worse, they can get on in regard to the children as well as in regard to anything else. It appears to me that if you provide that there should be a joint guardianship, and do not provide any means for making it effectual, the only result would be that the wife might feel that the law had given her a right without also giving a remedy. It therefore appears that if there is to be a joint guardianship while the spouses are living together, it is essential that there should be some provision for the intervention of a Court, and that to provide the intervention by a Court while they are living together would not be a benefit, but the reverse. We get into an entirely different region when the husband and wife are living separately, either voluntarily or under judicial authority, and it is in that case that I believe in England, and I think I may say certainly in Scotland, there is need for a remedy. I shall not go into the law of England in the absence of the Attorney General, who had meant to take part in this discussion, and who has been unavoidably obliged to leave; but I have not heard any challenge of the accuracy of the statement of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), in which he formulated the law of England as he understood it. He said that under the Act of 1873 the mother was excluded from the custody unless grave misconduct was made out against the father. He did not say exactly what was required to constitute grave misconduct on the part of the father; but I rather understand that something lighter would be enough to constitute misconduct in England than in Scotland. What I shall have to offer upon this point would, of course, apply a fortiori to Scotland, but would equally in principle apply to England. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) has quite correctly stated the law of Scotland on this matter. It has been decided that although there is a discretionary power vested in the Court, that discretion has become very much a matter of rule, and it is right that judicial discretion should be settled upon principles that can be known and understood; but it has this effect, that what is originally a discretion really comes in the end to be the application of a hard-and-fast rule. That hard-and-fast rule has gone the length in Scotland of being applied thus, that even where the husband and wife are living separately under a decree of the Court on the ground of cruelty, the husband is entitled to the custody of the child, however young—it may be weeks or months old—unless it is shown that residence with the husband is likely to be injurious to its morals or health. That is upon the ground that there is a primary right in the husband to the child—a survival of the patria potestas of the Roman law. In such a case there is no consideration for the wife, who is the victim; but in so far as the parents are considered at all, the consideration is for the husband, who is the guilty spouse. The primary and governing consideration ought to be the welfare of the child, and where consideration for either parent comes in, it ought to be subordinate and collateral to that. When the interests of the child would be indifferently subserved by giving it to one spouse or the other—and still more if the wife is the better custodian—she should have as good a right to it as the husband. When you have to consider between the husband and the wife, it should be the innocent and not the guilty, or, at all events, it should be open to the Court to take full view of all the considerations, and, other things being equal, to give the custody rather to the innocent than to the guilty spouse. I think it would be very easy, whatever view is taken of the other parts of the Bill, so to modify and amend it in Committee as to make provision for an improvement of the law in that very vital and important respect. There have been points of a more doubtful character mentioned, and I do not propose to go into them in detail or to defend the Bill as regards these points, but only to state the reasons why we assent to going into Committee. The 2nd clause provides that on the death of one of the parents the survivor shall be the guardian of the children. I take that to mean that the survivor shall be the sole guardian. That is a proposal open, certainly, to criticism, and it would demand very careful consideration. I should be disposed to say that the wife, if she was the survivor, should be a guardian; but it is quite another thing to say that she should be the sole guardian. And I may add that the provision is departed from when we come to the end of

Clause 4, where, as regards property left by a husband to a child, while he is to be allowed to nominate a guardian, that guardian is not to have the sole administration even of the property left by the husband, but is only to come in jointly with the mother. It is one thing to say that the mother shall be a guardian, or the sole guardian, when the person of the child and its education and religious training are concerned; a totally different thing to provide that the law shall decline to allow a man to appoint such trustees to a particular part of his property as he may choose, because it happens that that property is left to his child. That does appear to me a very strong proposal, and it would require a great deal of argument to convince one that it is right. That matter of guardianship ought to be considered in Committee, and in that matter, too, with some amendment, the Bill could be turned to some useful purpose—probably, at all events, to the extent of providing that the wife should in all cases be a guardian. Clause 4 is quite consistent with the general scheme of the Bill; but, of course, if the criticisms which I have ventured to submit to the House upon the other proposals in Clauses 2 and 3 have any substance in them, then Clause 4 would either become unnecessary or require a good deal of modification. As regards Clause 5, if the House should come to the conclusion that while the husband and wife are living together there should be judicial intervention—which I am not at the moment satisfied would be a beneficial proposal—then Clause 5 would require to be extended to meet that case, otherwise you would have a law without a sanction, and a right without a remedy. There are various proposals of a minor character which I do not go into now. It is a very fair question whether there ought not to be a power given to apply in certain cases to an Inferior Court. There are other matters in this Bill, particularly in its application to Scotland, which would want a considerable deal of amendment. There is much of the definition and phraseology, and of the Interpretation Clauses, which is not very appropriate to the law of Scotland; but any discussion upon these would be more fitted for Committee. All that seems necessary to be said now is, that we think this Bill may be turned into a useful measure—it may be by excoision to some extent, but possibly also by some addition, and that we assent to the second reading, and hope the House will take the same view.

MR. ELTON said, he thought that by the adoption of a process of excoision and alteration in Committee this Bill might be made to effect a useful reform. He thought that a wife who survived her husband should, at the discretion of the Court, have more power than she at present possessed in determining what religion the children should be brought up. He hoped also that occasion would be taken to abolish the whole series of semi-obsolete kinds of guardianship which infested the English law, such as guardianship in socage, by nature, by nurture, and guardianship of the lord of the manor or the Archbishop. He should support the second reading of the Bill.

MR. BRYCE, in reply, begged to express his satisfaction at the tone of the discussion which had taken place, and the admission universally made that the present law was indefensible. Everyone had admitted that the Bill furnished the basis of useful legislation whereby the law might be amended. He was not pledged to any particular form which his Bill might take in the details of its clauses, and would, therefore, be content if the House would read it a second time and subsequently deal with it in Committee.

MR. WARTON said, he objected to the principle laid down by the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch (Mr. Horace Davey) that when a mother changed her religion after her husband's death, she should be allowed to bring up the children in her newly-adopted faith. This Bill, which would bring discord into many happy homes, was promoted by an organization of strong-minded women, supported by weak-minded men, who held meetings, disseminated pamphlets, and wrote letters by the hundred. In many happy households now united they would by their pamphlets and letters stir up the wives to a neglect of their duty, and promote discord. It was perfectly clear to him that the Law of God declared that the husband should be supreme. Scripture said that, "The desire of the wife shall be to her husband, and he shall rule over her;" and, therefore, he had no belief in the equality of the sexes. The best wives did not wish to have the existing laws to be altered by Acts of Parliament and perversions of God's written Word.

MR. INCE said, that after the statement that his hon. Friend would place the details of the Bill in the hands of the Committee, he would not press his Amendment.

The House divided:—Ayes 208; Noes 73: Majority 135.—(Div. List, No. 52.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday 7th April.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER BILL.—[BILL 50.]

(Mr. Broadhurst, Sir Thomas Chambers, Mr. Alderman Cotton, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Collins, Mr. Causton, Mr. Puleston, Mr. Burt, Mr. Heneage, Mr. Samuel Morley.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for the Second Reading of this Bill be discharged, and that the Bill be withdrawn."—(Mr. Broadhurst.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE asked whether the Resolution in pari materid, of which the hon. Member had given Notice, was consistent with the Standing Order, it being identical in substance with the Bill now before the House, and having been given previous to the Notice of withdrawal?

MR. SPEAKER: There was nothing informal in the Notice given by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stoke. He now proposes to adopt a different mode of proceeding; but when the hon. Member gave Notice of his Motion, he intended, as I understood, to withdraw the Bill which now stands on the Order Book. I may remind the House that it is action, and not Notice, that is the material point, and the Motion of which Notice has been given could not come on for discussion so long as the Bill remained on the Orders. The hon. Member was quite in Order in taking the action which he did.

MR. HEALY supposed that the right hon. Gentleman might, if he pleased, object to the adoption of the hon. Member's present Motion for discharging the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes; in that case the Order would stand over till to-morrow, but nobody has objected.

Mr. HEALY: I object.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow.

REVISION OF VOTERS AND JURORS LISTS (DUBLIN COUNTY) [SALARY].

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of the annual Salary of the Revising Barrister for the county of Dublin, which may become payable under the provisions of any Act of the present Session to facilitate the Revision of Lists of Jurors and Voters, and the Registration of Voters in the county of Dublin.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

MOTION.

WATERWORKS RATING BILL.

On Motion of Mr. DODDS, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Rating of Waterworks Undertakings belonging to Local Authorities, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DODDS, Mr. BARRAN, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. NORTHCOTE, and Mr. CODDINGTON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 158.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

ARMY—ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE, SANDHURST—EXAMINATIONS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I rise to ask the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether he will state the nature of the alteration which has been recently made in the regulations for the examinations for admission to the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, and the grounds upon which the change has been made? I should like to ascertain what object the Government have in view in making this change? The practical result of the change made is that, whereas English composition, English history, and English literature, taken together, were subjects which had the highest number of marks—namely, 3,000—they have now been banished altogether from that favoured position, and put into the position of having only 1,000 marks attached to them. This will make them unlikely to be frequently selected by candidates as their subjects. In place of English literature, German and French literature are to receive the additional number of 1,000 marks. The result is that English literature is altogether swept out, and each candidate must take up Latin and mathematics, or German and French. I wish to know on what ground this set has been made against English literature? At the same time, another change has been made which I confess I regard with some regret. A much smaller value has been given than before to natural science, chemistry, and such subjects. Of course I am aware that public school boys will prefer Latin, but many boys take more readily to the study of English than Latin literature; and to many, not educated at public schools, English literature will be more acceptable and a better test of their capacity; and, certainly, if you look to the utility of the studies, English literature will compare favourably with Latin. The change with respect to natural science is still more to be regretted, because there is no body of men to whom a knowledge of science could be more useful, and conduce more to their happiness, especially when it is considered that they have to pass large portions of their time in various parts of the world, often with no adequate employment for their spare hours. I wish to know what are the latest intentions of Her Majesty's Government on this subject, as I understand that even yet there is some doubt on the subject, and what are the reasons for this change?

THE EARL OF MORLEY, in reply, said, the Question was a very natural one, and he was not at all surprised at its being asked. At the same time, he was much obliged to the noble Marquess for giving him an opportunity of explaining the main changes in the examinations, and the reasons which had induced Her Majesty's Government to introduce them. The noble Marquess had been, no doubt, fairly accurate in the description of the main features of these changes. At present there were practically eight subjects given to candidates, of which they must take up not less than two or more than four. These were — mathematics, to which 3,000 marks were given; English composition, English literature, and English history, limited to certain fixed periods, also 3,000; Latin, 3,000; Greek, 2,000; French and German, each 2,000; experimental sciences, 2,000; general and physical geography and geology, 2,000; freehand drawing, 1,000; and geometrical drawing, 500 marks. Under the new scheme a different line had been taken. The subjects were divided into three classes. In the first class were subjects having a maximum of 3,000 marks — namely, mathematics, Latin, French, and German, each of which commanded the maximum number of marks. In the second class came five subjects, with a maximum of 2,000 marks, given to Greek and to higher mathematics; 1,500 marks were given to each of the following subjects:—English history, included one general paper and one limited to a fixed period; experimental sciences; and general and physical geography and geology. In the third class came English composition, tested by the power of writing and essay, letter, or précis, freehand drawing and geometrical drawing. The maximum for each of these three subjects was 500 marks. It was proposed that every competitor who came up for this examination should have a more restricted option of subjects than he had before. In the first class he must take up three subjects, and, in addition, he might take up one subject in Class I. or Class II., and all the subjects in Class III. Far greater importance was thus given to modern languages in the new scheme, and also to mathematics, while less importance was given to science. The English paper as it had existed before was now abolished. The details which he gave to the House were, he acknowledged, somewhat technical. The object of these changes was not to screw up the examinations, but as far as possible to improve their character and to encourage the taking up of subjects which must be taught rather than crammed. In drawing up that scheme they had had the advantage of the advice of the noble Viscount behind him (Viscount Enfield) and of the other Civil Service Commissioners, and of communication with a great many gentlemen interested in education. Of course, the War Office had the whole responsibility of the scheme; but he begged to thank them for the assistance which they had given. They had also consulted other gentlemen who had been engaged in education. It was quite unnecessary to argue the question whether competitive examinations were good or bad. The main object was to test the results of a general education, and to do that satisfactorily it was necessary that the subjects should be general subjects, and not set ones. That was one of the faults of the present system. These examinations were not intended to be technical or military, but to test the general education of the candidates; their military education began at Sandhurst. They did not think it necessary or desirable, in drawing up a scheme for the examination of candidates for the Army, to follow the exact lines laid down by public schools. They should consider what were the subjects which should be included in general education, and thus encourage in the schools the study of those subjects which had hitherto been too little attended to in the scholastic curriculum. It was a matter of regret that during the last few years the number of successful candidates for admission to the Military College who came direct from the public schools was rather diminishing than increasing. At the February examination in 1877, out of 177 successful candidates 61 were helped by tutors—that was, 116 went straight from school. In December, 1883, out of 170 there were 123 helped by private tutors—that was, 47 went straight from school. He did not wish for a moment to speak disparagingly of private tutors, some of whom were extremely able and admirable teachers; but, taking them as a rule, he feared that their main object was mark-getting. They did not, in many cases, he believed, even require their pupils to read the books in which they were to be examined, but by an ingenious process of analyzing all the questions which had been set at a given number of examinations they could almost exhaust the number of questions that were put, and then by means of epitomes, abstracts, and essays of all kinds which they made their pupils commit to memory, there were a great many chances to one that when their pupils came up for examination they would find these "tips" available for use. That, however, was not real education, but simply a process of cramming. It did not last, and had not the same effect on the mind as genuine teaching. But he had a still greater complaint, not against individuals, but against the system of private tutors, and that was the moral effect it had upon young men at a particularly critical period of their life. They went to them for a short time merely to obtain sufficient information to enable them to get the requisite number of marks to secure admission to Sandhurst. These tutors generally had little or no responsibility for and no moral supervision or control over their pupils. These pupils, while at school, were subject to the moral control of their tutors, and, what was even more important, to the public opinion of their school-fellows. He was glad to think that the tone of our public schools was sound and healthy. At Sandhurst, and afterwards in the Army, they were subject to military discipline, and to the influence of their brother officers. In the interval of time which was spent at a tutor's, prematurely emancipated from the restraints of school, they were not subject to the wholesome influences of school traditions, or of military discipline and esprit de corps. This he considered as a great danger to boys between 16 and 19 years of age, and he believed was the cause of many bad habits being contracted. Some time ago he had heard a story, though he could not vouch for its truth, which gave an idea of the general impression entertained in regard to the moral responsibility of those private tutors. He was told that a parent, anxious about certain irregularities which his son had committed, complained to his tutor, remarking on the peril which the young man's soul incurred. The tutor replied that he had no responsibility as to the pupil's soul, but had only to get his body into Sandhurst. The training in schools was more healthy, and it was desirable, as far as they could, to obviate the necessity for the employment of those private tutors. It would be admitted that the staple elements of education were literary and scientific knowledge, languages, and mathematics. Mathematics, Latin, French, and German were now to be placed in the first class, each with a maximum of 3,000 marks. In the second class came Greek. It had been suggested that Greek should be put in the first class, but after careful consideration it had been decided to put it in the second class. When really well learnt, Greek was an admirable instrument of education; but for boys who were going into the Army at 17 or 18, he found that the results to be obtained were so slight that they would not be justified in putting it higher in the scale than they had done. The noble Marquess had complained of the way in which they treated the English paper, which consisted of three parts—composition, literature, and history. The changes now made were to give English history and composition as separate papers, the former in the second, the latter in the third class, and to abolish the examination in literature altogether. With regard to English literature, it was a field in which cramming was most rampant. If they could exact from those young men a general knowledge of English literature it would be advantageous, but, as a matter of fact, it was acknowledged by all who had experience in such examinations to be impossible. He would repeat that in many cases the tutors did not even require the pupils to read the book in which they were to be examined. Much the same remark applied to history, in which also there was much cramming. As regards the examination in the experimental sciences, a deputation of distinguished gentlemen connected with the Royal Society and the British Association had met with the authorities of the War Office a few days ago, and they represented that it was extremely inexpedient to lower the number of marks allotted to experimental science. It was argued by them that lowering the number of marks given to this subject would discourage the instruction carried on in public schools. He was bound to say there was great force in that objection, and his noble Friend the Secretary of State for War was now considering whether the same number of marks should not be attached to this paper as in the case of higher mathematics and Greek. At the same time, the gentlemen to whom he had referred, among whom were Professor Huxley and Dr. Carpenter, were of opinion that the present papers were not satisfactory. They had sent suggestions to the War Office with the view of re-classifying them in a more satisfactory manner, and this he thought would tend to the improvement of the papers. The last paper was that dealing with geography and geology. The gentlemen to whom he referred had admitted to him that they could not attach so much importance to this paper as to experimental sciences. On this subject, again, the gentlemen to whom he referred had made several suggestions, and it was under consideration as to whether all the subjects should be placed in Class II. or on the same level. He thought he had now stated as carefully as he could the reasons which had induced the Government to alter the present scheme of arrangements at Sandhurst. The scheme he had sketched would still admit of a considerable choice of subjects being made to suit the tastes of candidates; but no doubt it was rather less elastic than the present scheme. He believed that all the subjects could be learnt at school; and the public schools must make efforts to improve the instructions which they gave in them, if they desired to retain their pupils, and to obviate the great evil which had resulted in the necessity of leaving the school to go to private tutors. He did not wish to say a word against private tutors as a rule. He did not deny that many of them were able teachers; but, for reasons already given, he considered that, both morally and intellectually, the time spent with private tutors was in too many cases badly spent. The scheme would not come into effect until the middle, or, perhaps, the end of next year, and therefore ample time would be afforded to all schools and individuals engaged in educational work to make any necessary alterations in their systems to suit the requirements which were now laid down for admission to the Army.

LORD WAVENEY said, he knew, from his own experience, of the degradation of the moral fibre of young men who were allowed, through the carelessness of private tutors, to dispense with the discipline that was so essential. He believed it to be essential that the young soldier should be familiarized with his weapons as early as possible in his career. He thought it was better to train a young soldier up to a certain point and until he was capable of attaining a certain amount of military knowledge. He referred to the establishment of the military school at Oxford for the purpose of breaking through the barrack system. The system had been an efficacious one. Young men were taught all kinds of athletic sports, and he was confident that they did honour to the regiments by which they were selected.

LORD RIBBLESDALE said, he hoped the noble Earl (the Earl of Morley) was correct in telling their Lordships that the alteration in the number of marks would not in any way tend to discourage English composition. He believed the early habit of English composition was of the greatest use in these days of examination to young officers who intended to make the Army their profession, because to attain the rank of captain they had to pass an important examination in tactics, and they could not write a good paper unless they knew something of composition.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, the noble Earl was correct in saying that the changes that had been sketched were the result of correspondence and consultation between the War Office on the one hand and the Civil Service Commission on the other. He believed that his noble Friend, together with the noble Marquess at the head of the War Office and the Civil Service Commissioners, acting in favour of the public and the Army, had but one object in view—namely, to make such changes in the examination as would give the fairest chance to young men who were educated in the public schools in order that they might be able to pass from those public schools direct to Woolwich and Sandhurst without the intervention of cram-mers. In regard to the subjects that were to be taught under this scheme, he thought elementary mathematics was a sine quid non to any young man entering the Army. Latin and mathematics were subjects which were likely to be thoroughly taught in our public schools; but, unfortunately, it was too often the case that young men who had been educated in great schools like Eton, Harrow, Winchester, Cheltenham, and Marlborough, were obliged afterwards to have recourse to crammers. In limiting the subjects to Latin, mathematics, and French or German, good results were likely to be produced. The noble Marquess expressed regret that the number of marks allowed for English history had been reduced. Some correspondence had passed between the War Office and the Civil Service Commission on this point, and it was probable that the number of marks for this subject would be raised to 2,000, which would be a very fair amount. The parents and guardians of the young men who were candidates for the Army desired that the education which they received before they competed should be of a practical character, and that what they learnt they should learn thoroughly. With this object he thought it would be well if the War Office insisted upon elementary mathematics, one modern language, and Latin or Greek as essential in the examination for entrance into the Army, added to which there should be a competent knowledge of English history. The deliberations between the War Office and the Civil Service Commission on these matters had been of the most harmonious character.

LORD STRATHNAIRN said, it was absolutely necessary that English officers should be thoroughly educated and trained for their work. He trusted that the short-service system would soon be replaced by long service, which would ensure better soldiers and improve the condition of the Army generally. They should not forget past dangers resulting from the state of the Forces. The noble Lord went into a criticism of the tactics that had been employed in the conduct of the Zulu and Soudan Campaigns; but the drift of his observations did not reach the Gallery.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, I shall not attempt to enter into the large military questions dealt with by the noble and gallant Lord who has just sat down, for I do not think that they are raised by the Question of the noble Marquess. But I should like to make this observation without giving any special opinion—that I think his condemnation of any particular movement is rather a dangerous thing, and I cannot help thinking that the result of what we have heard is quite inconsistent with the existence of the grave evils of which the noble Marquess is afraid. I think we may safely say that the gallantry of the troops serving in Egypt has been very conspicuous; and though, perhaps, some persons are disposed to think lightly of the enemy they have had to deal with, I venture to think it is a very peculiar and special enemy, inspired with very great fanaticism, who it is well known will do anything and court death really with more pleasure than if he escaped destruction. Therefore, I do not think it can be said the enemy was not a formidable one. But, without going into that question, I will merely remark that the great object of our examinations was to open up the education of the country. We want to do away with cramming as much as possible, and to see young men enter Sandhurst and Woolwich from the great schools—from Eton, Harrow, or Winchester, or from the more modern schools, such as Wellington College and Marlborough College or Cheltenham College—rather than to come from a course of cramming, which, I am sorry to say, has been very much the practice. I wish to draw the attention of your Lordships to the desirability that the great schools should try to accommodate themselves to educating their young men so as to enable them to go direct to Sandhurst. We want young men to come up to the general education, such as I should think any young gentleman ought to have, whatever the special sphere of life he intends to adopt; and, therefore, our endeavour is to put forward such a syllabus of examination that all these young candidates should have a fair opportunity of entering Woolwich or Sandhurst direct from those schools, and that I may say is the object we have in view, and that I believe is the object of the noble Earl and of the noble Lord behind him. When they come to Woolwich or Sandhurst we try to instil into them those necessary military subjects which it is essential for them to know for the practice of their Profession; but up to that time we only look for an education in general subjects, and not special subjects—an education such as any gentleman ought to have if he wishes to be useful to his country. These changes have been made entirely with that object in view. I am convinced, however, that should anything arise to lead us to suppose that some modifications in the proposed change are necessary to secure the result we desire, I have no doubt they will be gladly and willingly accepted. But I think, on the whole, the principle now laid down is a sound principle; and therefore I trust the great schools of the country will give us their assistance in enabling the young lads whom they educate to enter directly into the great Colleges of the Public Service without having to pass through an ordeal which I believe is not at all to their advantage.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I do not propose to follow my noble Friend who spoke before the illustrious Duke in the interesting matter with which he dealt. The judgment of military evolutions can only be satisfactorily performed by those who know the object of them, and I, at least, have not advanced to that knowledge yet. I have listened with great attention to the speeches of the illustrious Duke and the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State, from which it is evident that the policy which animates the ruling powers in this matter is to put down cramming. I dare say that may be theoretically desirable. I am not sure, however, that I can go without reserve even so far as that, for in many walks in life there is no power more desirable than the power of acquiring knowledge rapidly. But, on the whole, I sympathize with the efforts that are being made to repress the practice. I can also understand and sympathize with the feelings that have been expressed by the noble Earl as to the want of moral discipline which characterizes some of the establishments for private tuition. You will, however, never get rid of cramming as long as you have a system of competitive examinations. You might as well dream of having races without trainers, as of having competitive examinations without cramming. When we were at Oxford we thought it no shame or harm to have special coaches to prepare us for examinations. We were crammed, and my belief is that, wherever you have examinations, you will have crammers. I admit that, in connection with particular subjects, the system of cramming may be pushed too far; but wherever that is the case, the fault is due to the practice of the educational establishments of the country, which have not brought themselves into harmony with your educational policy, and are pursuing a different system. A sudden change has consequently to be made at the time when a boy leaves school and before he enters the Army. The object of the military authorities is that sympathy should be established between them and the public schools, and that such a sudden reversal of study should not be necessary. I am inclined to think that they are pursuing that object in rather a dangerous way. If there is a difference of opinion between the great public authorities and the public schools, I think the former should hold out and not give way to the schools. When, in deference to the wishes of the public schools, you give up any particular branch of education, you are removing them from the influence of public opinion to which they ought to be subject. By deferring to the schools in educational matters, you may even preserve systems and methods of education which public opinion is beginning to condemn. With respect to the importance of English literature, I noticed that the noble Earl, in arguing against the subject, said—

But you expect them to have a general knowledge of Latin literature and history. Why cannot they have as general a knowledge of English as they can have of Latin? The only reason is that the public schools will not teach English literature and history, and if you tell them that you will change your course to suit their preconceived ideas, that will still continue to be the case. It is you who must force them, not they who must force you. I do not desire to depreciate the subjects of education hitherto taught, and I recognize the advantages arising from the study of Latin literature and history; but there is also some advantage arising from the study of English literature and history. There is no civilized country that treats its own tongue as badly as we do ours. In France and Germany the French language and the German language are the subjects of careful study, while we seem to treat our language and history as subjects of no importance, which may be learnt accidentally in the nursery or in conversation after school hours. That is the great fault of our public school education; and I am sorry that the Government should not use the influence which these examinations give them, to lead the public schools into a more desirable path than that which they follow at present.

EGYPT—(MILITARY OPERATIONS IN THE SOUDAN).—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he wished to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which he had given him private Notice. There was a report that some fresh information had been received from the Soudan with regard to the advance of General Graham. It would be a great advantage if the noble Earl would state how far it was correct?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, Notice of this Question was given to me only two minutes ago. Therefore, it is necessary that the answer I give to the noble Earl should be received with reservation. As far as I know, the information which has been received from the Soudan is contained in a telegram from Sir William Hewett, dated Suakin, 2 P.M., this day. He says that the enemy had been driven away without loss on our side from a village the name of which I will not venture to pronounce, where water, which was much wanted by most of the men and animals, was found, and that the rebels were dispersing.

QUESTIONS.

INLAND REVENUE—DIVIDED PARISHES ACTS—THE LAND TAX.

MR. THOMAS COLLINS asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, in those parts of parishes which, under the Divided Parishes Acts, have been added to other parishes, Land Tax levied therein forms a part of the quota of the ancient parish, or part of the quota of the parish into which such divided parts of such parish have been cast; and, if the latter is the case, whether the Government is prepared to recommend legislation with a view to alter the quota of the enlarged parish in accordance with the rateable property added thereto?

MR. COURTNEY: It has been judicially decided that in the cases of parts of parishes which, under the Divided Parishes Acts, have been added to other parishes, the Land Tax forms part of the quota of the ancient parish.

THE EGYPTIAN WAR (1882)—THE INDIAN CONTINGENT—CASE OF MR. STRINGER.

MR. SALT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether any decision has been arrived at with respect to an appeal which he said, on 7th August last, had been forwarded to the Government of India regarding certain disputed claims; and, whether any, and, if so, what compensation has been given in respect of such claims?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The appeal in question having been sent to the Government of India, they replied—

"We are of opinion that Mr. Stringer received every consideration from the military authorities of the Indian Contingent, and that there are no sufficient grounds why the award of the arbitrator should be set aside, and any further sums paid to Mr. Stringer."

Mr. Stringer was, therefore, informed last December that he would receive no grant in excess of the sum awarded by the arbitrators appointed at Alexandria to settle his dispute.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT—WATER SUPPLY (IRELAND)—GUARDIANS OF BALLYBAY.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to a Memorial, influentially and numerous signed, forwarded on 30th January to the Local Government Board, alleging that the water supply to the town of Ballybay, county Monaghan, was totally inadequate; that a large portion of the townspeople were compelled to use the water of a river polluted with sewage matter; and that typhus fever prevailed in the town for a considerable time; whether the Memorialists asked for an investigation by a Local Government Board inspector into the grievance mentioned and the general unsanitary condition of the town, and what action has been taken thereupon; whether the water supply (temporarily improved after Memorial was forwarded) is now as deficient as before; has the number of fever cases in the town increased largely of late; has the Local Government Board been dependent for answers to the allegations in the Memorial on the parties responsible for the present state of the town, viz. the Board of Guardians and the local sanitary officer; and, whether an Inspector will now be sent to take the evidence of the inhabitants on the water question, and to inquire generally into other matters seriously affecting the health of the town?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed by the Local Government Board that a Memorial was received as to the shortness of water supply to the town of Ballybay, and such inquiries as have been made leave no doubt that the water supply of the town is defective. The Inspector of the Local Government Board went to examine into the matter of the water supply; and the Board have recommended the Guardians to employ professional assistance for the purpose of ascertaining the best means of improving the water supply, and they will not allow the matter to drop, and, if necessary, will send a Medical Inspector to report on the state of the town. At present they do not consider this necessary. The Reports of the medical officer show that there has been in all 13 cases of fever under his charge since the 1st of January. On the 1st of this month he reported that he had none, and on the 18th he stated that he had no patients suffering from any disease likely to become infectious. The Board of Guardians are quite willing that the Town Commissioners should become the Urban Sanitary Authority and manage their own affairs; and the Local Government Board are willing to consider an application with that object under Section 7 of the Public Health Act.

CRIMINAL LAW (SCOTLAND)—CASE OF LACHLAN McLEOD.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Lachlan McLeod, Uig, Island of Skye, who some time ago was sentenced by Sheriff Substitute Speirs, Portree, to ten days' imprisonment with hard labour for supposed prevarication while giving evidence in a civil action; whether, on the case being appealed to the High Court of Justiciary, Edinburgh, for suspension of the sentence, appeal was refused, Lord Young dissenting from the other Judges; whether his attention has been called to the words of Lord Young, that this was a "High-handed summary procedure, founded on a fiction long since abandoned in the Supreme Criminal Court, where alone, so far as he knew, it was ever adopted;"

and, whether he would order a full inquiry into the sheriff's conduct in the matter?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): This question has been finally decided by the highest Court of Appeal in Scotland, and there appears to be no necessity, and indeed no room, for further inquiry into the matter.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—SUB-POST BETWEEN DORRA AND BLACKLION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Postmaster General, Has the report of Mr. Bell, surveyor of the Northern Division, been yet laid before the Lords of the Treasury regarding a Sub Post Office between Dorra and Blacklion; did the surveyor disapprove of the premises of a man named Wynne; and, did surveyor report in favour of any other; and, if so, why has the vacancy not been filled up?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, it had been reported to him that a Mr. Lee was a qualified person who would be willing to take this office, and he would be at once appointed.

IRISH REPRODUCTIVE LOAN FUND ACT.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that, at a public inquiry held within the last few months at Union Hall, county Cork, at which the three Inspectors of Fisheries were present, complaint was made by the parish priest of the short period (only three years in general) for which loans under the Reproductive Fund were granted, thus involving an annual payment of more than thirty-three per cent., and that he had been obliged to back bills for borrowers in order to enable them to meet these instalments; whether, according to the last Report, not more than one-third in 1882, and one-half in 1883, have been expended of the money available for the county Cork; and, whether he would advise the Inspector in charge to extend the time for repayment to five or six years?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that at a meeting of the Piers and Harbours Committee in Ireland, held at Union Hall, County Cork, on the 24th of January, complaint was made of the short period for which loans under the Reproductive Fund were granted. It is true that only a comparatively small part of the money available for the county of Cork in 1882 was expended; but the greater portion of it only became available in October (in consequence of the passing of the Act 45 Vict. c. 16). Out of the money available in 1883, loans to the extent of over three-fourths were recommended. I understand that all this money has not yet been actually advanced, in consequence of delay arising from the Inspectors themselves supplying the articles and paying for them. The last paragraph, which is the most important, I cannot answer now because it has not been replied to by the Inspector, and I must wait for further communications from him.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1876) —THE PUPIL TEACHER GRANT.

MR. SALT asked the Vice President of the Council, If in view of the hardship that may be occasioned to many schools by the proposed Article 114 of the New Code, he will consider the expediency of allowing, as heretofore, the special grant for pupil teachers (Articles 110 and 110*) to be exempt from the operation of the money limitation?

MR. MUNDELLA: Last year, for the first time, we excepted the pupil teacher grant from the operation of the money limitation of the Act of 1876. But it has been pointed out to us that this was contrary to the 19th section of Viscount Sandon's Act, and, therefore cannot be sustained. The consequent reduction, however, is a very small matter.

MR. BOURKE: Has the Vice President considered what effect that decision would have on the various schools?

MR. MUNDELLA: The effect will be that the pupil teachers' grant will be in the same position as it was in 1876, and has been since.

MR. BOURKE: Will the House have an opportunity of expressing its opinion on the New Code?

MR. MUNDELLA: Of course, any Member can at any time before the New Code becomes law call attention to it.

In reply to Mr. STANLEY LEIGHTON,

MR. MUNDELLA said, the New Code would come into operation 30 days from the date of its being laid on the Table.

MR. J. G. TALBOT: Will an opportunity be given to discuss the Code?

MR. MUNDELLA: As the matter cannot be blocked, it can be discussed any night.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—MANAGEMENT OF ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked the Vice President of the Council, If he will be good enough to explain to the House to what extent managers of public elementary schools are to be held responsible for the health of individual scholars under Article 8 of the Educational Code of 1884; whether it is intended that it shall rest with the managers to decide as to the need of withholding individual scholars from examination; whether the action of managers in this respect is to be subject to review by school inspectors; and, what effect such withholding by managers of individual scholars from examination will have upon the merit or other portion of the Government grant?

MR. MUNDELLA: The Question is an important one. It is intended that managers of public elementary schools shall be generally responsible for the conduct of the schools and of the schoolmasters for issuing directions to the teacher as to not pressing children of weakly constitution, and for seeing that these directions are obeyed. It is obvious that there are two reasons for withholding children from examination—one is for the protection of the child; the other is for the purpose of enabling the school to obtain a larger grant. The first is a very proper object; the other ought to be discouraged. The Department has a right to expect the co-operation of managers in distinguishing between these two classes of cases. If any children are withheld from examination by the teacher and managers, the reasons for so doing will be stated to the Inspector, and it will be for him to judge whether they are satisfactory. The Inspector will be instructed to pay special regard to the representations of the managers, and if they are in this respect overruled by the Inspector they will, of course, have the right to appeal to the Department. It will strengthen the position of teachers, to be supported by their managers in their claims for withdrawals. The effect of improperly withholding individual scholars will be that they will be treated as failures. But such withdrawal will not affect the merit grant.

MR. R. H. PAGET: Are we to understand the right hon. Gentleman that if the managers of a school withdraw 8 or 10 per cent under this Article, it will in no way affect the grant—that the Inspector will be in no way entitled to reduce the grant?

MR. MUNDELLA: No, Sir. I say that the withdrawal will in no respect affect the grant, although withholding from examination may do so.

MR. ONSLOW: Who is judge of the weakly condition of the children—the manager, the schoolmaster or schoolmistress, or the parents?

MR. MUNDELLA: I do not know anyone so well able to judge as the local managers and the teachers. It is impossible for the Central Department at Whitehall to judge; and it is because we wish the local managers to exercise some discretion that we have left the matter in the hands of the teachers.

MR. R. H. PAGET: If it is to be left to the discretion of the managers, is it to be understood that that discretion is liable to be overruled by the Inspector?

MR. MUNDELLA: If the Inspector thinks that scholars have been improperly withheld for the purpose of obtaining an additional grant, he will disallow the claim. The managers have the right to appeal to the Department.

IRISH COURT OF PROBATE—DISTRICT REGISTRARS.

MR. GIBSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether there is any truth in the report that Her Majesty's Government intend to bring in a Bill to abolish the District Registrars of the Irish Court of Probate; whether the Judge of that Court has been consulted on the subject; and, whether a similar measure is contemplated as regards the District Registrars in England?

MR. O'BRIEN asked whether there was any intention to abolish the Probate Judgeship?

MR. TREVELYAN: A proposal has been made, and is now under the consideration of the Irish Government, for providing greater facilities for obtaining probate and letters of administration in the localities in which the executors or administrators reside. Up to the present nothing has been determined about it. It has been only within the last day or two that the matter has come before the Irish Government, and the Judge of the Court of Probate will be consulted. I have no information as to any similar proposal having been made respecting the District Registrars in England.

NAVY (DOCKYARDS)—CHATHAM DOCKYARD.

MR. GORST asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether a practice has been recently commenced, in Her Majesty's Dockyard at Chatham, of placing workmen on piecework without previously informing them of the prices that will be paid for such work; and, whether he will direct that in future such information shall be given before piecework is commenced?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : The practice referred to by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham is not new, but has always prevailed in the Dockyard. It is not considered desirable that the scheme of prices for piecework should be officially communicated to the workmen.

NAVY (DOCKYARDS)—ARTIZANS' MEMORIALS.

MR. GORST asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether any decisions have yet been arrived at by the Lords of the Admiralty upon the Petitions presented by various classes of workmen, in Her Majesty's Dockyards, at the beginning of last year; and, when it is expected that their Lordships' decisions will be communicated to the persons interested?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : In introducing the Navy Estimates in Committee of Supply I made a full statement of the position of this matter. I hope there will not be much longer delay.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked when the answers would be officially communicated to the men; and, also, whether Her Majesty's Government would consent to present to Parliament copies of the various Memorials which had been sent in by the men in reference to their claims?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I do not think that it would serve any useful purpose to present these Memorials to Parliament. As to when the Memorials would be answered, the nature of the answers must be determined upon in the first place.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked whether the Admiralty always took a whole year to consider such Memorials?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, that if the hon. Gentleman had been present when he made his Statement in moving the Navy Estimates and heard the explanation given, he would not have asked such a Question.

ARMY (INDIA)—INDIAN GRADATION LIST—GENERAL ORDER No. 579.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is a fact that the "Cavalry" Officers who elected the terms offered them in General Order No. 579, dated 27th October 1882, have been denied the brevet promotion on the Indian Gradation List to which they consider themselves entitled through the promise given them before electing, in the reply by the Government of India to Question VII. in its letter No. 1527 A, dated 11th December 1882; whether the brevet promotion on the Indian Gradation List of any Cavalry Officer has been cancelled since December 1882; and, whether, in view of the loss of Army rank to such officers through the misunderstanding under which they elected the above terms, they will now be permitted to revert to their former positions?

MR. J. K. CROSS : The Cavalry officers who came under the terms of the General Order in question waived their claim to all advantages attaching to their position as local Cavalry officers; one of these advantages being brevet promotion in succession to General Officers. Finding, however, that the Government of India had already formally promised these officers the continuance of their brevet promotion, the Secretary of State determined to accept this decision; and the Government of India was informed, in January last, that the system of brevet promotion would be continued. The brevet promotion of an officer, made in anticipation by the local authorities, but which had not been confirmed, was thereupon submitted for Her Majesty's approval.

GRANTING OF CHARTERS BY THE BOARD OF TRADE—FACILITIES FOR OPPOSITION.

MR. ROUNDELL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, when applications for the grant of a Charter are referred by the Privy Council to the Board of Trade, it is the practice of the Board, before making a Report upon the subject, to give opportunity, by the issue of advertisements or otherwise, for the making of objections; and, whether there is uniformity in the practice of the Board in this matter?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: When applications for the grant of a Charter are referred by the Privy Council Office to the Board of Trade, it is the uniform practice of the Board of Trade to cause an advertisement to be issued for the purpose of ascertaining what objections there are against the proposed grant.

ARMY—WOOLWICH ARSENAL—SURPLUS STORES—THE "REMAIN."

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether the "Remain," now being taken at Woolwich, will include all the "old" stores and all the "unserviceable" stores at the Arsenal and at the Dockyard; whether it is intended to sell by auction, or otherwise, any of the old stores or of the unserviceable stores at the above-mentioned dépôts without first taking stock of them; whether any facilities will be furnished for the perusal by Members of this House of any auction or other catalogue prepared for the purpose of such sale; and, whether there would be any objection to produce, for the information of the House, after the comparison between the ledger-balances and the result and the stock-taking has been made, a Statement of the surpluses and deficiencies found?

MR. BRAND: The "Remain" now being taken at Woolwich will include all the stores in Woolwich Arsenal and Dockyard. It is not intended to sell old or unserviceable stores without first taking stock of them. As I have before explained to the hon. Member, catalogues of sales by auction (which will be advertised in the Press) will be obtainable at the War Office or from the auctioneer. With regard to the hon. Member's concluding inquiry, there would be no objection to give the Return, except that it would be long and complicated, and its printing would entail a considerable expense.

ROAD MAINTENANCE (IRELAND).

COLONEL NOLAN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If contributions are made from the Imperial Exchequer towards the expenses of certain roads in England and Scotland; and, if he would consider the propriety of extending this advantage to some districts in Ireland where the County Rates are very high?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): The answer to the first Question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman is in the affirmative. As to the second, I am not prepared to propose this grant without reviewing the whole question of the contributions from Imperial funds towards local burdens in Ireland. At present, Ireland is far more favourably situated than England and Scotland in this respect; and I fear that the additional cost to the Irish ratepayers would be very heavy if the three countries were placed on an equality.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—THE RECORDER OF DUBLIN.

MR. WHITLEY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he could inform the House what is the salary of the Recorder of Dublin; how many working days did he sit in the year 1883; and, how many of those days were occupied in the revision of jurors' or voters' lists?

MR. TREVELYAN: The salary of the Recorder of Dublin is fixed by statute at £2,500 a-year. It appears, from Returns which have been furnished from the officers of the several Courts over which the Recorder presides, that in 1883 he sat on 162 days, of which 20 were occupied in the revision of voters' and jurors' lists. It is necessary to add that by law the sittings of the Recorder for the revision of the Parliamentary lists are fixed to begin on the 8th of September in each year. I am informed by the Recorder that his summer sittings in the Civil Bill Court last late into August, and that he resumes these sittings on the 1st of October, without any interval between the Parliamentary Revision and the Civil Bill Court duty. In this way the pressure upon the autumn quarter is greater than at any other period of the year.

MR. HEALY asked whether it was not the fact that the Recorder last year threatened that he might be unable to finish the year's work within the statutable time; and whether, in such an event, a legal question would not arise involving the disfranchisement of the county of Dublin?

MR. TREVELYAN: Yes.

THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY (IRELAND)
—QUEEN'S COLLEGES—CORK COLLEGE.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Government are prepared to grant the Returns, of which Notices stand upon the Notice Paper, relating to the Queen's Colleges, (Ireland) and the Royal University (Ireland)?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Irish Government have received an application from the corporate body of the Cork College for a Royal Commission of Inquiry; and while of opinion that an inquiry is necessary, are at present considering the form in which it should be made and the field which it should cover. Such inquiry, if held, would probably obviate the necessity for the Returns the hon. Member is anxious to obtain; but as I cannot speak definitely on that point, I should be glad if the hon. Member would repeat his Question next week, and if, in the meantime, he and the other hon. Members would not press for Returns.

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND) ACT
—THE KINSALE QUAY AND PIER.

MR. DEASY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he has ascertained whether the Kinsale Harbour Board contributed £2,000 or £3,000 towards the building of the Kinsale Quay and Pier; if the latter sum, could he explain the letter from the Board of Works to the Piers and Harbours Commissioners, and read by them at the public meeting held in Kinsale, in which it was stated that the amount contributed was only £2,000; if it is a fact that no memorial was at any time received by the Board of Works, in accordance with the sixth section of the Piers and Harbours Act, 9 Vic. c. 3, for works at the World's End, and that the only memorial in accordance with that section was for a pier at Scilly; if it was sworn to at the late inquiry by the harbour master that—"There would be little use in carrying out the present works without dredging and deepening," and that this has not been provided for in the Board of Works' plans; and that to carry out this so as to enable fishing vessels to come to the quay for nearly its entire length—

"Will cost as much, if not more, than the original estimate;"

if it is true that one of the Commissioners, Mr. Johnston, stated at the inquiry—

"That a sum of £16,000 would be thrown away unless a further large sum will be expended in dredging and deepening, and that, if the works were carried on at Scilly, no such extra expenditure would be necessary;"

and, whether the Commissioners of Piers and Harbours have made any Report consequent on the inquiry above referred to respecting the alleged inadequacy of the proposed works to meet the requirements of the craft engaged in the mackerel fishery; and, if not, when may the Report be expected?

MR. COURTNEY: The original contribution by the Kinsale Harbour Board was £2,000; but there was a subsequent addition of £1,000, and the omission of the latter sum in the letter referred to has since been rectified. Two Memorials under the Piers and Harbours Act, 1846, have been received in favour of the site which has been chosen, one in favour of the alternative site at Scilly, and none about the site called "World's End." The Report of the inquiry which I have seen is somewhat confused. Mr. Johnston suggested in a question that the money would be wasted unless more was spent; but the witness did not agree with him, and he did not make the erroneous statement that the Scilly scheme would be cheaper. The Report of the Piers and Harbours Commission has not been received; and, in the meanwhile, nothing is being done to prejudice the decision as to whether additional work should be done.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE
(IRELAND)—THE SHANNON SLUICES.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If the Board of Works has received any Report as to the efficiency of the Shannon sluices at Killybegs; and, if any complaints have been received as to the upper water being caught by the sluices when raised?

MR. COURTNEY: Weekly Reports are received from all the Shannon sluices; and I am glad to say that their action throughout the winter has been attended with good results. The only complaints received have been to the effect that floods have not been put a stop to altogether; but a total cessation of flooding could never be attained, and was never expected.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)
—ILLEGAL DISTRESS—MR. ARTHUR
HAMILL, COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How it happened that Mr. Arthur Hamill, Q.C., County Court Judge, was allowed, on the 20th ultimo, to seize certain cattle and other stock of his tenant, Mr. Patrick Bellew, at Tully, near Mullaveir, County Louth, drive them a distance of about ten miles, and sell them by public auction on a fair day in the town of Dundalk, although the movement and sale of cattle in that district was forbidden by proclamation; and, whether Mr. Patrick Bellew, or any other tenant farmer, who had driven in his cattle to Dundalk upon that day, and proceeded to offer them for public sale, in order to pay his rent or meet any other liability, would, by so doing, have incurred prosecution and penalty?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, that the cattle referred to were seized and sold at Dundalk. No licence was given by the Lord Lieutenant for the sale. The matter was not reported to the Government, and they heard nothing of it until inquiries were made regarding the hon. Member's Question. The Sheriff had been asked for an explanation. Any person disposing of cattle by sale in Dundalk on that day laid himself open to prosecution.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS (IRELAND).

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, considering the great interest taken in the settlement of the endowed schools question in Ireland, he will consider the advisability of introducing, and at least having read a first time, the Bill which the Government have prepared, dealing with the subject?

MR. TREVELYAN: I regret to say that at present I see no prospect of finding an opportunity of getting forward with this measure. The two Members who are most prominently interested in it are the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), and the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), whom I do not see in his place; and if they will help us in getting forward with Public Business, there will be a fair chance of carrying an Endowed School Act this Session.

MR. HEALY asked, whether it was not unprecedented for the Government to introduce a Bill, and have it read a first time, simply for the purpose of gratifying legitimate curiosity of Members and of the public generally?

MR. TREVELYAN said, it was not unprecedented, and he was afraid the Government were doubly committed to this policy already by the Irish Department.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—SUPPRESSION OF ASSIZES.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Assize in any city in Ireland can be abolished except by Bill?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER), in reply, said, that an Assize Court could not be abolished except by Bill.

PORTUGAL—THE CONGO RIVER TREATY.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Native Chiefs on the Congo, with whom Great Britain made Treaties, 1854—1877, for the establishment of free trade throughout their dominions, had signified their acknowledgment of the Sovereignty of Portugal; and, whether these Chiefs have been consulted by Her Majesty's Government regarding the Treaty with Portugal not yet ratified?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government are not aware whether there have been any communications between the Native Chiefs referred to and Portugal as to their acknowledgment of the Sovereignty of Portugal. These Native Chiefs were not consulted by Her Majesty's Government. •

BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1883—THE CASE OF MR. KIRKBY.

MR. E. STANHOPE asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to an article in The Law Times of Saturday last, reflecting in severe terms upon the circumstances connected with the removal of Mr. Kirkby from the office of Trustee in Bankruptcy, to which he had been appointed by a majority of the creditors, and which they still wish him to fill; and, if he will explain the reasons which induced the Board of Trade to rescind the appointment of Mr. Kirkby?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I am afraid I cannot give a complete answer to this Question at present. The subject is a very important one, and it is possible that ulterior proceedings may have to be taken. In the meantime, in reply to the latter part of the hon. Member's Question, I may say that the Board of Trade did not rescind Mr. Kirkby's appointment; but, acting under the powers conferred upon them by Section 21 of the Bankruptcy Act, they refused to confirm it. I have seen the article in The Law Times referred to; but the reason assigned in that article for the course pursued by the Board of Trade had absolutely nothing to do with the action of the Department in the matter. Certain circumstances connected with the bankruptcy which came to the knowledge of the Board of Trade, but which had no reference to Mr. Kirkby's personal character, led them to believe that the appointment was not, in the present case, an altogether desirable one, or in the interest of all the creditors. The creditors have power, under the Statute, to appeal to the High Court against the action of the Board of Trade.

MR. E. STANHOPE wished to know whether there was more than one creditor who objected to the appointment?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I am not aware.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Will the right hon. Gentleman lay the Correspondence on the Table?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: No.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Then I beg to give Notice that I shall move for its production.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether the appeal by the creditors would not be at the cost of the estate?

INDIA (FINANCE, &c.)—THE OPIUM TRADE.

MR. CROPPER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If his attention has been drawn to a telegram published in The Times of March 17th, stating that Sir Auckland Colvin, in his Financial Statement, says as follows:—

"That the Government is indebted to Mr. Rivett Carnac, opium agent at Benares, for some successful experiments in the preparation of Malwa opium into a form suited for local consumption, experiments which, in 1882, set free 1,372 chests, and, in 1883, 3,000 chests, of provision opium (or opium available for export), at a profit to the Government of 194,846 rupees in the former, and of 756,347 rupees in the latter year;"

whether the Indian Government did, during the last two years, purchase a quantity of opium produced in the Native States of India, and prepare it, in the Government factories, for sale in British India; whether this new form of the opium trade has the approval of Her Majesty's Government; whether any limit is to be put to the quantity of Malwa opium which may thus be purchased and prepared for local consumption, or whether it is to be increased indefinitely; and, whether this system of purchasing Malwa opium, for preparation in the Government factories, is to be confined to opium for local consumption in India, or extended to the preparation of the Malwa opium into the form suitable for exportation to China?

MR. J. K. CROSS: I have read the telegram referred to. Two thousand maunds of Malwa opium were purchased in 1882 under circumstances referred to in Sir Evelyn Baring's Financial Statement for 1883-4, paragraph 202; and a further quantity was purchased in 1883. The export demand is as much as the present production of Bengal can usually supply; and it has been thought better to set free the Bengal production to meet this export demand, supplying the local consumption of Bengal by Malwa opium, rather than to extend the cultivation of the poppy in Bengal. The Malwa opium, so purchased, is not intended for export, but will be confined to local consumption. The Secretary of State sees no reason to disapprove of this arrangement.

EGYPT—THE LAW OF LIQUIDATION.

MR. GOSCHEN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What effect has been given to the following declaration, signed on the 31st March 1880, at Cairo, by the Representatives of Great Britain, Germany, Austro-Hungary, France, and Italy—

"Les Gouvernements précités s'engagent, à accepter comme obligatoire, et sans appel, la décision qui sera rendue, en ce qui concerne les obligations et dettes du Gouvernement Egyptien, ainsi que les Dairas Kassa et Sanieh, par la Commission de Liquidation établie en vertu du dit Décret. Ils consentent aussi à ce que les décisions de la Commission constituée en vertu de ce Décret soient reconnues par les Tribunaux de la Réforme comme une loi obligatoire aussitôt qu'elles auront été publiées officiellement par le Gouvernement de son Altesse le Khédive ;

“ Les Gouvernements de Grande Bretagne, d'Allemagne, d'Autriche-Hongrie, de France, et d'Italie s'engagent, en outre, à porter collectivement cette Déclaration à la connaissance des Puissances qui ont pris part à l'établissement des Tribunaux Mixtes instituées en Egypte, et à les inviter à y adhérer ; ”

and, whether the collective step contemplated in the last paragraph of the foregoing Declaration has been taken by the five Powers in question ; and, if not, whether the remaining Powers who took part in the establishment of the Mixed Tribunals have been in any way parties to the Law of Liquidation, or would have any locus standi in negotiation for its modification ?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : The collective step contemplated was taken, and all the Powers who took part in the establishment of the Mixed Tribunals acceded to the Law of Liquidation in the course of the year 1880.

MR. GOSCHEN : Is there any relation in the Blue Book on the subject ?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : No, Sir. I think the right hon. Gentleman is correct in stating that the Blue Books do not mention it ; but I can give the dates.

MR. GOSCHEN : Would there be any objection to laying the despatches upon the Table of the House ?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to consider it.

MR. BOURKE : I wish to ask a Question which arises out of this, and of which I have given private Notice. The Question is—Whether the Powers who had taken part in the establishment of the Mixed Tribunals were those represented on the International Commission which assembled at Cairo in 1869—namely, Austria, Germany, France, England, Italy, the United States, Russia, and Egypt ?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : Yes, Sir ; with the addition of the Governments of Belgium, Denmark, Greece, Holland, Portugal, Spain, and Sweden.

TURKEY IN ASIA—NAVIGATION OF THE RIVERS TIGRIS AND EUPHRATES.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, having regard to the difficulty of maintaining the rights of navigation upon the Tigris and Euphrates, Her Majesty's Government will propose to the Porte that it is desirable to place those rivers under an International Commission ?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : The subject of the navigation of the Tigris and Euphrates is still under discussion, and I cannot pledge Her Majesty's Government to any particular proposal.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINOK asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has been informed that at a public meeting for the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Acts, held at St. James's Hall, on the 28th February last, Mr. Stevenson A. Blackwood, C.B., Secretary of the General Post Office, made the following observations :—

“ We denounce and oppose these Acts, because they are an outrage upon the weaker and most defenceless portion of the population, whom they hand over to the mercies of a spy-police, and to the danger of imprisonment without trial. These Acts must be demoralizing to the agents who enforce them, for what can we think of a system which is used to put money into the hands of the spy-police to lead women into acts of sin with themselves in order that they may be detected and in order to denounce them ; ”

whether it is true that any case has occurred where a person has been imprisoned without trial under the provisions of the Acts ; whether there is any foundation for the assertion that the mode in which the Contagious Diseases Acts have been administered is demoralizing to the agents who have enforced them ; and, whether any case has ever occurred of money being put into the hands of the police for the purposes mentioned by Mr. Blackwood ?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT : I have not seen the speech to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman refers. With reference to the last three paragraphs in the Question, the statements in those paragraphs are incorrect and unfounded.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE MILITIA (NUMBERS).

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the case that the Militia Force is 561 officers below its establishment, and if his attention has been called to an advertisement in The Army and Navy Gazette of 22nd instant, for officers for the Kilkenny Militia, in the following terms:—

"5th Battalion the Royal Irish Regiment (Kilkenny Militia); Several commissions for Lieutenants are vacant.—Applications will be duly considered by the Commanding Officer at Kilkenny;"

and, whether this dearth of officers has accrued since the inauguration of the territorial system, and how long it has been the practice to advertise for candidates for commissions?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Yes, Sir; the number of vacancies for subaltern officers is as stated by the hon. Member, the number having increased since the introduction of the territorial system in 1881; but the vacancies have no apparent connection with the territorial system. Among other causes, I may mention compulsory retirement by age; the temporary reduction of the number of Line commissions allotted to the Militia from 120 to 60; and the non-training of the Irish Militia for some years. The advertisement referred to by the hon. Member is the first of the kind that has come under my notice, and I have given orders for its withdrawal.

ARMY (SMALL ARMS)—MARTINI-HENRY RIFLES.

COLONEL WALROND asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, Whether it is a fact that there are at present 250,000 Martini Rifles in store; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government could not at once issue 200,000 to the Volunteers, the Commanding Officers of Volunteer Battalions undertaking to return them to store within a week of their being called in?

MR. BRAND: There are at present 250,000 Martini-Henry rifles in store. This is somewhat below the ordinary reserve, it not having been thought desirable to manufacture any large number of rifles in view of the possible alteration of the arm. The Government cannot undertake to issue 200,000 Martini-Henry rifles on loan to the Volunteers.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked, when would the improved arm be ready?

MR. BRAND said, that he had used the word "possible," in contradistinction to "probable." The change had not yet been decided on by the Secretary of State for War.

NAVY—H.M. DOCKYARDS—WAGES OF LABOURERS IN THE VICTUALLING YARDS.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the inquiry which is at present going on at the Admiralty respecting the labourers employed at the various dockyards includes those employed at the victualling yards; and, whether any steps will be taken for removing the particular grievance suffered by the labourers at the victualling yards in consequence of the time served on the hired list not counting towards their superannuation allowance on being discharged from the established list?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The question of the wages of labourers in the Victualling Yards is not before the Admiralty. No difference exists in the mode of calculating pensions for Dockyard and Victualling Yard labourers, hired time never being allowed to reckon for pension.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND) ACT—CATHOLIC EXAMINERS.

MR. BIGGAR (for Mr. LEAMY) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What was the number of examiners under the Intermediate Education Act in the years 1880, 1881, 1882, and 1883; and, what was the proportion of Catholic examiners to those of other religious denominations in each of these years?

MR. TREVELYAN: I answered the first paragraph of the Question on Monday. With regard to the proportion under the Intermediate Education Act of Catholic examiners, I have received the following communication from the Commissioners:—

"The Board are not in the habit, when selecting examiners, of inquiring into the religious profession of the candidate. They consider it their main duty to select in each subject of examination examiners in whom the public will have thorough confidence. Having regard to the above predominant consideration, they have been always anxious to give proportionate representation to candidates of the different religious denominations."

MR. HEALY: Are we to understand, then, that the reason there are so few Catholic examiners is that the Irish public would not have confidence in them?

MR. TREVELYAN said, he had as little control over this Board as others. He gave the answer which he received.

STATE OF IRELAND—MEETINGS OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE—INTRUSION OF THE POLICE AT KNOCKAMORE, CO. WATERFORD.

MR. BIGGAR (for Mr. LEAMY) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the constables who attended a Committee meeting of the National League at Knockamore, county Waterford, on the 16th of this month, refused to leave the house in which the meeting was held when requested to do so by some members of the Committee, and stated that they were instructed to remain until they were removed by force; whether they had been so instructed; if so, by whom; and, whether the Irish Executive approves of such instructions?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I have already stated that the police entered without opposition the place where the meeting was held, and remained there because the owner of the house raised no objection to their presence. They were acting under the instructions of their superior officers. Both constables distinctly deny that they stated that they would not leave unless turned out by force. They would have left if requested by the owner of the house.

MR. SEXTON: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether the Irish Government will not, to prevent the struggle about these meetings, issue general instructions to the Constabulary that they are not to remain at the meetings when requested to leave; and, if special instructions are given with regard to particular meetings, that they shall produce those instructions when called on to do so?

MR. BIGGAR: The right hon. Gentleman did not answer the last paragraph of the Question.

MR. TREVELYAN: I answered, on previous Questions with regard to the general attitude of the Irish Executive in this matter, that they do not wish the police to attend the meetings of the National League unless it is considered very necessary by the officers in charge of the peace of the district, and in such cases the matter is communicated to the Executive; but the burden of it rests with the officers.

MR. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman give us any guarantee, if the police are ejected by force, that the persons who eject them will not be prosecuted under the Prevention of Crime Act?

BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1883—OFFICIAL RECEIVERS.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE asked the President of the Board of Trade, If there is in existence a Treasury Minute which orders that an official receiver, under the Bankruptcy Act of last Session, shall not be allowed to hold or accept any political agency; and, whether that Treasury Minute continues and is intended to continue in force?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I am not aware that there is any Treasury Minute dealing with the holding of a political agency by an Official Receiver in Bankruptcy; but in December last a Minute was issued by the Board of Trade setting out the conditions attached to the office of Official Receiver, and one of the conditions is as follows:—

"An Official Receiver appointed in pursuance of this Minute will not be allowed, either by himself or his partner, to engage in any private business or practice connected with bankruptcy or insolvency proceedings, nor may he accept any political agency; but in so far as is consistent with the due discharge of the duties of his office, and except as otherwise determined by the Act and Rules or by Regulations issued by the Board of Trade, he will not be precluded from engaging in other business."

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND)—NUMBERS.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER (for Mr. COCHRAN-PATRICK) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is the fact that, during the year which ended 29th September 1882, 465,646 persons received poor relief in Ireland; and, if there is any ground for hoping that the number of the population receiving aid from the rates, either in the shape of poor relief or medical relief during the past year, will be sensibly diminished?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the method in which this Question is stated might give rise to some misapprehension. It is true that 465,646 persons received relief for the year ending the 29th of September, 1882, exclusive of the number who received medical relief, which, of course, is very different in Ireland to England or Scotland; but that number does not represent individuals, but cases. The same person is often relieved many times in the year, and each time he is relieved or enters a workhouse is put down as a fresh case. The more reliable gauge of pauperism is the average daily number receiving relief. In 1882 the average daily number receiving relief in Ireland was 109,404, in a population of about 5,000,000. In Scotland, 99,341 were receiving relief on the 14th of May, in a population of 3,773,128. In England, on the 1st of January, 803,381 were receiving relief, in a population of 25,965,000. There is, I think, some ground for hope that the number of those persons receiving relief is decreasing. I calculate it may be put at about 5,000.

THE BOARD OF TRADE—CONSTITUTION.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER (for Mr. COCHRAN-PATRICK) asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he can inform the House who constitute at present the Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council for Trade and Foreign Plantations; how many members are required to make a quorum; how many meetings were held during the year 1883; how many members were present at each meeting; and, of how many Departments of Trade and Commerce the Board of Trade has control?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The facts which the hon. Member desires to elicit have been several times stated to the House; but I may, perhaps, be allowed to refer him more particularly to a debate which took place the Session before last on the constitution of a Minister of Commerce. An Order in Council, dated August, 1786, regulates the legal constitution of the Board of Trade, and specifies the various high officers of State (including the Archbishop of Canterbury) who are to form the Committee for Trade and Foreign Plantations. In the last century and at the beginning of this, the business of the Board of Trade appears to have been transacted at meetings of the Committee; but no quorum was required by the Order in Council. No meetings have been held for many years, and all business is now, and has been for a long time past, conducted by the President. The Board of Trade is divided into five Departments—the Commercial, Railway, Marine, Harbour, and Finance—under one or other of which the various duties of the office are grouped.

NAVY—PAYMASTERS.

MR. GABBETT asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether certain of the Assistant Paymasters of the Royal Navy, at present serving as such, have been some 20 years in the Service; whether optional retirement of Paymasters is ever allowed (except for ill-health) until the age of 55 is reached; whether, if every Paymaster who arrives at that age up to the end of 1889 avails himself of the option allowed, the promotion of the Assistant Paymasters of the standing of 1871 can be reached before about 18 years have been served in that rank; whether such officers will have then been some 22 years in the Navy, and of an age of about 39; and, whether the retardation of promotion, which now exists, will continue and tend to increase until the year 1890?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I believe that, excluding the case of any officer who may have lost time or promotion owing to misconduct, there are two Assistant Paymasters who have been 20 years in the Service. Optional retirement of Paymasters is not allowed, except for ill-health, before the age of 55, which is earlier than the age prescribed for the Civil Service. No conclusion can be drawn from an estimate of the effect on promotion which would be caused if every Paymaster retired at 55, because promotion depends on vacancies arising from death, dismissal, and retirement for physical unfitness, as well as optional or compulsory retirement. Owing to over-entries in past years, it is quite possible that the time for obtaining promotion may be slightly longer than at present up to 1889-90, after which year it should considerably decrease.

Major General Alexander

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SOUDAN) —
GENERAL GRAHAM'S SUMMONS TO THE TRIBES.

MR. RICHARD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any objection to produce the letter which General Graham stated he sent to the outposts, with white flag, before the battle of Teb, and which it is understood was affixed to a pole and stuck in the sand?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: We have received a copy of the letter referred to in the Question; but, as it is short, perhaps the most convenient course will be for me to read it. It is a translation of a letter written in Arabic, and is dated Thursday, 27th March. It is as follows:—

"From General Commanding English Army to the Sheikhs of the Tribes between Trinkitat and Tokar—I summon you, in the name of the English Government, to disperse your fighting men before daybreak to-morrow morning, or the consequences will be on your own heads. Instead of fighting with English troops you should send delegates to Khartoum, to consult with Gordon Pasha as to the future settlement of the Soudan Provinces. The English Government is not at war with the Arabs; but is determined to disperse the forces now in arms in this neighbourhood and near Suakin. An answer to this letter must be left at the same place before daybreak to-morrow morning, or the consequences will be on the heads of the Sheikhs."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: May I ask whether General Graham's despatches have arrived, and when they will be communicated to the public?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Yes; several despatches have been received, and will be published in a Special Government Gazette this evening.

MR. O'DONNELL wished to know whether there had been any other negotiations with the Arabs besides those referred to in the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil's Question?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Does the hon. Member mean before the battle of Teb? I have often referred to frequent communications which passed between Admiral Hewett and the leader of the tribes before the arrival of General Graham's force at all.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether General Gordon had also addressed the Sheikhs and tribes in the name of the British Government?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I am unable to answer that Question.

JAPAN—CLAIMS OF MR. HARTLEY.

MR. GRANTHAM asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government will place upon the Table of the House Copies of Mr. Hartley's 1874 and 1879 claims, with all the Correspondence relating to the same; and, Copy of the Agreement entered into by Lord Salisbury with the Japanese Government respecting the importation of medicinal opium into Japan?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No agreement was entered into by Lord Salisbury with the Japanese Government respecting the importation of medicinal opium into Japan. Mr. Hartley's complaints against the Japanese Government were examined at the time by Her Majesty's Minister in Japan, and by the late and the present Government, and were not considered such as to justify diplomatic intervention. Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to incur the expense of printing and laying the voluminous Correspondence on the subject, being of opinion that it would serve no useful purpose.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND)—CORK
DISTRICT LUNATIC ASYLUM—DIS-POSAL OF DECEASED PATIENTS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any amount is paid to the Cork Lunatic Asylum for the bodies sent to the Queen's College for dissection?

MR. TREVELYAN: No, Sir; no money is paid.

MR. HEALY: Well, then, I will draw attention to the fact that while no money is paid for these bodies the Professors charge the students a fee for dissection.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—THE CORPORATION OF KILKENNY.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the Corporation of Kilkenny have obtained an eviction decree against their tenant John Bergin, who holds a farm under them in the neighbourhood of Borris-in-Ossory, and have refused to allow him to sell his interest in his holding, although the amount realizable for it would far exceed the year and a-half's rent due from him; and, whether, if this is in accordance with the existing Law, the Government propose to remove the restrictions imposed on the sale of a tenant's interest?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I am informed that the Kilkenny Corporation obtained a decree against John Bergin, and that he has been evicted. They did not refuse him permission to sell his interest; but the difficulty was that there was such an amount due by him that his interest was practically valueless.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (IRELAND)
—PRIMARY SCHOOLS—MINIMUM ATTENDANCE OF SCHOLARS RE-QUISITE FOR EMPLOYMENT OF ASSISTANT TEACHERS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether an average attendance of 70 children is required to justify the employment of an assistant teacher in the National Schools in Ireland, whereas the average required in Primary Schools in England is only 60; whether the Catholic Hierarchy and the General Assembly of Ulster have made representations as to the inequality and the necessity of maintaining the lower average of 50 formerly allowed on account of the greater difficulties experienced in Ireland in securing the attendance of children; and, whether the Government propose to remove the grievance?

MR. TREVELYAN: I went fully into this matter last year in consequence of a Question put to me by the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien), and I satisfied myself that the Irish schools are not in an unfavourable position as compared with the English schools, but that the comparison is entirely the other way. This I found to be also the view taken by the Heads of both the English and Irish Education Departments. When I suggested the notion of assimilation to Sir Patrick Keenan, he was quite dumbfounded at the effect that would be produced to the disadvantage of Irish education. In England, for a school attendance of 60 children one certificated teacher and a pupil teacher are paid by the manager, who, of course, receives a certain assistance from the Treasury, while in Ireland a certificated teacher and two monitors are allowed and paid by the Commissioners. A large school, however, is the best illustration of the difference between the Irish and the English system. In England, for a school of 140 children two certificated teachers and two pupil teachers are specified; while in Ireland four certificated teachers and three monitors are allowed and paid by the Board. Under these circumstances, the hon. Member, I am sure, will not be anxious to assimilate the two systems. I am aware that there is an impression in some quarters that the regulations are more favourable in English than in Irish schools; but this arises from an imperfect acquaintance with the facts.

SUPPLY—THE EDUCATION ESTIMATES.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he can now fix a day on which the Education Estimates will be moved?

MR. MUNDELLA: I should be glad to bring on the Education Estimates as early as possible, and will take advantage of the first opportunity that offers; but I can say nothing more till after Easter. I find, however, that since 1876 only once have the Estimates been moved before July.

SUPPLY—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, before he makes his Financial Statement, he will cause to be distributed to Members a "Statement of Income and Expenditure as laid before the House," similar to that in Return O-60 of last Session; and, whether he will be able to include in it a statement of the Exchequer Issues for 1883-4, as well as of the payments into the Exchequer for the same year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): I have to say that before making my Financial Statement I will distribute a Paper for the use of Members during my speech giving all the necessary figures as to 1882-3 and 1883-4 which may have been already published. I cannot, however, include in that Paper any figures not yet published, which will be, for the first time, given in my Financial Statement. The Exchequer issues will be only known from my speech; but the payments into the Exchequer will have been published on the 1st of April. If the hon. Member has any suggestion to make as to this

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

Mr. O'DONNELL asked whether it was not the case that Dr. Hunter, in his work on India, had admitted that if all the poorer classes of India had two full meals a-day the surplus of wheat for export had been less than it was at present; whether the Famine Commissioners reported that the famines of 1866 and 1877 were partly due to the reduction of the wheat stocks owing to excessive exportation; and, whether 500,000 people did not perish in the latter year in the North-West Provinces, although two lines of railway were exporting corn to Southern India and to Europe?

Mr. JAMES HOWARD asked whether it was not the fact that the total exports of wheat from India to England only amounted to the difference between a good crop and a bad crop; and, whether it was not in consequence of the unusually good crop that there had been larger exports?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am bound to say that these two last Questions partake of the nature of debate.

RAILWAYS (INDIA)—COMMITTEE ON INDIAN RAILWAYS.

Mr. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If witnesses representing the views of the Government of India will be examined before the Special Committee on Indian Railways?

Mr. J. K. CROSS: The Government of India have deputed Major Conway-Gordon, one of the Under Secretaries in the Public Works Department, and Mr. Westland, the Comptroller General, to represent their views to the Select Committee.

Mr. O'DONNELL asked how many witnesses representing the various classes of the Indian population would be heard?

Mr. J. K. CROSS said, that if the hon. Member would communicate with any of the Indian Associations appearing before the Committee, he could probably secure the examination of any witnesses he desired to recommend.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS—TABLES OF COMPARISON.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, in reference to a correspondence published by Dr. Birbeck Nevins of Liverpool, Whether it is true that a misleading comparison of the this information for the past 10 years would involve a great amount of labour and considerable expense; and I should like to see the Return for 1882-3 before deciding whether it is worth while incurring that expense.

LAW AND JUSTICE—"BELT v. LAWES."

COLONEL NOLAN asked Mr. Attorney General, If his attention has been drawn to the Correspondence on the "Belt v. Lawes" case, in The Standard of the 26th, by which it appears that both sides are becoming bankrupt on account of the costs of that case; and, if Her Majesty's Government will introduce a measure by which the speed of trials may be increased, and the costs diminished?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): It would be very difficult to frame any Rule which would add to the speed or diminish the length of trials. I am afraid it is a disease incurable by legislation. As to costs, some Rules framed last year with the assent of this House have, I am glad to say, considerably diminished the costs of litigation.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAY (PARK RAILWAY AND PARLIAMENT STREET IMPROVEMENT) BILL.

MR. FIRTH asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he can state to the House where it is proposed to place the ventilating shafts of the Metropolitan Railway (Park Railway and Parliament Street Improvement) Bill, and how many of such shafts there are to be, and what is to be their height and distance from each other; and, whether, having regard to the positive statements made last year by the District Railway Company as to the impossibility of ventilating underground railways in London, he will require the Metropolitan Railway Company to show the possibility of the suggested method of ventilation by practical experiment on the Metropolitan line between Portland Road and King's Cross before proceeding with the projected railway under the Parks?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I am informed by the promoters of the Bill that the engineer, Sir John Hawkshaw, is prepared to lay before the Select Committee to whom this Bill has been referred his plans for ventilating the Railway. He believes he can satisfy the Committee that it can be effected without any detriment to the public Parks. The promoters are unwilling at this stage to give details, and they do not think they ought to be called upon to do so.

MR. FIRTH: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the last part of my Question?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I do not know what their plans may be; and therefore I cannot say whether it is reasonable that they should be asked to make experiments.

MR. GORST: May I ask whether we are to understand from the First Commissioner of Works that he has assented to the railway under the Parks without knowing how it is to be ventilated?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: When I spoke in the debate the other day, I said we had consented to it on the assurance of Sir John Hawkshaw that ventilators would not be necessary.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman give an undertaking on the part of the Government that if the promoters cannot carry out that undertaking they will oppose the Bill?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I have stated all along that this is the condition of the assent to the scheme, that there are to be no ventilators in the Parks. Of course, I shall require to be assured that they shall ventilate it in some other way.

RAILWAYS (INDIA)—EXPENDITURE ON INDIAN RAILWAYS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, with reference to the recent statement of Lord Kimberley, that—"They had spent upon Railways in India during the last three years the following sums:—In 1881-2, £5,729,606; 1882-3, £6,493,100; and in 1883-4 £8,304,700;"

If he can state to what extent interest upon this outlay has been guaranteed by the Government; and, for what time the guarantee is to run?

MR. J. K. CROSS: I am glad of the opportunity of correcting an error in the figures which were supplied to Lord Kimberley by the Department, and I need not say how much the Secretary of State regrets the mistake. On further examination, it has been found that those figures included certain considerable items which will be charged to the Revenue account of the Indian Railways, and which, therefore, should not have been treated as capital expenditure, though temporarily appearing in the capital account. The correct figures of capital expenditure on Indian Railways are—1881-2, £4,020,000; 1882-3, £4,452,000 (revised Estimate); 1883-4, £6,626,000 (Budget Estimate). Besides which, the Bengal and North-Western Company, which is not in any way subsidized by the State, may have spent from £400,000 to £500,000. The Estimate of expenditure for 1883-4 appears to be in excess of the amount actually spent, which, according to the latest telegram, is £5,368,000. The portion of the estimated expenditure of these three years on which interest would be guaranteed is £4,980,000; interest on £900,000 being guaranteed for about five years, and on the remainder until the lines become the property of the State by purchase.

INDIA—EXPORT OF WHEAT.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, with regard to Lord Kimberley's statement to a deputation of English manufacturers and capitalists on Friday, that—if he can give the grounds for expecting this further development; and, if he can show to the House that this development is not taking place at the expense of the food supplies of the population?

“There has been a surprising increase of the wheat trade, which was open to still further development;”

MR. J. K. CROSS: The production of wheat in the Central Provinces and the Punjab will naturally develop as a greater population devotes itself to the cultivation of the waste lands, and in the Punjab as the irrigation works in progress, and lately opened, exercise their natural influence. That the development is not taking place at the expense of the food supplies of the people is shown by the fact that, whereas in 1879, when the export of wheat was only 1,056,720 cwt., the price of millets averaged 5s. 7½d. per cwt.; in 1882, when the export of wheat was 19,910,005 cwt., the price of millets was 3s. 4½d., showing that, along with an enormous increase in the export of wheat, there had been a fall in the value of ordinary grain foods of 40 per cent.

MR. O'DONNELL asked whether it was not the case that Dr. Hunter, in his work on India, had admitted that if all the poorer classes of India had two full meals a-day the surplus of wheat for export had been less than it was at present; whether the Famine Commissioners reported that the famines of 1866 and 1877 were partly due to the reduction of the wheat stocks owing to excessive exportation; and, whether 500,000 people did not perish in the latter year in the North-West Provinces, although two lines of railway were exporting corn to Southern India and to Europe?

MR. JAMES HOWARD asked whether it was not the fact that the total exports of wheat from India to England only amounted to the difference between a good crop and a bad crop; and, whether it was not in consequence of the unusually good crop that there had been larger exports?

MR. SPEAKER: I am bound to say that these two last Questions partake of the nature of debate.

RAILWAYS (INDIA)—COMMITTEE ON INDIAN RAILWAYS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If witnesses representing the views of the Government of India will be examined before the Special Committee on Indian Railways?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The Government of India have deputed Major Conway-Gordon, one of the Under Secretaries in the Public Works Department, and Mr. Westland, the Comptroller General, to represent their views to the Select Committee.

MR. O'DONNELL asked how many witnesses representing the various classes of the Indian population would be heard?

MR. J. K. CROSS said, that if the hon. Member would communicate with any of the Indian Associations appearing before the Committee, he could probably secure the examination of any witnesses he desired to recommend.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS—TABLES OF COMPARISON.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, in reference to a correspondence published by Dr. Birkbeck Nevins of Liverpool, Whether it is true that a misleading comparison of the amount of venereal disease as between "protected and unprotected" ports has been published in the Navy Report for several years past; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to discontinue the comparison, and acknowledge that it was erroneous?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN : The Table of Comparison of the amount of contagious disease at protected and unprotected ports was originally suggested by the leading opponents of the Contagious Diseases Acts, and was, at their instance, included in the annual Reports on the health of the Navy. Last year, on looking into the matter, the Admiralty came to the conclusion that the comparison was of no real value, and resolved to discontinue it. Through a pure inadvertence in the Office, however, the Table was repeated in the early copies of the Report issued this year. The mistake was at once corrected, and no such Table appears in the copies of the Report which have been provided for Members of Parliament, or put into general circulation.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked, whether the rate of admission to Plymouth Hospital for Contagious Diseases had not risen from 104 per 1,000 during the last six months of 1882, when the Acts were in full operation, to 230 per 1,000 during the last six months of 1883, when the Acts were suspended?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN : The figures quoted by the noble Lord appear to be correct. They are taken from a Return on the subject laid on the Table on the 7th of March.

PARLIAMENT—NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE—"BLOCKING."

MR. FIRTH : Sir, I wish to put a Question to you upon a point of Order in reference to the application of the Standing Order which was passed in November, 1882, as to the abuse of the Rules of the House by "persistently and wilfully obstructing the Business of the House." The Order Book shows that one Member has blocked no fewer than 34 Bills, ranging over the whole area of the legislation proposed during the present Session. They include simple Consolidation Bills, Bills affecting election matters, Bills affecting Ireland, Bills affecting London, Bills relating to the Church, and Bills upon various other subjects. The Question I wish to ask is, Whether this procedure on the part of one hon. Member does or does not come within the Rule as to Obstruction; and, if not, whether there is any Rule that can be applied to a case of this sort?

MR. SPEAKER : In reply to the hon. Member for Chelsea, I may say that I am not of opinion that the blocking of Bills, even on the scale referred to by the hon. Gentleman, would bring the Member who should indulge in that practice within the penalties imposed by the Standing Order for "persistently and wilfully obstructing the Business of the House." At the same time, I am bound to say that a wholesale system of throwing obstacles in the way of Bills, not out of consideration for the merits or the demerits of such Bills, but from a desire to prevent the several Bills themselves from being discussed, is, in my opinion, a violation of the spirit of the Rule, and ought to be very much deprecated. But I think it is for the House itself to decide whether the abuse, if it be deemed to be an abuse, has reached such a point as that a remedy ought to be applied in this stage, in order to remove it. I cannot myself but think that the spirit of the Rule is violated, when not only is a Rule which was intended for the promotion of the course of legislation turned into a means of obstructing legislation, but also into a means of withdrawing Bills from the consideration of the House, and thus limiting the discretion of the House itself in dealing with them. As I have stated, the matter is one which rests with the House itself; and it will be for the House to judge whether the abuse is of such a nature as to require a remedy.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—THE RIVER CONGO—MR. STANLEY.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for War, How many British officers are serving with the expedition directed by Mr. Stanley upon the Congo; whether he is aware that the Stanley Expedition is attempting the armed conquest of the Native tribes, that battles with the Natives have occurred near Stanley Pool, on the River Congo, at Tchoumbiri, at Bolobo, where cannon have been employed, in the country of the Mangalas, whose chief town has been burnt; whether vast amounts in ivory and other commodities are exacted as war indemnities; and, whether British Officers are authorized to take part in these proceedings?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have no knowledge at present of any British officers being with Mr. Stanley. There is no information at the War Office, nor, as far as I can ascertain, at the Foreign Office, with respect to the battles and the circumstances referred to in the further part of the hon. Member's Question.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— TELEGRAMS.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT: I wish to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether any telegram has been received from General Graham, confirming the telegram of to-day of the action that has taken place between the forces under his command and Osman Digna's forces?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: We have received the following telegram from Sir William Hewett, dated this day at 2 P.M. :—

"Thursday.—General Graham has driven enemy away from Tamanieb village, and got at water much needed by men and horses. No casualties on our side. Arabs dispersing. Forwarding information from messengers."

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—[BILL 119.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Trevelyan, The Lord Advocate.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

[SECOND NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [24th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House declines to proceed further with a measure, having for its object the addition of two million voters to the electoral body of the United Kingdom, until it has before it the entire scheme contemplated by the Government for the amendment of the Representation of the People,"—(Lord John Manners.)

—instead thereof.

Debate resumed.

MR. RAIKES said, that the first sentiment which he took to prevail that evening throughout the whole of that House with regard to this measure was one of sincere personal regret at the absence of the right hon. Gentleman who introduced it. He could assure the House, and those who generally acted with the right hon. Gentleman, that that feeling was at least as cordial and as genuine among those who were usually occupied in combating his policy as it could be among any of those upon whose fidelity he had so often relied. At the same time, he was bound to say that close upon this conviction there followed another as to the enormous embarrassment under which the House laboured in consequence of the absence of its Leader. He might have risen on Monday last, when the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) indicated his proposal for this momentous change, to call attention to the extremely unusual and extremely irregular course adopted on that occasion. The noble Marquess had no more to do with the conduct of that Bill through the House than he (Mr. Raikes) had. His name was not on the back of it. The only names upon the back of it were those of the Prime Minister, the Attorney General, the Lord Advocate for Scotland, and the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant; and he presumed that it was to these Gentlemen that the House must look for any exposition of the course which the Government were prepared to take with regard to the measure. As regarded the other Members of the Ministry, they might, perhaps, be better employed in holding Cabinet Councils elsewhere than in sitting and listening to a discussion in which they were not authorized to speak in the name of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was Her Majesty's Government; and in his absence they might make a certain amount of impression upon those who sat with him in his Cabinet; but they could not have the slightest hope that any impression they might make upon those right hon. Gentlemen would be likely to affect the mind of the author of the scheme. He had to go back for something like a century to recall a state of things at all similar to this, and that was when the great Lord Chatham was struck down by indisposition, and was precluded from taking his place in Parliament. The Business of the Government had at that time to be conducted for many weeks by Colleagues who were destitute of his authority, debarred from his counsel, entirely unable to speak in his name, and who, therefore, produced a state of extraordinary confusion in Public Business. This headless Ministry invited the House to embark upon the "most important organic change"—to quote the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—which this country had witnessed for something like two centuries. For the first time in their history they were asked to undertake a complete political revolution at the bidding of a provisional Administration. On Monday last the House listened to a speech from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright). The right hon. Gentleman came forward as the apologist of the Government, and, as far as he could, vindicated the policy which had suggested this measure. He taunted hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House with not having met the Motion for the second reading with a direct negative, and suggested that it was their duty to have abstained from bringing forward an Amendment of an abstract character; and he also reminded them that when Mr. Disraeli, in 1859, brought forward a measure for the purpose of making the franchise in the boroughs and counties identical, he was supported by Gentlemen who at that time acted with him. Whether Mr. Disraeli succeeded in converting his Colleagues and Party to the view which he then held or not he certainly did not succeed in converting the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, who not only made a powerful speech against Mr. Disraeli's proposal, but supported the abstract Resolution then moved as an Amendment by Lord John Russell. He would leave the right hon. Gentleman to settle that part of the question with his own historical conscience. The right hon. Gentleman, on Monday last, posed as an old-fashioned Tory in his adhesion to the Act of Union; but, unfortunately, the old Adam crept out in his remarks, and he could not forbear having a fling at the Irish Church by telling the House what meaning he attached to the words "for ever" in such a document. The right hon. Gentleman said the stronger party to such a convention might modify it against themselves, but not against the weaker party. That appeared to him to be a most unfortunate argument to use in connection with the Irish Church, for if ever a convention was modified by the stronger party against the weaker that was it. The right hon. Gentleman said that nothing would induce him to depart from the Act of Union. Possibly there was a more recent document from which he would be equally unwilling to depart. He might have cognizance of an unpublished article in an instrument known as "The Treaty of Kilmainham." There were three excellent speeches made against the Bill on Monday last. The first was by his noble Friend (Lord John Manners), the second by his right hon. Friend the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther), and the third and best of all by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War. With regard to the speech of the noble Marquess, he thought that of all the argumentative displays he had ever listened to in that House, he had never heard anything which appeared so completely to show all the weak points of the measure which the noble Marquess was supposed to champion, although, at the same time, it did not seem to have produced any effect upon his own convictions. The noble Marquess admitted that this was an incomplete measure. That was what the Opposition contended. The noble Marquess admitted that the redistribution of seats should be accomplished in the same Parliament, and, if possible, in the same Session, as the Bill for the extension of the franchise. That was what the Opposition said. The noble Marquess further observed that the representation of minorities, and questions connected with proportionate representation, should receive most careful consideration. The Opposition made it one of the principal objections to the proposal of the Government that these matters received no consideration whatever in the Bill before the House. The noble Marquess also said that the sketch of redistribution by the Prime Minister was not a declaration of the absolute conclusions of the Cabinet; but that it represented only in a general manner certain lines of agreement to which they had come. This, also, was a principal objection which the Opposition were prepared to take to the Bill. Then the noble Marquess went on to speak about Ireland, and this was the most interesting part of his speech, because they all remembered that not many months had passed since he spoke at a meeting in the country against including Ireland. On Monday night the noble Marquess said that the extension of the franchise in England and Scotland had generally led to increased loyalty; but he added that it was difficult to expect that anything of the sort would occur in Ireland among the people whose minds had been poisoned by agitators against the English Government. He also, with great candour, proceeded to observe that, as far as he could see, such a measure must entirely extinguish the whole representation of the loyal subjects of Her Majesty in Ireland; but he told the House that the loyal law-abiding classes in Ireland who were unrepresented were to find representation among the English and Scotch Representatives, who were supposed to take an interest in them. That was the argument used years ago with regard to the people of Leeds and Manchester when they were unrepresented. They were told that they would find their representation in that of other important communities, and that they should be content with that sort of representation. Never before, in his recollection, had a Minister supposed to be in charge of the Business of the House made a speech containing so many unanswerable arguments—expressed with all the noble Marquess's characteristic moderation—against the very measure for which he was obliged to stand up. He thought the noble Marquess would have done better had he contented himself with that simple touch of the hat which he gave in moving the second reading. The speech of the Prime Minister in introducing the measure was one of remarkable power and eloquence, and they had all listened to it with the very greatest attention, because it was a great effort of a great man in his best manner. It dealt with the exposition of details, in which, as the House knew, he was unrivalled; and he trusted they might soon again have the pleasure of hearing from the right hon. Gentleman a speech of the same sort in that House.

But, having listened to that speech from the first word to the last, he must say that he failed to find one argument or pretence of argument in it in favour of the measure. The Bill was explained with perfect lucidity and great detail; but as for any argument why they were to pass it there was absolutely none. Hon. Members might have thought that that was reserved for the second reading; but, instead of having the right hon. Gentleman to make up for the deficiency, they had the noble Marquess arguing in the manner he had pointed out. He supposed the advocates of the Bill must either base their arguments upon expediency or abstract right. Few would think that this question ought to be determined by considerations of abstract right. Even the junior Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) would hardly take up the position of the rights of man; he would say that it was rather a question of political expediency than of philosophical theory. But the Prime Minister had long had a curious foible in regard to this matter. He (Mr. Raikes) thought he could trace that foible to the ancient days when the right hon. Gentleman represented a nomination borough, and when he seemed to have got into his head the notion that the vote was a personal privilege and not a public trust, and he seemed to regard it as a nice thing that persons who now had not votes should share the privileges of the electors for Newark. The only word in the right hon. Gentleman's speech which had a syllable of recommendation with regard to the measure was the reference to "capable citizens." Did that mean persons capable of performing the duties of citizens, or persons capable of being turned into citizens? Was the House to give a commanding voice to those who, up to the present time, had had no opportunity of showing their capacity? The case of 1867 had been referred to, when it was said that Parliament had legislated in the dark. But Parliament did not at that time legislate altogether in the dark. The persons upon whom the franchise was conferred were accustomed to political discussion and political combination. They had a knowledge of trades unions, and of all the controversies that arose between capital and labour. They had been in the habit of criticizing the Budget of their Town Councils, and of voting for or against their municipal representatives, according as they had made good use of the rates or otherwise. They had been concerned in the management of Benefit Societies. Therefore, although a very hazardous experiment was tried, the question was absolutely different from that of to-day. He was not in the House in 1867, and the measure of 1867 appeared to him bolder and perhaps rather wider than was desirable in the interests of the country. But, in the main, it was sound and had answered. The experience they had had in the borough constituencies was such as largely to justify the prescience of Mr. Disraeli when he had the courage to take that step, and had the unequalled honour of establishing the borough franchise upon a firm and stable basis. The effect had been such that the boroughs had become so Conservative that the Liberal Party had found it necessary to recruit their strength from the counties. Nevertheless, as far as they had gone there were certain tendencies observable in Parliament, on which the Prime Minister himself had enlarged more than once, showing that the extension of the franchise in the boroughs had very considerably modified the character of that House. Still, their ancient forms were preserved; but there had been no doubt that the debates were conducted in a somewhat different manner, and Public Business was transacted in a fashion extremely unlike that which prevailed in the years before the Reformed Parliament met. The Parliaments which sat since 1867 had passed several measures with regard to Ireland which could not have been passed in any preceding Parliament. When they came nearer home, property in this country was reasonably safe; Consols had not been attacked; and the Duke of Westminster's ground-rents were, at all events, held sacred against invasion. They seemed to have hit the happy medium between general confiscation and ordinary honesty which he supposed characterized the best Legislative Assemblies. They must come, then, as regarded this measure, to the question of expediency, and discarded abstract rights. He did not wish to take up the time of the House by referring at length to the experience of foreign countries. In France they had the spectacle of a perpetual change of Government and of perfect legislative sterility. In this country they did not have a perpetual change of Government; but they had something of legislative sterility. As that legislative sterility dated from the epoch when they had extended the suffrage, was it unreasonable to assume that the more they extended the suffrage the greater would become that legislative sterility? In America they had a different form of things. American politics were chiefly distinguished by cynical profligacy and undisguised corruption. They had had in that House recently some very edifying harangues. They had heard something of "spoils to the victors," and they might be tending in that direction. If the extent of the suffrage produced the condition of things which was rampant in the United States, they would be acting very foolishly if they were to take a step which no one could justify in order to arrive at that condition. The Prime Minister had said that they were going to add about 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 voters. He did not suppose that the right hon. Gentleman proposed to mislead the House; but what they were asked to do, as far as England and Wales were concerned, was to add 1,400,000 to 900,000 voters, or not 60, but 150 per cent to the present number. If they should do that, they had only to look forward to the uncertain event whether the majority in the existing constituencies would or would not be absolutely swamped. They were going to hand over every county seat in England to a new electorate, which, if dominated by passion, prejudice, agitation, or uncontrollable distrust against those who at the present time held political power, might return a Parliament in which the whole face of the county representation might be absolutely changed. They were told that this proposal was only supplementary to the Bill of 1867; that, as that Bill enfranchised the householders in boroughs, this Bill would enfranchise the householders in counties. That appeared to him absolutely the opposite of the fact. In 1832, as they all knew, there was a great number of powerful Peers and wealthy merchants who had interests in many boroughs. It was proposed by the first Reform Bill to take those boroughs from them but they were allowed to regain in th counties what they lost in the boroughs. The Chandos Clause gave them power in the counties which they never had before. In 1867 it appeared to him exactly the same process went on. The middle classes had to surrender most of the boroughs, for which they were compensated by the £12 franchise in counties. The principle acted upon was that property should be represented in the counties and population in the boroughs. Every Reform Bill had proceeded mainly on that basis, and the principle had found no more distinguished advocates than the great men of the Whig Party. How could they say that a proposal to hand over the whole representation of the country to one class alone, to obliterate and disfranchise all others, was in any sense a supplement to measures which it would have been impossible to carry through the House of Commons except on the basis he had stated? It might be a good thing to do away with the property qualification altogether; but if that was their view, pray let it not be done under false pretences. Do not let them come forward and say—"We are carrying out the principles of the Act of 1867," when the effect of this Bill would be to annul the Act of 1867. He thought it well to say one word with regard to the attitude of the Conservative Party as to the rural labourers. It was said they were hostile to the aspirations of the labourers. That assertion could only be made by men who had no regard for truth, or no knowledge of the subject. The rural labourers possessed great virtues and qualities, which made England proud of them; but it was possible that a population possessing many virtues might not be qualified to exercise a very complicated trust. The same might be said of the good qualities of English women at large; but the House had refused to give them an equal franchise with men. He did not believe the rural labourers were the persons best qualified to administer the affairs of this country; and he invited hon. Members opposite to say if they would go to the rural labourers in their vicinity for trustees under a will or of a marriage settlement? They had, then, to confront the question of redistribution. The noble Marquess told them there was no difficulty in dealing with it next year; that the difficulties were not so great as on former occasions. But the fact was the difficulties were much greater now. They were asked to pass a measure which involved, as a necessary consequence, electoral districts. It was impossible to avoid that if they passed this Bill, which would change the whole electoral map of England, and disfranchise half the constituencies represented in the present House. After such a measure was passed, what chance would they have of passing a Redistribution Bill? No Minister would be strong enough to accomplish such a task. If they were going to pass this Bill as it stood, and not a Redistribution Bill before Parliament was dissolved, they would never have justice done to the persons they now proposed to enfranchise. They were going to give South-West Lancashire, for instance, with its 65,000 voters, two Members; while they were going to retain for Calne, with 860 electors, and Liskeard, with 750, one Member each. What a ridiculous position this would be to place the voters in! This would give to the people of Calne and Liskeard ten times the influence in the councils of the nation which would be enjoyed by the electors in Lancashire, and thus a difficulty would be created which Parliament would find beyond its power to surmount. Parliament, further, would not be so self-denying as to do justice to the new constituencies if they were to be created in the way which was proposed. The powers of the petty boroughs would prevail; and before he had ended his days it might be expected of the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) that he would pronounce a dithyrambic eulogy upon the villages in the West of England which returned Liberal Members to Parliament. The Bill would refuse to men of enormous property, or great wealth, experience, knowledge, or public service, any greater weight in returning his Representative to the House of Commons than was possessed by the hedger or ditcher who worked outside his gates; and the Government had the effrontery, when making such a proposal, to say that they were not in a position to put an end to the petty oligarchies whose existence happened to be convenient to Her Majesty's Government. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War had told the House that he did not believe that this Bill would lead to the making of electoral districts; but did any reasonable man believe that it would lead to anything else? They knew that the noble Marquess was a man of guileless simplicity. He was the only man in England, he believed, who had doubted whether the Prime Minister would accept Office when the present Government was formed; so perhaps the noble Marquess might be pardoned for another display of this attractive characteristic—namely, a reluctance to believe that electoral districts would be a necessary sequence of the Bill. With regard to the position of Ireland in relation to this Bill, he heard the other day from an hon. Member sitting on the Ministerial side of the House, who was one of the greatest masters of statistics—particularly educational statistics—in this country, that 40 per cent of the people of Ireland could not read and write; and he had also recently seen in the Press a statement based, he believed, upon the Census Returns, to the effect that 40 per cent of the Irish people lived in tenements with only one room; 40 per cent more in tenements containing only two rooms; and that only 20 per cent of the inhabitants of Ireland lived in tenements of more than two rooms. Leaving the political aspect of the question aside for a moment, it was clear, therefore, that the Government were about to add to the existing Irish county electorate of about 200,000 persons other 400,000 or 500,000 of these gentlemen who could not read and write, and who lived in one—or at the least in two—roomed tenements. This, he maintained, was equivalent to the disfranchisement of the whole of the population above those in the very lowest condition. He hoped by the time the Bill was through Committee—if it ever got through—that they should have some very decided and marked expression of feeling from the House as to the prudence of placing the destinies of the country entirely in the hands of such a class as that. In Ireland, as was known, the Protestants, who were the wealthiest, the most educated, and most loyal—he did not mean to say that there were not many loyal Roman Catholics in the country—lived chiefly in the Province of Ulster; but there was also a large numerical majority of other persons who lived in houses below the value at present entitling the occupiers to vote, and if they were enfranchised the present representation would be entirely obliterated by what would practically be an enfranchisement of barbarism. The Government was going, in fact, to silence the vote of Protestant Ulster, for it was doubtful whether anywhere, except in Belfast, the Protestant Loyalists would be able to return Members who would do justice to them. He had dealt with the main points in favour of or against the Bill; but he should like to say a word on the question of whether the Bill was or was not an unavoidable concession to popular demands. Whenever on that side of the House they asked if any proposal made had excited popular interest in the country, they were told that if they wanted an exhibition of popular interest they could have it to-morrow. It was a case of Brennus throwing his sword into the scale; and the right hon. Gentleman the junior Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) was ready to perform the office on the present occasion. There could be no doubt that these agitations were easy of manufacture, and that outrages would be ready to order. Those who had profited so much by the reign of outrage in Ireland would be quite ready to produce, at all events, a tolerable imitation of the same thing in this country. Those who resorted to calculated brutality might, perhaps, wait until argument had failed before they applied it; and the dramatist of the Revolution was not so poor a workman as not to know that the climax should come somewhere in the third act. If their windows were to be broken, and the Members of that House were to be intimidated—[“Oh, oh!”] They had not done these things! No; because they were to wait until it was necessary. In regard to the question of opportuneness, he should not say much; but he would allude to a phrase of the Prime Minister, which he had repeated so often that it seemed to have become a sort of fetish with him—that the Liberal Party had always trusted the people more than their opponents had. How did the Liberal Party trust the people in Ireland? Ireland exhibited a wonderful example of Liberal confidence in the people. The Government had abolished the right of public meeting, suppressed the freedom of the Press, and governed the country by means of English bayonets and carefully-selected juries. No doubt the Government had done these things under a sense of public duty; but now they had the audacity to ask the House of Commons, in view of such a state of things, to multiply threefold the elements of disaffection in that country, and to extinguish at once and for ever the voice of loyalty and order in that country. There was, however, an opportuneness in the matter. The Government had declined to take the House into its confidence, and to communicate to Parliament the necessary complement of their scheme; but they were more afraid of the constituencies than they were of Parliament. They were determined, in any case and at any hazard, not to face again the constituencies who returned them to power. They wanted a new constituency, who would be more accessible to their arts than the one which elected the present Parliament. On that side of the House they asked why this question was brought forward at a time when no one had asked for it? He knew that the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) recently got up a meeting at Leeds on the subject; but he did not count that as a great representation of popular feeling. They on the Opposition side of the House could not tell why, when the Cabinet was so disunited on the subject, when the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) and the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) had been disputing on the subject on different platforms throughout the country, when the country was facing a crisis daily deepening, and when the political horizon was constantly darkening abroad, the Government had selected this precise mode and method of forcing this measure upon that House. Was it that the Government went forth, like M. Emile Ollivier, "with a light heart," to a work which might be more disastrous than his? He hardly believed that. It was, he believed, a policy of despair. After the battle of Cannæ the Senate came out to welcome the defeated Consul, because he had not despaired of his country. If the Liberal Government believed at that moment that this legislation was demanded of them by some fatality which they could not resist, and that although they saw the danger and felt the doubt, they were yet drifting in this manner, because they had no hope in them of any other method of meeting the difficulties of the position, he would say to them that if they would yet have heart to face their difficulties and their dangers, without recourse to those desperate expedients, it might be possible for them to earn, at least, the credit of the General who earned the gratitude of his country, because they had dared to resist the temptation of political suicide.

Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL remarked, that he could not help thinking that it was a little significant that the right hon. Gentleman opposite, occupying, as he deservedly did, a position of so much importance in the eyes of his Party, should have been driven, in speaking on the second reading of a measure of this kind, to rely on the trifling technicality that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), in moving the second reading, had raised his hat instead of making his Motion formally. When the right hon. Gentleman was forced to fall back upon a plea of that kind, it showed that he and those who acted with him were reduced to the most miserable shifts of exhausted polemics. When the right hon. Gentleman went on to express his sympathy with the Liberal Party for the absence from his place of the right hon. Gentleman the Head of the Government, he could not deplore that absence more than those who sat on the Government Benches did; and he might, perhaps, add that the same influences that had deprived the Government of their head had almost deprived them of their tail in the person of their humble servant the Secretary to the Local Government Board, who had, therefore, to appeal to the House for a greater indulgence than usual. The right hon. Gentleman had condoled with the Liberal Party of the temporary loss of their Head; but he could not compliment hon. Members opposite on their double headship. Whether the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was in his place or not, at all events his supporters followed him, and they did not immediately break up during his temporary absence. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of legislative sterility. Well, in 1867, Parliament passed the Reform Bill; in 1869, they legislated upon the Irish Church Question; in 1870, they dealt with the Irish Land Question, and subsequently they had legislated in reference to Public Education, and to the Abolition of Purchase in the Army. He stopped when he came to 1874, because then the period of legislative sterility commenced. Since the present Government had come into power Obstruction had been elevated into a fine art. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had said that we were going from bad to worse; that every change was a deterioration; that all apparent progress was essential retrogression; and that the more citizens they could keep outside the franchise the better—that the narrower the foundation the safer the superstructure. All that was very suitable matter of observation for the right hon. Gentleman, who had three times unsuccessfully solicited the suffrages of the working-class constituencies, and who, after a few and evil days of his connection with such bodies, had found refuge in the embraces of a constituency composed exclusively of country clergymen and non-resident M.A.'s.

MR. RAIKES: The hon. Gentleman is inaccurate in his statement. I would remind him that I have three times successfully contested such constituencies.

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL said, that the right hon. Gentleman expanded without contradicting his statement. It was high time for someone to strike a bolder note. The difficulty of the Government lay in the fact that of all the previous speakers hardly anyone had ventured to attack the principle of the Bill. If the time-honoured metaphor of the red herring and the scent had not long been eschewed by even provincial rhetoricians, it would be applicable to the present attempt to draw off attention from what was in the Bill by talking of what was not in it—from franchise to redistribution. He did not in the least underrate the difficulties of the question of redistribution. There was the difficulty of dealing fairly by London and Yorkshire and Lancashire, and yet not unfairly by the rest of the country. The question of redistribution was one of detail, of degree, of application of principle, not of principle itself. On that all were agreed. But the question of the Bill was a question of principle. On that point the Government would not be drawn off from the vital principle of the Bill, which was that every householder should have the vote. With regard to this there were four main criticisms. In the first place, they were told that there was no enthusiasm in the House, and they were bidden to contrast the present time with 1866, which was undoubtedly a very exciting time, a time of much good speaking and much bad voting, when they heard of Caves of Adulam, and Skyeterriers, and wooden horses of Troy. But there many reasons for the excitement then and the calmness now. The House of Commons was at that time, on the question of Reform, rotten to the core, while on this subject the present House of Commons was sound as a bell. The House of Commons of 1866 had not been elected for Reform; while the present House, if for anything after the reversal of Lord Beaconsfield's foreign policy, had been elected to extend the suffrage to the labourer. The Bill of 1866 was full of dangerous points, which might be fatal to the Bill and to the Government; while the present Bill was perfectly clear and simple. It would not be fatal to the existence of any Ministry, and its passage through the House of Commons, at any rate, was perfectly secure. In that House of Commons no one knew of his next-door neighbour whether he was a Reformer or not. In the present House of Commons, if the majority were not Reformers they would not be where they were. Of course, he excepted the case of the right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen); but he was one among many, and they had not the commanding personality of his right hon. Friend nor such an obliging constituency. These facts might sufficiently account for the comparatively quiet and business-like attitude of the House of Commons with regard to the Bill now under discussion as compared with the excited atmosphere of 1866. The right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken asserted that there was no enthusiasm for this Bill out-of-doors. They were asked—"Where are your big meetings?" as if they could convene them at any moment. In point of fact, they had no need to convene them, because they had been held over and over again. There was the great Conference assembled at Leeds last autumn. That was no mere fortuitous concourse of atoms; it was an assemblage of deputies commissioned by the organized Liberal opinion of the country. That great meeting, by an overwhelming majority, pronounced in favour of dealing with the franchise first. Since his right hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) carried his Motion in 1877 in favour of the extension of the franchise to the agricultural labourers, Resolutions had been passed at every Liberal meeting in favour of that extension; and, as far as the Liberal Party was concerned, its verdict had been given over and over again. Reference had been made on various occasions to the waning interest in this measure, as evidenced by the decreasing success of the Government at bye-elections. He was one of those who hated to underrate a defeat; and he was as ready as anybody could be to allow hon. Gentlemen opposite the maximum of satisfaction from recent Ministerial disasters. But, while they admitted the fact, the causes of it might be matter for speculation. They were told there had been a marked defection among Liberal voters. He was not prepared to say so. Rather he was disposed to look at the defection in the growing distrust on the part of the electors in the fidelity of the present House of Commons as regarded Reform. It was incumbent upon them to make it clear to their constituents, to whom they were so deeply pledged, that they were as resolute, as keen, and as united in support of Reform as their forefathers were in 1832, and their Predecessors in 1866. A third argument against the Bill was used much more sparingly than either of the two to which he had referred. They were told by some persons that the agricultural labourers were not fit for the vote. The right hon. Gentleman who spoke last made a warm profession of affection and respect for the agricultural labourers. He echoed those remarks. He had lived among them; he knew them; he respected them; and, what was considerably more than the right hon. Gentleman could say, he represented them. Hon. Gentlemen who had visited his constituents could bear witness when he said that the agricultural labourer yielded to none, either in his eagerness for political knowledge, his zeal for the principles which he had espoused, and his unfailing steadfastness to those to whom he had once given his allegiance. But the most important point was that they were voters already. The hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) did good service the other night by pointing out that there were five boroughs which comprised altogether 600,000 acres. That which he represented (Aylesbury) comprised in all some 68,699, out of which 65,597 were exterior to the borough proper. It contained over 4,000 electors, of whom more than 3,000 belonged precisely to that class which it was now proposed to enfranchise. Out of the whole of these 4,000 electors, and they were nearly all polled, there were only 29 spoilt votes, including the blind, the sick, and the palsied, and the vote of a certain country clergyman. The reason it was known that he had spoilt his vote was that when he came out of the polling booth he said—"I have no need to claim the protection of the Ballot; I crossed Russell's name out and ran my pencil through it." They were told that such voters would be led away by charlatans, by faddists, and bogus candidates, and men of straw, and that wealth and education would be not only not qualifications, but objects of hatred. Well, the electors of Aylesbury manifested their hatred of capital by electing the head of the great financial family of Rothschild, and their hatred of intelligence and culture by returning the humble individual who was now addressing the House. The fourth point which had been repeatedly urged was that even if the agricultural labourers were fit for the vote they had not asked for it. They were told that the labourers were knocking at the door of the Constitution so feebly that their knock could not be heard. But it was not always safe for them to knock loudly. It was not safe for them to pronounce too plainly their political views and hopes. When they were voters they were bolder. In the great majority of villages the official who used to be called the "black recruiting sergeant," the clergyman, the squire, and the farmer, forgetting for the moment their mutual antipathies, united and banded themselves together in order to preclude the agricultural labourers from the attainment and the exercise of political power, and from the formation and expression of political opinions. They were the employers of labour and the dispensers of charity, and "charity covers a multitude of sins," including the blackness of political intolerance. Two or three years ago there was a Conservative banquet at Aylesbury, and a farmer, who was an enthusiastic Conservative, asked one of his supporters to go with him to it. A political meeting followed. The bill of fare was peculiarly extensive and attractive. It included a speech from the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham), and it would be admitted that a speech from the hon. Gentleman was of itself a satisfying meal. Lighter refreshment was supplied in the form of a speech by his hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Northcote), and he was not sure that there was not some mention in the menu of a discourse by the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) on the affairs of Eastern Europe. One of his (Mr. Russell's) constituents was of the farmer's party of labourers, and when he had been driven safely home he went to the Dissenting minister and gave an account of the proceedings; but added—"I did not believe what they said." "Then, as it was a free meeting," said the minister, "I hope you got up and told them so." "Not such a fool," said the man; "I should have had to walk home if I had." Which things were an allegory. The agricultural labourer was capable of forming a right judgment in politics; but in nine cases out of ten he had not the means of expressing it, and where he had it was not safe for him to speak. From that bondage they could not deliver him; but they could put him in a position to deliver himself. That was the work to which the Government had set their hands, and they would not be deterred either by open opposition in "another place" or dilatory and evasive criticisms in the House of Commons. They were resolved, so far as they could encompass that end, that the agricultural labourer should be no longer either serf or cypher; but a free man and a self-governing citizen.

Mr. CUBITT said, that the Prime Minister, in introducing the Bill, had stated that fancy franchises had been killed by a playful remark of the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright). It was strange that the right hon. Gentleman had not remembered that there was one fancy franchise which the House had established—namely, the lodger franchise. No franchise had been received with greater favour, and from none were greater results anticipated. He could only find, in the various debates in which that franchise had been discussed, one hesitating adverse criticism. Sir George Cornwall Lewis said that the lodger franchise would bring on the register a population, mostly working men, who flitted about from one place to another, and who were, therefore, little qualified to vote for Members of Parliament. On the other hand, the proposal to give votes to lodgers met with the warm approval of Mr. Disraeli and Lord Derby. At last, in 1867, that which had in several Bills been introduced as a fancy franchise was incorporated in a Reform Act. A useful Return, presented on the Motion of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. A. Arnold), had given the results of the lodger franchise in the Three Kingdoms. In Scotland only 323 lodgers were found on the list, and of those 173 were in Glasgow, out of 63,716 electors, and 50 in Edinburgh. The remainder were scattered by twos and threes in the other constituencies. In Ireland 1,213 lodgers had votes, of whom 1,082 were resident in Dublin, in consequence, mainly, of the exertions of the Home Rule Party. In England there were 21,918 lodger votes out of 1,651,732 electors. Of these there were 379 in Liverpool, 115 in Manchester, 120 in Leeds, and Birmingham, notwithstanding the exertions of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain), only rejoiced in 72. Out of the 21,918 lodgers in England 15,690 were in the Metropolitan boroughs. In Westminster there were 3,774, or one-sixth of the total number of lodger electors in the United Kingdom. It was remarkable that the increase in the number of lodger electors in the Metropolis coincided with an increase of effort and of success on the part of the Conservative Party in the Metropolis. But the main result had established the fact that the lodger franchise was almost entirely an election agent's franchise, for it was hardly possible for a lodger to get his name on the list of voters without the aid of an agent. There were no fewer than five forms of claim for lodgers; and it was mainly on the ground of the difficulties with regard to them which had arisen that the stringent penal clause, introduced by the late Member for Cambridge (Mr. Marten), had been introduced into the Registration Act of 1878. It was found that the great number of false claims and fraudulent declarations required a sure remedy. In the view of those facts, it must be admitted that the lodger franchise had proved a complete failure. Some convictions in the Metropolis for tampering with the claims of lodgers showed that the penal Act had not put an end to all difficulties. He should be glad to hear from the Government what means they had found of making the lodger and the service franchise self-acting? If the Attorney General had been able to accomplish this, he would prove a great benefactor to the country. The reason for extending the lodger franchise to the counties appeared to be that uniformity of the occupation franchise in boroughs and counties would prepare the way for electoral districts, although the idea of electoral districts had been repudiated by both the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for War. The only difference it would leave between borough and county constituencies would be that the borough freeholders generally would have votes for their counties. He would give two or three examples. The effect of the Bill would probably be to raise the number of electors in West Surrey from 8,400 to about 20,000; and in Guildford, which was probably doomed, there were 1,542 electors and 154 freeholders who would still vote for the county. The electors in South Hants would probably be increased from 10,510 to 30,500; and the division included Portsmouth, with 18,112, and Southampton, with 7,464 electors; while in the two boroughs there were 3,000 freeholders who would vote for the county. But in South Norfolk there were 7,417 electors, and in Norwich 13,131 and 732 freeholders, and these freeholders voted by old custom in the city, so that in this division of a county there would be identity of the county and borough franchise. They were really and truly coming to electoral districts, although Ministers said that was what they did not wish. He would support the Amendment of his noble Friend the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners), or any other Amendment hostile to the Bill. He did not believe that they had sufficient experience of the working of the Reform Bill of 1867. The Election of 1868 gave a Liberal majority, which was lost in 1874 and regained in 1880; and keen observers believed that a General Election now would result in another reversal of the country's last decision. For the first time they had had a Government who had prided themselves on reversing the foreign policy of their Predecessors; the present Government's domestic policy might be reversed by their Successors; and so they might go on, until they got into great confusion. For these reasons he supported the Amendment, and he hoped the Bill would be shipwrecked either in that House or the House of Lords.

Mr. SPENCER said, he was anxious not to lose the opportunity of stating how very keenly he felt the importance of passing the Bill, and how great was the desire for it in the country at large, and certainly in that part of it which he represented (North Northampton). Those who thought otherwise could not be conversant with the feeling of the country. All the conferences and meetings that had been held had spoken out strongly in favour of the reduction of the county franchise. It might be that there had been no extraordinary excitement about the Bill; no Park railings had been knocked down, as some noble Lords seemed to expect; there had been no visits to the Home Secretary by Presidents of Reform Leagues; still, all the same, there was a feeling in the country, and if Ministers receded one jot from the position they had taken up, a great agitation would probably ensue—not "to order," as some hon. Members had suggested, but as the spontaneous expression of public opinion. If the country was supposed not to be in favour of the Bill—if it were a bad Bill for the country at large—how was it that the noble Lord (Lord John Manners), instead of moving the Amendment, had not moved the rejection of the Bill altogether? He suspected the reason was that the noble Lord knew what an enormous force such a Motion would put into the hands of the Government at that terrible time—the next General Election. The noble Lord also knew that if the Conservatives came into power they would have this incubus on their future policy—that the country was in favour of Reform, and that they had denied the necessity for and the desirability of Reform. The country had made up its mind to have this Bill, and he had no doubt that, in the long run, the measure would be passed. The Cambridgeshire Election had been put forward as a sign that the Bill was not wished for by the country. He expected that some portion of the large majority which the hon. Member for Cambridge-shire (Mr. A. Thornhill) secured was obtained by hon. Gentlemen telling the farmers that if the labourers had a vote they would be entirely swamped. The part of the country which he represented was very much in favour of the Bill, not only for the reasons he had given, but also because Ireland had been included in the measure. Many hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite had made strong remarks with reference to the manner in which the Bill proposed to deal with Ireland. He did not share the feelings of fear which had been expressed, and he was quite certain that the inclusion of Ireland was not a cause of alarm. If Ireland had not been included, he thought that the country would have shared that feeling of injustice which Irishmen of all sides in politics would have felt at the strong slap in the face which would have been given to that country by the Liberal Party. The Government, he rejoiced to think, had not given way upon this point. The fears and terrors of hon. Gentlemen opposite would not, in his opinion, commend themselves to the constituencies at the next Election. Notwithstanding what had been said, he could not help thinking that the agricultural labourer was quite as anxious for the welfare of his country as any other member of the community; and, considering the spread of education, that he was quite as well able to exercise the privilege of voting as the more exclusive electors in days that were past. There would be a great deal more power and force in the vote of an elector when they obtained an extended electorate. He should be glad to give his vote against the Amendment and in favour of the measure of Reform now before the House, chiefly because he wished that there should be no invidious distinction made between England, Scotland, and Ireland.

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL said, that, in supporting the Amendment, he had no wish to oppose any well-considered measure for assimilating the borough and county franchise, provided it was a complete measure, embracing redistribution of seats, and giving a promise that all classes of the electorate should have a fair share in the representation. The Bill before the House was, however, not a Bill of that kind, and never professed to be. It was entitled a Bill to amend the Representation; but it dealt only with one part of the subject—the extension of the franchise—so that its title was a misnomer. The House had been already informed of the precedents and authorities that supported the contention of the noble Lord who had moved the Amendment. No answer had been attempted to the application of those authorities to the present case, except this argument—that the separation of the two parts of a complete measure was not of such consequence now, because after passing the Franchise Bill the Redistribution Bill would not make any further change in the franchise. But the question of what the constituencies were to be was quite as important as the question of who the voters were to be. It required to be kept in view from the very beginning, in any satisfactory treatment of the general question of the representation of the people. If there was to be any separation of the two parts, the Bill for the redistribution of seats ought to have the first place, rather than the second place. Lord Stanley, speaking in 1866, said—

“You cannot deal conveniently or satisfactorily with the question of the extension of the franchise in boroughs and in counties—but more especially with the question of the franchise in counties—unless you know what is to be the nature and what is to be the extent of the constituencies you are about to create. . . . What I contend for is simply this—that we ought to know what the constituencies are to be as regards their nature and extent before we settle the question of who is to vote in these constituencies. . . . I believe that we ought to take the question of the redistribution of seats before we take the question of an extension of the franchise.”—(3 Hansard, [183] 2059-2061.)

Now, he failed to see that those words had lost any of their force because of the difference between the proposals of the present Bill and those of the Bill of 1866. For instance, he would ask the House to consider the proposals of the Bill with regard to Ireland. The electorate there was to be increased threefold; and, in the words of the hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Blennerhassett), “this was making a complete transfer of political power from those who now possessed it to the new electorate.” It seemed essential, before the House committed itself to such a change, that information be given as to how the increased electorate was to be arranged, and under what conditions as to voting it was to exercise its privileges. The hon. Member for Kerry warned the House of the danger of allowing those who held extreme views, who, he said, were 65 or 70 per cent of the population, to have the whole power in the representation of Ireland, condemning to extinction the political energy and public life of the minority. That danger could only be averted by a fair and just scheme of redistribution. Of the two parts of the scheme of the Government, it seemed to him that redistribution was more urgently called for than the extension of the franchise. They had heard it stated that there was a demand for a Reform Bill. But that demand had mostly come, not from the agricultural population, but from people in towns. The grievances which had been heard of were mostly such as might be remedied by redistribution. The anomaly of one man living on one side of the street and having a vote, while his comrade in the same circumstances, but living on the other side of the street, had no vote, was to be remedied by an extension of the boundaries of the borough. Even the case cited by the Prime Minister of a considerable population which had gathered about ship-building yards on the Clyde, some miles below the municipal boundaries of Glasgow, was a case calling for redistribution rather than for a reduction of the county franchise. It was the case of an unrepresented urban population, with urban and not rural interests, and their enfranchisement was to be sought rather by joining them to other town populations than by admitting them as county voters. But the Government themselves plainly admitted that redistribution was inseparably connected with, and, in fact, was a part of, the subject which this Bill opened to the House. Why, otherwise, was it that the Prime Minister gave them a sketch of his own ideas as to redistribution? Was that not an admission that an exposition of a large enfranchising scheme would be incomplete and insufficient without some explanation which went further than merely informing the House who were to have votes? But while the sketch presented was enough to justify the House in asking that the entire scheme contemplated by the Government should be placed before them in outline at least, it was not enough to satisfy their demand. It was an admission that they were right in asking for information as to what was intended; but it failed to give that information in a sufficient or satisfactory manner. The sketch was unsatisfactory both in form and in substance. In form, because it was not given as from the Cabinet—it did not come as binding on the Cabinet. It was true the Prime Minister stated that he would not have submitted that sketch if he believed that it was vitally in conflict with any of the opinions his Colleagues entertained; and the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War had strengthened that statement by speaking of the Prime Minister's sketch as submitted with the assent of his Colleagues, as a declaration generally accepted and concurred in by the Members of the Cabinet. But why should there not be some information more definite and unqualified than that? It was only reasonable to suppose that the Government had considered what their entire scheme was to be. If they had, why did they not make a statement to the House? This Reform measure was to consist of two parts. Why should the House be asked to commit themselves to the first part without knowing what the second part was to be, especially as the first part might be entirely changed in its effects according to the manner in which the second part was dealt with? The Prime Minister had said, with reference to a demand on the Government to tell its plan for redistribution, that the Government "did not intend to walk into any trap." But as regarded the sketch of redistribution which had been put forward with the view of satisfying them, the House might say that without the positive assurance that it bound the Government they must decline to regard it as offering any pathway that was certainly clear of traps and pitfalls. It was said that redistribution was too difficult a subject to treat in conjunction with the extension of the franchise. He should have thought that its difficulty would have been the very reason why the Government should have endeavoured first to deal with that part of their scheme. To show that it was not a subject impossible to deal with, the House would shortly have in their hands the Bill of his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Sir John Hay), in which it would be found that the subject was treated in a thorough and comprehensive way. But the substance, as well as the form, of the Prime Minister's sketch called for some remarks. One portion of it was re-assuring enough, where he said that the distinction of town and country known as burgh and shire was to be maintained. But was there not a danger of that distinction being lost if the Franchise Bill were passed before the redistribution scheme was considered? If it should so happen that there was a Dissolution of Parliament after the passing of this Franchise Bill, but before a Redistribution Bill was passed, large suburban populations and many small towns which, under a Redistribution of Seats Bill, would be included in borough constituencies, would vote in the county, outnumbering, in some cases, the proper rural electorate. As an illustration, he might state what the result would be in the case of Glasgow. The population within the Parliamentary borough of Glasgow was 488,000; but there was a population in the suburbs of 186,000. If this Representation of the People Bill was passed the suburban population would receive the same privilege of voting as those now had who lived within the borough; but if the redistribution scheme were not passed they would vote in the counties of Lanark and Renfrew, and not in the town. The Parliamentary borough of Glasgow, with its population of 488,000, had a constituency of 68,000. In the same proportion the suburban population that would be enfranchised by this Bill would give a constituency of 26,000. That constituency was considerably larger than the whole present constituency of the two counties within whose bounds it now resided. The constituency of North Lanarkshire and Renfrewshire was 18,000; and if this Bill passed, there would be added to it—without taking into account the smaller towns—a suburban Glasgow constituency of 26,000. But the great blot on the Prime Minister's sketch was the proposal that had been so often referred to, of retaining the number of Irish seats undiminished. He was quite aware that representation had not been given strictly according to population, and that the highest authorities on the subject did not propose it. They had not yet come to equal electoral districts, and he trusted they never would; but if they were to have all classes fairly represented they must have a certain variety in their constituencies, even although the borough and county franchises were assimilated. The three Divisions of the United Kingdom contained populations that were approximately similar. There was the same need for variety in constituencies in England and Wales, in Scotland, and in Ireland; so that, though population was not the only thing to be taken into account in distributing seats, the respective populations of the three countries might fairly be taken as affording some guide to the number of Members to which each country was entitled. On that ground it could be said that England and Scotland were under-represented, and that Ireland and Wales were over-represented; and yet the proposal was that Ireland should retain its present number of Members, and that a few Members be taken from England and given to Scotland. Nothing had been said by the Prime Minister to justify this exceptional favour to be shown to Ireland. He hardly thought that its distance from London would really be insisted upon as a reason for it, especially in the absence of any proposal to give more Members on that account to the far North of Scotland. Therefore, it was impossible to avoid the conclusion that the proposal was simply a bid for the Irish vote. He could well understand the difficulty of bringing in a Representation of the People Bill for Great Britain that was not to apply to Ireland; and he could also well understand the feeling of alarm of those loyal to the Union at the idea of extending the franchise in Ireland under present circumstances. Many said this was not a time for such a measure for Ireland; and the conclusion one would be led to was to doubt whether the present was a good time for a Franchise Bill at all—whether it should not be deferred to a later and a safer time. But if they were to legislate on the subject now, and if Ireland was to be admitted to the same privileges, why should not Ireland be subjected to the same conditions, as the other parts of the United Kingdom? If favour was to be shown, why should it be shown to Ireland, which, on any grounds which could be held to have a bearing on this question, had the least claim to be favoured? Since the Reform Act of 1832 the population of England and Wales had increased from 14,000,000 to 27,000,000, and that of Scotland from 2,333,000 to 3,750,000, while that of Ireland had decreased from 7,750,000 to about 5,000,000; and yet the proposal was that whatever happened to England and Scotland, Ireland was to have its present number of Members continued undiminished. Passing from the question of population, let them look at the statistics recently furnished of the contributions of Scotland and Ireland to the Exchequer. Scotland contributed last year to the Exchequer £9,138,000, and Ireland £8,195,000. On the other hand, Scotland received out of public money during the year £2,665,000, whilst Ireland received £7,000,000. He did not say that these grants to Ireland were unnecessary or ill-bestowed; but he said that, the two countries showing such differences in their relations to the public Exchequer, it was altogether unreasonable to place Ireland in a more favourable position with regard to representation than Scotland. What was the object of a Reform Bill? To amend the representation. But for what purpose? For the purpose of securing better government for the country. But they could not look for good government if all classes, minorities as well as majorities, were not fairly represented in the House of Commons. A Household Franchise Bill, if it stood alone, might place the power wholly in the hands of the most numerous class of householders. He thought it was no want of charity to say that the most numerous class was not necessarily the best qualified to govern the country. They might be capable citizens, but they could not claim to be the most capable. Until they knew what the intentions of the Government were as to the redistribution of seats, it was impossible to forecast the effects of the present Bill—whether it was likely to lead to salutary reform or to make a dangerous revolution.

MR. ANDERSON said, the hon. Member for the Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities (Mr. J. A. Campbell) had confined himself to the stereotyped views of his Party on this question by attacking only the redistribution part of the measure. He had no wish to answer that, at least at present, but to refer to the historical sketch they had in the earlier part of the evening from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), in which he drew a picture—he (Mr. Anderson) believed it was only a fancy picture—of the way in which on former Franchise Bills the two Parties bargained away the political power of the people to suit or defeat each other. He did not think that such bargaining ever really took place; but he wished to point out that the right hon. Gentleman spoke of it not only as having taken place, but spoke of it as approving of that kind of thing. Well, that was exactly the kind of thing that hon. Members on his side of the House did not approve of—namely, bargaining away the political power of the people, without proper reference to the people themselves, whose power was to be dealt with in that way, and that reminded one that this mode of bargaining followed out the principle of the Tory Party, that the franchise was not a right of the people, but only a trust. The noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners), the other night, stated that in the broadest way, when he said it was the Birmingham heresy that the franchise was a right and not a trust. Whether it was a heresy or not, it was not confined to Birmingham, because they in the North shared it thoroughly. They looked upon the franchise as the inherent right of everyone of full age and sound mind in this country; and it was for those who denied any class their right in that respect to show good and cogent reasons for it. No doubt society had a right to protect itself against criminals and lunatics; but they were the only ones who should not exercise the right. It had been tried to show that women should not possess the franchise, but he thought with very doubtful success; and he thought that women who were to obey the laws and pay the taxes, the same as men, had the same inherent right to have some say in the election of those men who made the laws they were bound to obey. He did not think those who had argued against the admission of women had made out their case for exclusion. There was also the class of lodgers. They had an attack on the lodger franchise from the right hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr.

Cubitt). There was no doubt that the lodger franchise had been a failure; but he thought all would admit that it ought not to be that. There was a very extensive class of lodgers all over the country who were thoroughly well qualified to exercise the franchise, and who ought to have it; and if the lodger franchise was now re-arranged, and all its difficulties and technicalities removed so as to make it more easy for intelligent lodgers to obtain the franchise, it would be no longer the failure the right hon. Member described. Then, beyond that, there was a large and floating population, not now included, that would be embraced under manhood suffrage. They said, not without some reason, there were difficulties in the way of including these; but they were difficulties, not in the way of denying them the rights, but in denying the expediency of including them, on account of the almost impossibility of getting their names upon any register, so that it should be known they voted once, and once only. These appeared to be great difficulties in connection with any extension of the franchise beyond household suffrage; but they surely did not apply to agricultural labourers. There were agricultural labourers, certainly in Scotland, if not in England, who were abundantly suited to exercise the franchise intelligently. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) went to Edinburgh last winter, and attempted to tell a Scotch meeting that the Scotch agricultural labourers were not sufficiently intelligent to have the franchise; but the meeting only laughed at him. They who had had parochical schools for 300 years in the country had an intelligent people all over the country; and the agricultural labourers were, perhaps, even rather better fitted to exercise the franchise intelligently than those in towns. If the agricultural labourers in England were ignorant, whose fault was it? It was the fault of the parson and the squire, who had had them under subjection for hundreds of years, and who, in order to keep them in subjection, had been keeping them in ignorance. That alone was the reason why; but the franchise was a great educator, and if they once gave them the franchise they would before long know well how to use it. The hon. Member who had just sat down gave Glasgow as an illustration against the Bill. It was really one of the strongest that could be given in its favour. In Glasgow they had a population of 500,000 in the burgh, 250,000 immediately outside the burgh boundaries, and another 250,000 a little further afield; so that altogether there was a population of 1,000,000 in this centre of industry. These men might be said to be interchangeable. They went with their employment. They were this year working and living within the burgh, next year they had gone with their work into the counties. They had a vote when they were living in the burgh, and why should they be deprived of it when they went to live in the country? They had not become less intelligent; but yet, by their stupid law, the moment they got out of the borough they lost their vote. He did not think much greater injustice could be done than that, or that there could be a better argument for the extension of the franchise. When they lived in the counties they could not have a vote for the reason that they were not living in a house of £14 a-year, and that was another injustice they suffered from in Scotland. He did not know where the Scotch Members were in 1868 when they submitted to that; but in Scotland their county franchise was £14, and in England it was £12, and he had never been able to see any reason for the injustice. As it was an injustice, the best way of getting quit of it would be to adopt household suffrage altogether. The hon. Member who had just spoken said a good deal about the redistribution scheme as it was to apply to Ireland. The Scotch Members, of course, felt a great deal about that. They were anxious to give the fullest justice possible to Ireland; but, at the same time, they felt they required justice for themselves also. They had not got justice at present, because, according to population, they ought to have 71 Members instead of 60. He certainly thought if they got 71 Members they might be content—"No, no!"—but he did not think they could be content with one single Member less. If the hon. Member opposite wanted more he did not object; but he did not see where they were to come from, and that was his great difficulty about the justice to Ireland. If Ireland was to maintain her present number of Members at 105, he did not quite see where Scotland was to get the 11 extra she ought to have. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) the other night spoke very strongly about maintaining for Ireland the number given to Ireland by the Treaty of Union; but Ireland had at present five more. She had three actually; but she had a right to five more than were given by the Treaty of Union. According to population, she would only have a right to three less than was given by the Treaty of Union; and if they could not prevail on their Irish Friends to come to a just measure of the population and be content with the 97, and allow Scotland to have the other eight, he hoped, at least, they would be content with the number awarded to them by the Treaty of Union, and surrender the five given them in 1832, when the population was a great deal larger than now. Then there was another source from which they might possibly hope to get a few Members; but, so far, it had not been hinted at by the Prime Minister, or anyone else. Although this Bill was not to abolish any existing franchise, the franchise to which he was alluding might be abolished by means of the Redistribution Bill—he meant the University franchise. [Laughter.] Hon. Members might laugh; but he, and a great many people, looked upon the University franchise as a mere device for giving certain classes a double vote. They looked upon a single vote as the right of a man, and that double votes were not his right. Of course, if England surrendered her University seats, Scotland would surrender hers equally. He much regretted that certain Members would, by that means, lose their seats, who were at present great ornaments to the House; but he thought that the grievance of giving certain persons a double vote ought to be got rid of. The only other subject he would allude to was that of proportional representation. He had been asked to sign a document approving of this, which had been signed by many Members on both sides of the House; but he disapproved entirely of proportional representation, and the attempt to represent minorities. If hon. Members who signed it had as much experience of minority representation as he had they would not be so anxious for it. The best way, and the only correct way, of getting minorities represented was to abandon the system of having double and triple constituencies. Let them abandon the very large constituencies as well as the very small ones, and have moderate-sized constituencies, with only one Member for each. If they adopted that system, they would have minorities represented in what appeared to him to be the only fair and proper system of minority representation.

COLONEL WALROND said, that he was glad to have the opportunity of stating his reasons for giving a cordial support to the Amendment of the noble Lord (Lord John Manners). It was estimated that about 2,000,000 of new electors would be added to the electoral roll, and the consent of the House was asked to that increase without any scheme of redistribution being presented. There were many Members on the Conservative side of the House who did not object, in principle, to the assimilation of the borough and county franchise, as it seemed to them but natural such a measure should follow the Bill of 1867. He, however, would not give a very willing assent to it unless it was accompanied by a redistribution which would insure a due maintenance of the distinction between borough and shire—a distinction which, in his opinion, ought to be maintained. He fully admitted there were many anomalies under the present system; but he was willing to remove them. There were, however, many things in the present Bill which he would shrink from. If it were desirable that the county and borough franchise should be assimilated, they ought to ask whether that was the proper time for the change; and he was quite convinced it was not the proper moment, and that it was not a wise or statesmanlike policy to bring forward a measure which was to include in it the reduction and extension of the franchise in Ireland. Something like 400,000 or 500,000 voters would be added to the electorate of Ireland. Now, the essence of the Premier's speech, as he understood it, was that they were to enrol capable citizens by means of this Bill; but would everybody entertain the idea that these 400,000 new voters in Ireland could be called capable citizens? His own definition of a capable citizen was a man who went quietly about his daily labour and was a loyal subject; but of these 400,000 additional Irish voters fully two-thirds would be men whom it would be impossible to call law-abiding citizens. It might possibly be argued that it was very wrong to bring in a mere temporary Bill for England and Scotland, and he rather agreed to that. When the franchise was extended he thought it ought to be extended to the three countries, and that was a strong argument in favour of the postponement of the measure. They would be taunted that they desired no reform; but he could not think there was any very great desire in the country for this measure at the present time. No doubt, it was desired in large towns where there was no direct representation, and among the mining population of the North and in the suburbs of those boroughs, where there certainly was a hardship which ought to be redressed; but to say that the rural population desired this change was, in his opinion, incorrect. He represented a constituency (East Devon) largely composed of agriculturists, and with a large town in it. He knew that in the town of Torquay there was a strong desire that a measure something like this should be brought forward; but he had not had a single Petition from the rural districts, and he believed his Colleague had had only one Petition—and that from Torquay—that this measure should pass. He had looked through the latest summary of the Petitions, and he found that up to Saturday there were 61 Petitions only, and, with two or three exceptions, they all came from Scotland. The Premier had said that household suffrage was generally desired in the counties; but in the West of England he thought he had shown that that was not the case, except among the town population. No doubt, however, the Birmingham Caucus would soon manufacture Petitions enough to show the feeling of the rural population. Among farmers he believed there was a feeling of alarm, not at the prospect that the agricultural labourer would receive the franchise, but lest their interests should be annihilated under this Bill. Without redistribution the agricultural interest in the counties would be swamped by the urban voters. The principle which had been hitherto invariably recognized in the extensions of the franchise would be obliterated. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) said he was entirely in favour of electoral districts and manhood suffrage; but that was not the general feeling of the House. Anyone who was in the House during the discussion of the last Reform Bill would know that both Liberals and Conservatives accepted the principle that there should be a distinction between town and country. In 1859 Lord Derby defined the distinction as being, as regarded the counties, that property was the basis, and that in the boroughs numbers and residence was the basis; and Lord John Russell himself said, with regard to that speech, that the expression was clear, the authority high, and the argument conclusive. The Government might say they had no other alternative than such a Bill as this; but he believed that if they could appoint a Boundary Commission to enlarge some of the present boroughs, and also to group certain of the small boroughs together, the real requirements of the case might be met in that way. Gentlemen on his side asked that the present Bill should be postponed until a complete scheme of redistribution was submitted to the House. There were some Members of the Government who were in favour of electoral districts, manhood suffrage, and payment of Members, although, from a desire to work with their Colleagues, they kept their more extreme doctrines to themselves. The proposed service franchise, he believed, would be popular in many quarters; but he could not quite understand it, and he thought it might create great anomalies. If he built a lodge for his coachman, his coachman would have a vote; but if his coachman lived in his house he would have no vote. That seemed rather a hardship, and he suggested whether all for whom the taxes were paid might not have a vote. He also considered it right not to allow faggot voters to be created in future, and the Prime Minister had exercised a wise discretion in not disfranchising those now upon the register; but he hoped some Amendment to the Bill would be brought forward by which female suffrage would be introduced. Something like 25,000 or 30,000 women were farming their own land; and he thought it very hard that when they were proposing to enfranchise the labourers they should refuse these women the franchise. The Prime Minister had deprecated what he called fancy franchise; but he thought it would not be at all difficult, if the House could agree, to give votes to all who had a certain amount in the savings bank, or who paid a certain amount in direct taxation. Without saying anything more upon the

Bill, he wished to add that there was nothing in this Amendment which negatived the principle of Reform. It simply expressed the feeling which Lord Derby expressed in 1866, when he said the House did not know that the Government, if they had made up their minds with regard to redistribution, would not change their minds. They had been told that the scheme of redistribution could not be brought forward at the same time with the Bill. He believed, however, that in the Reform Bills of 1832 and 1867 the details of the redistribution scheme were joined to each Bill, which in one case contained 80, and in another case 60 clauses, while the present measure only contained 12 clauses. There was no reason, therefore, on that ground why the scheme should not be brought forward now. So far as the House knew it was intended to take Members from the boroughs of the South of England and give them to Ireland, a measure which he considered would be utterly unjust. They had heard a great deal about justice being meted out to Ireland. He was as anxious as anyone to see justice done to Ireland; but he certainly protested against that justice being conferred at the expense of England. It was quite certain that if the population or the taxation of Ireland were considered relatively to that of England and Scotland, Ireland should lose in any scheme of redistribution 10 or 12 Members. In his opinion, therefore, it was absurd to say that Ireland was entitled to 105 Members. He believed that the whole of this Bill was simply meant as a sop to the Irish vote. It was a sop, not only to the Irish vote in Ireland, but to the Irish voters in the large towns of England. It was well known that if there was an appeal to the constituencies in a short time, many hon. Gentlemen opposite who had Irish voters among their constituents might find it very hard to please them. Upon all grounds, therefore, he contended that piecemeal proposal was inopportune. As Lord Derby said in 1868, redistribution ought rather to come before extension. He objected also that there was no finality about this proposal; and, in the words of the Prime Minister, he urged that the constant agitation of organic changes diminished the stability of their institutions, and tended to disqualify England for the performance of those great duties which she had to discharge for herself and the world. There were so many persons who had just claims to be enfranchised left outside the purview of the Bill, that he was quite certain in a very few years the House would have to all do this work over again. It was, therefore, an unfortunate circumstance for the country that the House should be asked within a short period to re-open this question and discuss another Reform Bill. He cordially supported the Amendment of the noble Lord.

MR. MELLOR: Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Walrond) who has just spoken has somewhat needlessly alarmed himself about manhood suffrage and electoral districts. As I understand the Bill, there is nothing in it which points to anything of the kind, and there has been nothing in the speeches delivered in this debate which tend to that conclusion. The speech of the noble Lord (Lord John Manners) who has moved the Amendment was one of considerable power; in every way worthy of the occasion, and of the great experience of the noble Lord. But I cannot understand why, if he anticipates all the mischief which he believes will result from this Bill, he moved an Amendment of this description, which is in the nature of a dilatory plea. Why did he not say boldly that the Bill was a mischievous one, and that it ought to be at once rejected? Can the noble Lord, in moving this Amendment, have reflected upon the magnitude of the interests with which he was dealing? Two millions of householders in the United Kingdom, at the present time, are without the franchise. I can understand hon. Members considering that to add 2,000,000 to the voters of the country is a serious matter; but I hope that those hon. Members will also remember that it is an equally serious matter to keep 2,000,000 of householders out of the franchise, if they are entitled to it. Either it is very wrong to admit them, or most unjust to keep them out; and if I anticipated half the evils from admitting them that hon. Gentlemen opposite have done, I would unquestionably vote against the Bill itself. The only excuse for the course taken by the noble Lord that I have heard was given by the right hon. Gentleman who spoke after him

(Mr. J. Lowther). He said that this Amendment was according to precedent. Sir, I can understand the value of precedent, if the unwritten law of this House were in question; but how can precedents be of any value when the question is whether a Bill of this kind should be passed or not? It is either right or wrong. If it is wrong, and the noble Lord said that it was, then, in my opinion, he was bound to move its rejection. Now, Sir, the speakers who followed him have contrived to drag Birmingham and the Caucus into this discussion, although the noble Lord wisely tried to keep them out. It is said that, according to what they call the Birmingham heresy, the franchise is looked upon as a right, whereas it ought to be considered a trust. Surely, if it is a right, there can be no question that every man, woman, and child in the country is entitled to it? If, on the other hand, it is called a trust, where is the responsibility, and who is to call the trustees to account? Why, non-voters are not even entitled to inquire how those having the franchise voted. I have always understood that the franchise has long been considered to be a privilege, conferred upon those that, in the opinion of the nation, are capable citizens. The position of the labourer in this country has, for many years past, called for the attention of statesmen; and I am surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes) speak so strongly against his being entrusted with the franchise. That right hon. Gentleman can hardly have considered the statement in 1867 of Mr. Disraeli, whom I suppose hon. Gentlemen opposite would call a prudent and far-seeing statesman. In 1867, quoting a speech he made in 1852, he spoke as follows in this House, with respect to the Reform Bill of 1832, which took the franchise from the freemen:—

"I have also another objection to this Bill. I have often said to this House—I repeat it now, and it is the expression of a deep and sincere conviction on my part—that I think in the construction of that remarkable law, the Reform Act of 1832, there was a very great deficiency, which consisted of a want of due consideration of the rights of the working-classes to the franchise. . . . Under our old system, by the suffrages of the freemen, the political rights of the labourer were acknowledged by the Constitution. We virtually destroyed those rights."—(3 Hansard, [185] 1200.)

Again, Sir Robert Peel also pointed out that—

"You will find the labouring class, whose Parliamentary rights you are now destroying, will take the opportunity of claiming again those privileges which you have thoughtlessly taken from them."

Surely it cannot be said that those two statesmen did not give a great deal of attention to the subject. It is true that the present proposal is to give the franchise to a much larger number than at that time. And hon. Gentlemen talk about appealing to the constituencies! Do they suppose that if this Bill were thrown out upon such an excuse as this, and the constituencies were gravely told that 2,000,000 of people were denied what they consider to be their right, on the ground that the way in which they were afterwards to be locally arranged was not introduced into the measure, that then the constituencies would be satisfied? Why, Sir, the noble Lord has actually told us that the labourer was sufficiently represented at present—that he was represented in agricultural boroughs. And this he afterwards qualified by saying, "that is as far as it goes." He then said that recent elections had shown that no interest was taken in this question. As to the election for West Somerset, I claim to know something about that, as I live there, and I can tell him that this question was never made the principal subject. But I can also tell him that many electors expressed very strong views with regard to faggot-voting in West Somerset, where it actually happened that one tithe-rent charge had been divided amongst 33 Bristol Tory merchants, who had nothing to do with West Somerset, and never came there except to vote at the elections. But what did his argument amount to? Why to this, and this only—that some of those who had got the franchise themselves wanted to keep, and did their best to keep, others out. This is a question not so much for those who have the franchise, as for those who have not, and who now desire it. Something has been said about there having been no agitation on the subject. Agitation, Sir! Why has there been no agitation? Because the people believe and trust in the justice of Parliament. Why should they agitate, when they believe that they will get the franchise without? The English labourer, to begin with, is not accustomed to agitate. He has no means nor many opportunities of meeting his fellow-labourers for the purpose. But if this Bill is rejected, and if what they consider their just claim is refused, does anyone doubt that a very strong feeling of indignation will arise throughout the country, and agitation enough to satisfy its strongest lover, or any hon. Gentleman opposite? It has been suggested in the course of the debate that these claims could be met sufficiently by enlarging the boundaries of boroughs. But, in my opinion, no advantage would be gained by that. By that means, you would only take a large number of voters from the counties and put them in the boroughs, and how could you go on always extending the boundaries? Men are attracted by superior wages into the towns, where they acquire votes. They are in constant communication with their friends in the country, who remain without, and great dissatisfaction is caused, both in the country and also to the enfranchised householders of the towns, by the exclusion of their friends. But not only by this is great dissatisfaction caused. In the borough that I have the honour to represent (Grantham), working men, machine makers, and such, often go to the other unrepresented towns in Lincolnshire—such as Gainsborough, or Sleaford, or Spalding—and what do they find? Why, they find as soon as they have stepped across the borough boundary of Grantham to live for a time elsewhere, they have lost their votes. If this is the case with regard to Grantham, what would hon. Members say about Nottingham, where, if a man crosses the street, he may lose his vote! The man's wages, house rent, and all remain the same. He wants to vote for the county where he lives. How can you, in the name of justice prevent him? The noble Lord tells us that the constituencies would become unmanageable. I say so much the better. We want to get rid of management and canvassing, and all the evils that this system leads to. He quoted South-West Lancashire, which, he said, would then contain 60,000 voters. Well, but he must have forgotten that such a constituency would be no larger than Liverpool, Birmingham, or Glasgow, and very little larger than Lambeth or Finsbury. Surely this was a very small argument to use, to induce the House to reject a Bill of such magnitude. Important as it is, still hon. Members opposite are not satisfied with it, and are now trying to get rid of it on various grounds, but amongst others, because it contains no scheme for redistribution. Why, Sir, would any Prime Minister in his senses have brought in a redistribution scheme when he wanted to carry a Franchise Bill, so as to raise every element of discord against him? Is it, indeed, the object of hon. Gentlemen opposite to make extension of the franchise impossible, while some of them profess, or have professed, to be in favour of it? Surely this shows that the noble Lord tried to get rid of this Bill by a side-wind, because he knew that he could not collect the enemies, open and secret, to the Bill if he moved its rejection. Sir, we want nothing but what is fair and honest in the way of redistribution. For my part, although, of course, I wish the supremacy of the Party to which I have the honour to belong to be maintained, I do not wish seriously to weaken the Opposition. I think this House most likely to promote good government when there is a sufficient Opposition. But, Sir, how have we been treated in this matter? Why, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge, who spoke to-night, said that we kept outrages to order! I indignantly repudiate, for the Liberal Party, that it has ever been or is the Party of outrage or disorder. We seek to obtain our ends by reason, and not by violence; and I think that the right hon. Gentleman never made a greater mistake than when he condescended to use such language. Sir, everyone must be conscious of the difficulties connected with Ireland. Certainly I am. But I have come to the conclusion that it is impossible to legislate on this subject for one part of the United Kingdom only. We ought to deal with the whole, and try to do equal justice to all. By doing so, you will bring Ireland to the belief that this country is now, at all events, willing to treat her fairly. Sir, I sincerely trust that this House will come to the conclusion that the Bill ought to be extended to that country; and that, in the interests of all who love peace and order, this Amendment may be rejected and the Bill read a second time.

Mr. RITCHIE said, he took a slightly different view of this question from that of some of his hon. Friends near him, inasmuch as he was not opposed to the extension of the franchise to agricultural labourers. On the contrary, he was one of those who thought that it was impossible to maintain that artificial distinction which at present existed between voters in the towns and a similar class in the counties; and, as he could not see the principle upon which the distinction was based, he felt that it was only a question of time when that barrier should be broken down, and when the vote given by the Bill of 1867 to householders in towns should be extended to counties. He did not agree with those who argued that this would be a greater leap in the dark, large as the numbers were it proposed to enfranchise, than that of the measure of 1867. The Conservatives certainly had no reason to regret the enfranchisement of 1867. His own constituency was a working-class one, and if he were not able to appeal to the working men it would be useless to show his face there; but the fact was that the number of working men who supported him increased 50 per cent between 1867 and 1880. He was aware that Conservatives could not compete with Liberals in the bribes which they held out to that class; but the working classes were beginning to discover that there was a considerable amount of difference between promises and performance, and would resent the deception practised upon them merely for the purpose of catching their votes. He would, therefore, ask his hon. Friends not to lose courage at the prospect of the extension of the franchise as now proposed. It might, no doubt, entail a considerable amount of additional labour upon hon. Members, for a great deal of attention would have to be paid to the wants and wishes of the people, and that, perhaps, was one argument in favour of the Bill. Of one thing he was certain—namely, that there was no class of the community that showed more gratitude for services rendered to them than the working classes. He would say unhesitatingly that he was not opposed to the extension of the franchise to the counties; on the contrary, he had always felt it a mere question of time that this proposal should be carried. He thought, however, that it was wise to withhold what he believed to be an act of abstract justice to the county householder until he had shown by his education that he was entitled to it; and he could not help thinking that, considering the time which had elapsed since the passing of the Education Act in 1870, it was not unnatural for the Party opposite to think that the time had now arrived when the franchise might be safely extended to the county householders. That being admitted, it was desirable, in his opinion, that the boon should not be granted owing to pressure from outside. There was, he believed, no strong feeling either inside or outside the House with regard to this measure; but, at the same time, he could not agree with those hon. Members who believed that the recent county elections were any indication of public feeling with regard to it. Then, with regard to Ireland, the question was one of great difficulty. They might well hesitate before extending the provisions of the Bill to Ireland; at the same time, it was difficult to see how they could deal with one part of the United Kingdom without also dealing with the other. On the other hand, there was not one Member of the House who could be ignorant of the effect in Ireland of this extension of the franchise. A great number of the voters it was proposed to enfranchise could neither read nor write; and the extension of the franchise to such people could not be viewed without the gravest apprehension. Neither could Government disguise from themselves that by this extension of the franchise they were giving it to those who did not belong to what might be termed the Loyal Party in that country. On these grounds, therefore, he thought it would have been wiser to defer this Bill a little longer until things were in a more settled condition in Ireland. Another difficulty in omitting Ireland was that justice could not in that case be obtained for England and Scotland; because, as a matter of strict justice, it was evident some seats would have to be taken from Ireland to provide for the additional seats required for England and Scotland. As far as what the Bill included was concerned, he was in favour of it. In many respects it was distinctly Conservative. It retained the property qualifications for the county voters which many on his side of the House feared would be taken from them. Nor did he object to the service franchise. Indeed, he hoped that the principle might be extended, because there were many besides the class it would enfranchise who were perfectly fit to enjoy the franchise, but who would not have it under the Bill. Like many others, he objected not to what the Bill included, but to what it did not include. An hon. Member opposite, who had spoken of redistribution, had said that they could afford to wait till that question arose; but he thought that was a vital part of the question of the franchise. It had been contended that distance from the seat of Government was a reason for having larger representation. As a Member for the Metropolis, he altogether objected to that argument. He thought it was admitted on all hands that in any redistribution of seats the Metropolis had a very large claim for an increase in the number of her Members, both as regarded population and wealth. But, according to the Prime Minister's argument, referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), he was afraid that so far from any addition being made to the number of her Representatives she would be deprived even of those she had. The right hon. Gentleman had asked the House to look at the number of Members London now had, and the influential newspapers in which the public opinion of the Metropolis was represented. If that argument meant anything at all, it meant that there was no necessity for any further representation in London; but to that he entirely objected, as having no basis in justice. The redistribution scheme shadowed out by the Prime Minister meant the taking away of Members from Conservative parts of England, and giving them to Liberal constituencies in Scotland, while disloyal Ireland was to be rewarded by being allowed to keep Members to which it was not entitled at the expense of England and Scotland. This he considered was a monstrous injustice. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham was for retaining the present Members in Ireland, because it was a plot of ground on which the wicked Tories had so long worked their wicked will; and he was, therefore, in favour of governing Ireland on new lines. The Government of which he was then a Member had passed two of the strongest Coercion Bills ever known. Were these his new lines? He argued that the Representatives for Ireland had a diminishing influence; but no Representatives had ever shown that they possessed more. They had forced the Government to deal with the land in Ireland in a way in which land had never before been dealt with in any country, and they had forced the Government over and over again to pass remedial legislation. The real reason for retaining Irish seats, he believed, was apparent to everybody. It was another element in the history of bribery and corruption which had for years past been practised by the present Government with a view to obtaining what they never would obtain—the support of the Home Rule Party. He was in favour of an extension of the franchise; but he should support the Amendment of his noble Friend, because he thought the House ought not to be asked to pass a Franchise Bill without having also at the same time the redistribution scheme before them. It would, in his view, be a gross anomaly to pass a Bill which would involve an appeal, in the event of a Dissolution, to constituencies which were neither the old nor the new ones. If the Government, instead of promising a Bill for Municipal Reform in London—for which there was no cry—had been content to deal with both branches of Parliamentary Reform, there would, he thought, have been a general desire in the House to arrive at a settlement of the question. The fact was that the Government did not dare to introduce the Redistribution Bill, because, by so doing, they would have alienated the votes of several Members whose seats would be taken from them by the Bill.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON remarked that Liberals were sometimes taunted with difference of opinion; but nothing could be more divergent than the speech they had just heard, and that in which another Member of the Conservative Party (Mr. Raikes) had opened the debate. He (Viscount Ebrington) wished to give his hearty support to the Bill as a Representative of one of those semi-rural constituencies which the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. George Russell) had so eloquently described at an earlier part of the debate. At the same time, he wished to reserve complete freedom to himself as regarded the supplementary measure of redistribution. He regretted that the House had not had better assurances from the Government that they would seek to avoid a happy-go-lucky General Election with the new electors and the old constituencies. He was glad to hear from the Prime Minister that the old lines would be observed in whatever re-arrangement might be made; and still more glad to hear from the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) that the views put forward by the Prime Minister did not represent the settled determination of the Cabinet; and that if it appeared the proposal to increase the general number of Members, and make the distance from London a factor in determining the number of Representatives, did not receive general approval, they would be reconsidered. The universal cry in the country was for more work and less talk in Parliament; and he could not think an enlargement of the number of Members would be likely to diminish the amount of talk or increase the amount of work done. An increase of Members in England and Scotland would be dearly bought if obtained at the expense of giving to Ireland more Representatives than on any computation, excluding the question of distance, that Island was entitled to. He spoke as the Representative of a borough which, under any possible scheme of representation, must lose at least one of its Members. There were a good many such in the South and West of England; he believed he might say that the people there knew very well that they had more separate representation than they had any fair claim to, and he believed they would acquiesce cheerfully in a scheme of redistribution which would give fairer representation generally to the United Kingdom. But they knew well that there were plenty of small boroughs in Ireland which did not even, for their smallness, contribute in due proportion to the Exchequer; and he did not think the English boroughs would be at all satisfied if they were treated on a different footing from the Irish ones. He himself had no wish to lose his seat in order that the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) might retain his; and he did not think the country would consider it had made a good exchange if it lost the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) and retained the Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien). Unless the redistribution was framed on some such scheme as that he did not see how the Government could fail to have sufficient spare seats from Ireland to be able to provide sufficiently for the claims of the North of England and Scotland, after giving Ireland all she was in fairness entitled to. If, as the right hon. Gentlemen the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) had suggested, Ireland could be moved across the Atlantic, the number of Members she would have in Congress was the exact number to which her population entitled her—namely, 33 or 34. He trusted that the Secretary of State for War would not throw his great influence against those who desired in the Redistribution Bill some scheme for giving the loyal minority in that Island, or any other substantial minority in any part of the Kingdom, that share of representation to which its numbers fairly entitled it.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER observed that the House had been treated to a somewhat remarkable scene that evening, and perhaps it would not have been out of place if some hon. Members who had taken part in the debate had changed their sides of the House. Some hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House had spoken in favour of the Bill, while they had heard from hon. Members opposite many arguments in favour of the Amendment of the noble Lord (Lord John Manners). He had listened with pleasure to the admirable speech of the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. George Russell); but that hon. Gentleman had really put aside altogether the question which the House was now called upon to discuss, and had indulged in a headlong speech in favour of the Bill. The hon. Member had told them that the House had been elected for the express purpose of dealing with this great question of Reform. If that assertion were true, he should like to know why Reform had been kept in the background for the last four years? Why was it that a moribund Parliament was so suddenly called upon to deal with this great question? The question had been much discussed whether there was any considerable feeling in the country in favour of Reform; and hon. Members opposite had pointed with triumph to the fact that great Conferences had been held in favour of the Bill at Leeds, Newcastle, Manchester, Bradford, and Bristol. He acknowledged that all those great towns were places to the expression of whose opinion the House would give every consideration; but it was somewhat startling that on questions admittedly affecting agricultural more than urban interests, they should be referred to the great boroughs and cities of England. The hon. Member for Aylesbury, in attempting to explain away the inconvenient results of the late elections, said that Liberal electors had not come to the poll because they were not satisfied with the Government on account of their not having introduced a Reform Bill earlier. He should have thought if that were the case that the electors instead of remaining away from the poll would have rushed to it, and have returned men who would have insisted upon a Reform Bill being brought in. While he agreed with the noble Viscount who had just sat down in a portion of his remarks, he agreed in other respects with the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie); for, in his opinion, the measure—if a measure for the extension of the franchise was to pass at all—was an extremely moderate one. He was glad to see that the faggot voter was to be abolished; and he was glad to find that the 40s. freeholder was still to be retained on the electoral roll; above all, he was extremely glad that Ireland should be included in this measure, and should receive the same extension as England and Scotland. But when he had said so much he had gone as far as he could on the road with hon. Members opposite. They had it in the Prime Minister's own words that it was desirable that the two great measures of Reform and Redistribution should be dealt with by the same Parliament. The right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had told them that this House was not a debating society; that they were there to pass practical measures; and that in discussing them they must, to some extent, endeavour to foresee what the result of those measures would be. If this Bill passed it was impossible to shut their eyes to the fact that a Dissolution might occur before the end of the year. If so, Gentlemen would be going to the country and asking the support of constituencies which were shortly to be abolished. It might be thought that Members on the Opposition side took too sanguine a view of the time of this Dissolution. But it must be remembered that in 1874 a Dissolution was announced almost without the knowledge of some of those who sat on the Treasury Bench. They could not hide from themselves that Dissolution or no Dissolution was a question that rested in the mind and will of the Prime Minister—a mind and will in which that House was not apt at times to place implicit confidence. They must consider what would be the result of an appeal to the constituencies if this measure were passed before a Redistribution Bill became law. He had been at the trouble to look into the figures contained in a Return moved for last year by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. A. Arnold), and on comparing several constituencies he had come to the conclusion that the probable electorate of the future would be one-seventh of the population. Taking that as the unit, he found that the West Riding of Yorkshire Southern Division had a population of 497,000; and assuming that one man in seven had a vote, the probable electorate under this Bill would be 71,047. That Division returned two Members; but the four boroughs which existed in it—Dewsbury, Huddersfield, Sheffield, and Wakefield—had an electorate of 71,596, and they together returned five Members, while the Division of the county, with almost exactly the same number of voters, returned only two. In the Eastern Division of Cornwall the population was 135,170, the probable number of electors would be 19,310, and they would return two Members; whereas the borough of Liskeard within it, which returned one Member, had only 770 electors. Again, in the Western Division of Cumberland there was a population of 135,663, the probable number of electors would be 16,519, and they would return two Members; while Cockermouth returned one Member with only 1,071 electors. A great many similar results might be shown, and he would trouble the House with one additional example on account of its magnitude and the lesson it conveyed. The South-Eastern Division of Lancashire had been mentioned. The population amounted to 534,435; the probable number of electors would be 76,348, and they would return two Members. He found that certain boroughs, with 76,865 electors, returned no less than 86 Members. Surely this would be a most extraordinary anomaly. Reform was a means to an end, and not an end in itself; and, he asked, what was the end at which the Government aimed by this measure? He ventured to say that not one word fell from the Prime Minister in his eloquent speech which could give the House an inkling of the object he had in view. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) said it was desirable to return a better House of Commons. [Mr. H. H. FOWLER: Hear, hear!] He supposed, however, that the hon. Gentleman was one of those who, in 1880, were loud in their protestations of the extraordinary ability and intellect displayed by the House of Commons which was returned in that year. They had not yet been told what great measure was to follow the sweeping away of the Corporation of London. There was only one which, to his mind, loomed darkly in their path, and that was the severance of Ireland from Great Britain. This was the question that would have to be faced at no very distant date; and were hon. Gentlemen opposite prepared to say it was necessary, in order to deal with that question, that the agricultural labourers should be introduced into the polling-booths of this country and of Ireland? The position of Ireland in regard to redistribution of seats was different now from what it was when the Prime Minister gave the assurance that Ireland was to retain her present number of Representatives, for they had since had a statement from the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), whose mission seemed to be, to some extent, to explain away the declarations of his great Leader. The noble Marquess informed them that the proposition was only part of the whole of the scheme, and that it depended on the acceptance of the other two proposals—namely, the centrifugal theory propounded by the Prime Minister, and the increase of the number of Members of that House. If in this debate one thing had been more generally approved than another it was the condemnation of those two proposals. The Irish Members only desired to be treated with justice; and if justice showed that they were only entitled to 93 Members, he believed they would be the first to say—"Let justice be done." If the suffrage were extended downwards, to use an expression of the Prime Minister, he thought it would have a deplorable effect on the character of the Members returned by Irish constituencies. In conclusion, he would quote from a speech by the Prime Minister, who, on the 11th of May, 1864, said—

"What are the qualities which fit a man for the exercise of a privilege such as the franchise? Self-command, self-control, respect for order, patience under suffering, confidence in the law, regard for superiors."

He regretted to think that none of these virtues, or, at all events, very few of them, could be attributed to the class of voters which this Bill proposed to enfranchise in Ireland.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I cannot help thinking, Sir, that the prevailing impression left upon the minds of all those who have listened to the debate this evening will be a certain sense of its unreality—at all events, on the side of the Conservative Opposition. That feeling of indifference to the discussion may, of course, be due to one of two causes. It may be that they have reason to know that, whatever may be the fate of the Bill in this House, it is going, when it leaves this House, to a strange and inhospitable country, from which it may never, perhaps, safely return; or, on the other hand, they may feel that it is a Bill which is so urgently demanded by the country, and so generally popular, that it is perfectly useless for them to kick against the pricks. But, whatever may be the cause, the unreality of the Opposition has to-night been conspicuously manifested. Take the speech to which we have just listened, with so much interest, from an hon. Member (Mr. J. W. Lowther) who we hope may become as popular a Member of this House as his distinguished Relative. But what has he told us? In the first place, he has told us that it is a very improper thing to introduce a Reform Bill in a moribund Parliament. I should like to know how it is possible to introduce a Reform Bill in a Parliament which would not immediately become moribund on its passing. A Reform Bill has this peculiarity—that it is fatal to the Parliament in which it is carried. The hon. Member went on to say that this is an extremely moderate Bill, and I naturally thought that he would follow that declaration of opinion by a statement of his intention to vote for it. Then he went on to say, very differently from everybody else in his Party, that what he particularly approved was the inclusion of Ireland in the provisions of the Bill. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) also made an admirable speech, so far as four-fifths of his statements were concerned. Four-fifths of his speech were dedicated to expressing his concurrence with the main principles of his Bill. But the remaining fifth of the speech, if he will pardon me for saying so, was a very halting defence of the course which he intends to take in voting against a Bill of the principles of which he approves. It is quite true that he gave a reason for voting against the Bill—namely, that his Party were unable to offer bribes to the constituencies. He does that Party great injustice. So far as I can judge, they are at least as able to make promises which they find it difficult or impossible to fulfil as any other Party in this House. But, no doubt, the tone and temper of the speech of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets were dictated by the fact that he represents a populous constituency; and the speech itself differed very much from the tone adopted by the right hon. Gentleman who sits for a learned University (Mr. Raikes), who was more acrimonious in his comments on his political opponents than any other speaker has been during this debate. But even the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge had hardly any thing to say against the merits of the Bill which is before the House. I venture to say that he spoke quite as strongly against the Reform Bill of 1867 as against the Bill of 1884. Sir, I think the House will agree with me that the reticences of this debate have been quite as remarkable as the utterances which have distinguished it. We are now engaged on what is practically the fifth night of the debate on this great proposal. Four nights were spent in the introduction of the Bill. [Mr. R. N. FOWLER (Lord Mayor): Only two.] Two nights? I beg pardon. I am glad to be corrected by the better memory of the Lord Mayor. We are now engaged on the fourth night of the discussion of a Bill which is of the greatest importance—a Bill for the extension of the representation of the people. And during the course of the debate we have had ample criticisms, and many and interesting opinions expressed upon the details of an imaginary measure which is not before the House; but we have had no definite or authoritative statement of the opinion of the Conservative Party as to the merits of the Bill actually before us. The noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) concluded a very eloquent speech by a poetical quotation, in which he put the demand of the Conservative Party for more light as to the intentions of Her Majesty's Government. I admit that that is a very reasonable demand, and the Government will do all in their power to elucidate this great question. But surely there ought to be some reciprocity. Surely we have some right to appeal to the Opposition to give us some clear idea of their opinion upon this great measure of national interest which we have submitted to them. We propose to call up to the exercise of the highest functions of citizenship 2,000,000 of men, and we ask you to say whether you think this a great, just, expedient, and beneficent object? We ask you if you are prepared to put trust in the people, or if you still fear them, as you have feared them on so many previous occasions? And, if you do not fear them, are you prepared for an immediate extension of the franchise? We ask you whether the Bill goes too far, or not far enough; who is it that you are willing to enfranchise, and who is it that you doom for an indefinite time to political nullity? These are fair questions to put, and I think the country would like to have an answer. In default of any answer—and we have had none yet—we are forced to resort to inference and supposition. I admit that we have good grounds for inference upon the subject. We have the Amendment before the House. It asks the House to decline to enter upon the consideration of the Bill until it has before it the full scheme of the Government with regard to redistribution. The inference which I draw from that is this—and I think it is a fair one—that the Conservative Party do not admit that the extension of the franchise is either a good or a bad thing. It may be good, or it may be bad, according to what accompanies it, or to what is immediately to follow. In fact, the position of the Conservative Party is like that of guests at a Lord Mayor's Banquet—the Conservative Party are, of course, frequently guests, and enjoy the hospitality of the Lord Mayor—who should refuse to say what they thought of the turtle soup—the Lord Mayor will pardon the suggestion—and who decline to pronounce whether it was turtle or conger until they have tasted the venison. We take issue with them on that subject. We say the extension of the franchise is a good thing in itself; that it is desirable to include the largest number of capable citizens within the limits of the Constitution, whether or not you follow that up by a scheme of redistribution. We say that no scheme of redistribution can possibly make the extension of the suffrage bad, although it is quite possible you may have a scheme of redistribution which may most materially detract from its value. I should like to test that contention, not by reference to a hypothetical position of things, but by reference to what has taken place in the past. Consider what has been the result of the last Reform Bill, for which the Conservative Party are continually taking credit. How did that affect the constituencies? I will take, in the first place, the borough of Sheffield. In 1866 the number of electors in Sheffield was about 8,000. In 1867, by your Reform Bill, you increased the number to 30,000—nearly four-fold. But you made no change whatever in the political power which you gave to the borough of Sheffield. It had two Members before the Reform Bill of 1867. It was entitled at that time, by virtue of its population and wealth, to four Members; but you still only gave it two Members. In the case of the borough of Sheffield, therefore, there was an extension which was not followed by redistribution. In Wolverhampton, in 1866, the number of electors was 3,000. In 1868 it was 15,000, so that the increase was five-fold. And yet there was no change made in the number of Members. What you did in the case of Wolverhampton was to redress one great injustice. You redressed it within the limits of the constituency; but you left untouched the other injustice which concerned the relations of Wolverhampton to other constituencies. As far as you went you did well. You would have done better if you had gone further; but you satisfied an acknowledged grievance. Lastly, I will take my own borough, because it illustrates rather a different case. Birmingham, in 1866, had 14,000 voters. In 1868 it had 42,000. There are now over 60,000. But while you increased by the Reform Bill of 1867 the electorate of Birmingham 300 per cent, you increased the representation by only 50 per cent, and you accompanied that miserable and inadequate increase by the absurd, ridiculous, and irritating minority vote, which, although it has never succeeded in stifling the true voice of the constituency, has, nevertheless, been a constant source of objection and vexation. Birmingham, at the time of the Reform Bill of 1867, was entitled to six Members, and you only gave it one Member more, and accompanied the gift by a scheme which deprived the majority of the electors of one-third of their power. But with all its defects, the Reform Bill of 1867 was accepted by Birmingham as a satisfactory measure, and as settling one great branch of the Reform Question. Well, since 1867 the people of Birmingham, like those of all other boroughs, have been more loyal, more orderly, and have taken a keener interest in political affairs than they ever did before. If you declare now that a Bill for the extension of the suffrage without redistribution is an evil thing, which ought not to be tolerated, you are condemning your own Reform Bill of 1867; because in 1867, in the great majority of boroughs, you gave extension of the franchise without redistribution, and in others the redistribution was so insignificant as to fail to meet the case at all. There are two great grievances in this Reform Question which remain to be redressed. There is, in the first place, the grievance of those who have no voice at all under our present system—the grievance of the many householders and fathers of families who pay rent and taxes, who are bound to perform every political obligation, and who are, nevertheless, denied the first political right of citizenship. That is the greatest of these grievances; that is the grievance which, by the Bill, we seek to minimize and to reduce to the greatest possible extent. There remains, no doubt, another grievance—the grievance of those who have the vote, or will have it under the Bill, who may complain hereafter that their vote has not the full power and value which is given to the vote in other parts of the country. ["Hear, hear!" from the Opposition.] Yes; I am delighted to hear that cheer from the other side of the House. That is a still more important branch of the subject. We are asked how we are going to deal with it; and we have replied, by the voice of the Prime Minister, that without attempting logical completeness, without any unnecessary disturbance of old traditions, without obliterating the distinction between town and country, we will, at the first opportunity, bring in a Bill which shall be a great and generous measure of Reform, and which, if it does not entirely remove the existing anomalies, shall do so to such an extent as shall settle the question, at all events for our time and generation, and shall leave no room now for further agitation. In all that I have said hitherto I have been arguing on the assumption that, on the part of the Opposition, there is no settled determination to oppose the passing of this Bill, but merely an honest desire to be assured that by it and the succeeding measure we are not going to create any new anomalies, and that we are going to make a settlement which will be satisfactory to the great bulk of the population. ["Oh!"] I admit that that is a very large assumption to make. Yes; that the Opposition is animated by an honest desire to see a satisfactory settlement of the question. No doubt it is a large assumption; but there is another assumption which I think the House is bound to take into view. If I were to suppose that the Opposition were really hostile to this extension of the franchise, were distrustful of their fellow-countrymen, and were not willing to extend the limits of political freedom, while, at the same time, they were unwilling to commit themselves to any irreconcilable antagonism to the people to whom, at no distant day, they may have to appeal for support; if I were to imagine that on this question they were "willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike," what would be the policy I should attribute to such an Opposition? What is the natural course they would take? I suppose it would be their business—it would be their interest—to minimize the importance of the Reform proposed for the acceptance of the House; to deny altogether the interest the country would take in it; and, at the same time, to magnify and exaggerate the gravity of all the complications which might arise while it was under discussion. I assume that they would take every opportunity to delay the discussion of the Bill by interposing debates upon every conceivable subject and at all possible times; and, above all, I conceive they would strive to stifle the consideration and deliberation of a Bill which is a very simple measure, raising but few questions of principle, which could be easily decided, by endeavouring to import into it the consideration of an elaborate scheme, full of details, which might easily arouse and perhaps offend local susceptibilities and local interests. That seems to me to be the course an Opposition would take in the circumstances I have described; and that is the course the Opposition has taken in reference to the present Bill. I am sure the country will not be slow to draw the natural conclusion. [Mr. R. N. FOWLER (Lord Mayor): Try the country.] We are not left entirely to inference in drawing our conclusions as to the attitude which is taken by the Opposition in reference to this Bill. The objections which have been made are not confined absolutely and strictly to its incompleteness. We have heard again to-night from several Members the old allegation that the country is apathetic, and that there is no pressure on the subject. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) says, very wisely as it seems to me, that even if there was no pressure that would be no reason for not dealing with the matter. This is one of those subjects which have to be decided, to a large extent, by questions of expediency and justice; and in doing what is expedient and what is right we ought not to wait for pressure. On this point I should like to quote the opinion of a statesman who lived 50 years ago, and who took a great interest in the subject of Reform. I refer to the first Lord Durham, who, in 1836, said—

"It is the duty of a wise statesman to examine the objects the people have in view and have determined to obtain, and when he is satisfied of their justice he should not wait to be forced to the adoption of such measures; he should not do it upon expediency or upon compulsion; but he should grant them freely and cordially, for a boon granted on compulsion loses half its grace and often half its value."

I have quoted the opinion of one of the elder generation of statesmen, because I want to contrast it with the opinion of one of our modern statesmen. I want to contrast it with the latest product and most satisfactory development of that Tory Democracy of which we shall hear a good deal in the future, which is represented in this House by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill). It is an utterance of the noble Lord to which I propose to direct attention. I pay the greatest attention to everything he says, for two reasons—in the first place, because I believe the noble Lord always says what he means, and sometimes means what he says; and, in the second place, because I find that what he says to-day his Leaders say to-morrow. They follow him with halting steps, somewhat unwillingly, but they always follow him; they may not like the prescription he makes up for them, but they always swallow it. Speaking at Edinburgh, on December 19, 1883, this is what the noble Lord said on the subject we are now considering—

"If I saw the agricultural labourers of Great Britain in a great state of excitement over this question; if I saw them holding vast meetings, collecting together from all parts, neglecting their work, contributing from their scanty funds, marching on London, tearing down the railings of Hyde Park, engaging the police, and even the military, I should say to myself—These men have great and bitter grievances, which have not been represented in Parliament, or which have been neglected by Parliament, and they know that if they had the franchise these grievances would be no longer neglected, but they would be represented and remedied. They have made up their minds to have the vote. The fact that they have made up their minds to have the vote shows pretty well that they will know how to use the vote; and if we wish for peace, order, and stability in the realm of Britain we had better give them the vote. And on these grounds, and on these grounds only, would I consent to equalize the position of the agricultural labourer and the town artisan."

I must say that I think this is a very remarkable utterance; and it appears to me to be a direct incitement to violence and outrage. If it had been made in Ireland by an Irish Member, I feel certain that it would have been denounced from those Benches as a direct provocation to crime and disorder.

Mr. Chamberlain

MR. HEALY: And he would have been put in quod by the Government.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I am not quite certain whether the Government would not have found it necessary to take notice of it. But for myself, all I can say is that I protest absolutely and entirely against language of that kind; and I think it is a fatal lesson to teach the people of this country, or any class in this country, that the only way by which they can obtain redress of their grievances is by violence, pulling down railings, and by engaging the police. Although there have been no riots up to the present time—nothing to satisfy the noble Lord—yet I think there have been ample signs of the opinion of the country and of the interest taken in this question. The last Recess was distinguished above most Recesses by the activity of the debate which went on during its course; and, on the whole, I am afraid I must say that our opponents were more active than we were. They had more time at their disposal, and they were the attacking party. On the whole, they held, I believe, more meetings than we did. I am not going to lay stress upon our meetings. You say they arose from a mere mechanical agitation. Meetings of thousands of representatives from all parts of the country, and meetings equally numerous in localities, are regarded as the creatures of the Caucus; while the meetings of the Constitutional Committees, held in the public-houses, are recognized as the free and full expression of public opinion. They are the free and full expression of the public-house opinion, I have no doubt. But what I want to point out is, that at these meetings, whether held in the open or in public-houses, in not a single instance throughout the whole of the Recess, as far as my memory goes or my knowledge extends, has there been a single case of a solitary resolution having been passed condemning the extension of the franchise. Our meetings, one and all, passed resolutions unanimously, or by vast majorities, in favour of the extension of the franchise. Why have you not accepted the challenge? You say you are certain that the country is with you. Why, then, did you not pass resolutions to that effect at your meetings, and call upon Parliament to discharge this question from its thoughts and give its attention to other business. As far as I know, in not one single case has any resolution hostile to this Bill been passed even at a Conservative meeting. If hon. Gentlemen opposite are really in doubt as to the opinion of the country, it is a doubt which I am inclined to think will be removed before the discussion is finally closed. I do not think we shall be able to gratify the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill). I do not think we can get up outrages to order, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes) amiably imputes to us. That is not our line. That is not to our interest, and it has never been our policy. In the time of the late Government, when public feeling was greatly excited, I am not aware that any prominent Member of the Conservative Party was molested or even insulted by his political opponents. It was not the Prime Minister of that day whose windows were broken by the mob. It was the windows of the right hon. Gentleman now the Prime Minister of this country, and I do not suppose they were broken by any Liberal organization. I have no doubt, although we cannot get up outrages, we shall be able to show the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge that the opinion of the country is, at all events, made up in reference to this matter. We were told the other night by the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) that this Bill had not the slightest ghost of a chance of passing in the present Parliament. I do not know how the House understood that statement. To my mind it was something like a veiled menace, and the House of Commons is deliberating under a threat, veiled, no doubt, in this House, but one which outside takes a more open character. At the Lord Mayor's Banquet, at which reporters were not admitted, it has been mentioned that Lord Salisbury said he would advise that this Bill should be thrown out, if it ever reached the House of Peers. I do not know whether right hon. Gentlemen opposite admit the accuracy of the statement which has been made; but, at all events, it was strongly confirmed at another banquet on Tuesday, where reporters were present, at the Constitutional Club, presided over by Lord Cranbrook. [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Conservative Club.] Oh; I thought Conservatives were "Constitutional." Well, at a Conservative Club, not Constitutional—presided over by Lord Cranbrook, who said that the House of Lords would appeal to the country when the Bill came to them from a decaying and discredited House of Commons. I look forward with cheerful eagerness to the time when an appeal will be made, when I have no doubt ample satisfaction will be given to right hon. Gentlemen opposite as to the opinion of the constituencies. It is not merely said that the country is apathetic. We are told the time is inopportune. I should like to know when the time would be opportune in the minds of the Tory Party for a measure of Reform. I would undertake to have drafted a Resolution any time in the last 10 years, which would command the united support of the Tory Party, declaring a measure of Reform inopportune at that particular time. This matter was brought before the House on the 13th of May, 1874, by my right hon. Friend the present Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan). It was opposed, on the ground that it was inopportune, by Mr. Disraeli, who was then the Leader of the House, who stated that its inopportune arose from the fact that an attempt had just been made to start a national union of agricultural labourers, and the labourers were in a state of excitement, which was not favourable to the impartial consideration of such a measure. In July, 1875, the matter was again brought before the House of Commons. This time the Trades Union movement of agricultural labourers had settled into a normal condition, and there was no particular excitement. But the measure was still inopportune. It was inopportune, because the House of Commons were told it would delay the great social measures of the Conservative Party. On the 30th of May, 1876, the expression was again used. At that time the country had seen something of the great social measures which the Tory Party had it in their hearts to pass, and that excuse would not pass muster a second time. The Conservative Party was rather hard up for an excuse. They did not declare it inopportune; but they said it was really indecent to bring forward a Motion for a third time which in the same Parliament had been twice condemned by large majorities. I confess it seems to me the time is never inopportune to do a just thing. The difficulty I have is in justifying the delay which has already taken place. Since 1867 there has been an immense advance in the condition of the people generally. They have had full experience since then of the advantage and absolute safety of trusting the people at large. Education, one of the most important factors in this matter, has made gigantic strides. The number of children in attendance at school has tripled since 1867. The old order has given place to the new. A generation has arisen which, I believe, compares favourably in every respect in education, in patriotism, and in political intelligence, with those who were enfranchised by the great Act of 1867. Then I ask the House how long they think, even if the Opposition is now successful, they can continue to close the portals of the Constitution against those who are claiming an entrance—how long can we refuse men who are compelled to perform all the obligations of citizens, without having the right of citizens to which they are entitled? We were told only at the beginning of this year by Lord Salisbury that we were on the threshold of a time when a great addition must be made to the country constituencies. Why should we not pass the threshold? Why wait on the threshold? What is there in the question that should keep us knocking at the door? These, of course, are only preliminary objections to the extension of the franchise. The objections in principle have still to be considered. We are told that this Bill, if passed, will annihilate the agricultural interests. Well, that is a most extraordinary statement. When you proposed to enfranchise all the artisans in the towns, I am not aware that the manufacturers said that their interests would be annihilated by the political rights you gave to their workmen. They thought—and thought rightly—that the interests of themselves and their workpeople were identical, and they rejoiced that their workpeople were to be permitted to exercise Constitutional rights. Why, then, is the agricultural interest in a different position? Is it pretended that the interests of the landlords and the interests of the tenant farmers are interests which are hostile to those of the agricultural labourers? That is a very dangerous admission to make. For my part, I say that the greatest of agricultural interests is the interests of the men who till the soil. Those are the interests which we ought to care for, and they are interests which will be advanced by this Bill. They are interests which have been too long neglected and ignored, very much to the injury of the class concerned. What has happened in consequence of the agricultural labourers not having a voice in this House? They have been robbed of their land. [Cries of "No, no!" and "Withdraw!"] I repeat that they have been robbed of their land. ["Prove it!"] They have been robbed of their rights in the commons. ["No, no!"] They have been robbed of their open spaces—["No, no!"—I do not say intentionally, with any desire on the part of this House or of those who were answerable for those proceedings to injure them, but in ignorance of their interests and rights, for which, unfortunately, they had no spokesman in this House. And, Sir, it may be said that these proceedings, which I have characterized in language not a whit too strong, have now come to an end. Not a bit of it; they are going on still. The agricultural labourers are still being robbed. ["No, no!"] You can hardly go into a single country lane in which you will not find that the landowners on each side of the road have already enclosed lands which for centuries have belonged to the people, or that they are on the point of enclosing it. ["No, no!"] There is no protection against the steady absorption that is continually going on of open spaces which belong to the people, but which are gradually being included in the estates of the landowners. That is not all. It is not merely with reference to the land that this injurious operation is going on; it is going on also with respect to the endowments of the poor. There are in all parts of the country endowments which have been left, and which for centuries have been employed, for the benefit of the poor. They have, no doubt, in many cases been abused; and it would be right that the employment of those funds should be altered and amended. But it is not right that that should be going on which has been going on with the sanction of the majority of this House, with the authority of Parliament and under the direction of the Charity Commissioners—namely, the transfer of property, which in many cases transfers from the poor to the rich the funds that were intended for the poor. ["No, no!"] Right hon. Gentlemen opposite are very eager and not very courteous in interrupting me. In what I am saying now I am not bringing any charge against either Party in this House in regard either to the robbery of the land or the robbery of endowments. I take shame to the Liberal Party quite as much as to the Conservative Party. We are both to blame; but what I argue is, that these wrongs would never have been committed had the agricultural labourers had a voice in this House and been able to speak. Another objection that has been taken has been embodied in an illustration of the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners), which I think not altogether felicitous. He said that this Bill was a cheque for two millions, drawn payable to the order of the President of the Board of Trade and the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). In the first place, I would ask the noble Lord, if this is true, why on earth is it he does not come forward like a man and vote against the second reading of the Bill? If it is going to have an effect which he considers to be disastrous in the highest degree, why does he propose a mere shirking Amendment, which expresses no opinion whatever upon the merits of the measure? What possible scheme of redistribution can ever be devised on the other side of the House which will reconcile the noble Lord to such a result as he describes as necessarily following an extension of the suffrage, unless, indeed, he thinks he has got some patent process by which he can take away with one hand what he gives with the other, and by some ingenious arrangement, or mis-arrangement, of boundaries destroy the whole effect of the measure, and destroy the political influence he gives? I said the illustration was infelicitous. The noble Lord spoke of a cheque drawn for two millions. I do not think the cheque is drawn to my order; but, Sir, the cheque is for the enfranchisement of 2,000,000 of capable men. The notion of the noble

Lord is that they will proceed, on the receipt of that cheque, to endorse it to my order and the order of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). As far as I am concerned, I am flattered by the good opinion the noble Lord expresses of my influence in the country; but his argument comes to this—he refuses to give the franchise to anyone who he is not certain beforehand will support the Tory Party, and, above all, will renounce the President of the Board of Trade and all his works. I think he cannot be serious in what he says in my case. The noble Lord referred to the influence the hon. Member for the City of Cork would obtain. His terror of me is simulated; but I have no doubt he is sincerely afraid of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. He described that hon. Member as likely to become, by this Bill, the Grand Elector over four-fifths of Ireland. I think that happily describes the present position of the hon. Member. Nobody denies the great influence the hon. Member at present exercises over the constituencies of Ireland; but I am certain that this Bill will make no material change in that great influence. But, in any case, whether it does or not, unless the House is prepared to abandon all idea of a Constitutional treatment of the Irish Question, and all idea of a representative system in Ireland, let us take care that the representative system there shall be a reality and not a sham—not a mere fraud and imposition upon the public. We may like or dislike the opinions held by the majority of the Irish people; but we cannot suppress those opinions; and, under these circumstances, it is to our interest, it is wise statesmanship and sound policy, that those opinions, however unpopular, should, at least, be represented in this House, and we should tempt the people of Ireland to bring their grievances to a Constitutional test, and not force them, by driving them into secret conspiracy, into a desperate course. Agitation is always legitimate so long as there are grievances to be redressed; and the grievance of Ireland, in this matter of the franchise, is a great and an urgent grievance. It is not merely a grievance in the same sense in which it is a grievance in England and Scotland. It is not only a grievance in the Irish people being badly represented; but it is a greater grievance in the odious distinction it makes between the Irish people and the people of Great Britain. Let us see what the fact is. In Great Britain, excluding Ireland, one in 10 of the population have votes; in Ireland only one in every 25; there are, therefore, two and a-half times as many electors in proportion in Great Britain as there are in Ireland. The result is that the position of Ireland at the present moment, with regard to the franchise, is worse now than was the position of England and Scotland before the Act of 1867. Ever since the Reform Bill of 1867 we have gone on complaining that it was insufficient for our purpose, and yet during the whole of those 17 years the Irish people have had to put up with a representation worse than that which existed before that measure became law. It is the merest folly, and a matter of serious danger, to perpetuate inequalities of this kind; and those who attempt to maintain them are really the best friends the Irish agitators have, for it is they who will sharpen their weapons of attack upon the British connection. As regards the Government, our intention in this matter is clear and manifest. We have declared our intention in our speeches and in the Bill. Anyone who will look at the Bill, and see the way in which it is drafted, will see that it would be a very difficult, if not an impossible thing, to take Ireland out of the Bill without reconstructing the measure altogether. That is an indication of our intention to stand by the Bill. The noble Lord (Lord John Manners) referred to the cry heard so frequently at the time of the Reform Bill in 1832. We adopt that cry; we ask for "the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill;" and we will not accept a position which would either increase the anomalies and inequalities which now exist between the Three Kingdoms, or which would maintain and perpetuate them. Then there is an argument which I almost regret to find used at all in the debate in reference to the Irish vote—it is what I may call the mud-cabin argument. We are told—and I am afraid truly—that half the country population in Ireland live in mud-cabins. That, no doubt, is very deplorable. But I want to ask hon. Gentleman whether that deplorable state of things is likely to be remedied by refusing to give to the inhabitants of the mud-cabins in Ireland an articulate voice to express the misery and wretchedness of their condition? We have heard a good deal lately about the dwellings of the poor in the large towns of England, and I am afraid we have not much to boast of in that respect in comparison with Ireland. I am afraid it has been sufficiently proved that the condition of a great portion of our population, numbering even millions, is such that they live in a state which is repugnant to humanity, and under sanitary conditions which make morality almost impossible; and they are, in this respect, at all events, in a worse position than the inhabitants of the mud cabins in Ireland, in that our fellow-countrymen, instead of being surrounded by open spaces and living in the free air, live in poisonous courts and stifling dens, from which they cannot escape even into the fresh air. It is to people living in these conditions that the Conservative Party have given votes, and have not scrupled to enfranchise as householders or lodgers. Every one of these people living in the dwellings I now speak of—every one of them—is entitled to claim the vote either as householder or lodger; and, that being so—[Interruption.] I do not know whether the hon. Member who interrupts me does so because he thinks I am going to complain of the Conservative Party in this respect. On the contrary, I accept what they did, and approve of it. You did well when you enfranchised those people; and if there is now any hope for them to escape from the condition of misery in which they live it is because they are beginning to find their feet and to make their political influence felt, and because there is political danger in the neglect of their wrongs. Why should you not do the same for the mud-cabins? Why should you not find some remedy for the miserable condition under which they live; and if you do so it will be of advantage, not only to themselves, but to the whole community. Before sitting down there is only one further observation that I wish to make. It has been said, with reference to a statement made by the Prime Minister, that he declared he was in favour of maintaining the existing numerical proportion of the representation of Ireland. This statement has been received with very strong dissent by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. [Mr. BERKEFORD HOPE: On both sides.] Well, but not to the same extent on this side. I have to deal with the arguments of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite; and I was going to say that I have followed those arguments with the greatest interest, with the keenest sympathy, and with general approval. Hon. Gentlemen opposite are really to be congratulated on their newly-fledged enthusiasm for logical completeness in any scheme of political redistribution. It appears, according to them, that each district of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland should be strictly represented according to the number of their population. [Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition.] I am delighted to hear that that is the opinion of the Conservative Party. It is of no use for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) to shake his head; for I did not say that the right hon. Gentleman said so. Other hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House have said so. I am delighted to find such an advance towards Radical opinions on the part of the Conservative Party. How far will they carry this opinion of theirs in favour of electoral districts? It is good for Scotland; it is good for England; for Wales; for Ireland—is it good for London? Is it good for Birmingham? [Mr. T. COLLINS: No.] The hon. Member for Knaresborough—I hope he carries his Party with him—draws the line at Birmingham. I will give up Birmingham. Is it good for Liverpool, Manchester, or Glasgow, and many other great Provincial cities? Will he carry it out in them, and will he then tell us what is the difference between the view which he and other Members of his Party are prepared to support, and the view which appears to them so monstrous, when coming from the President of the Board of Trade, that we ought to give an equal value to every vote? When it is said I am in favour of equal electoral districts, I do not care a straw for equal electoral districts; I care for the principle, and not for the method. I can easily devise a much better method than equal electoral districts for securing what I require. ["Hear, hear!"] I am glad to see that hon. Gentlemen opposite have confidence in my ability; and I only hope they will put it to the test. What I care about is that one equal value shall be given to every vote in every case. It has a great bearing upon the question raised by the Prime Minister. There is a large Irish vote in many of our large towns—in London, Liverpool, and other places—as hon. Members on both sides know, sometimes to their advantage and sometimes to their cost. I say on both sides of the House, because, however hon. Gentlemen opposite may denounce the conduct of the Liberal Party in this respect, I have never found a Conservative candidate at all slow to ask, invite, or even truckle to the Irish vote. Now, I want to ask hon. Members to bear in mind that if they are going to demand that in Ireland Irish opinion shall be limited strictly to the exact proportion to which its number entitles it, then, at least, they ought not to refuse to Irish opinion in our large towns the full value of the vote to which, by number, it is entitled; but they ought to give to Manchester, to Liverpool, and, above all, to London, the full proportion to which their numbers entitle them. I may conclude the remarks which I have ventured to address to the House by pointing out that the issue before the House is really an extremely simple one. We propose to widen the foundations of our political institutions. We propose to associate the largest possible number of capable citizens in the work of government. We are at least as anxious as hon. Gentlemen opposite to proceed, at the earliest possible moment, with the consideration of the next and still more important step of redistributing political power. But we will not consent to jeopardize the success of these great and beneficent reforms by coupling them together, in the vain hope that thereby we may conciliate opponents who are hostile to both. I hope the House of Commons will be true to its pledges and its traditions, and that this Bill will pass with a great majority. Then, perhaps, the House of Lords will be true to its traditions also. In that case let the nation decide between us; and I, for one, have no fear of the result.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: In the last sentence of the speech of the President of the Board of Trade, the right hon. Gentleman spoke of conciliation towards his opponents; but there was not much conciliation in the speech we have just listened to. Considering the great national importance of the question before us, I think I never listened to a more ill-conditioned speech. The right hon. Gentleman has brought charge after charge against us; he has accused us of truckling to our opponents, of offering bribes which we were afterwards unable to fulfil; and, by way of climax to his accusations, he has charged us with the wholesale robbery of the agricultural labourers, without a particle of evidence to support his accusation. Then, to extricate himself from the difficulty in which he was placed, he went on to say that he spoke not merely of the way in which we have robbed the labourers of their land, but also the poor of their endowments? But who was it who robbed the poor of their endowments? What is the Act under which that robbery is being carried out? It was one of the very first Acts passed by the Reformed Parliament of 1868, and one which had been opposed by the Conservative Party. The object of that Act was to take away their endowments from the poor, in order to devote them to secondary education. We have done our best to ameliorate the provisions of that Act; and now, after 16 years, down comes the right hon. Gentleman, and, with his characteristic inaccuracy, he associates us with wholesale robbery. The right hon. Gentleman has said there is an unreality about this debate, and he also implied that there was an earnest and burning anxiety out-of-doors for this Bill. Now, I can speak with greater authority on that point than the right hon. Gentleman, having, with my Colleague, addressed many gatherings of our constituents, and both of us having, on every occasion, informed them of the course we intended to take on this question. Nevertheless, neither my Colleague nor myself have received a single remonstrance from our constituents on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman has declared that it was the duty of the Opposition to express an opinion on the merits of this Bill, because, no matter what the scheme of redistribution might be, it was essential for us to express our opinion on the enfranchisement of the labourers in counties. During the Recess the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War and the right hon.

Gentleman played the game of contradicting each other at every public meeting that either of them attended; and again, on the first occasion on which the right hon. Gentleman has spoken on the subject in this House, he flatly contradicts his noble Colleague. On Monday night the noble Marquess, speaking in this House, said that if this Bill would lead to electoral districts he would not vote for it. So closely is the question of enfranchisement associated with the redistribution of seats, that if the Bill leads to a certain form of redistribution it ought, even in the opinion of the noble Marquess, to be rejected. So much for the unanimity of sentiment in the Cabinet. The right hon. Gentleman said he would give the House information as to how this redistribution is to be carried out, and this was the information he gave us. He told us the Government would take the first opportunity of introducing a generous measure of Reform, which would settle the question of redistribution for a generation. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that he does not care what machinery is employed, provided that it only secures what he requires. What is it that he requires? Well, we know what the right hon. Gentleman wants—namely, manhood suffrage and the payment of Members.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I wish to correct the noble Lord in reference to what I said. I said that what I required was that an equal value should be given to the vote in every case.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The right hon. Gentleman used the words—"I do not care for the manner, provided I secure what I require;" and we know very well that he wants manhood suffrage and the payment of Members; and he wishes, if he can, through the machinery he has established in England, to obtain as complete a monopoly of political power everywhere as he and his friends have secured in municipal matters in Birmingham. The Opposition are not prepared to aid and abet the right hon. Gentleman in securing what he wants; and, therefore, we have determined to support the Amendment of my noble Friend the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners), and will oppose this Bill until we have from the Government some indication of what the lines are on which their scheme of redistribution is to be drawn. In the various speeches that have been made from the other side of the House it has been always assumed—and the right hon. Gentleman from first to last assumed—that the Opposition are prompted by unfair and underhand motives in the course they are taking. Now, supposing I can show that the course we recommend is in accordance with precedent and usage, and that any departure from what we suggest must be accompanied by the gravest possible inconvenience, and even attended by subsequent national danger, shall we not, then, be able to give a reality and a substance to our objections which will entitle them to fair consideration on both sides of the House? What is our great objection to the particular method of procedure adopted by the Government? In the first place, it is entirely contrary to precedent, because I do not believe that there has ever been any serious attempt to introduce a Reform Bill at the close of the life of a Parliament. Such measures have invariably been introduced at the commencement of the life of a Parliament; because the nearer it was to a General Election when a Reform Bill was brought in by a Government the more danger there was that the object of its promoters might be to strengthen the influence of their own Party than to effect a real and permanent improvement in the national representation. And when the Government who adopt this course, in the teeth of all precedent, are a discredited Government, whose policy has everywhere failed, and whose only hope of rehabilitating themselves lay in suggesting some sweeping and organic change, the inference that they are attempting to affect the impending Election ripens into a certainty. If this Bill passes in its present shape, it seems to me that it would do three things. It would, first, indefinitely impede and postpone the redistribution of seats; in the next place, it would lead, by its novel enactments in the one direction and by its obvious omissions in the other, to a most audacious manipulation of the electoral system for the benefit of the Party in power; and, lastly, by unfair arrangements in respect to Ireland, it would render it more difficult for the Loyalists in that country, and the English and Scotch Members, to maintain hereafter the integrity of the United Kingdom. If these objections be real, all the gibes and sneers of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade will be of no avail. They are substantial objections; and I will venture shortly to recapitulate them. If this Bill passes in the present Session, it is a matter of absolute certainty, about which there can be no question, that a General Election must take place without a redistribution of seats. ["No!"] The hon. Member who contradicts could never have thought out the matter. It does not admit of argument. There is no time this year for a Redistribution Bill. Next year you would have to introduce a Registration Bill; you would also have the romaneys from the present Session, and—what is far more important—you would have to renew the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Act. Will the hon. Member on the other side who interrupted me say how, if the Government have to introduce a measure so repugnant to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, they will also be able to pass a Redistribution Bill next year, which may possibly curtail the representation of Ireland? It is, therefore, a matter of certainty that a Redistribution Bill cannot pass next Session. {Then, can it pass in the seventh Session—the sole remaining Session? Upon that point we have an opinion of no ordinary weight—that of the Prime Minister himself. Speaking in Mid Lothian, he predicted, with almost prophetic accuracy, the position of this Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"We have arrived at the time wherein, according to the fixed and invariable practice, I think, of the entire century—nay, even of more than the entire century—there ought to be a Dissolution. The rule—and the wise rule—of our governors in other times has been that although the law allows a duration of seven years to Parliament, it should not sit to transact more than the usual Business of six Sessions. And you will see, gentlemen, the good sense, I think, of such a rule. It appears to be founded upon this—that the operations of the seventh Session would be likely to descend as to their moral level below the standard of the earlier portions of a Parliament, that the interests of the country would be more liable to be compromised by personal inducements, and personal inducements not in relation to the country at large, but in relation to particular groups and cliques of persons—in relation to what are sometimes called harassed interests. And matters of that kind would be likely to bring about a bartering and trafficking in public interests for personal ends if it were made absolutely certain that in so many weeks, or in two or three months, the Parliament must be dissolved. Now, out of this has grown a rule; I am far from saying that rule is a rule mathematical or inflexible; for some great public or national reason it is perfectly justifiable to depart from it—but what is the public or national reason for departing from it now? None at all. I defy the most ingenious man to suggest to me any reason whatever for departing from this rule, which has been in use through the whole of our lifetime—I believe even through the lifetime of your fathers and grandfathers. I do not believe the wit of man can give a reason for departing from it except this—that it is thought to be, upon the whole, for the interests of Her Majesty's Government. That, I say at once, is not a legitimate reason for departing from the Constitutional rule."

The Prime Minister, therefore, makes it a matter of absolute certainty that no Redistribution Bill can be carried by the present Parliament. Now, what is the objection to dissociating the redistribution scheme from the extension of the franchise? The President of the Board of Trade seemed to think that the only object of the Conservative Party, in objecting to dissociating the one portion of the scheme from the other, was to stop the measure of Reform altogether. But why did our ancestors always object to dissociating redistribution from Reform? Why was it that the Parliament of 1865 associated them? The object, I think, is perfectly clear. The extension of the franchise will always be popular with the people, because it proposes to give something, while a redistribution scheme is unpopular, because it takes away something; and, therefore, it is only by associating the two together that you can get rid of the objections of those whom you propose to disfranchise. Every argument that has been used as to the length of time a Redistribution Bill will take if associated with a Franchise Bill is a conclusive argument, because if it takes so much time to pass a Redistribution Bill, when associated with reduction of the franchise, it will never pass if it has no propelling power behind it. The proposal of Her Majesty's Government, if the House will excuse the expression, appears to be an idiotic proposal; because it is equivalent to this—Supposing a railway manager had to run a very heavy train, and for the sake of convenience split the train into portions, putting the locomotive power in the first portion and all the guards and the brakes in the second. The result would be that while facility would be given for the movement of the first portion of the train the second would remain stationary. So, also, in this case. The first part of the scheme once carried, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and his Friends would be a sufficient impediment to the carrying of any Redistribution Bill hereafter. If an Election is soon to take place on the increased electorate which this Bill would give, I wish to point out to the House the absurd position in which the House of Commons would be placed. I am sorry to weary the House with figures; but as the question is so important it is essential that I should place some before them. At the present moment there are 151 urban districts unrepresented, with a population of over 10,000 inhabitants each. Exactly one-half of these districts are in Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Middlesex. There are 44 in Lancashire, 16 in Yorkshire, and 14 in Middlesex. What is the proposal under this Bill? These enormous masses of people, numbering in the aggregate 1,500,000 persons, are to be pitchforked into half-a-dozen constituencies, every single one of which is already under-represented. These constituencies would be absolutely unworkable. I will take, as an illustration, the case of my own constituency. The present number of electors on the register is about 42,000, and under the Bill now before the House that number would be increased to about 80,000 or 100,000. In the neighbouring county of Buckinghamshire there are three boroughs—Buckingham, High Wycombe, and Aylesbury, of which we had a humorous description to-day by the Secretary to the Local Government Board. These three boroughs, in the aggregate, would have a population equal to half the number of electors in Middlesex, and they would return double the number of Members. The two Members returned by Middlesex are Conservatives, while the four Members for these small boroughs are Liberals. I have already pointed out the effect of splitting the measure in half, and how seriously it must affect the General Election. At the present time there are 142 borough Members who represent constituencies of under 5,000 voters. Every one of those constituencies, if numbers are to be taken into consideration, ought to have their representation curtailed. But they are not to be touched; and why not? They return 89 Liberal Members and 53 Conservatives, giving a majority of 36 in favour of the Government. By the counties in England 175 Members are returned; 122 of those Members are Conservatives, while only 53 are Liberals. They are much under-represented, for under this Bill, with the exception of Rutland, every county constituency is over 5,000 voters; but no proposal of any kind is made to increase their representation. The result, therefore, is that in this Bill the Government gain two points by declining to disfranchise where they ought, and thus preventing their following from being reduced; while by declining to enfranchise where they ought, and where the population requires it, they diminish the following of their political opponents. If the representation went by population the county of Middlesex is entitled to 36 additional Members, Lancashire to 32, and Surrey to 15. The Prime Minister has been kind enough to tell the House one of the principles which ought, in his opinion, to regulate the Redistribution Bill. It is the principle of centrifugal representation, which has been already referred to. What is the political effect of that principle? England is the most Conservative portion of the country; Wales, Ireland, and Scotland are the most anti-Conservative; but Wales, Ireland, and Scotland are further off. Owing to the distance of these countries from the Metropolis, their representation is to be favourably considered. England, because it is Conservative, is to be under-represented; Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, because they are anti-Conservative, are to be over-represented. I could scarcely control my countenance when on Monday last I heard the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) giving as a reason why London should not be entitled to additional representation the fact that London has a powerful Press. The right hon. Gentleman seldom makes a speech on any public platform in which he does not take the greatest praise to himself for having assisted in removing the taxes on knowledge; and it is, therefore, strange for him to argue that because London has a powerful Press it is not to be fully represented according to its population. The unfortunate peculiarity of all these flimsy arguments and suggestions is this—that in every single case they tend to favour the prospects of our political opponents, while in every case they damage those of the Conservatives; and, under such circumstances, I think we should, indeed, deserve to be called the stupid Party if we allowed a Bill of this character to pass, which, under the plausible pretext of enlarging the electorate, manipulates in the most audacious manner the present electoral arrangements to the advantage of the Party in power. Supposing, what is almost a certainty if the Bill passes, that the next Parliament is to be elected under it, before any scheme of redistribution has been carried out, the next House of Commons would find itself such a monstrosity as regards the difference between Members representing boroughs and those representing counties, that no authority could be claimed for its decisions. I have made a calculation, and I find that, adding to the existing county constituencies the proposed addition under this Bill, each county Member in the next Parliament would, on an average, represent over 12,000 voters, while each borough Member would, on an average, represent less than 6,000. So that you will have reduced your representation to this mathematical absurdity—that if 50 county Members went into the Lobby against 99 borough Members, the 50 county Members would represent a larger population than the 99 borough Members; but, unfortunately, borough Members are mostly Liberal, while the county Members are chiefly Conservative; and therefore this Bill was intended, neither more nor less, to pack the next House of Commons, in order to deprive the Conservative Party of that representation which its wealth and its numbers entitle it to. The noble Marquess informs us that it is impossible to bring in a Bill dealing with redistribution until the Government are in possession of further material facts and figures. What do they want more figures for? They have the population Returns, and if we assimilate the franchise throughout the counties these population Returns would afford amply sufficient data for a Redistribution Bill. When the noble Marquess says the Government are not in favour of electoral districts, what more accurate Returns do they want than those already in their possession? The House must bear in mind that no promise or pledge of a Minister—I speak with no personal disrespect—is of any value whatever unless it is embodied in an Act of Parliament; and although the noble Marquess may solemnly assure us he would oppose the Bill if it tended to electoral districts in the next Parliament, we may have the President of the Board of Trade coming down with a Bill carving the whole of the United Kingdom into electoral districts. Constitutionally, agreements made in one Parliament are not binding in a subsequent Parliament. We, therefore, have no guarantee as to the principle of redistribution unless it is associated with the Franchise Bill, or that we may not be ultimately compelled to accept the proposal of equal electoral districts which Her Majesty's Government now repudiate. To meet this difficulty my right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson), on the first evening this Bill was introduced, suggested to the Prime Minister that there should be a clause inserted in it to the effect that it should not come into operation until the redistribution scheme has passed. Anybody who watched the Prime Minister's face when that proposal was made must have a pretty good idea of the purpose for which the Bill has been brought in. The Prime Minister at once repudiated the suggestion with warmth, as much as to say he had not been 50 years in Parliament, managing delicate political matters, to be caught with such a device as that. There was one part of this Bill which no one connected with Ireland can ignore. What will its moral and political effect be on that country? The Bill, if passed in its present form, will practically establish hovel franchise in Ireland. The Prime Minister advocates the Bill on the ground that the men to be enfranchised are "capable." But I am curious to know what the poor cottiers of Ireland, who inhabit these "hovels," are capable of? The great majority of them cannot read and write, and a large proportion have never travelled 10 miles from their homes. The only thing I am afraid they are capable of is hatred of England and animosity towards all things English. Her Majesty's Government is composed of men of ability; but what are their facts and proposals? One-third of the population of Ireland is loyal, as the Government know, and yet they are deliberately making proposals by which nine-tenths of the representation of that Island is to be given over to the disloyal. You are doing everything in your power to strain the Act of Union in favour of disloyalty in Ireland. The first speech I ever heard the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) make was some 16 years ago, in this House, and it was one in which he spoke with supreme contempt of the Act of Union, describing it as a musty piece of parchment. On that occasion the Union stood in the way of the disestablishment of the Irish Church; and now, 16 years afterwards, the right hon. Gentleman has made the discovery that the Act of Union is so inviolable a document that the very letter as well as the spirit of it must be retained, because a literal adherence to it will give the Irish people a larger representation than they are entitled to. But what would be the moral effect of this Bill on the loyal population of Ireland? The Government know perfectly well that they could not have brought in the Bill a year ago and applied it to Ireland. Why is Ireland quieter now than it was 18 months ago? It is because crime has been put down by the co-operation of the loyal population with the Government, and in return for that the Government are now about to give the franchise to those whom, on former occasions, they have excluded from the jury box. The return you make to the loyal population is to swamp their political influence by the wholesale enfranchisement of the very man who has threatened their lives hitherto. I am afraid the Loyalists in Ireland are not disposed to put more confidence in those who negotiated the Kilmainham Treaty, because they will see that exactly the same reason which induced the Government to betray them on that occasion, when they only desired to get the support of some 30 Members of Parliament, would induce them to go further when they have to deal with the 90 followers of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). We are told that if we exclude Ireland we shall create a grievance there. You are creating a tenfold greater grievance by what you are now doing. What is the franchise? What is it but a means to an end, and what is the end but separation from England? Will it be in your power to refuse that separation, which nine-tenths of the people you propose to enfranchise as capable citizens will demand? I do not always approve of the utterances of the President of the Board of Trade; but there is a very remarkable passage in a speech which the right hon. Gentleman made some years ago. Speaking at Liverpool, on the 25th of October, 1881, he said—

"Unless the Government of the country are prepared to accept the idea of the secession of Ireland from the Union, and the severance of the two countries, I think the time had come when the Government was bound to assert its authority. Now, is this question of separation one upon which there is any difference among us? I assume we are prepared now, as we have been all along, to consider impartially every just claim, to remedy every proved grievance, to endeavour to govern Ireland, not according to English prejudice, but according to all those most patriotic and intelligent among the Irish people. Are we ready to consider the Union itself as a standing grievance, and are we prepared to admit that the question of reparation is an open one between us? I say, for myself, that I am not prepared to admit that it is possible, either in the interests of this country or in the interests of Ireland, that there should be created a hostile Power within striking distance of these shores. I suppose the first result would be that independence would be the signal for civil war, in which we should be forced to take a side. But, if this were avoided, Ireland independent must always be jealous and afraid of England. The greater power, the commercial supremacy of the latter country, would always be a subject of anxiety and alarm to the smaller. Ireland would be crushed under the weight of military and naval expenditure, which it would have to maintain in order to secure its separate existence. We should find our burdens enlarged in proportion. The two countries would be a standing menace one to the other. Sooner or later the condition would be intolerable, and we should have to commence the struggle anew. Ireland would have again to be reconquered, and England would be ruined. I am not prepared to face these contingencies; and therefore I say, Liberal and Radical as I profess to be, I say to Ireland what the Liberals or the Republicans of the North said to the Southern States of America, the Union must be preserved. You cannot, and you shall not destroy it."

These are very grave words. But are not the Government putting it outside their power to make them good? If you say to the Irish people you are capable citizens and deserving of this extension of the franchise, and nine-tenths of the persons returned to Parliament ask you for this separation, how can you refuse it? What was the policy announced by the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright)? He commenced by saying—"Force is no remedy. I object to the old policy. I wish to proceed on new lines, and to deal more generously with Ireland;" and when at last he was forced to face the contingency that 90 of the hon. Gentlemen who would be sent from Ireland would make government impossible through this House, he replied—"Oh, if the worst comes to the worst, the 550 Englishmen and Scotchmen will find a way to stop the 90." Well, Sir, what is that but force? You will ultimately have to undo that which you are now inclined to do; but in how different a position will you be placed? It would be fairer and more straightforward to say plainly to the Irish people—"We do not consider you entitled to this growing franchise; and until you can give some guarantee that you will not use it to our detriment and harm we will not give it to you." The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War said, a year ago, that it would be madness to give increased self-government to Ireland, until we received from the Representatives of the Irish people some assurance that this boon would not be misused for the purpose of agitation, and for the purpose of weakening the authority and power of Parliament. But, so far from receiving any such guarantee, these Gentlemen openly say that they are in a state of war with the British Government; that they have not the material force on their side now for giving effect to their views. In this House the greater the control which is exercised over the acts of the Government the better for the State; but nothing in the world would be easier. These 90 Gentlemen holding these views will be able to render government impossible, and they know it. They will have their thumb, so to speak, on the whole administration of the Empire, and you will be forced either to accede to their wishes, which means civil war, or else once more reconquer Ireland. Now, this seems to me to be the very melancholy position in which you will be placed with your large majority in this House. The right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham used almost un-Parliamentary language with regard to some Irish Members—he described them as rebels; then the noble Marquess said it was an act of madness to extend self-government in Ireland. Then, what are we to think of the policy of the Government which makes these rebels supreme in this House? Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking in the country, made use of an illustration, in one sense happy and in another sense unhappy. He said that the changes which would shortly have to be considered in that House were greater than any which had come forward since the Revolution of 1688, which had conferred inestimable benefits on England. What was the result of that Revolution? It established civil and religious liberty in England and Scotland, but it created civil war in Ireland; Ireland had to be subjugated, and civil and religious liberty there was crushed under a Penal Code. It seems to me that the changes alluded to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer must unquestionably produce a condition of affairs in Ireland from which nothing but force can ultimately deliver us. Sir, I think I have shown that our objections to this proposal are reasonable, and that they rest upon facts and arguments which give them reality. The President of the Board of Trade threatens us with agitation for our opposition to this Bill; he applies such language to it that I suppose he hopes that agitation will follow. Well, Sir, I am not afraid of agitation. In the past the Liberal Party were foolish enough to associate the franchise with a pecuniary benefit to those who were enfranchised; and the result was that after the passing of the Reform Bill in 1832, the country was shaken to the centre by the Chartist Riots which were directly the result of that Bill. The present Government associated their advent to Office with the revival of trade, and that revival of trade has not occurred; and the people whom you now propose to enfranchise are sensible enough to know that it is outside your power either to improve the trades or industries in which they are engaged, or, as in the past, to make good the bribes you have offered them. It has been said by hon. Gentlemen opposite that the Liberal majority was so great at the last Election that even the manipulation with which, as I have shown, this Bill might be connected cannot affect the impending Election. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) estimated the Liberal majority at the last Election at 500,000. It was nothing of the kind. All the statistics on the subject which I have seen put forward are absolutely illusory, because they count not the voters but their votes. That was the case at the last Metropolitan Elections. I am satisfied that the transfer of 5 per cent of those who voted as Liberals last time is sufficient to give us a majority from one end of the country to the other. Well, Sir, we are threatened with this agitation by the Government. The only way to make that agitation effective is by a Dissolution, and here I will refer to that point in a speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, delivered in Mid Lothian—for his speeches there refer to every conceivable subject, and are worthy of the attention of the Liberal Party. The right hon. Gentleman said, referring to the late Government—

“Why, gentlemen, are they not anxious to obtain the judgment of the country? It is surely plain that they are not anxious. If they were anxious they would follow the rule and dissolve Parliament. It is plain, therefore, they are not anxious. Why are they not anxious? Have they not told us all along that they possess the confidence of the people? Have they not boasted, right and left, that vast majorities of the nation are in the same sense with themselves? Oh! gentlemen, these are idle pretexts! It is an instinct lying far deeper than these professions that teaches them that the country is against them, and it is because they know that the country is against them that they are unwilling to appeal to the country. Why, gentlemen, an absolute appeal to the public judgment, when there is a knowledge beforehand on the part of those who make the appeal that the answer will be favourable, gives additional strength to those who make that appeal. If it be true, as they will say, that the country is in their favour, I say that with the favourable reply that they would receive to their appeal, they will come back to Parliament far stronger for the purpose of giving effect to the principles that they know to be true than they are at this moment. They know that as well as you do. They know perfectly well that a favourable reply would strengthen their hands; they know perfectly well that an unfavourable answer would be the end of their Ministerial existence; and it therefore requires no great wit on our part to judge why, when they have reached the usual and what I may call the Constitutional period, they do not choose to make an appeal at all.”

Sir, I will recapitulate in two sentences my objections to this Bill. I object to it because it cannot settle, and will retard, the settlement of the question which it pretends to promote; I object to it because it invokes the Imperial machinery of Parliament for the worst partizan uses, and because it makes the advocates of separation and rapine the sole representative authority for Ireland. These are the objections which I have to this Bill. We regard them as weighty enough to entitle them to the consideration of all right-thinking men; and, therefore, we are determined to do the very best in our power to oppose a measure which, under a specious disguise, contains so many germs of political dishonesty and national danger.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, of course I do not intend to make any objection to this Motion; but I think it is desirable that we should consider whether it is possible shortly to come to some arrangement as to the probable conclusion of the debate. I believe it would be extremely desirable, and I think it would be reasonable also, that it should be terminated in the course of next week—that it would be a very great convenience to a large number of Members of this House, not only that it should be so terminated, but that within a reasonable time there should be an understanding on the subject, so that they could make their arrangements accordingly, and avoid the risk of being absent from the Division. If there could be an arrangement that Monday and Thursday would be sufficient for concluding the debate, that would, of course, be most satisfactory. If, on the other hand, a longer time than that is required, I trust the House will be disposed to consider whether some additional time than that at the disposal of the Government may not, in the course of next week, be devoted to it. I see on the Paper Notices of several Motions on subjects which have been discussed frequently during the present Parliament—namely, the position of Bills coming from the House of Lords, and the question of carrying over Bills from one Session to another. I venture to hope that the House may appeal to hon. Members not to proceed with the Motions I have referred to. I do not ask the House to come to a decision at this moment. We shall put the Bill down for to-morrow, not in the hope of being able to proceed with it, although, of course, we should ask the House to continue the debate tomorrow evening, if there were any chance of bringing it on at a reasonable hour. At all events, the placing of the Bill on the Paper to-morrow would enable us to make some proposal or announcement that might be for the convenience of the House generally.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I am sure the feeling of the House is to forward in any reasonable manner the convenience, not only of the Government, but of Members generally, with regard to this debate; but I am equally sure that the suggestion contained in the closing words of the noble Marquess as to the Bill being able to come on to-morrow is one which is rather likely to retard than promote his wish. The noble Marquess must remember that private Members have already during this Session been obliged to give up their time for Government purposes in a manner neither satisfactory to them nor to the House. The noble Marquess must feel that after what has occurred there is a certain amount of sensitiveness on the part of private Members; and that if an appeal is to be made to them with any hope of success it ought to be accompanied with some compensation. The Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) relates to a subject of very great importance, and one which is of corresponding interest to a large number of Members. I think it is both unreasonable and undesirable that there should be an opportunity for the discussion of that Motion. No one, I believe—not even the noble Marquess—thinks that this debate can be renewed before Monday, which day, probably, offers the most reasonable opportunity for considering within what time it can be closed. There are a great number of hon. Members who have yet to speak, and it is only reasonable and fair that they should have an opportunity for so doing. On the other hand, I fully recognize the fairness of the desire that the debate should be concluded before the Easter holidays; and we on these Benches shall be most ready to promote any arrangement to that end which will not interfere with the rights of private Members.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, the right hon. Baronet appears to be under the misapprehension of supposing that the Government intend to bring forward the discussion on this Bill to-morrow. My noble Friend has stated that the Bill will be put down to-morrow, in the hope that this may afford an opportunity of coming to some understanding as to the time when the debate will be brought to a close. There is no doubt that if the debate can be concluded next week, it would be greatly for the convenience of hon. Members on both sides of the House; and the House is also aware that it is very desirable, if not absolutely necessary, that the Financial Statement should be disposed of before the Easter holidays. We do not wish in any way to force it against the wishes of the House; but we think that for the convenience of Members on both sides who desire to make their arrangements for the Easter Recess there should be an understanding on this subject at the earliest possible moment. If we cannot arrive at that understanding, then we must do the best we can without it; but I think it far better that hon. Members, who will have time to consider the matter, should take the opportunity of the Bill being mentioned to-morrow to indicate the arrangement they would be disposed to assent to.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: Then I understand that the Bill will be put down to-morrow, not for the purpose of the debate being resumed, but simply for the purpose of its being mentioned?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: That is so.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked whether effective Supply would be taken to-morrow?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

Debate further adjourned till To-morrow.

ARMY ANNUAL BILL.—[BILL 144.]
(The Marquess of Hartington, The Judge Advocate, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (MR. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, he saw that this Bill was blocked, and he should like to have the Speaker's ruling as to whether it was competent to him to bring on this Motion now? He submitted that it did not come under the half-past 12 Rule, upon the ground that having been brought in under the provisions of, and to continue the Army Act, 1881, it was a "proceeding made in accordance with the provisions of an Act of Parliament," and, as such, within the exceptions contained in the 45th Standing Order.

MR. SPEAKER: I am of opinion that this is a Bill which does not come within the half-past 12 Rule; but is a Bill specially exempted from that Rule.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (MR. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, the Bill was blocked by the hon. Members for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) and Sligo (Mr. Sexton), and he therefore wished to obtain the Speaker's opinion. As, however, those hon. Gentlemen were not present, he thought that to move the second reading now would be to take the House by surprise; and he should, therefore, not move the second reading till to-morrow.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION OVER CHILDREN (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 75.]

(Mr. Gibson, Sir Richard Wallace, Mr. Blake, Mr. Corry.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 6th March.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 4 (Summary trial of children for indictable offences unless objected to by parent or guardian).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. GIBSON said, he had made inquiries, and he found that the practice at present was that no child under 13 years of age, or a man or woman over 60 years of age, was allowed to sleep on a plank bed.

MR. O'BRIEN said, he wished to move the omission of sub-section (d) of this clause, which gave power to policemen to administer the punishment of whipping to children. People had already had too much experience of the power of the police in Ireland; and he objected very strongly to any power being given to them to administer corporal punishment to children. He could very well imagine such a power being made use of by policemen whose resentment children had incurred by some trifling offence. They all remembered that during the recent agitations the Irish police were not very good humoured or kind towards children; and he should not care to find that the child of an Irish tenant could be whipped by a policeman for whistling Harvey Duff, or for some such trifling delinquency. The presence of an officer was not sufficient guarantee that this power would not be abused; and he could see no reason why a punishment of this sort, which was considered degrading to a soldier or any grown-up man, should be inflicted upon children of tender age, particularly as it might be inflicted in a case which involved some political bias. He therefore begged to move the omission of the sub-section.

Amendment proposed, that sub-section (d) be omitted from the Clause.—(Mr. O'Brien.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. GIBSON said, he hoped the hon. Member would not press his Motion. The Bill was intended to mitigate the present law; and he was sure that all Members desired that the change should be brought about without opposition and by general consent. If the Bill became law any child brought up under summary conviction would not get more than one month's imprisonment. This particular passage was, word for word, the present law in England; and it was most desirable that there should not be a difference between the law in the two countries. An appeal could be made where that should be thought desirable.

MR. O'BRIEN was sorry to say that he should be obliged to press his Amendment, for the law in England and the law in Ireland were worked very differently. There had been cases in Ireland, and there might be cases again, in which power given to policemen to punish children by whipping was very degrading; and he could see no reason for retaining this provision.

MR. MOLLOY suggested that his hon. Friend should bring the matter up on the Report, when there would be more time to discuss it.

MR. SEXTON said, no one had anticipated that this Bill would come up for discussion that night, and he thought a Bill of that importance should not be taken at so late an hour. He was inclined to agree with the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien); but he would suggest that flogging should only be inflicted with the consent of a parent or parents.

MR. MAYNE said, the only argument put forward by the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) for retaining this provision was that this was the law in England; but in England the police could be trusted with those extraordinary powers, while in Ireland they could not, owing to the well-known want of sympathy between them and the people of that country.

MR. KENNY said, he should support the Amendment, regarding this power to flog children as perfectly revolting. Nothing made a more lasting impression on children than having personal chastisement inflicted on them; and he was convinced that nothing tended more to addict children to vicious criminal habits than resorting to this species of punishment in the case of children of tender age. Even on the grounds of mere humanity English Members should join with them in rejecting this portion of the Bill. Children could be punished severely enough for whatever offences they committed without resort being had to the birch rod—the birch rod of the Royal Irish Constabulary and of the Dublin Metropolitan Police. He trusted that English Members, who professed to have such lively humanitarian instincts, and to be always so affected when they heard of cases of cruelty even to dumb animals, would join with the Irish Members in opposing this clause.

MR. GIBSON said, that if there was one man who had a greater dislike to whipping in any shape or form than another, that man was the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood). He was particularly strong on the question; but he had been a Member of the Committee which sat and thrashed out the question, and he had thoroughly acquiesced in the clause, believing it a humane provision. Any father in the world would—he himself would, unquestionably—prefer, on the grounds of humanity, seeing his child whipped, let them call it by what name they liked, than seeing the child sent to prison for a month. If they took it out of the power of a magistrate to inflict corporal punishment on a child they would only compel him to send it to prison, which was a thing he (Mr. Gibson) was striving to prevent.

MR. SEXTON said, that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would make whipping an alternative punishment the Irish Members might be disposed to consider the question; but to leave the use of the lash to the magistrate's discretion—which, to their knowledge, in Ireland often meant extreme indiscretion—was a thing they were not disposed to concede. This discretion would leave it to the magistrate first to flog a child, and then to send him to gaol for a month. Could the right hon. and learned Gentleman produce evidence to show that such a discretionary power as that was necessary in Ireland? If he could not, he (Mr. Sexton) should be disinclined to agree with him, the opinion of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) and the Committee notwithstanding. He was not inclined to take the Report of a Committee on such a matter as this as conclusive; indeed, so strongly did he feel on this matter that he would now move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Sexton.)

MR. GIBSON said, he was sorry the hon. Member had taken that course. He believed every single Member from Ireland was in favour of the Bill—"No, no!"—yes; although some of them challenged this particular clause; and now moving to report Progress was going, as far as it was in an hon. Member's power to go, in the direction of killing the Bill. The clause was clearly for the benefit of children in Ireland, and decidedly in the interest of the peace of mind of many parents in Ireland, who were sorry to see their children sent to gaol and subjected to contaminating influences. The Bill was one of social merit and social importance; and he therefore trusted that the Motion would not be persisted in. If hon. Members wished to mark their opinion of the punishment of whipping generally, they could do that by taking a Division. He understood that that was the desire of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), who was as good a fighting man as there was in the House. That hon. Member was in favour of taking an opinion only on one clause.

MR. SEXTON said, that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman was sincere in his statement that this clause was for the benefit of the children and for the peace of mind of the parents, the Irish Members would offer, as a compromise, that the Court might inflict a flogging on a child with the consent of one or other of the parents.

MR. GIBSON said, the hon. Member was a very acute and intelligent man; but he had not, perhaps, gone into this matter as fully as he (Mr. Gibson) had. On reflection, the hon. Member would see that many unfortunate children whom it might be desirable to bring under this provision might have no parents, or none that were available—they might be unfortunate waifs and strays—and it surely would not be suggested that these should be subjected to conditions which would render it necessary for them to be sent to gaol—conditions which hon. Members were satisfied were not for the benefit of the children or their parents, when they had any. He had no right to make any appeal to the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton); but if the hon. Member would take his assurance that on the Committee hon. Gentlemen who differed from him (Mr. Gibson) as widely as the poles on political questions were satisfied that the words of this clause were for the benefit of the children, the hon. Member would probably not press his Motion.

MR. O'BRIEN said, that what would most likely afford an easy solution of the difficulty had just occurred to him. According to the clause, this punishment of whipping was to be inflicted on a child by a policeman in the presence of the child's parent; but he (Mr. O'Brien) would propose the alternative that the whipping should be administered by the parent in the presence of the policeman. He objected very strongly to the employment of policemen in the infliction of this punishment—nothing could be more objectionable to Irish feeling than that.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the Committee that if the discussion on the words of the Amendment is to be continued, the Motion to report Progress must be withdrawn. At the present moment only the Question of reporting Progress can be discussed.

MR. O'BRIEN said, he had been offering, as he thought, some reasons to the right hon. and learned Gentleman why he should defer to the opinion of so many Members from Ireland. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would show no signs of yielding in that respect, unquestionably Irish Members would be obliged to oppose the Bill. Every advance in the direction of a compromise had been made by the Irish Members on the particular provision before the Committee, which happened to be the only provision in the whole Bill which was objectionable.

MR. MOLLOY said, they were all agreed as to the merits of the Bill, and there was no animosity in any quarter against anyone in regard to it. He trusted the right hon. and learned Gentleman would consider the suggestion which he (Mr. Molloy) had made some time ago, and would consent to take this point on the Report stage of the Bill. That would give hon. Members ample time to consider the matter. He had no desire to oppose the right hon. and learned Gentleman in the ordinary sense of the word.

MR. GIBSON said, he had been turning over in his mind what had fallen from the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) and the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) upon this question; and, probably, it would meet the views of these hon. Gentlemen if he struck out from the clause the words "either in addition to or." That would leave the punishment of whipping as an alternative punishment to imprisonment. It would be making a great change in the Bill.

MR. SEXTON said, that, as a matter of principle, the Irish Members had made their protest against the infliction of this punishment; and he thought it now would be well to assent to the proposal of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He would withdraw his Motion for reporting Progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. O'BRIEN said, that as the Bill was one for the mitigation of the punishment of children in Ireland he would withdraw his opposition.

MR. GIBSON: I now propose my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, lines 25 and 26, to leave out the words "either in addition to or."—(Mr. Gibson.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. SEXTON said, he saw the right hon. and learned Gentleman had several Amendments down to Clause 8, to insert after "child" the words "or young person." He presumed this "young person" meant a male person?

MR. GIBSON: That is so.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

DEATH OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF ALBANY.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, it is with deep concern that I have to announce to your Lordships that Her Majesty the Queen has lost her youngest Son, the Duke of Albany, by death, at Cannes. I do not propose to move the adjournment of the House, for in these matters it is better not to yield to natural impulse, but to follow the precedents which have been set in both Houses of Parliament. I, therefore, wish to give Notice that on Monday I shall move an Address of Condolence to the Queen and the Duchess of Albany.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, in the absence of my noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury), I merely rise to say that which he would have said much better—namely, that it is with deep grief and consternation that we have heard this announcement. After what the noble Earl has said it would not be proper for me to add another word.

DOMINION OF CANADA—STATE-AIDED EMIGRATION.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in rising to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for copies or extracts of correspondence between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the President of the Canada Pacific Railway in regard to State-aided emigration to Canada; also for copies or extracts of correspondence on the same subject between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and Mr. F. Boyd," said, that the Motion of which he had given Notice needed some brief explanation. First of all, he desired to call attention to the congested state of the labour market. The state of things there, as their Lordships knew, was grievous. It was even more than that—it was dangerous. Of course, there were many modes in which this great difficulty might be met. A great deal might be done by improved accommodation with respect to their houses; but, although that touched one very important side of the question, it could not cover the whole ground. In order to produce any real and permanent improvement, nothing short of emigration, and emigration on a large scale, would meet the case. Immigration from the country to London had been one great cause of the distress, and now emigration from London must take place. Here, in London, they had an excessive population, stagnation of the labour market, low wages, or rather in many parts no wages, and high rents, combining to make a state of things only to be described as utter misery, and that condition was increasing. In their Colonies, on the other hand, within only a few days' sail from this country, there were large tracts of magnificent land, high wages, ample work, and a desire—in fact a demand—for labour. But then it had been asked why it was that no advantage had been taken of this. This was partly due to the ignorance of the classes themselves whom it affected, and partly to the absence of proper machinery for the purpose. Voluntary organization had done, and was doing, a great deal to remedy the evil. The Local Governments themselves subscribed largely to the expenses of emigration, Canada paying a quarter, and Australia nearly one-half of the cost; but something over and above all that was needed, and the question he desired to bring before their Lordships by his Motion was, how far the Government might assist that emigration? It was true there were many objections that might be urged against this. It was constantly said, sometimes in speeches and sometimes in print, that the aid of the State involved the principle of Communism; but it was very easy to blacken the merits of any scheme by giving it a name of that sort; and it was always to be remembered that, if there was any Communism involved in such aid, we already had that principle in our Poor Laws. A more practical objection was that there would be great difficulty in selecting the emigrants; but he felt confident, for his own part, that machinery qualified for dealing with the subject could be devised. It never could be contemplated as desirable to emigrate the worthless portion of the class they were endeavouring to relieve; they must be such as would be approved of by the Colonial authorities of the places to which they were going. He would admit that there were a great many who were disqualified by the life they had led for the agricultural life of the Colonies; but there were undoubtedly many, also, that were by character, habits, and occupation, perfectly well fitted for it. Another objection which was raised was that by State emigration they were taxing the Mother Country to send out labour for the benefit of the Colonies. The answer to this, however, was simple. No doubt, by that system, great benefit accrued to the Colonies; but the benefit to this country was quite as great in sending the unemployed elsewhere. Then, the schemes referred to in the Correspondence in question did not go to provide cheap labour for the Colonists; the idea was that they were to be settled upon land of their own, and should become farmers and small proprietors, not that they should work for any other person. The next objection made against the aid of the State in emigration was, to his mind, perhaps the most important of all. It was said that when the State interfered, there was great danger that they would injure voluntary effort. If he had thought that voluntary effort would be seriously injured by such a change in policy, he certainly would not have advocated any such scheme; but, in this case, voluntary effort had proved unequal to the great strain put upon it. A very large number, it was true, had been sent out; but they formed, in reality, merely a small portion of those who should be assisted, and there was necessity for larger means and stronger organization. A further objection made was that there was no surplus labour to send out of the country. He replied—"See with your own eyes." He thought that no one could hold such an argument who had ever witnessed the piteous scenes that took place at the dock gates in London. Even in agricultural districts, machinery had thrown a quantity of labour out of employment. It was sometimes said that in sending out emigrants in this manner they would not send out the best class. He quite admitted that those sent out would not be the best class; but, for his part, he would be sorry to see the best class sent out of the country. There was an intermediate class between the best and the worst, who, under more favourable circumstances than those under which they now had to exist, were easily convertible into excellent workmen, and would become admirable Colonists. There was only one other objection which he could remember having heard against such a plan, and that was that in any of these schemes there might be considerable difficulty in getting the money refunded by the Colonist to the Government. A certain portion of the money might, perhaps, be lost; but the security taken was sufficiently good security to guarantee a very large proportion of the money being recovered; and even if a small portion of the money should be lost, he maintained that the experiment was worth trying. It might be urged that what he was advocating was a new doctrine; but he did not think that it was so new as many supposed. His noble Friend opposite would be aware that Boards of Guardians were entitled to raise money in aid of emigration, and during the last 60 or 70 years there had been a steady growth in this direction. A Statute of the Reign of William IV. gave power to owners and occupiers to raise money for this purpose, and by a Statute of the present Reign the power had been largely increased. The whole tenour and tendency of recent practice and legislation on that subject had been to remove restrictions and give fresh facilities. But, further, there was a department at the Colonial Office which existed for rather more than 30 years—between 1840 and 1871—which was so constituted as to superintend the passage of emigrants, and during that time it superintended the departure from this country of between 6,000,000 and 7,000,000 of emigrants. He had not been able to satisfy himself how far that emigration had been assisted by Votes of Parliament or by grants in aid, but on certain occasions public money had been voted for it in exceptional instances. The Irish Famine, he thought, was one of them; and the expense of that office itself and the establishment connected with it was defrayed from public sources. Therefore, it could hardly be contended that that doctrine was altogether a new one. Their Lordships would remember that three years ago, when the Irish Land Act passed in that House, there was a clause which enabled the Government to raise money without limitation as to amount for purposes of emigration. In the other House of Parliament, at the instance of certain Irish Members, that clause was very much cut down and limited. When the Bill was before their Lordships he endeavoured to give the provision some additional scope and enlargement; but the Amendment was not accepted. The clause was much reduced and stunted in its operation; but even so the Irish Government were empowered to raise £200,000 for emigration; and therefore, so far as the principle went, it had been admitted in recent times. In advocating such a system of emigration he held that certain limits and conditions must be laid down. The principal conditions should, it seemed to him, be, first, that the emigrant should be a fit and competent man—that was by agricultural knowledge, and capacity, and also by physical strength; secondly, there should be a satisfactory and competent machinery for selection—a machinery which would adequately represent the local authorities, and pass, as it were, through the sieve the various applicants for emigration; thirdly, it was important that the emigration should be so sufficiently gradual as to be absorbed without inconvenience by the new country to which the emigrants were sent; and, lastly, some security should be taken for repayment by the emigrant, either in whole or in part of the money advanced. There had been in that Correspondence various proposals that would, more or less, carry out those objects. He now asked for the Correspondence that had passed between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and Mr. Stephens, the President of the Canada Pacific Railway, and also for the Correspondence between the Secretary of State and Mr. Boyd, who was greatly interested in emigration from the East End of London. He believed that there was no secret about the proposals which Mr. Stephens made rather more than a year ago to Her Majesty's Government. The Canada Pacific Railroad was one of those gigantic enterprizes connecting ocean with ocean which were pushed forward in these days with an energy and a vigour which were truly marvellous. The Railway Company had received from the Dominion Government large concessions of land alongside of the line, and that land was the subject-matter of the present proposal. In addition to that, the Hudson's Bay Company and the North-West Company were owners of vast tracts of land, and their object was to secure emigrants for that territory. Mr. Stephens's proposal, he believed, was that Her Majesty's Government should advance without interest a loan of £1,000,000 sterling for 10 years; that the Company should allot to each settler a block of 160 acres, reserving the adjoining block of the same extent for the Company. The emigrant would be transplanted, provided with a house, agricultural implements, seeds—in fact, everything required to settle him on that block of land, at the same time taking such precautions that he would be able to live for the first year. The next step was to take a mortgage on the land at 6 per cent. The English Treasury were to advance the money, so that they would have ample means of seeing that it was properly expended; and the land, with the adjoining block reserved, would constitute the security for repayment. That was the scheme which was proposed in reference to Irish emigration alone. The plan proposed by Mr. Boyd was, he thought, in its general principles, so nearly like that of Mr.

Stephens that he need not particularly describe it. The Irish scheme had fallen through. Objections had been taken and difficulties made by Her Majesty's Government. He did not know in what condition the East London scheme stood; but he feared that little or nothing had been done. He was not there to advocate either Mr. Stephens's or Mr. Boyd's scheme. He did not desire to advocate any particular proposal, still less to advocate any broadcast and indiscriminate expenditure on the part of the Imperial Treasury. But he thought that the time had come when that question should be considered from different points of view as it had never yet been considered, and that the State might properly intervene, at all events, to help those who were doing their best to help themselves. That being so, he thought it was the duty of the Government not to leave that matter to voluntary effort entirely, but to see whether they could not devise some sound and practical method of assisting the work. The Irish scheme, as he had said, had failed. He did not know what the reason of that failure might be; but he believed his noble Friend was not wholly averse from the principle which he had mentioned. Last year he gave a very encouraging reply to a Question on this subject. He said that there was a great congestion of the labour market in the East of London, and that the difficulty was growing; and he went on to say, speaking for the Colonial Office, that he did not know that any great difficulty need be apprehended as regarded this proposal, because it was no doubt possible to make arrangements with the Colonial Governments. Therefore, he did not think, so far as they might judge from the utterances of his noble Friend, that there would be any invincible objection on his part. What, then, was the objection, if there be one, on which this scheme was opposed? Was it an objection of principle, or was it merely an objection of Treasury detail? If it be an objection of principle, then he thought it was important their Lordships should know what it was; and if it be an objection on the part of the Treasury, he should like to know the nature of it? He had heard it said that the Canadian Government were perfectly willing to give every facility, to give actual security, for the payment of this loan, to make themselves responsible for it, and to step, as it were, into the shoes of the landlord as regarded the emigrant tenant. He could perfectly well understand such an objection on their part; but he did not think that the same objection could apply at all to the Government. The risks and evil of allowing the present condition of things in our large towns to go on growing in the same ratio were tremendous, and it could hardly be doubted that it was a wise and sound policy to run some risk in its alleviation. He had little further to add in moving for this Correspondence, except to press to the utmost of his power on Her Majesty's Government and the House the great evil and danger of the present state of things, such as existed in many of our large towns in the Kingdom. However continuous the emigration might be, more persons came into this town than were taken away. Emigration from Scotland, Ireland, and foreign countries poured into this large town, and the evil was still more enhanced by the fact that the German workman undersold the labour market of England. Lastly, there was emigration from our own country districts. Poor country people come to London, and by their presence contributed still more to swell the already enormous population. London at present was, in point of population, nearly as large as Scotland, and it was still increasing in size. No one could think of the condition of the Metropolis and the bonds which loosely held its immense population together without being made aware of the numberless difficulties and dangers which presented themselves at every turn. He thought we were approaching a time in the existence of these great cities, such as, indeed, the world had never seen before, and to which the attention of the Government ought to be most seriously directed. It was the duty of the Government to bring their minds, free of prejudice, to a consideration of the question and to accept the facts, such as they were. It was their duty to find a timely and well-considered measure to avert that which was an evil of overwhelming and increasing proportion.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for copies or extracts of correspondence between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the President of the Canada Pacific Railway in regard to state-aided emigration to Canada; also, for copies or extracts of correspondence on the same subject between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and Mr. F. Boyd."—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I waited a moment to see whether any other noble Lord wished to follow the noble Earl in the interesting speech he has delivered. To those observations I am sure you will have listened with interest, whether you entirely agree or not with the conclusions to which he came. There is no doubt that the question to which he has called our attention is one, not merely of great interest at the present moment, but one of great importance in the future. It cannot be discussed in an off-hand manner and done with; the question of what we are to do with the outflow of our population is one not for this year or the next, but one which will concern the next generation as much as, if not more than, the present. Now, my Lords, I am not at all inclined to argue in a doctrinaire manner upon the question of how far State assistance should be given to promote emigration. The question, I think, has never been fully discussed or argued out in either House of Parliament, and it is one in which we must be guided much more by that experience which we gather as we go along than by any preconceived notions. There is no doubt, as my noble Friend has stated, that of late years we have been in the habit of sanctioning the employment of public funds for many purposes which it was formerly thought were better left to individual enterprise. I do not say whether that tendency is good or bad. I accept it as one of the most remarkable characteristics of the time in which we live; and I willingly concede to my noble Friend that there are many worse uses to which public funds can be applied than that to which he proposes to apply them. I see no sense in talking about a scheme of State-assisted emigration, as if it were of a Communistic character, because if that is Communistic there are many things done by the State which equally deserve that character. My noble Friend was quite right in citing the case of the Poor Law and State assistance in education. If it be proper to feed a man when he cannot support himself, and to give his children the greater part of their primary education gratis, then it is impossible to argue on the ground of principle against transferring labour at the public expense from one place where it is not wanted to another where it is wanted. I think, also, my Lords, there is no ground of complaint against the expenditure of public money from Imperial funds merely because it has conferred incidentally a benefit upon the Colonies which are concerned. If we find that we are better off by getting rid of a certain amount of labour which is not wanted in this country, if we can promote our own advantage and save our own pockets by transferring that labour elsewhere, it certainly is no reason against taking that step that the Colonies also will be the gainers by its being taken. But, my Lords, I do not think that my noble Friend has quite made out his case. He has to show that the work of emigration upon a great scale requires to be taken in hand, and that it cannot be done by private enterprise. Now, I am not speaking at all of what may be the case hereafter, and I am not laying down a general principle for all time; I am simply speaking with reference to the circumstances as they at present exist. I would just remind your Lordships of several facts with which I dare say you are familiar. The last Emigration Return shows that at this moment we have a larger outflow of population from the British Islands than has ever been known at any previous period. I may, perhaps, modify that statement so far as to except one or two years which immediately followed the Irish Famine; but the emigration of those years was due to purely exceptional and temporary causes. I think if my noble Friend will look at the Emigration Returns which are on the Table of the House he will see that the emigration in 1883 was 320,000 persons of British and Irish origin, and this rate is greater than it has been at any previous period. Ireland alone contributed of that number 105,000 persons; and your Lordships will further find, by looking at this Return, that the natural growth of Ireland is less than the outflow, and that the population is, in consequence, steadily decreasing. The same cannot be said of England and Scotland; but, taking the whole of the British Isles, your Lordships will see that the present rate of emigration is equal to 1 per cent of the whole population. Speaking generally, and taking the country as a whole, I do not think there is a demand for any acceleration of this outflow. I quite agree with my hon. Friend that in considering this subject we must bear in mind the absorbing power of the Colonies themselves, and I do not believe that the present rate of outflow could be very largely increased without pressing unduly on the labour market of the Colonies. The next question is—Will the present rate of emigration continue? I think it will, and that it may very probably increase. I think we may fairly expect that the demand for labour in the Colonies, which to a great extent regulates the amount of emigration, will be greater in the future than in the past. The attractive power of a Colony is in proportion to the bulk of the attracting mass. It is greater in the United States than in Canada and Australia, because there is there more capital and more employment, and the field is being continually extended as the advantages of other countries are being made known. There is another cause which my noble Friend partly admitted. He stated that among the reasons why emigration was not as popular among the working classes as might be expected were ignorance and poverty. Whatever may happen as to the poverty of the working classes, there is no doubt that ignorance is diminishing from year to year, and especially ignorance on this subject. The rising generation are learning to read and write, and the next generation will be a much more reading people than the last. This change will especially take place and be most marked in the agricultural districts, which have hitherto been most backward. Moreover, there has been an enormous amount of emigration; and probably there is not a village or parish in the country from which one or two persons have not emigrated. In this way information as to Colonial life is communicated to those who stay at home. Those who thus take an interest in Colonial matters, and compare their chances of a career at home and in the Colonies, are in consequence year by year increasing. Then there is another consideration—that as communication becomes more rapid and more complete the risks and inconveniences of an emigrant's life tend to diminish. The attraction of cheap land remains; but the difficulty of getting to and fro and the hardships of an emigrant's life perpetually diminish. As to Ireland, there is, I think, additional and special cause why this emigration of the last few years should not diminish. We have heard quite enough in this House of the Irish land legislation of the last two years, and I do not wish to refer to it in any controversial spirit; but I think that, whatever other result may follow from the change in the Irish Land Laws, the tendency will be rather to promote than check the consolidation of farms, and, as a consequence, to increase the emigration of the surplus population. The Irish tenants have no longer any fear of eviction; but they have power to sell their holdings; the smaller and poorer farmers will be under a constant pressure to sell, especially in times of distress; and it is my opinion that the outward movement will be not retarded, but accelerated. Of course, the adoption of a higher standard of living and comfort, which I believe there is no doubt is taking place, tends in the same direction. For these reasons, it is my belief that, as far as the next few years are concerned, all the probabilities point, not to a diminution, but to an increase in the rate of the outward movement. If this is the case, it diminishes the urgency of the suggestion which my noble Friend now makes in favour of an official stimulus being given to emigration. He reminded us that Boards of Guardians have certain powers in this matter; and if these powers have not been used, I apprehend the reason to be that in the general judgment of those who have to deal with this matter emigration is already going on so rapidly as to require no stimulus. The noble Lord referred to the congestion of the labour market. I do not know if he meant all over the country, or in certain parts.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: In certain parts.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Well, local distress and local difficulties require local rather than general treatment. The noble Earl specially referred to the East End of London, and I agree with what he said on that subject. But I am afraid that, do what you will—and a great deal has been done lately—you will find that the poorer parts of London are the natural refuge of those who have failed elsewhere. I do not know why it is, but it has always been so. It is also a question how many of the East Enders, if they were offered the opportunity of emigrating, would be willing to go, or would be of the right sort to emigrate. It is not enough that a man should be able-bodied—that is, that he should have the right number of legs and arms—to make a successful emigrant. You require other qualities which are not always found in the poorest classes. We had some experience 14 or 15 years ago of a plan, not of emigration, but of migration. In 1869 and 1870 there was an exceptional amount of distress in the East End, and many men were sent from the East End to the Northern towns, where there was a brisk demand for labour; but the plan did not succeed. A few remained and prospered, but the majority went back. They did not like the new conditions of life which were offered, and preferred the distress with which they were familiar. Now, I have laid great stress upon that point, because it really is not enough that men should be in distress and want work to justify us in sending them to the Colonies. When the Colonists import labour for themselves it is their object to get men who will be able to do the work they require to be done. But when we export labourers, not because they are wanted in the Colonies, but because there is not work for them in this country, there is naturally a strong inducement to select not those who are the best fitted to go, but those who can best be spared. Another consideration is that no large scheme of emigration taken up by the State can possibly be expected to work without the co-operation of the Colonies to which the emigrants are sent. It is said that the Colonies ought to wish for a large supply of labour. If the emigrants are well chosen, it may, no doubt, be for the permanent benefit of the Colony that they should settle there; but it is not for the benefit of all persons concerned—for instance, it is not for the benefit of the ruling class, which in Colonial communities is the working class. The labourers in the Colonies enjoy exceptionally high wages. They have got a good thing, and are, of course, desirous of keeping it; and for that reason no great scheme of emigration is likely to be popular in the Colony to which the emigrants go. That consideration applies still more strongly if the Colonists believe, or seem to believe, that those we send out are those whom we wish to get rid of. But there is a third objection to large schemes of emigration, and that is that in adopting them we should run the risk of superseding, instead of supplementing, private efforts in that direction. In certain districts there are persons who want to emigrate. Suppose that in a given district 100 men wish to go out; most of them will probably succeed with the help of their families, and of their richer neighbours in the absence of State help. If, however, Government passages were offered to 20 of them, the other 80 would be sure to wait until they also got help; and every man who was not assisted would feel aggrieved. I do not consider that an insuperable obstacle; but it is, nevertheless, one that would have to be encountered, and one that must be considered. With regard to the general plan which has been hinted at—namely, the plan of planting down a large community in a district reserved—I am not prepared absolutely to condemn it. There are, no doubt, some advantages in it, and possibly in some instances it might be successful; but it would more probably fail, for this reason—that such plans are arranged, not by those whom they chiefly concern, but by persons at a distance, who do not understand, and therefore fail to comply with, the necessary local conditions. I do not think my noble Friend will ask me to discuss in detail the Canadian scheme of last year. That scheme fell through because the Canadian Government absolutely declined to guarantee repayment of the sum proposed to be spent, and other securities were not deemed sufficient. It is obvious that if loans of that kind are to be made, repayment must be required. But if the Government is left to collect its debts from individual emigrants, which is the only other way of obtaining the money, I think there would be a very small prospect of the sum being obtained. In conclusion, I doubt whether there is, at the present time, any requirement or demand for such State emigration as my noble Friend proposes, and I doubt whether the scheme he proposes would be very well received in the Colonies. Moreover, I am quite sure that if it is not cordially received by them it will not work; and I think, therefore, that the question would be better dealt with locally. For instance, it would be a very fair matter for a Municipal Authority for London, if we ever get one, to consider the question as it affects London. So with the other large towns, it is preferable that they should proceed step by step, and feel their way, rather than that they should commit themselves at once to any heavy expenditure. The Papers I am able to produce will be rather scanty, and it would be inconvenient to give the inter-Departmental Correspondence; but such Correspondence as can be given shall be produced. Before sitting down, I should like to make a personal explanation. My noble Friend opposite, referring to a reply I made some time since to a Question on this subject, quoted me as having said that, in regard to a scheme of this sort, no difficulty would be found in the Colonial Office, and he inferred that there was disagreement between the Departments concerned. What I did say was that the objection, if any, would not lie with the Colonial Office, but that we do not find the funds. The question of funds is a question for the Treasury; and I wish it to be understood that I did not in any way pledge my Colleagues, but that my observations applied solely to the action of my own Department.

LORD NORTON wished to take the opportunity of saying a few words on what was, perhaps, a small branch of emigration, but which, at the same time, might be made a very successful and important one; and it had the merit that instead of costing anything it would effect an enormous saving. Every child which was brought up and boarded out in the cottages of foster parents, as was now very frequently the practice in this country, and still more so in Scotland, cost the Treasury something like £25 a-head per annum during the whole period of their education. If foster parents were found to take homeless children in Canada the saving would be as great to this country as the advantage to the Colony and to the children; for one single payment of £25 on sending the children to Canada would provide for them infinitely better than the £25 a-year during the whole of their education, which was paid for them in this country. They would there be useful to their foster parents, and would become acclimatized to a country in which they would be able to find, and fit to exercise, certain employment hereafter.

LORD DENMAN said, it was courteous in the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies (the Earl of Derby) to give time for any noble Lord to speak; but it would have been vain for anyone to speak until he had heard the answer to the remarks of the noble Earl the late Secretary of State for the Colonies. He (Lord Denman) had had the honour of presenting a copy of Maguire's The Irish in America to the Library of their Lordships' House; he found in it that the Irish always adapted themselves to the best modes of agriculture. He was glad to hear from the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) that emigration was on the increase, for it was far better for the poor to live abroad than to starve at home; but he did not think, because men were starving at the East End of London, that, if better fed, they would be unable (if also sober) to do any kind of work. He believed that it was a mistake for them to settle in towns; but he thought that fellow-labourers, instead of repelling them as the noble Earl imagined, would welcome them. He did not follow the utilitarian ideas of the noble Earl; and he hoped that, notwithstanding the want of a guarantee, emigration on a large scale would answer. At the same time, he wished that great care should be taken to prevent the people from believing that we wished to get rid of them.

THE MAURITIUS — ECCLESIASTICAL AND EDUCATIONAL MATTERS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for copies or extracts of any recent correspondence between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Governor of the Mauritius on ecclesiastical and educational questions."—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he had no objection to lay the Papers on the Table; but they would require preparing, and, pending their preparation, perhaps the noble Earl would withdraw his Motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES — THE DEPORTATION OF FRENCH CONVICTS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY, in asking the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the French Government has yet communicated the estimate, promised in the Note Verbale enclosed by Lord Lyons in his Despatch of 3rd December 1883, of the number of persons to whom the Bill for the deportation of recidivists is applicable? said, that, as his Question was directed to a practical object, he only wished to state the case very briefly. The Question referred to matters of very great importance—namely, the deportation of French convicts to Islands near our Colonies in the South Seas. In the Blue Book on the proposed annexation of New Guinea and the Conference on the subject held in Australia, there was a Note by Lord Lyons on this subject in reference to communications he had with the French Government in regard to the grievances of our Colonists as to the importation of French convicts. No one could be more aware than he was of the extreme delicacy of saying one word with respect to a foreign and friendly Power on the subject of the deportation of convicts. But that Note had caused dismay and horror in the Southern part of Her Majesty's Australian Dominions. In the Blue Book it was suggested that the excitement about this matter in Australia was possibly exaggerated. He wished to say emphatically that it was not. During the last 40 years, since the last shipload of English convicts was sent to Australia, there had been no feeling in that country comparable to the excitement existing there now. The noble Viscount near him (Viscount Sherbrooke) would remember the agitation that prevailed then—in fact, pari magna fuit. Since that time the population had doubled, and the present excitement was more than double in intensity. He hoped the noble Earl would be able to give them some assurance on this subject; and if the French Government had not redeemed their promise to send some figures on this subject, he would suggest that some courteous intimation might be made to them to the effect that the subject was one which largely interested the inhabitants of a portion of the British Kingdom, and that further information was desirable.

EARL GRANVILLE, in reply, said, he was not surprised that the noble Earl, who had had so recent an opportunity of making himself acquainted with our Australian Colonies, should have thought it right to call attention to this subject, and to the strong feeling which existed in the Colony. He believed the noble Earl had not, in the slightest degree, exaggerated the sentiment and the feeling of sympathy in the Colonies with regard to the Mother Country, or their intense alarm as to the possible emigration of foreign convicts from any neighbouring settlements. The noble Earl might be perfectly sure that Lord Lyons, acting under our instructions, was neglecting no opportunity of bringing before the notice of the French Government the feeling which existed in the Australian Colonies on this subject. The noble Earl was quite right in saying that this question was mixed up with questions of International Law in a way which created a certain amount of difficulty and embarrassment; but it might certainly be expected from a friendly country like France that it would not, without very cogent reasons, take steps which might cause the exasperation which, undoubtedly, now existed in the Colony. The Government had not received the estimate of numbers referred to by the noble Earl from the French Government; but in a recent conversation the French Foreign Minister verbally assured Lord Lyons that the intention of the Government was to send the great bulk of convicts to French Guiana, and only a small number to New Caledonia, and these were to be selected from among men who had been trained to manual labour, and who might, therefore, be serviceable in the Colony.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he was aware that the question was one of delicacy; but his private information was such as to satisfy him that the noble Earl who had asked the Question had not overstated or exaggerated the strength of the feeling about it in Australia. He had reason to think that the number of criminal refugees who had found their way into Australia was rather large. It was important that the French Government should be made acquainted with the tension of feeling that this question caused, and with the fact that there was always a risk of some strong measures being taken by the Colonists which would place both countries in considerable difficulty. He trusted that the Government, in their communications with the French Government with reference to this question, would use what diplomatic pressure they could, and would not treat the subject as if it were of small importance.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY said, he would call attention to the subject on an early day after Easter.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

DEATH OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF ALBANY.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I deeply regret to announce that intelligence has been officially received of the death of His Royal Highness the Duke of Albany at Cannes. I have, with my Colleagues, inquired, as fully as was possible in the short period at our disposal, as to the precedents which bear upon this melancholy event; and it appears that it has not been usual under such circumstances as these to move the adjournment of the House. I desire, however, to give Notice that on Monday next the Prime Minister, if he is well enough to be in his place, or I, in his absence, will move an Address of Condolence with Her Majesty and Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Albany.

Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE:

Sir, if it is not irregular, perhaps I may be permitted to say that we on this side of the House share with the noble Lord the feeling of grief and distress at the terrible news which has so suddenly come upon us. It is for the Government to decide in accordance with the usual precedents in these matters; and I can only say, if their decision in the circumstances is to bring forward on Monday an Address of Condolence, we shall be in our places to take our part in that Address.

QUESTIONS.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—ADJOURNMENT OF A CASE AT PETTY SESSIONS UNDER SECTION 7.

Mr. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is the fact that Mr. Bodkin, R.M., adjourned a case at Tramore, county Waterford, under the 7th section of the Crimes Act, at 11.30 A.M. on 17th March, when defendant was summoned to appear at 12 noon, although the statute prescribes that no single resident magistrate can act in a case under section 7; was this postponement legal; did Sub-Inspector Milling serve notice on the defendant not to appear in answer to the summons on that day; do the Government intend to take notice of this; and, are police in Ireland empowered to act in this manner?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER), in reply, said, that the Irish Government was advised that an adjournment could be made by one Resident Magistrate; but the question in this case did not arise, as a fresh summons was issued for the second day. Sub-Inspector Milling did serve notice on defendant that he might not appear on a particular day, and the defendant accordingly did not appear. The arrangement was for the convenience of the defendant, and no notice would be taken by the Government of the matter.

Mr. HEALY: Has the police power to act in derogation of the action of the magistrates—when a magistrate issues a summons to appear on a certain day, can the police tell him not to appear?

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—APPLICATION BY PRO- CLAMATION OF SECTION 8 TO THE COUNTY OF LOUTH.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why Section 8 of the Crimes Prevention Act (making assaults on bailiffs and police in the execution of their duty, taking forcible possession of evicted farms, &c. offences under the Act), has been applied by proclamation to the county of Louth; whether the County Court Judge of Louth, in opening the Hilary Quarter Sessions on the 31st of January last, said—

whether his attention has been drawn to the statement of Mr. Baron Dowse, in opening the assizes of the county of the town of Drogheda on the 3rd instant, addressing the Grand Jury—

“I am very happy to inform you that there is no business to go before you at the present Assizes; as it is only matter of form you have a right to be proud of the favourable state of morality and order in your district;”

whether his attention has also been drawn to the statement of Mr. Justice Harrison, in opening the Spring Assizes for the county of Louth on the 4th instant, at Dundalk, to the Grand Jury—

“I am happy to see that the business of a criminal nature for the present Assize is extremely light. . . . The report of the county inspector is also very gratifying, he having only returned nine cases that required special notice, and that is a very small number in such a county as Louth. The reports from the other parts of the county are also good;”

what facts can be assigned to explain the issue of the proclamation; and, whether it will be revoked?

Mr. TREVELYAN: Sir, I have every reason to believe that the extracts quoted by the hon. Member are correct. The county of Louth was proclaimed under the 8th section of the Crimes Act, in order that in the event of cases of riot taking place they might be dealt with under its provisions.

Mr. SEXTON begged to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the extract in the 4th paragraph from Mr. Justice Harrison's address, and to ask on what evidence the Lord Lieutenant apprehended any riots might occur?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Lord Lieutenant, judging from the immediate past, thought it extremely probable that rioting would occur on St. Patrick's Day; and until the state of things which existed in the North of Ireland had come to a close, the Irish Government would regret very much that any decision should be given in any case of conflict between Orangemen and Catholics which would be suspected to have been given from Party motives.

MR. SEXTON: Now that St. Patrick's Day is over, and that there is no conflict between Orangemen and Catholics, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would suggest to the Lord Lieutenant the propriety of removing this proclamation from County Louth?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I am quite willing to submit the revocation of the proclamation of County Louth to the opinion of the Irish Government; but it does not follow that all the counties in the North of Ireland are in the same position.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY— SERGEANT KNOX.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Sergeant Knox, of the Blackrock Police Station, in the city of Cork, in June last, tore his tunic to pieces and threw it into the River Lee; whether, some time ago, he attempted to shoot one of the policemen under his control; whether, in the year 1881, he was confined in the Cork Lunatic Asylum; and, whether, if these allegations are true, he will be continued in the charge of a police barrack?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the County Inspector reports that, so far as he has been able to ascertain, there is not a shadow of foundation for the suggestion in the second part of the hon. Member's Question. He states that if such a circumstance occurred it certainly would have been reported to him. It is true that three years ago the sergeant was committed for a short time to the Cork Asylum; but his illness was only temporary, and was not insanity. The Resident Magistrate Superintendent certified that it was a sudden paroxysm caused by anxiety owing to the illness of his wife; but there was no trace of insanity. His superior officer certified that he was an excellent and trustworthy officer.

Twenty-five magistrates of the locality have spontaneously signed a declaration stating that his being sent to the lunatic asylum was a most unfortunate mistake.

THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND —CORRECTION OF RETURN.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, with regard to the Return of last Session relative to the Royal University of Ireland, which, after setting forth,

"the number of undergraduate students in Arts, of the first and second years respectively," attending the Queen's College, Cork, in the Session 1882-3, purports to state, as a distinct Return,

"the number of Arts students in attendance who have passed the matriculation examination of the Royal University in 1881 and 1882;"

whether the number of Arts students thus returned as having "passed the Royal University examination of 1881" is 62; whether he will communicate with the official by whom this Return was made, so as to obtain the names of these 62 students, and thus enable honourable Members to test the accuracy of the Return by comparing it with the list of matriculated students in the Royal University Calendar; and, whether, in the event of the Return being thus discovered to be substantially incorrect, steps will be taken, by the issue of a Royal Commission or otherwise, to obtain more trustworthy information as to the actual condition of the Cork College?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, this is a Question which is rather hard to answer in words; but I will endeavour to make my meaning clear. I find that, owing to a slight typographical error, which, it is to be regretted, was not discovered when the proof of the Return was being read of last Session, the figure 62, which the hon. Member quotes, is undoubtedly misleading. The corresponding figure for Belfast College is 77; and a note appended thereto explains that this number includes students on the books of the College before the dissolution of the Queen's University, and who became, by the terms of the Act 42 & 43 Vict., matriculated students of the Royal University, by a self-acting process. This note was intended to apply also to the figure 62 for Cork College; but the typographical mark to indicate the reference was accidentally omitted. The College officials who supplied the figures were in no way responsible for this.

MR. GRAY: Is the right hon. Gentleman in possession of the proper number of students who passed in 1881?

MR. TREVELYAN: No; but I will ascertain.

CHINA—OPIUM SMUGGLING AT HONG KONG.

MR. CROPPER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Report of the Commission has been received which (as he stated in the House on the 27th February 1883) the Administrator at Hong Kong appointed to inquire into all the circumstances of the smuggling of opium and other goods from Hong Kong to the mainland of China; and, whether he has any objection to present it to the House?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Sir, the Report of the Commission has been received, and there is no objection to lay it upon the Table.

POST OFFICE—ACCELERATION OF THE IRISH MAILS.

MR. GRAY asked the Postmaster General, Whether his attention has been directed to a report in the Dublin papers of the 22nd instant of a deputation from the Cork Chamber of Commerce to the Board of the Great Southern and Western Railway Company in reference to the acceleration of the mails, at which the chairman of the Company was reported to have stated that they had received no communication directly or indirectly on the subject from the Postmaster General or the Postal Department; and, whether he will say what practical steps have been taken for the promised acceleration of the mails from London to Dublin, and from Dublin to the Provincial towns; when the scheme of acceleration will be completed; and, whether, before it is decided upon, he will afford to representative bodies in Ireland and to the House an opportunity of pronouncing their opinion upon so important a matter?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, my attention has been directed to the Report to which the hon. Member refers. The reason why no communication has yet been made to the Great Southern and Western Railway Company and other Irish Railways, with the view of accelerating the mails in Ireland, is that we are not in a position to make any arrangement until the new time table between London and Holyhead has been finally settled. As I have already explained, this is a matter involving many intricate details, as many cross-country trains have to be fitted in with the Irish mail train. Communications are on the point of being made to the various Railway Companies, and I can only say that no effort will be spared to bring the matter to a conclusion as speedily as possible. I shall, when the matter is further advanced, be happy to furnish the information to the House of Commons which is asked for, and any Memorials on the subject that may be sent to me from Ireland shall be carefully considered.

MR. GRAY: The right hon. Gentleman's answer does not apply to the latter part of my Question.

MR. FAWCETT: I am afraid it would not be convenient formally to lay the scheme of acceleration on the Table; but I shall be very glad to communicate with the hon. Gentleman, or any other Irish Members who may be interested in the question.

PAUPERISM—RETURN OF CAUSES FOR INDIVIDUALS.

MR. RANKIN asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he would grant, unopposed, a Return, taken from a number of workhouses in various districts sufficient to give an average result for the whole Country, of the causes which have led to the pauperism of the various inmates; especially noting the condition of the paupers while between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five, and also a Return of the occupations of the paupers before they entered the workhouse?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, the Return would be so voluminous and costly that he could not agree to its publication. Moreover, he did not think that such a Return could be given in a satisfactory manner, or so as to afford trustworthy results.

HACKNEY CARRIAGE ACT (METROPOLIS)—CAB LAWS—DEFAUDING CABDRIVERS.

LORD ALGERNON PERCY asked the Secretary of State for the Home

Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Mrs. White, summoned at the Mansion House, on the 16th of February, for defrauding a cabdriver of his fare; whether his attention was called by the Cabdrivers' Benevolent Association in June 1882, to the hardships frequently suffered by cabdrivers, in similar cases, from the action of fraudulent persons; and, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any steps to amend the existing Cab Laws, so as to place cabmen in a more advantageous position with regard to the recovery of fares?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I presume the noble Lord refers to the hardship of the cabmen not being able to proceed summarily by arrest, but by summons. I sympathize very much with the cabmen, and should be very glad to help them; but this state of things has arisen out of a very good Act of Parliament passed by my Predecessor—the Summary Jurisdiction Act. It is impossible to deal with one particular trade or industry on a different footing from that on which the rest of the community is placed; and therefore I cannot see my way to make the cabdrivers a special exception under the Act.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—THE REV. MR. FIRTH.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that, in the case of "Firth v. Trimble," an action for damages for libel, brought by the Rev. John Firth, Justice of the Peace for the county of Fermanagh, against the proprietor and manager of the Fermanagh Impartial Reporter, for an article in that newspaper charging the plaintiff with having adjudicated in a manner contrary to his duty as a magistrate, the jury found for the defendant; whether the report of the case is accurate, that Captain MacTernan, the resident magistrate of the district, swore that he considered that Mr. Firth led the other members of the Bench to give an improper decision; that Mr. Firth had acted, in his opinion, corruptly; that he believed there had been partiality in the decisions, and a pollution of the justice seat, and that he believed the Government ought to remove a partial magistrate from the Bench; and, whether he will make inquiry into all the circumstances of the case?

MR. TREVELYAN: I have seen the newspaper report of the case. I am informed that it is the intention of the plaintiff to proceed to a new trial, and that the presiding Judge stayed the execution to enable such an application to be made. Under these circumstances, the case is still sub judice, and no action can be taken.

VISCOUNT CRICHTON: As the right hon. Gentleman has informed the House that the case is still sub judice, I will refrain from putting to him a Question on the subject of which I have given him private Notice.

MR. SEXTON: For the public information I wish to ask the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland whether the plaintiff in this case chose the venue; whether he asked for a special jury, and got it; and whether the jury which found the verdict against him was not exclusively Protestant?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): It is the fact, Sir, that he chose the venue; and the other matters referred to in the Question of the hon. Member are, I believe, accurate.

POOR LAW (ENGLAND AND WALES)— THE POLAND STREET WORKHOUSE INQUIRY.

LORD ALGERNON PERCY asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the continued complaints regarding the treatment of the inmates of the Poland Street Workhouse of the Westminster Union by Mr. T. D. Bliss, the master, since the letter of the Local Government Board, of the 18th of July, 1883, censuring him for his previous conduct; whether he is aware that, shortly after the receipt of that letter, the guardians presented Mr. Bliss with a purse containing £25, as a mark of their appreciation of his conduct; whether Mr. Jordan, lately sent by the Board to make inquiries into these complaints, had been formerly intimately acquainted with Mr. Bliss, and whether he conducted his inquiries in private or in the presence of the master; and, whether it is the intention of the Local Government Board to take any further steps in the matter?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, all cases of complaint as to the treatment of inmates of the Poland Street Workhouse of the Westminster Union which have been brought under the notice of the Board have received their attention. The Board are not aware whether or not Mr. Bliss was presented with a purse of money by the Guardians, and they have not deemed it necessary to make inquiry as to the action of individual Guardians in a matter of this kind. Major Jordan was not acquainted with Mr. Bliss prior to his inspecting the workhouse as an officer of the Board. In consequence of a statement which appeared in a Notice of a Question as to an inmate named Warren, Major Jordan visited the workhouse and saw the man. He saw the man alone, and not in the presence of Mr. Bliss. A person who was visiting the workhouse when it was alleged that Warren was threatened by the master was seen by Major Jordan in the presence of Mr. Bliss. The Board are in communication with the Guardians as to the case of Warren.

THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND
—QUEEN'S COLLEGE, CORK—
PUNISHMENTS.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the resolutions of the Council of Queen's College, Cork, of 18th March, sentencing students to rustication from College, deprivation of scholarships, and other punishments for holding a meeting outside the College, and without the permission of the Council, to call attention to the expenditure of the public endowments enjoyed by the Queen's College; whether Mr. J. J. Lynch was sentenced to a long term of rustication on suspicion of having been Chairman of such private meeting of Students, without being afforded any opportunity of hearing or rebutting the evidence against him; whether it has been brought to his attention that Mr. E. R. Hennessy, senior scholar in chemistry, and Messrs. Daniel O'Callaghan and John Kearney, junior scholars in medicine, were punished, the former by forfeiture of his scholarship, and the latter by fines of £2 each, on the ground that—

“On being questioned by the Council on the subject of the meeting, and after being warned by the Council that, as scholars, they were bound by the statutes to assist the Council in maintaining discipline in the College, they refused to give the Council the benefit of the information they possessed;”

what portion of the College statutes prohibits students from participating in the discussion of the question of University Education in Ireland; does the detection of private meetings held with that object outside the precincts of the College form part of the obligation of scholars to assist the Council in maintaining the internal discipline of the College; if so, under what provision; are scholars bound under pain of forfeiting their scholarships to reveal what passed among their fellow-students at such private meeting; upon what grounds did the Council conclude that the gentlemen in question had information to give; and, whether a special Visitation will be ordered for the purpose of investigating the present relations between the College Council and the Students?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I am aware that circumstances have occurred which have led to the punishment of certain students of the Queen's College, Cork. It is not the province of the Government to interfere in matters of College discipline. The College Statutes provide the manner in which such matters can be dealt with. The students who consider themselves aggrieved have applied, under the provisions of the Statutes, for an extraordinary visitation, and the matter will, therefore, be before the Court of Visitors. I may say that, at the time when I answered a previous Question on this subject, I was not aware that the students had appealed against the decision of the authorities.

MR. GRAY: When the right hon. Gentleman stated on a previous day that these students had been guilty of “insubordination,” was he aware that after the visitation he would be called upon to pronounce an opinion on their conduct?

MR. TREVELYAN: As I have already stated, I was not then aware they had appealed. As to what exactly was floating in my mind as to my own position with regard to the matter, I am not quite certain.

MR. O'BRIEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to make the suggestion that these gentlemen be permitted to attend their lectures pending the result of their appeal. Otherwise, even if successful in their appeal, they would lose a year on account of insufficient attendance?

MR. TREVELYAN: These matters are treated according to some regular College system. I will ascertain what is going on.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: In case the appeal is successful, will the gentlemen concerned be allowed credit for the lectures they are prevented from attending?

THE DUBLIN MURDER TRIAL—COMPENSATION TO MR. FIELD.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Field, of Dublin, who was awarded compensation for personal injury, by order of the Lord Lieutenant, has received any portion of the sum thus awarded to him; why it is that nothing has been paid to Henry Byrne of Coolbanagher, and Constable Daniel Connell, both of the Queen's County, who were awarded compensation for personal injury on the 20th October 1882, and 29th September 1883 respectively; whether he will give a return of the parties, stating names, amounts of compensation, and dates of grants, of persons in Ireland to whom awards for compensation for personal injury has been made, and who have not yet received the sums due to them; and, whether he will take steps to ensure that no further delay shall take place in securing that persons to whom compensation is due for injuries inflicted upon themselves, or whose claims for compensation for the loss of relatives has been allowed by the Lord Lieutenant, shall receive the sums due to them, according to the spirit, as well as the letter of the Law?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, Mr. Field has been paid £600 out of the £3,000 awarded to him, and the further collection is in progress. His case was the only one in the Metropolis, and the machinery employed for collection is exceptional. In the other 123 cases throughout Ireland the collection is made by the Constabulary, and every effort is made to press it on. Many of the warrants are for very small sums, and the general intention has been to press on the full execution of the warrant before paying over any sums that may be collected; but if any of the persons interested are unwilling to wait and will make application to Government there will be no objection to advance a portion of the collection to them. Returns pursuant to the Act are already from time to time presented to Parliament showing the awards and the sums collected and paid.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE SPRING ASSIZES—RETURN OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT NOT SUMMONED TO SERVE ON GRAND JURIES.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many Members serving in the present Parliament for counties and boroughs in Ireland were not summoned by the High Sheriffs to serve as grand jurors in their respective counties, or counties of cities, at the recent Spring Assizes; and, if he will assent to a Motion for a Return showing the names of the Sheriffs and Members of Parliament in question?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If, in the event of his granting the Return, asked for by the senior Member for Sligo, showing the names of Irish Members of Parliament who were not summoned to serve as Grand Jurors at the recent Spring Assizes, he will also give a Return of the rateable value of the property owned by such Members of Parliament, specifying the counties in which such properties are situated?

MR. TREVELYAN: I will answer the two Questions together. The information which the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) asks for could only be definitely ascertained by collecting it from the various sheriffs or secretaries of Grand Juries throughout Ireland. There is no obligation on the part of High Sheriffs to summon Members of Parliament. It is only custom. With regard to the proposed Return, it is not one that the Government would regard as of much importance; but if the hon. Member chooses to move for it I will not oppose it. With regard to the Return asked for by the hon. and gallant Member for Dublin (Colonel King-Harman), I think it would be quite unreasonable and altogether inquisitorial to ask for a Return in such general terms as would involve an inquiry from each of the persons concerned whether he had or had not rateable property in any part of Ireland, and, if so, to what extent. But if the hon. and gallant Gentleman chooses to limit the terms of his Notice so that it would apply only to the county or city which the Member represents in Parliament, then the same observation will apply as to the proposed Return of the hon. Member for Sligo. While not regarding it of importance, I shall not oppose it.

MR. SEXTON: Is there any Constitutional rule requiring that a Member of Parliament, or any other person summoned to serve as a Grand Juror, shall possess any rateable property in the country? Has it not been usual to summon the sons of Peers who possess such property? I shall move for the Return, and I shall ask the right hon. Gentleman to make it fuller by adding the names of all Members of Parliament in Ireland who have been returned to serve as Grand Jurors, and in how many cases they obtained grants of money from public funds for the improvement of their estates, and whether they have expended the money for that purpose?

MR. TREVELYAN: I must think over the amended Return of the hon. Member. With regard to his Question, there is no Constitutional rule of the nature he asks, and there is no Constitutional rule at all in reference to Members of Parliament serving on Grand Juries.

MR. HEALY: If the hon. and gallant Member for Dublin (Colonel King-Harman) moves for a Return of the amount of rateable property held by each Member of Parliament, I shall move for a further Return, showing the amounts of the mortgages on such property.

ARMY—PROMOTION.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER asked the Secretary of State for War, If he can state why paragraph 19 of the Revised Memorandum of 1881, whereby it was provided that promotion should go regimentally for seven years from that date has not been carried out; and, if he will consider the expediency of compensating officers who have thus been deprived of the position they purchased in their regiments?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, the reasons which influenced my Predecessor in departing to some extent from the Revised Memorandum of 1881 as to promotions in the regiments were, I understand, that by keeping up separate lines of promotion for seven years the amalgamation of the two battalions would be postponed for too long a period, and that it had been laid down as a principle by Lord Penzance's Commission, upon whose Report the present system of promotion is mainly based, that—

“No Purchase officers who have been or may be promoted at any time since the abolition of Purchase can claim exemption from any new Regulations affecting the rank to which they may have been so promoted.”

The right of officers to promotion in their own battalions is respected for seven years, provided they have had no promotion in the meantime, and that of the captain who was senior in his battalion at the date of the Warrant, notwithstanding that he had had one promotion. This is all that the justice of the case seems to demand.

ARMY—AUXILIARY FORCES—DEFICIENCY OF OFFICERS.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any effort will be made before the coming Militia training to remedy the very unsatisfactory condition of that service, as regards the serious deficiency of officers in many regiments; and, whether, if such efforts should fail, there is any intention of giving extra pay to Officers in these regiments, to compensate them for the extra expense that will devolve upon them from having to divide amongst a small number of Officers these necessarily heavy expenses incident to a Militia training, which are intended to be borne by the full complement of Officers?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I am now considering whether we are not in a position to grant the original number of commissions in the Army to Militia candidates—namely, 120 per annum. This will, I hope, have the effect of increasing the number of candidates for the Militia. Meanwhile the Militia Regulations empower commanding officers to fill vacancies during training by obtaining the services of officers of the Regular Army or of other Militia regiments. I can hold out no hope of extra pay being given.

THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND
—QUEEN'S COLLEGE, CORK—
THE RETURN.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why the Return ordered from Cork Queen's College has not been presented; is he aware that it could be prepared in a few minutes from the College Rolls; and, what is the cause of the delay?

MR. TREVELYAN: This Return passed from my Department three or four days ago. I believe it was laid on the Table yesterday.

BURIAL FEES ACT, 1832—ECCLESIASTICAL BURIAL FEES.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Her Majesty's Government contemplate asking Parliament to legislate, with respect to Ecclesiastical Burial Fees, in the direction recommended by the Select Committee which reported on the question in 1882?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: My hon. and gallant Friend asks me whether Her Majesty's Government contemplate legislation on the subject of ecclesiastical burial fees. With regard to contemplation, I think we may say that we do; but in regard to action in the present Session I am afraid he must accept the answer I gave the other day, that we are unable to do anything.

EGYPT—SLAVERY IN THE SOUDAN.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in view of the statements of The Times Correspondent at Suakin, that slaves, men who are starved by their then owners, and slave girls, who are forced to prostitute themselves for the benefit of their owners, and who escape from their owners, are restored to them by persons in the service of this Country, orders have been sent to the Commanders of Her Majesty's Forces at Suakin prohibiting such practices; whether he can give the House any assurance that, in future, escaped slaves in Suakin and its neighbourhood will not be restored to their owners by any action of the civil and military authorities of this Country, or by any persons under their control; and, whether he can inform the House what has become of a caravan of slaves which it is stated, by the correspondents of several of the daily journals of the Metropolis, recently arrived in the vicinity of Suakin?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, the only definite statement I have received on the subject was one relating to the alleged proceedings of Admiral Sir William Hewett in regard to Abyssinian scouts. That statement appears to me to have been completely disposed of by the telegrams of the Admiral, which I read to the House a few days ago. If the hon. Gentleman can bring to the notice of the Government any well-authenticated and definite statement of any further proceeding we shall make inquiries about it; but I do not think it would be desirable to ask for information, or that a vague statement respecting the conduct of officers should be made the subject of inquiry.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he would repeat the Question on Monday.

LICENSING LAWS (IRELAND)—CASE OF DANIEL O'NEILL.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to a case heard on the 20th inst. at Rathdrum, county Wicklow, before Dr. Traill, Colonel Kemmis, and Mr. Fritzell, Justices, in which Mr. Daniel O'Neill was fined on a summons charging him with having opened his licensed premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors at 11.15 A.M. on Sunday 2nd March, and the Justices refused to increase the fine in order to enable the defendant to appeal against their judgment; whether the evidence of the prosecuting constable was, that on the day in question he saw Mr. Byrne, a respectable farmer in the district, who was accompanied by his wife, drive his trap through an archway into a yard at the rear of the defendant's premises, and a few moments after saw Mr. Byrne pass from the stable, where he had put up his horse, through the yard and into the street, without entering the house; whether Mr. Byrne deposed that, on the occasion in question, he was on his way to Divine Service, and that for twenty years it had been his practice on Sundays to leave his horse and car on the defendant's premises while he himself was at prayers;

whether the magistrates acted legally in fining the defendant, and in refusing him an appeal to the higher Court; and, what means of obtaining redress are open?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, several cases recently brought under my notice led me to believe that in the county of Wicklow, and possibly in some other parts of Ireland, some misapprehension existed as to the duty of the police with reference to cases where there was a prima facie breach of the Licensing Laws in respect of persons found on licensed premises during prohibited hours, and that the consequence was that some cases were needlessly brought into Court. I therefore caused the case to be laid before the Law Officers of the Crown, and their opinion shows that I was right in my conjecture. Fresh instructions have, therefore, been, within the last two or three days, issued to the police, especially in the county of Wicklow, which will, I hope, have the effect of preventing any recurrence of such proceedings. With regard to the particular case mentioned in this Question, which was also the subject of a Question which the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. Corbet) had on the Paper yesterday, but which he was good enough to postpone at my request. I believe the facts are as stated. I cannot help regretting that this case was brought into Court; and I shall ask the Lord Lieutenant to consider whether it is not one in which his Excellency might properly remit the penalties. I may observe, however, that the refusal of the magistrates to increase the penalty did not deprive the defendant of the right of appeal. In cases under the Licensing Acts, as I am advised, this does not depend on the amount of the fine; and the defendant might have appealed to the Quarter Sessions if he had taken steps to do so in proper time.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—
GENERAL GORDON.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any further intelligence had been received from General Gordon since the 14th?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that no intelligence had been received since the last reply of his noble Friend the Secretary of State for War on the subject.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF inquired, whether information had been received respecting the further breakage of the telegraphic communication with Khartoum?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: If the hon. Member refers to the report in the evening papers, no such intelligence has been received by the Government.

PARLIAMENT—RULES OF DEBATE—PRODUCTION OF OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I wish, Sir, to ask for your ruling as to the application to the Rules of Debate of the precedents laid down in 1865 by Mr. Speaker Denison, and in 1883 by Mr. Speaker Brand. I desire to know whether the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella), having cited official documents—namely, certain Reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, and having stated the tenour of them, is not bound to lay them on the Table? I also wish to call your attention, Sir, to these facts—first of all, that the Report which I desire to have laid upon the Table was made in consequence of a Parliamentary pledge made to the House of Commons by the right hon. Gentleman last Session, and it would be to the public advantage that the honest opinion of the Inspectors on over-pressure should be known. I wish, also, to point out that it is unreasonable for official documents to be considered confidential after the Minister in charge of them has published their tenour. And, lastly, I wish, Sir, to call your attention to the broad principle laid down in the words of the leading case, from which I will read an extract, that—

“Such conduct, if permitted, has a direct tendency to injure the public interests, by making the Resolutions of this House proceed on inaccurate statements which it cannot correct by reference to the documents on which those statements are made.”

In 1865 and 1883 notice of a similar matter was taken two or three days after the occurrence of the irregularity.

MR. SPEAKER: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that it is an unquestioned Rule of this House that public despatches, documents, and Papers relating to public affairs should be laid on the Table of the House if quoted by a Minister; but, in this case, the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council made, I understand, no citations from any document whatever. He merely said that he had consulted the Inspectors. The statement which he made, as to the result of his inquiry as to over-pressure in the elementary schools, was made on his own responsibility, and he is under no obligation to lay any documents or Papers on the Table of the House.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON : I beg leave to give Notice that on an early day I will move for the production of these Papers.

METROPOLIS—HYDE PARK CORNER— THE WELLINGTON STATUE.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the paragraph which appeared in the morning papers concerning the disposition of the Wellington statue was correct?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The paragraph contains an accurate statement. I am informed that the Report has been agreed to by the Committee presided over by the Prince of Wales. It is also in accordance with the arrangement provisionally agreed to by the Government on the suggestion of His Royal Highness. I will answer the Question put on the Paper by the right hon. Gentleman on Thursday.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LOCAL TAXATION.—RESOLUTION.

MR. PELL, in rising to call the attention of the House to the subject of Local Taxation; and to move—

"That this House, while ready to entertain any necessary reforms in local administration, deprecates the postponement of further measures of relief acknowledged to be due to rate-payers in counties and boroughs in respect of local charges imposed on them for National services," said, he should have been perfectly ready to waive his right to bring forward this Motion if Her Majesty's Government had proposed the adjournment in consequence of the melancholy intelligence they had received. But as they had not done so, and as there had been no precedent for such a proceeding, he would now proceed with the Motion of which he had given Notice; and he trusted he should be able to remove the common idea that the Imperial and local Revenue concerned different classes of people. The local and Imperial Revenues made up one enormous fund, out of which all local and Imperial obligations had to be discharged. Thus, if one was spared the other had to be more heavily burdened. The question then arose, which of the two applicants had the stronger claim upon that House? The total local and Imperial Revenue was £146,000,000—the Imperial Revenue amounting to £89,000,000 and the local to £57,000,000. Before he went further, he desired to say that since the question which he was bringing forward was first introduced there had been considerable progress in the opinion both of the House and of the country. It was, therefore, unnecessary for him to repeat the old arguments which he had urged upon the House 14 or 15 years ago. The inequality of which he complained of the incidence of the two forms of taxation was admitted by all in that House, from the Prime Minister to the humblest Member. Nor was an inquiry into the subject any longer necessary. The right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), whom he regretted not to see in his place, had many years ago furnished a most valuable Report, which was almost a text book on the subject. Since then the question had been illustrated by the inquiries of Committees, statistical Returns, and the independent examinations of private Members. In particular, great service has been rendered to the country by the exertions of a number of Members from both sides of the House, who had constituted themselves into a sort of Committee of vigilance, and who had had the good fortune to be served and advised by a gentleman, Major Craigie, whose name was well known in that House and throughout the country. A large body of statistical information had been collected, although it was not so complete as he could desire. As he saw the President of the Local Government Board in his place, he wished to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to a want of diligence—he might almost say a want of respect—on the part of the Local Government Board with regard to one little matter. And it was not the first time that such a thing had happened. More than a year ago he moved for a short abstract setting forth the different items of local expenditure and the sources from which money was raised to meet that expenditure. That Return—now an annual one—was ordered on the 14th or 15th of February, 1883; but it had not yet been printed, and so would be out of date. The right hon. Gentleman had a staff of experts—paid and able officials—who could give, in a short and concise way, a summary of facts and figures which it would be a work of immense difficulty for an independent Member to obtain for himself, and almost impossible to obtain with complete accuracy. On the £89,000,000 of Imperial Revenue, the principal items of charge were £16,000,000 for the Army, £10,000,000 for the Navy, £10,000,000 for the Civil Service—in which, strangely enough, the Irish police was included—£29,000,000 for the National Debt, and £6,000,000 for the Post Office, which, of course, was a remunerative Department. £1,500,000 went under the head of Civil List, Pensions, and Courts of Justice, £7,000,000 went to exceptional charges, like Egypt and India, and £7,000,000 were appropriated to a kind of partnership concern, between local authorities and the central authority in London. Thus already Imperial and local expenditure were interlaced and irrevocably mixed up. There was, then, no pretence for saying that relief to local taxation could not be given until a grand scheme was carried into effect of Local Government Reform. Such a plea was a mere subterfuge. Of the £57,000,000 of local revenue, the rates contributed £28,000,000, or nearly half; and of the other half no less than £17,000,000 went to what were strictly national as opposed to local purposes—purposes which were inseparable from civilization and the attainment of social comfort—all the provisions, for instance, on which depended the security of life and property. These were strictly national, and should not be charged on local funds. First among these came the relief of destitution, which absorbed £8,000,000. Some had said that the English Poor Law was a bulwark against revolution. He thought, rather, that it operated as a discouragement to industry and thrift. Then there was the education rate, amounting to £2,000,000, by means of which, according to the Vice President of the Council, the police were to be rendered superfluous and society was to be regenerated. But since a complete system of elementary education had been introduced, it had not been found that the number of the police force in the country had been reduced. He was, of course, speaking in round numbers; but if any hon. Member wished to enter into details, he should be happy to see him to-morrow and discuss them with him. The balance of the £28,000,000 was made up by the expenditure of the county, highway, and sanitary authorities. The £7,000,000 which was contributed by the Imperial Exchequer, and was spent by the local authorities, was a sort of hybrid expenditure, under dual government, which made itself felt from Whitehall to every village and town. It was made up by contributions from the State of £4,000,000 for education, £1,425,000 in respect of the police—this was in Great Britain alone—£367,000 in respect of reformatories, £600,000 for pauper lunatics, £250,000 contributions to the highway rates, which was won by the exertions of the hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Harcourt), £250,000 for Miscellaneous Grants in Aid, under the supervision of the Local Government Board, £17,000 which went to the Irish hospitals, and £7,000 which was paid in respect of certain Courts in the Metropolis. In most cases the ratepayers made a larger contribution than the State to the sum expended under dual control. Now, one thing which made it more easy to assail the ratepayer than the taxpayer was that the latter was represented on the Ministerial Benches by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose policy must be one of economy, and whose duty it was to see that public money was not wasted or misused. On the other hand, the bias of the Local Government Board was towards expenditure upon old objects or upon new ones. One reason for this was that in Whitehall there was a host of eager, hungry, and not always the most able professional men, representing doctors and engineers, who received public money, who could not receive it for doing nothing, and whose existence depended on indicating how they could be employed. Some engineers had rendered great services; but he could not say quite as much for the doctors. There was nobody except the weak, trembling local authority to put a check upon the extravagant proposals of the Local Government Board in London; and; therefore, there was an opening for wasteful expenditure which was not permitted in the expenditure of the taxes. Every farthing of the taxes must be voted in Committee of the Whole House. When any humble private Member like himself got the opportunity of calling attention to the case of the ratepayers in the still hours of the night, he might say, without making this a Party question, that he had been met by a Conservative Government with sympathy, with desire to relieve the ratepayers, and by the actual granting of a subvention; but he had been invariably met by a Liberal Government with subterfuge; and any concessions which had been made were given grudgingly. When the hon. Member for Oxfordshire had forced the Government to grant £250,000, the Chancellor of the Exchequer offered to provide the relief in the most odious way by the increase of the tax on carriages, a proposal which ultimately had to be withdrawn. When a Commission was asked for in 1869, the Prime Minister said that he would be the Commission. The demand for inquiry of the hon. Member for South-Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) was met in 1871 by the Previous Question, and in 1872 by the proposal to divide rates between owners and occupiers, which was transparently a subterfuge. Last year, when he brought forward a Motion for immediate relief, he was met by an Amendment from the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Albert Grey) declaring that it was expedient to postpone the giving of relief until the whole question of local taxation and local government was brought under the notice of the House. The Liberal Party crept out of the difficulty with a fair majority of 12; but the effect of that small majority was marvellous. It produced qualms, hesitation, and remorse, on the part of some Members who had voted against the Motion, and soon afterwards there was presented to the Prime Minister an extraordinary Memorial, to which he would hereafter refer. Although it had been admitted in the debate that relief ought to be given, the Government attempted, in the Army Regulation Bill, to impose upon ratepayers in counties the whole charge for Militia storehouses and barracks. He should have thought that they would have postponed that until the Local Government Bill was brought forward. Later on, in 1882, a Bill was introduced with reference to the expenses of elections. That was a matter which might well have been considered in a re-arrangement of county business; but the Government, instead of waiting until their Local Government proposals were prepared, supported a proposition for the purpose of placing the whole cost of the official expenses of Parliamentary elections upon the ratepayers. How could the noble Lord (Viscount Lymington), who had an Amendment on the Paper, in the face of that proposal, say that he desired to see the ratepayers relieved of their burdens? As a substitute for effective relief, an extraordinary Memorial was, as he said, last year presented to the Government upon this subject by 31 hon. Gentlemen. He would illustrate the position of those Memorialists in this way—Suppose that a man in passing down a street was pinned to the ground by a falling bale of goods, and that other persons—the hon. Members for South Northumberland, or Great Grimsby, or South Norfolk, or Barnstaple, for instance—instead of hastening to render the miserable man assistance, proceeded to deliver a lecture on the Law of Gravitation—[Laughter]—and to point out the impossibility of giving any relief until some great scheme for packing bales on vans had been settled by the authorities of the town. [Laughter.] This was not a laughing matter. The question would not be laughed out of the House, and hon. Gentlemen would hear of it at the next Election. To carry his illustration further, he would suppose that the next morning the spectators of the cruelty, perhaps in consequence of the sounds of popular discontent, carried on the farce by signing a Memorial to the Mayor expressing their sympathy with the groaning wretch, but advising the Mayor to leave the man where he was until his worship had been instructed on the Laws of Gravitation, and until he had framed some distinct municipal regulation upon the matter. They would all certainly describe such conduct as "humbug," and the sufferer might consider it unfeeling. He thought that that was a fair illustration of the conduct of the Gentlemen who presented the Memorial to the Prime Minister. The result of the Division on his Motion evidently had an effect on those Gentlemen, and no doubt they began to think that they were not quite on the right side. The 31 Liberal Members who signed the Memorial did so for the purpose of explaining their vote to the Prime Minister. That was very curious conduct on the part of Members of Parliament. What he had to say he said in that House, and did not explain his vote by signing a piece of paper upon which something had been written in a back room. The Memorial was forwarded to the Prime Minister by the not over-buoyant Member for Herefordshire (Mr. Duckham) with solemnity and due decorum. The Memorialists stated that they voted for the Amendment, which declared that a measure dealing with the whole question of local taxation and local government was most urgently needed, in the full confidence that the often-promised legislation for this object should be proceeded with with the least possible delay. The hon. Member received—perhaps he should say was flattered by—a letter acknowledging the Memorial, and saying that the present state of Business in the House of Commons rendered it impossible to deal with the subject. Would anyone think it possible that 31 Liberal Members should occupy the valuable time of the Prime Minister merely to elicit from him a civil letter stating that there was no time to attend to the Business, though two days before they rested their arguments for the vote against him (Mr. Pell) on the ground that there was time? Perhaps they had forgotten what the Prime Minister himself had said. On February 21, 1882—only a year before that little scene—the Prime Minister, on the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire, said that the Government had, in the most solemn and formal manner, pledged themselves to open the whole question of local taxation and administrative reform with a view to remove those grievances. That was on the 21st of February, 1882, and this was the 28th of March, 1884; and had any single step been taken in that direction? If the words of the Prime Minister had not been made good in the two years which had passed, was it reasonable to expect that they would be made good in the two years to come? The Prime Minister was the creature of circumstances; he meant, perhaps, to do good, but he could not do it after this fashion. He could not bring forward a measure of local government reform this year, nor possibly next year; but he could give relief. As late as April 8, 1883, the Prime Minister, in answer to a Question put by him, said—"Have we lost any opportunity for introducing or pushing forward such a Bill?" Well, this year they had lost an opportunity, for they had put other measures before it. Then the right hon. Gentleman said—

"What was the year, what was the Session, what was the period, when there had been time to procure the proper discussion of such a Bill in this House?"

When indeed! Experience showed that the right hon. Gentleman was not likely to bring it forward. How was it that ratepayers never received in that House the attention that taxpayers received? The ratepayer was very often a poor man. He worked and voted, sometimes he prayed; but his chief business in life was to pay. When he prayed, it was to be hoped it would not be for the Party that did him no good. His name never got into the newspapers except when he married or died. He might grumble sometimes with his wife over his grievances, but he did not talk politics in the tavern, nor often sign Petitions; he hardly ever interviewed the Premier, and so it came to pass that he was forgotten. He provided Boards, and Inspectors, and institutions, and education, and other things, which ought to be found by the interested parties. No Minister of Local Taxation kept watch on his exchequer. His pocket was left unbuttoned, to be picked by every philanthropist and humanitarian, whose benevolence consisted in emptying the ratepayers' purse to protect the good-for-nothing at the cost of the industrious. The ratepayer had toiled hard, he had made his small investment, and just at the time he expected to reap the fruits of his self-denial, he found himself obliged to take care of some of his neighbours to save the coffers of the Imperial Exchequer. That was a harsh and unjust burden to lay upon the ratepayer, the more unjust because no one took the trouble to think of him when a burden was laid exclusively upon his back which should be shared by others. It was this man's cause that he was pleading. The Liberal Government persisted in postponing his claims; and he now appealed to the Party to which he belonged, and to just men on the other side of the House, to forget their Party for once, and to support, by their vote to-night, his advocacy, however imperfect it might have been, of a righteous cause. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution which stood in his name.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON: Sir, I beg to second the Resolution. I am not sure whether it is quite correct to take for granted that there is a general consensus in the House that this great relief should be given, and that there is only a question as to the mode and amount; because we are placed in this peculiar position—that, while the present Government apparently agrees as to the general proposition, they take every opportunity of raising objections and indefinitely postponing it. I will, therefore, with the permission of the House, state the facts and figures, and then answer the objections that are made. But first I must ask the House to consider the exact position of the question and the reasons that have compelled my hon. Friend and myself to bring this forward as an urgent question; and I would ask the House to accord me its special indulgence to-night, for I do not often trespass on the time of the House; and on this question it is well known, I think, that I have some special knowledge and experience. And if I am compelled, in order to make the matter quite clear to the House, to go into some little detail, I shall not do so more than is absolutely necessary to set forth the necessity of equitable relief coupled with administrative economy. Now, I will not take the House back over the last 40 years of promises half fulfilled, of Reports of Committees and Commissions, of statements and admissions of prominent Members on both sides—beginning with Sir Robert Peel and ending with the present Prime Minister—all admitting this injustice, and expressing themselves anxious to give relief. I will only ask the House to go back two years, and especially two months. Two years ago the Royal Commission on Agriculture reported on this subject that all the cost of indoor poor, including lunatics, should be a charge on the general taxation of the country other than local rates. To show how moderate are our demands, I may say that my hon. Friend and I should be content with relief to half that amount. A Select Committee of the House of Lords had previously reported that the incidence of local taxation for the roads was an unjust charge on one description of property. In 1882 a deputation went to the Prime Minister on the subject and received a favourable answer, and the relief of local taxation was put in the Speech from the Throne. I think it was omitted the next year; but on the debate and Division the Government adopted an Amendment saying that “a measure dealing with the whole question was urgently required.” Three days after 31 Members who had voted with the Government, and saved them from defeat, sent a Memorial to the Prime Minister, saying they had only voted with them on the understanding that the question was really going to be dealt with at once. Of course, the Government Whips laughed at the protest of hon. Members. They had got their majority, though a narrow one, and protests did not count in practical politics; but I shall be surprised if all of those 31 Members can vote again for indefinite delay; and I know that the constituents of the hon. Member for Herefordshire (Mr. Duckham), who took the lead in that deputation, are regarding with the greatest interest the course he will take to-night, after what has happened. Then we come to this year. A shadowy hope was expressed in the Speech from the Throne that after certain large and drastic measures had been disposed of something might be done, if there were time, for local government in the counties and local burdens; and, in answer to a letter from the hon. Member for Herefordshire, the Prime Minister rather emphasized the proposal—the shadow I think more than the hope—by saying that when the Government had time they would endeavour to bring in a Bill for the reform of Local Government, “with which local taxation was connected." But we are not left without still more positive evidence of the shadowiness of this hope. The right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board had the matter brought home to him by a deputation of his constituents at his private residence the other day; and he told them that whenever the Government had time they would set about the reform of local government, and give them—what? Why, nothing in relief. They would withdraw the subventions and give them some local licences instead. Therefore, after waiting one, two, or three years, we are to get absolutely nothing; at least, if it is any trifle, it would apparently go to the towns, and not to the county rate-payers. That is the present position of the question, and that is why the rate-payers feel that they are being juggled with, and will be juggled with no longer. ["Hear, hear!"] Now to come to facts and figures. I do not wish to pile up statistics, or to overwhelm the case with figures. Rather, I would desire to limit the question as far as possible, and to place figures and facts before the House which shall carry conviction and conclusion to the minds even of those hon. Members who may not have had time to devote to a full consideration of the subject; and I can assure the House that I desire rather to under-state than to over-state the case. I would not, for any consideration, exaggerate or mislead the House in a matter of this kind. The gross expenditure on local taxation is over £50,000,000; but it is only to about a quarter of that we desire to call attention to-night—namely, to some £12,000,000 or £14,000,000 in England and Wales, expended under these items—Poor, Roads, Police, and Lunatics. These heads have been acknowledged by inspection and grant, as well as by Reports of Committees and Commissioners, to be of national rather than local importance; and, in addition to that, the charge under the Statutes has always been on the general income of the place, and not on one description of property only. In fact, the present incidence of this taxation is an obsolete accident and a fiscal mistake, arising out of the fact that real property was more easily taxable than personalty. Now, I wish most distinctly to premise that, in advocating this relief, we are asking, not only for equitable taxation, but also for administrative economy. We are not asking that the whole of this £12,000,000 or £13,000,000—and these figures are only for England and Wales; but, of course, we include Ireland and Scotland in relief—should be charged to the general income, as the Statute directs in 43 Elizabeth; but that relief should be given by way of administrative economy of a quarter, or, at the most, a third of this amount, and I hope the House will realize the moderation of our demands. And the House will observe that these figures do not include education and public health, about which a good deal more may be said. The figures of these charges are, in round numbers, these—Maintenance of poor, £8,000,000, including lunatics; main roads, about £1,000,000; police, about £2,000,000; Scotland and Ireland, about £3,000,000 more. The general income of the country is estimated at about £1,200,000,000. The assessment to Income Tax is about £500,000,000 for England only, and £600,000,000 including Ireland and Scotland; but the property on which this expenditure is charged is only about £200,000,000, or about one-third of what is assessable to Income Tax, and less than one-sixth of the general income. Now, let us see the practical effect of this incidence—first in towns, and then in rural places. The rates in towns are about 5s. in the pound; and it was well observed by the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler), last year, that the amount of taxation and increase in urban rates is considerably more than rural rates, though the exact incidence may be different. The reason why the question has not been so strongly taken up in urban places as yet is that there is this element of confusion and complication in towns—namely, that a large portion of the rate is paid for purely local purposes, or, in fact, for services rendered—such as paving, lighting, sewerage, &c.; and there is this further complication—that, in some boroughs, water and gas, as belonging to the Municipality, are charged as rates; in others, they are the charges of various Companies. Now, I have been to some trouble to endeavour broadly to divide the purely local rates from national rates in towns, and I believe national purposes are three-fourths or four-fifths—that is to say, where—as on the average I reckon them—they are 5s. in the pound, about 4s. in the pound are for national purposes. Now, taking an average tradesman assessed for house and shop at £200 a-year, he will be paying, at 5s. in the pound, £50 a-year, or £40 a-year for these national services. Then, putting his income at £400 a-year, which, I believe, is a fair estimate, he is paying 1s. Income Tax for these national services, which, compared with his wealthier neighbours, is quite out of proportion according to his ability. Then, take the unskilled workman, who, for one or two rooms, is often paying some 4s. to 5s. a-week. The rates are paid by the landlord, but charged in the rent, and cannot be put at less than 1s. per week. Assuming the average wage of this class is £1 a-week, and taking the same ratio of four-fifths of the rates for national services, this labourer is paying an Income Tax of 10d. in the pound for these objects, which, compared with his richer neighbours, is altogether out of proportion for his income. This question of the rent of working-class dwellings in large towns is becoming a serious one, and I am thankful to say the country is awakening to it; and the Government has appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into it. But it will be found that one of the chief difficulties of the question—I might almost say the crux of the question—is that extra 1s. a-week. Philanthropic Building Societies find that they cannot supply these houses for less than that amount, after payment of rates and all outgoings, on any sound economic system; and the consequence of this is that respectable working men are compelled to herd with all their family in one room, instead of, as they ought, obtaining a minimum of two rooms for this amount of rent. Have hon. Members ever seen and visited these places?—rooms not much larger than twice the size of the Table in front of you, Sir, in which, in the wealthiest City in the world, respectable working men are compelled to live with all their family. What wonder if they are driven out to the public-house by this condition of things? The question of the skilled labourer's dwelling, which he can afford to pay 6s. or 7s. a-week for, is comparatively easy of solution; but the question of the poorer dwellings is greatly hindered by this system of taxation.

Sir Baldwin Leighton

The most philanthropic and best-managed Companies cannot afford to let decent accommodation to the working classes as long as they are compelled to pay these rates, which entirely fall on the working classes. Now, to come to the rural ratepayer, who is chiefly the tenant farmer. I estimate the amount of this rate at 3s. in the pound, five-sixths of which is for national service, according to the classification with which I started. The way I obtain this 3s. in the pound is this—in his valuable work on Local Taxation, published some 15 years ago, by the right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), the average rural rate comes to 2s. 5d. in the pound. Since then, disturnpiked roads and education and sanitary rates have added about 6d. in the pound. In many places a voluntary school is supported by subscriptions, which must be reckoned. There have been subventions and remissions amounting to some 10 per cent, or, say, 3d. in the pound; but there has been, to balance that, a fall in the value of the land to, at least, the same amount—namely, 10 per cent, so that the average rate or charges may be set, I think, at 3s. in the pound. The right hon. Gentleman said, some short time ago, that if relief was due then, it must, unquestionably, be far more required now; and at that time he proposed to give up the House Tax, which now amounts to £1,800,000, so that I hope we may have his support to-night. Now, taking these rates at 3s. in the pound, the tenant farmer is paying a 6s. Income Tax, because he is assessed at twice his income. If you say the rate falls entirely on the landlord, he is paying a 3s. Income Tax; if you divide it between the two, and say the landowner is paying two-thirds, then they each pay a 2s. Income Tax. This is manifestly out of all proportion to their ability as compared with other interests, especially considering the great depression of all agricultural property. But let me go a step further, and show the exceeding anomalies which arise from this system of unjust taxation. Here are four parishes in one Union, A, B, C, D. A is an agricultural parish, assessed to the Income Tax at £30,000 a-year. B, C, D are mineral, manufacturing, populous places, assessed to the Income Tax at exactly the same amount—namely, £30,000 a-year each. But how are they assessed for purposes of local taxation? Why, parish A is assessed on the full £30,000; while B, C, and D are assessed at about one-third, and nearly all the pauperism, crime, and lunacy for which the rates are levied are produced by B, C, and D parishes. Surely it has been well said that the agricultural interest is like the pastoral tribe Issachar, the strong ass crouching between two burdens—the burden of local and Imperial taxation. Then here is another anomaly. A large farmer is rated, we will say, at £600 a-year. His income is £300. His neighbour, living in a villa with ten times his income, perhaps, is assessed on his villa at £50 a-year. Now, for every penny in the pound of rates the farmer will pay 1s., while the villa resident, with ten times his income, will pay 1d., or one-twelfth. Surely, Sir, these are anomalies that ought to be corrected, and corrected at once. But, now, there is another class besides purely urban or rural ratepayers that is most unfairly taxed under this system. I allude to the country clergy. They are not directly represented in this House; but I hope it is not going to be felt generally what has been lately said in private, that Her Majesty's Government will concede anything and everything to threats and big battalions, but will grant nothing to truth and justice unless backed by such big battalions. Here is a statement of a clergyman in one of the Home Counties, which will require no comment from me—

"My tithe average is £325, nearly the whole of my income. I am assessed at £303 a-year. The rates were, and I beg you to note the amount, for poor, highway, and School Board, £80 16s., or over 5s. in the pound. The reverse picture is this—1. A parishioner driving two carriages, four horses, and two carts, and enjoying an income of £4,000 a-year, pays £25 yearly. 2. A Government clerk with £600 a-year pays £11 3s. 3. A tradesman turning over £7,000 a-year and driving pony carriage, two carts, and two horses, pays £6 10s., and so on. As for the farmers, the land cannot bear the burdens. One man failed, another threw up his farm, and another cut his-throat."

Now, Sir, if some of the anomalies I have instanced require immediate correction, surely this out-Herods all. A struggling clergyman on £300 a-year is compelled to pay £80 a-year for taxation for national services. You would not find such a system in any civilized country; to find a parallel you must go to Turkey, or Egypt, or Asia Minor, where taxation has paralyzed and destroyed all industry. Surely this is not only a perversion, but an inversion of the 43 Elizabeth, where men are taxed not according to ability, but according to inability. There is another element in this incidence—that is, the great tendency to increase, which I have already referred to generally; but here are some Returns taken at haphazard from four large agricultural parishes in my own county, and one farm in another county. They are ordinary agricultural parishes, and could not in any way be described as ever having been close parishes. The Return is from 1866 to 1880:—

Parish A. ....	335 ....	651
Parish B. ....	265 ....	558
Parish C. ....	710 ....	941
Parish D. ....	950 ....	1,022
Farm E. ....	20 ....	65

Many farmers in these depressed times have paid the whole of their profits in local rates. But, now, there is a collateral consideration that ought to weigh with hon. Members opposite. They profess, and I am sure sincerely, to wish to see the purchase and ownership of land and houses made more easy and general. Then I trust they will help us to-night in trying to get each purchaser less unfairly taxed. A labouring man or artisan saves £200, which he invests at 3 per cent. He wants to buy a house and garden, which, we will assume, is worth the same amount per annum—namely, £6 a-year; but the State, in the form of the rate collector, at once comes down on him and says—"You must pay me £1 out of that £6." Or, take a retired tradesman who buys a villa and a plot of land worth £60 a-year. Why is he at once to be taxed to the amount of £10 as soon as his money is invested in this commodity which he did not pay before? That is the way in which purchase and ownership are encouraged in this country by this system. Or, again, a man wants to improve his land—say to drain a morass—and spends £10 an acre on land worth little or nothing before. The spectre of the rate collector at once appears and says—"True, you have improved that land and made it worth 8s. or 10s. an acre; but you must give me one-sixth of that improvement for national purposes." The other day, whilst this subject was being discussed at the Central Chamber of Agriculture, an American farmer who was present asked to be allowed to address the meeting, and expressed his immense astonishment at the taxation which the British farmer was subject to. An acre of wheat-producing land in England paying some 7s. an acre in tithes, taxes, and rates, which the same acre in America was only paying about as many pence, because the taxation there was levied fairly on all property, and not on one description; but he added significantly—"You have the remedy in your own power;" and I believe, Sir, we have. Then, with regard to Scotland and Ireland, I am sure the House will not think I am unduly passing over any important item if I only glance at them. Three years ago a deputation of Scotch Members went up to the Lord Advocate, who advised them not to stir in the matter, as they were not heavily taxed. The deputation was important enough for the Lord Advocate to have his answer printed, and he kindly sent me a copy. I think, perhaps, it was not perceived by the Scotch Members that a low rate in the pound on a high assessment does not necessarily mean low taxation. But what the Scotch say is that they would be satisfied if the large mercantile and commercial incomes that at present pay nothing were to contribute fairly. That is exactly what we say in England—it is because of the impracticability of applying such a principle locally that we urge the Government to make the assessment, and to contribute to the localities which they inspect and order. Then, as regards Ireland, there are one or two points of special importance there as to the incidence of present rates. The police are paid by the State; but the county cess—about 1s. 6d. in the pound—falls entirely on the tenant, and the poor rate is divided. It is about the same as the county cess, or rather higher—some 1s. 6d. or 2s. in the pound. But in some of the Western Unions, and the poorest, the rates have lately been quite abnormally high—in some parts the amount is so ruinous that the Government has had to interfere and provide an Imperial rate in aid of 3s. or 4s. in the pound, and this has been going on for two or three years in the very poorest districts. No wonder the tenant is distressed when they are asked to contribute a further portion of their income for rates, and no wonder they refuse to become purchasers of their holdings under such circumstances, when the whole rate would fall on them. It amounted to positive confiscation, and the fear or possibility of such confiscating taxation falling on them is quite sufficient to prevent any effect taking place by way of purchase and sale. If a man is liable to have to pay 10s. in the pound—and that is the actual rate in some places—how can anything induce him to become a purchaser? And yet hon. Members opposite, who profess to be so anxious to promote purchase and ownership, are going to vote against this moderate proposal to assist it to-night. I do not know whether the House is aware that in the Eastern Counties there are at present thousands of acres lying uncultivated, which anyone may have rent free if they will only pay the tithes, rates, and taxes on them. Such a state of things has, I believe, never been seen before in this country. Now, let us consider what are the objections to giving relief; they come, I think, under three heads—1, Hereditary burdens; 2, That any change in the incidence will be a transfer of taxation from property to labour; 3, Postponement to Local Government Reform and objection to subventions. I do not know to-night whether we are going to hear anything about hereditary burdens or not. Well, the first time I had the opportunity of speaking on this subject in this House, I said, as I say again to-night, that all these so-called hereditary burdens that we ask to be removed have been laid on real property in my lifetime, and most of them within my recollection, and I am not an old Member of this House. This can be demonstrated. Police and lunatics were made a charge between 1840 and 1845, during the time of the Corp Law. Public health, education, and turnpike roads were imposed during the last 10 or 15 years; the maintenance of the poor was a charge on the general income of the parish up to 1840, and so were the roads. Personalty was then exempted by annual suspension, but never by repeal; and meanwhile personalty and unrated property, together with population, have doubled, trebled, and quadrupled. But, in addition to that, by the Union Assessment Act of 1865, these charges which were on the general income of each parish "according to ability" for the poor of that parish, is now a charge for the poor of a whole Union, including unrated industries, charged solely on one description of property. But, it may be said, real property may be too heavily burdened; but it has escaped from some taxation which it was formerly subject to. Now, I do not know if any Member of this House is prepared to risk his financial reputation by adopting the views of The Liverpool Financial Almanack, and I am not sure if I could trespass on the time of the House by anticipating or combating arguments that may never be advanced and are untenable. But I say that not only has real property not escaped from any due taxation, but it is personalty that has slipped out of this taxation, and I will just put these points shortly. First, the so-called Land Tax—4 William and Mary, c. 1, 1692—was a general Income Tax charged not only on income, but on chattels—that is, capital not producing income. Mr. Brodrick, in his able work, published by the Cobden Club, says, at p. 468—"The Act of 1692 was, in fact, an Income Tax, with three modifications;" and he goes on to explain them. He further says—"Personalty was taxed equally with land." Well, why is not personalty taxed equally with the Land Tax now? Then it is said that the rate was 4s. in the pound. The assessment was taken absurdly low, so that the rate was made absurdly high; but since then later equivalents to about 3s. in the pound have been piled upon real property as I have described, so that it is at present paying something like 4s. in the pound with Income Tax and Land Tax for national service, contrary to the intention of these Statutes. Therefore, to carry out the Act of 1692, you should impose an Income Tax of 3s. 6d. on all personal income, and that is a suggestion I make a present of to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the forthcoming Budget. Then it is said that there were certain Military Services charged on land; a sort of Militia was provided, but they were paid for their service; and anything that could be a charge would be more than represented in the £2,000,000 of Land Tax still charged. But I again turn to the Cobden Club for information. It says—

"Clearly the nation cannot even pretend to claim anything, but a contribution bearing the same proportion to the present national income as the revenue from the Court of Wards bore to the national income, say, in 1643."

And, again—

"The Land Tax was probably an effective substitute in the 17th century for the profits of the feudal tenures."

And then this writer of the Cobden Club adds—

"The statements of the almanack"—that is, The Liverpool Financial Almanack—"are utterly misleading."

But if we are to go into archaic taxation and finance, we must look further. We must ask about the origin of alienated tithes, and inquire why land that paid tithe partly for the poor is now asked to contribute doubly by way of poor rate? Also, we must inquire why the expense of public prosecutions is charged on private individuals, as landowners, who are sheriffs, seeing that the office was formerly one of profit? We must ask why Schedule A on land is charged on the gross—on profits, namely, that are never received—while all the other Schedules are charged upon the net, making the difference, as Sir Robert Peel stated, of nearly 50 per cent as against real property. So that, in addition to the injustice of rates which were distinctly charged on general income and on personalty, we have these four cases—Land Tax, tithes, public prosecutions, and Schedule A of Income Tax, in which personalty is unduly exempted at the expense of real property. Well, then, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has stated, I think in this House, but certainly to his constituents at Birmingham, that "any relief to local taxation would be a transference of taxation from property to labour." Sir, I entirely deny and traverse that statement. Why, surely, in the first place, it will depend on how the transfer is effected. Suppose a sum of £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 were so relieved, and it were raised by an Income Tax, would that be a transference to labour? Or, supposing you went a step further, and transferred it to a graduated Income Tax, as proposed by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), would that be a tax upon labour? Or if it were transferred to a Stamp Duty on transfer of property, which has been always held by political economists to be essentially a tax on property, would that be a tax on labour? Sir, this proposition will not hold water for one moment. It is one of those bald, superficial statements utterly untenable. But I go a great deal further than that. I say the tax at present is on labour. Is the tradesman and farmer, working hard with head and hands 10 hours a-day, not being taxed on his labour? Is the hard-worked clergyman, paying a quarter of his wretched stipend in this taxation, not being taxed on his labour? Are the working classes in our towns, who have to pay 20 per cent more for their house rent by these rates, not being taxed on their labour? Is the Irish cottier of the West of Ireland, paying a quarter of his wretched income in this taxation, not being taxed on his labour? The right hon. Gentleman even went so far as to say that to give any relief to the overburdened ratepayer would be to quarter the landlord on the State. It is the commercial interest that has already quartered itself on the labour of the country, and now endeavours to conceal the fact by raising a false issue. It is personality and monied wealth that has been exempted, not land and houses. To make such a statement, the right hon. Gentleman must either have failed to comprehend the bearings of a very simple fiscal question, or else he has, for Party purposes, made a statement wholly unworthy of his reputation. But I do not ask the House to take my statement of these facts. Here is the case put in a nutshell, in better words than I can put them, by the hon. Member for Carnarvonshire (Mr. Rathbone), formerly Member for Liverpool, who has a right to be heard on this question. It is well known that the hon. Member has given special attention to this subject, and also has great practical experience of this question in Liverpool. The hon. Member also occupies a high place in the commercial world, and this is what he says—

"The principal wealth of our large towns consisted of commercial, manufacturing, and trading interests; but, except incidentally, none of these interests contributed to the poor rate, and the more their wealth had increased the more they had escaped from anything like a legitimate amount of contribution to the support of the poor. They did not pay on their capital, because that capital, consisting mostly of personality, was not subject to local taxation."

Now, I pray the House specially to attend to this last part—

"Merchants, who had made the calculation, informed him that the proportion of their income derived from trade on which they paid poor rate amounted to only from  $\frac{1}{2}$  to 2 per cent, while the proportion of their income on which labourers in the employment of those merchants paid poor rate was  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. From this it appears that the proportion in which persons paid in large towns was in almost inverse ratio to their wealth. Upon the class of small tradesmen the poor rate operated most oppressively, and with especial severity upon those who were in the humblest circumstances. It might be said that it was foolish for the mercantile community to be active in promoting a change of system; but the mercantile community were not foolish or short-sighted enough to believe that a system could be good which transferred a considerable portion of the burden of taxation from their shoulders to those of the very poor."

Those are not my words, but the words of a Gentleman with a high position in the commercial world. Let the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade upset those arguments and statements if he can. Since these arguments of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chamberlain) have been put forward, I have been at some pains to inquire what was the exact incidence of this taxation on the different classes, and I must say that the results have been rather startling. The law of the 43 Elizabeth, under which we are levying this taxation, expressly states that it is to be paid according to ability. The conditions under which we are actually living appears to be an exact inversion of that principle; and we are paying according to our inability, thus:—The highest-rated class is the poverty-stricken cottier of the West of Ireland, who is paying, in many places, 25 per cent of his income. The next highest-rated in proportion is the unskilled workman in large towns, who has to pay 25 per cent more for house rent. After that the large middle classes who are excused Income Tax, or who pay under remission, and who are taxed at the rate of 1s. 6d. to 2s. in the pound on income—namely, the small tradesman and the struggling farmer. The capitalist in land pays 2s. in the pound on the statistical assumption that he pays two-thirds of agricultural rates; and the monied, or manufacturing capitalist, pays a fraction of a penny, or, in some cases, the fraction of a farthing. So now we come to the last argument—namely, postponement till after something has been done with Local Government.

We are to wait for one, two, or three years, when the subventions are to be taken away, and some local licence given in their place, which will probably be of no effect whatever in making a reduction. But there is to be reform of Local Government that is to do wonders. How? How, in the first place, is it in any way to affect the rates in towns which are the principal sum? How is it to affect the poor rate and road rate which are now administered by elected bodies? The amount of county rate is quite insignificant, even if you reduced it by half, and you will probably increase it by any change. Oh, but you will divide the rate between landlord and tenant. Well, that is no relief whatever; and how will that touch the clergyman who is his own landlord, or the compound householder in towns? How are you to do that with leaseholds in town, especially beneficiary leaseholds, where a capital sum is paid down? Then, if you divide the rate, you must divide the representation, and begin by pulling to pieces the constitution of all your local bodies. But we propose to extend the incidence of certain charges, such as indoor poor, to county areas. Then, how about boroughs? Half the Unions include a borough, which is not assessed to the county rate. You must have a new assessment area, and a new valuation. I do not greatly envy the post of a Minister who is going to re-adjust county and Union boundaries—he will find himself in a veritable Tower of Babel—but the Minister who is going to pull down and attempt to reconstitute all our local authorities, some 2,000 or 3,000 on these sort of lines, should be the Member for Bedlam. [“Hear, hear!”] These proposals are either made in theoretical ignorance, or they are mere pretexts for postponement. But it is said that subventions are extravagant and wasteful. According to the official figures, that is most positively not the case. The figures prove rather the contrary, and the facts still more so, as I will show; but, I say at once, I am in favour of strict administrative economy, and though equitable relief is required, I will support no proposal that, in my opinion, is not in the direction of economic administration. Will anyone say that the subventions for education are wasteful? No. Will anyone say that the people could have been educated without them? No. Then, as to police and lunatics, the subventions given by the late Government, which have been so greatly cavilled at, I will not say what has been often urged, that it is only because they were given by the late Government, that that charge is made; but I say it is unfounded. As regards the police, the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board quoted figures last year in this House, which proved exactly the contrary to what he stated—namely, that since the subventions the proportion of increase had been greater than before. I have been told that since then he has acknowledged his mistake; but all through the debate he clung to this fallacy, so that we must take any of his statements with reserve and cum grano. Then, as regards the lunatics, a great mistake is made in supposing that the grant of 4s. per head per week can be a pecuniary inducement to Boards of Guardians to send paupers to an asylum. It costs them more, with the 4s. grant, to maintain them in the asylum than the workhouse—almost double. The reason of the increase is, I believe, the effects of intemperance, promoted by the high prices of 10 years ago, and, possibly, from the facilities introduced by the present Prime Minister in the grocers’ licences. But let us see what the right hon. Baronet himself says, in answer to his own assertion of last year. Last year he says—

“The figures bearing on lunatics were also before him, and he should almost go so far as to state that many lunatics had been invented since the establishment of the subvention.”

Now, let us appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober, and see what the right hon. Baronet says in his official Report, published a few months ago—

“It has been suggested that the increase of late years in the number of pauper lunatics in asylums and licensed houses is due, to a considerable extent, to the effect of the Government subvention of 4s. a-week for paupers in these establishments, and that the subvention has induced Boards of Guardians, in many cases, to send to asylums paupers who might be sufficiently cared for at a less expense in the workhouse. It will, however, be observed, from the above table, that the increase in question has been accompanied by a considerable increase in the number of pauper lunatics in workhouses. . . . In January, 1874, the number of insane paupers chargeable to the poor rate in asylums and licensed houses was 31,024, and the number in workhouses 16,018. In January, 1882, these numbers had respectively increased to 42,230 and 16,976. The increase in the number of insane paupers was 13 per cent. . . . In 76 of the Unions in England and Wales the number of these lunatics was the same in the two years, while in 314 there was an increase, and in 259 only a decrease."

I have nothing to add to that, except that it is signed by the right hon. Baronet himself; and I think it will be more satisfactory that he should contradict himself in his own words than that I should do so. But, Sir, I go a great deal further than that. I say that the power to order the expenditure without the responsibility of having to pay for it is a cause of extravagance and waste, and gross injustice to the rate-payers, and I could 'give half-a-dozen instances that have happened in my own immediate neighbourhood. Some few years ago the Government Inspector came down and ordered the magistrates of my county to increase the number of police; it was in vain they asked on what principle, and pointed to the absence of crime, and especially of undetected crime. A contention took place, and the Government grant was refused. A compromise of some sort was at length come to, and some third or half of the number asked were added to the force. Again, in two or three parishes the Government Inspector came down a few years ago and ordered new schools to be built a mile or so off the old schools, which would have necessitated a great expense—a School Board probably, and the destruction or waste of the existing schools, which were thoroughly efficient and under Government inspection. In one case the provisional notice was actually put on the church door. After considerable correspondence the Inspector of the Education Board was induced to see the unreasonableness of his demand, and it was given up in each case. Again, the Lunacy Commissioners ordered the Asylum Authorities to purchase more land than they required, and refused to pass the plan for some additional buildings until they did so. They appealed to the present Home Secretary, who, I am glad to say, supported the county magistrates, and it was not insisted on. I could give the House some other cases; but I want to know, would the Government have attempted to force this unnecessary expenditure on the local bodies if they had had to pay for it? I am certain they would not. But now, if in one district all these attempts at extravagance were going on, there must be hundreds and thousands of such cases over all England, and in too many they have succeeded. So much for subventions being extravagant. It is on the ground of economy that I ask for them. But the money should be given, I think, on a three years' average, so that every penny the local authority can save goes to them, and is not shared. I am opposed to any extravagance and waste whatever. There may be difference of opinion as to the best mode of providing and dispensing this relief, into which, therefore, I will not go now—sufficient for to-night is the burden of local taxation. If we are to discuss Ways and Means, we shall have to go into the questions of expenditure and policy, which will become controversial and lead us far away from our subject. We shall have to ask what has become of the money raised by the increased Probate Duties and the increased Beer Duty? We shall have to ask why the Terminable Annuities were applied to the reduction of Debt last year, and why the present Government are spending some £2,000,000 more in Ireland and Egypt than the late Government? We shall have to ask why the Chancellor of the Exchequer is proposing to give away some £500,000 to India that is not yet due, and it is rumoured to abolish the £500,000 Carriage Tax, which might be applied to paying for the main roads? But it is not difficult to indicate where this money should come from. Carry out the principle of the 43 Elisabeth. Let property and income fairly contribute without favour and exemption. Tax income, tax wealth; you would have the support of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) if you taxed drink, the fruitful parent of crime, pauperism, and lunacy. Tax luxury, speculation, or waste; but do not throw the whole weight of this unequal taxation on depressed interests of trade and agriculture, contrary to statute and contrary to equity. Do not overtax poverty and misery. Sir, we shall probably be told again to-night, for the hundredth time, that the Radical Party desire to look at this question as a whole. Sir, they have been looking at us as a whole for 40 years. We would rather be looked at as a part. Men have been born, have lived, farmed, traded, died, and ruined, while the Party opposite have been looking at the question as a whole—we mean to have this relief now without further delay, adequately and equitably. We mean to take the sense of the House to-night, and if the Government should refuse it we will take the sense of the country at the coming General Election.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, while ready to entertain any necessary reforms in local administration, deprecates the postponement of further measures of relief acknowledged to be due to ratepayers in counties and boroughs in respect of local charges imposed on them for National services,"—(Mr. Peil,) —instead thereof.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that, before entering on the subject of the debate, he wished to make an explanation to his hon. Friend the Mover of the Resolution, who had accused his Department of want of diligence, want of care, and want of respect to the House of Commons. That formidable charge only related to one particular Return. He had better at once frankly state that the Return in question was overlooked. The Return was ordered, but, owing to a misunderstanding in the Statistical Department, it was not printed. The oversight was owing to the illness of the head of the Statistical Department. He thought, however, that he and the Statistical Department had cause to complain of his hon. Friend for not having informed them earlier that the Return had not been produced. He would say, at the same time, in justice to a hard-worked Department, that there was, with the exception of this Return and one other which had been moved for during the present month, no other Return which had been asked for and had not been rendered. With respect to the subject before the House, he would say that the increase of the rates which had been referred to in the debate had affected the towns much more than the country. He had attempted to show that in the course of the debate last year, and the same fact had been proved most conclusively by his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler). As a matter of fact, in many of the rural districts the rates had rather decreased than increased. He would not venture to make such a statement on his own authority; but he relied on the statement of his Department, which had ample means of informing him of the truth on the subject. There had, however, been a terrible increase in some urban districts. But there was a question which called for more attention than the increase of rates, and that was the increase of local loans. On that subject his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton had spoken strongly, as he had himself. The hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Baldwin Leighton) had complained that no one kept a watch over the ratepayers' pockets. But that statement involved some injustice to the Department over which he presided, which was a very hard-worked Department, and did little else than watch the demands made on the ratepayers' pockets. The Department, however, had more control over local expenditure in some quarters than it had in others. There had been an enormous increase in the rates and loans in some municipal boroughs, and over those the Local Government Board had little control compared with that which it exercised in rural districts. Where the Board exercised the largest control there was least increase in loans and rates. It was not true, as had been stated, that the Government had refused to grant any relief in respect of local taxation. On the contrary, relief had been most distinctly promised in the course of last year's debate. He had himself said that persons ought to contribute to local objects according to their ability and means. He had also said that relief ought to be granted to local authorities, and that it should be accompanied by a corresponding devolution of powers and duties. The Mover of the Resolution repudiated any intention of treating this as a Party question; but he made one of the best Party speeches ever delivered in that House. While sharing, as hon. Members generally would, the honest sympathy of the hon. Member for the poorest ratepayers, he must express strong disagreement from some of his views. The attack of the hon. Member was really directed against the principles of centralization; and it was well known how heartily he concurred with the hon. Member on this part of the subject, for he had repeatedly spoken against centralization. But his experience led him to entertain the greatest doubts as to the expediency of subventions; his impression was that they led directly to the centralization which the hon. Member deprecated. The hon. Member spoke of subventions in a wider sense than the term was usually understood to involve, for he referred to education grants. The Education Department had enormous powers compared with those of the Local Government Board; but those powers were given to the Education Department because of the very large contribution which the State gave to the cost of education, and those powers must be held and exercised for the protection of the public purse. One error which seemed to run through the speeches of those who advocated subventions seemed to be that they were a saving of money rather than a charge upon the taxes; they seemed to think that you got rid of expenditure whenever you put it upon the taxpayer. ["No, no!"] The Amendment almost amounted to this—"Never mind local government; but take care of local taxation." That was not the view of the Government. They felt the urgency of this subject; but they could not agree to divorce the subject of local taxation from the reform of local government. As, by the Forms of the House, there could be no Amendment to the Resolution, which was itself an Amendment to the Motion to go into Committee of Supply, the Government had no alternative but to vote for Supply, which was in this case equivalent to the Previous Question. It was said that the Government could give immediate relief to the local taxpayer. If it was meant by that that it was the duty of the Government to increase immediately the system of subventions, which they believed to be wasteful and to lead to centralization, without passing any general measure for the reform of local administration, that was not the view of the Government. It was not necessary to attempt to slay the slain, for there was no one who was prepared to stand up for the existing system of local government in England; it was assumed by the Mover and Seconder that it was to be dealt with sooner or later; but they said—"Temporarily, and until you have established a better system, give us more money." The hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), in his non-Party speech, used strong language; he spoke of pretence, subterfuge, delay, excuse, desire to postpone, and hypocrisy; and this was a strong collection of epithets to be drawn from a single speech. In reply, he had to say that the Government had a large measure actually in existence; it was ready for introduction; if they were allowed to make that progress with their Business which they had a right to expect to do, then the measure would be introduced in that House; and if the progress of Business were facilitated, it would be passed by this House. [Mr. PELL: This Session?] It was ready for introduction now. The Government would not have given enormous labour to the details of the measure if they had not supposed that they would be able to introduce it into that House, and if they had not had some expectation of being able to pass it. He laid it down as an undoubted proposition that if Public Business were allowed to proceed at the rate at which it used to do in the years from 1869 to 1872, the Bill could be passed by the House this Session, in addition to all the large measures that were before the House and the country. Not only had ordinary care been taken to produce a measure worthy of submission to the House, but in such modifications as the measure would exhibit this year he had been greatly assisted by his Predecessor, by the Government draftsman, to whom the preparation of such a Bill was well known to be a labour of love, by the labours of the hon. Member for Carnarvonshire (Mr. Rathbone) and the hon. Member for Bedfordshire (Mr. James Howard), as well as by the information collected by the right hon. Members for Ripon, Halifax, and North Hampshire, and others who had given time and thought to the subject. The principle on which the Government had proceeded in constructing the measure had been that in their opinion it was essential the measure should cover the whole ground of local administration. If they chose to introduce a Bill which should cover only a portion of the ground, it might be easy, even with the other Business before the House, to pass it; it might be easy to pass a Bill dealing only with county administration; but it would not be sufficient to deal with that only. You could not change the existing financial or rating system, get rid of the operation of subventions, and intrust local authorities with the use of a portion of the taxes if you did not reform the constitution of those authorities from the top to the bottom. When the subject came to be looked into by Parliament, he doubted whether it would be thought that the policy of the Government, in preferring a complete measure, would be a cause of delay in the long run. A mere measure of county government would be obviously of very little use. He doubted whether it would be possible to carry through both Houses a measure which merely transferred the administrative powers of Justices to elected County Boards. The limited scope of such a measure would rather limit the chance of its being passed into law. A Bill dealing only with county government was liable to the charge made in advance that it would really do very little, while it would unsettle everything. The plan of the Government, while it would unsettle everything, would also settle everything, and therefore, while drastic, would introduce something like a lasting system. The Government had thought it necessary, in dealing with this subject, in their Bill, to propose to create not only elective County Councils but elective District Councils, distinguishing urban from rural districts, and to these powers would be transferred from the Justices and the Local Government Board. If the hon. Member was really anxious, as he said, to get rid of centralization, he would advise him to do all he could to facilitate the transaction of Business in that House in order that the Government might have an opportunity of bringing their Bill forward. With reference to the financial part of the question, he might state that the Government proposed to substitute certain taxes for a portion of the Parliamentary subvention. The hon. Baronet (Sir Baldwyn Leighton) had spoken of those taxes as being probably very small, and as not supplying the place of the subventions which were to be taken away. But if the Government acted in that manner, they would break the promises which they had several times made to the House, that the measure should be one of relief to the local ratepayer; it would be a measure of relief, and not of increase, to the local rates. The hon. Member who introduced the Motion spoke as though he agreed with the plan which was laid before the House last year by the noble Lord the Member for Carmarthenshire (Viscount Emllyn) with reference to the relief to be given towards the maintenance of the indoor poor. That principle had been accepted by the Government, and it was his opinion that in any measure upon this subject it ought to be provided that relief should be given, probably to the extent of 4d. per day, for every indoor pauper over the age of 16, out of the county fund, towards the maintenance of the indoor poor. Last year the Government admitted the principle of the division of the rate between the owner and the occupier, and effect would be given to it in the Bill. He quite agreed with the hon. Member in principle that a portion of the rates of which he spoke were for national charges; but he disputed some of the instances which were given. The hon. Gentleman told the House, in the course of his remarks that he would explain exactly what he meant to any hon. Member who liked to call upon him tomorrow morning. He should be glad to call on the hon. Gentleman and ascertain which were local and which were national charges. The hon. Baronet the Member for South Shropshire apparently assumed as national anything he pleased to state as such. For his part, he could not admit that the poor rate was a national charge. He must thank the hon. Member for South Leicestershire, on behalf of the House and on behalf of the Government, who had had to administer the Poor Law, for the great and persistent efforts which he had made to administer the Poor Law upon proper principles. The hon. Member was one of the best, if not the best, Poor Law administrator in the country, and it was impossible to speak upon this subject without trying to do justice to him. Local efforts might decrease the poor rate, but local extravagance would increase it. These were matters which ought to be dealt with locally. The hon. Member spoke of education as a national charge, and he was astonished to hear the kind of sneer which accompanied his remarks upon that subject. Some of the charges were of a national character, therefore he thought that personal property should, in some degree, contribute towards those charges. That was a principle to which the Government stood committed, and to which they would give effect when they were allowed to proceed with their measure. Of course, there would be a simplification of the areas; and, therefore, it was proposed to give power to the County Councils to alter boundaries, except those of municipal boroughs, and there was a general provision for the simplification of areas by adjustment and consolidation. He admitted that any Bill upon this subject must be a long one; it could not possibly be short and simple. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) wanted it to be introduced at once and sent to a Select Committee. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) feared that such a Bill could only, after a long debate on the second reading, be sent to a Select Committee with the general consent of the House, and he thought hon. Gentlemen opposite would not give their consent. What would be its fate as to discussion when it came back from the Select Committee? He feared that its life before the Select Committee would hardly tend to shorten its life before the House. The hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) talked as if the Government were less desirous than he was to press forward the Bill. Taking only the meanest motive—did the hon. Member doubt their anxiety, for the sake of their Party, the Government, and themselves, to pass the Bill?

MR. PELL: I referred to the inability of the Government to pass it.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he was very glad to accept the hon. Member's assurance, even at that late moment, although "cant, hypocrisy, subterfuge" did not seem to relate to inability. But, turning from the lowest to the highest motives, did the hon. Member doubt their anxiety to remove from the country the disgrace of the present administrative chaos of English local government? Hon. Members should allow the Government to make progress if they wanted the Bill. The hon. Member had said that the Government had offered the counties a stone when they asked for bread, in the shape of a vote. In his opinion, the agricultural labourer would not regard a vote as being as useless to him as a stone, and he quite agreed with the hon. Member that the rural ratepayers would use the vote as a means of pressing this matter forward. He hoped they would. It was the best use they could make of it. The hon. Member, in taking that view, was showing in advance his belief in the capacity of those who were to be enfranchised, and there could not be higher praise given to the rural ratepayer, or to the measures which the Government were submitting. The Government were not afraid of the rural ratepayer, and they showed that by offering him a vote. The opinions of the Government were very similar to the Amendment of the noble Viscount (Viscount Lynton); but that Amendment was not placed on the Paper by the wish or desire of the Government. The Forms of the House would prevent the Amendment being moved; therefore, they should vote for their own Motion of Supply.

MR. SOLATER - BOOTH said, he must congratulate his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire on having, at all events, succeeded in eliciting from the President of the Local Government Board some indication of the measure which was in store for future Parliaments, and which the right hon. Gentleman had justly described as a large and comprehensive one. It was to be a measure dealing with the whole subject from top to bottom, and interfering with and disestablishing every existing local authority in the Kingdom. That might be a good policy or a bad one; but he put it to the House whether a measure of that kind was to be passed in one or even in two Sessions of Parliament. To meet the urgent demand for relief by a dilatory Bill of that nature was to defer the whole question to the Greek Kalends. The future measure was no doubt part and parcel of the great change in the institutions of the country which the Chancellor of the Exchequer described as second only to the Revolution of 1688—a revolution which began with the dethronement of a Sovereign, and ended by bringing in a new dynasty. The right hon. Gentleman had laid down the proposition that subventions led to centralization. Now, his contention was that the Poor Law Board had been established on a basis of centralization in the interests of the people at large. What schools, again, or lunatic asylums, would have been built were it not for the peremptory requirements of the Statute that the local authorities should be saddled with the expense? And the heavier those expenses had grown the stronger grew the sentiment of injustice that these charges should fall on one class of property alone. Centralization was the essence of Poor Law and similar administration. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the Government declined to divorce the subject of local taxation from the question of local government. That was the point on which they joined issue with the Government. The present ratepayer was the person who suffered from these burdens of taxation; but if reliance were placed upon the promises held out by the Government, existing ratepayers would obtain no relief whatever. It was 13 years since a Resolution similar to the one now before the House was first passed; yet during the whole of that time no chance had been found of dealing with this great and complicated question of local self-government. He denied that the system of local government as it was now working in this country deserved the imputations that had been cast upon it by the right hon. Gentleman. He did not defend the anomalies of the existing systems of local government, for he knew too well what those anomalies were; but he did press for an immediate relief from some of the burdens which now fell so heavily upon the rural taxpayer, and he believed that the system of subvention, however objectionable it might be in some points, was the only means by which that relief could be immediately given to the bitter cry of the oppressed ratepayer. That mode was found easy enough two years ago, when the Head of the Government, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, to prevent a hostile Division with which he was threatened, said that he would put down £250,000 in the Estimates in relief of local burdens. A great deal might be done to mitigate the hardship and sense of injustice which now prevailed, without any of the dangerous consequences which the right hon. Gentleman opposite found it convenient to allege. They had an illustration of that in the working of that most successful Act which had been passed by the right hon. Member for Ripon, under which the Metropolitan Common Fund had been established. Something ought to be done in aid of the cost of the indoor poor and of lunatics, now a tremendous charge on the ratepayers. He had been driven to the conclusion, by a process of exhaustion, that relief in respect of that charge was at once the most reasonable, philosophic, and statesmanlike mode by which further assistance could be given to ratepayers. He had, however, never pressed for a larger subvention in aid of the police rate unless those steps were taken which would have the approval of many of his friends, but upon which he would express no opinion, of placing all the police of England under one central authority, as was the case in Ireland. While objecting to wait until a complete scheme of local government reform was passed, his hon. Friend (Mr. Pell) and others who acted with him did not ask for complete justice or that an accurate balance should be struck. They merely asked that the Government, by pursuing a course which had been approved of by Parliament during the last 15 years, should show their sympathy and their willingness to entertain the objections which had been expressed, and in that way, rather than by a renewal of the promises which had been so frequently falsified, hold out to the present ratepayers some prospect of certain and immediate relief in their burdens, and to the ratepayers of the future the satisfaction of knowing that their case would demand the attention of Parliament when this great and complex question came to be dealt with.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said, the mere fact that local taxation had increased by 230 per cent in 40 years, as against 40 per cent for Imperial taxation during the same period, was of itself sufficient to show the hardship of the case which they now submitted. He thought it had been shown that this was a subject which should receive the immediate attention of the Government, and he believed that if hon. Members on both sides expressed their private opinions they would be in favour of the Motion. He observed that hon. Members on the Ministerial side who had spoken strongly at Chambers of Agriculture and other meetings in the country upon subjects of that kind had hitherto maintained complete silence that evening; but he trusted that before the discussion closed the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) and the hon. Member for South Northumberland

(Mr. Albert Grey) might, after expressing strong opinions in the Provinces in favour of immediate action on that question, now urge the Government to fulfil its promises. He, for one, did not desire to throw the whole cost of local taxation on Imperial funds, and he had a great horror of centralization; but he held that certain of those charges might be fairly transferred from local resources to the Imperial Exchequer. The management of the police should, he thought, be undertaken by the Central Government, and paid for out of Imperial resources. The maintenance of the highways and the relief of the indoor poor he did not think should be handed over to a centralized authority; but a grant in aid should be given to lessen the burden that was now imposed for the support of the indoor poor on the unfortunate occupiers and owners of real property. The house duty, the game and gun licence duty, the dog tax, and certain other taxes which were locally raised, should be handed over to local authorities. The President of the Local Government Board had stated that the Government had prepared a scheme for the reform of local administration. He should much like to see the proposal which the right hon. Gentleman intended to bring forward; and he must express, on the part of his constituents, the disappointment which they felt that that measure had been left so long without being effectually dealt with.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, continuing, said, they were informed last year, and they had again been told by the President of the Local Government Board, that they must wait for a large measure of Reform. It was a curious circumstance, however, that whenever any scheme of moderate legislation was brought forward by Gentlemen on the Conservative side of the House, or whenever any desire was expressed for legislation that was very much required by the agricultural community, they were always told to wait for a large measure of Reform. He should like to ask the House what chances there were of any large measure of Reform passing the House dealing with the question of local government?

He ventured to think that, after the delay that had taken place in legislating upon this question, the agricultural community, who were led to expect so much from the promises hon. Members opposite so heedlessly gave at the last General Election, would find out that those hon. Gentlemen were not the true farmers' friends they pretended to be. Hon. Members opposite when they appeared in the country or at the Central Chamber of Agriculture were very fond of expressing affection and regard for agricultural interests; but the nearer they got to the House and to the presence of their Whips the quicker did their convictions appear to ooze out at the soles of their feet. He trusted that on the present occasion they would support the Resolution of his hon. Friend, in which case they would earn the gratitude of their constituents.

MR. RATHBONE said, he shared the regret expressed by hon. Members opposite at the delay which had taken place in the settlement of this question and the manner in which Governments on both sides of the House had treated this important question. He confessed, however, to very considerable disappointment at the speeches delivered on the opposite side of the House; and he differed very strongly from the Mover of this Resolution as to how the unfortunate ratepayer was to be best relieved. The mere transfer of taxes or rates from one pocket to the other, without a reform of local administration, would not relieve the taxpayer, while at the same time it would make future reform almost impossible. He was astonished to hear the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who described the measure shadowed forth as revolutionary. On the contrary, he believed it was impossible for any Government to bring forward a measure more strictly and essentially Conservative, in the highest sense of the word, than the one which would effect a thorough reform of our local administration. What was the greatest danger to be feared? It was the fact that large classes of this country, who from their leisure and wealth were best enabled to take a useful share in the administration of the local affairs of the country, had withdrawn themselves more and more from active participation in local government. He could not conceive a greater or more pressing danger to be guarded against than that the people of this country should feel that the leisured and wealthy classes had no raison d'être for usefulness in the great work of local government. He would quote a few figures to show the great danger arising from neglecting promptly to deal with this important and intricate question, and how injurious would be the attempt to deal with the subject by mere grants in aid without a reform of the system of local taxation and of the bodies who should control and direct this vast and increasing expenditure. He had heard statesmen speak as if all that was necessary was to watch the growth of Imperial expenditure and taxation; and if they did that, local expenditure and taxation might be safely left to go on. But the facts most strikingly disproved that. The local expenditure of England and Wales had increased from £25,002,000 in 1867-8 to £50,418,000 in 1881-2. In other words, it had doubled in that short period, whereas Imperial expenditure had only risen from £71,236,000 in 1867-8 to £85,472,000 in 1881-2. Differently expressed, it had only increased by one-fifth, while local expenditure had doubled. Imperial expenditure, exclusive of charge of debt, was, in 1867-8, £44,664,000, while local expenditure was only £22,918,000, or, exclusive of repayment of debt and interest, just about half as much as Imperial expenditure; but, in 1882, when Imperial expenditure was £55,806,000, exclusive of charge of debt, local expenditure had risen to £38,791,000. Varying the terms, from being one-half, it had risen to about two-thirds the amount of Imperial expenditure; and, as it was increasing at the rate of about £1,000,000 a-year, local expenditure threatened rapidly to equal national expenditure. No doubt a large portion of the increase in local expenditure had been devoted to excellent objects, but there had, nevertheless, been much extravagance and waste, owing to the ratepayer having no supervision over the expenditure. Small subsidies alone would do no good to the ratepayer. What they wanted was the adjustment of areas and the strengthening and reform of local authorities in such a manner as to enable the ratepayer to exercise some vigilance over the expenditure. The hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) said there was no one to defend the ratepayer. Well, what they wanted to see was the formation of some elected representative body that would defend him. If all that the Motion asked were granted, it would have but small effect in relieving the ratepayer from his burdens. The subsidies in aid of local taxation that had been made in recent years had not reduced the rates. In 1873-4 the subsidies in aid of local taxation were £1,001,000; in 1879-80 they had risen to £2,732,000. But during those same years the rates had risen from £19,773,000 to £25,694,000; and they were still increasing at the rate of £1,000,000 a-year. Again, local debts during that time rose from £59,647,000 to £107,042,000; and, in 1882, they had risen still further to £120,072,000. What sign was there here of any relief to the ratepayers? The sops which had been thrown out by previous Governments had given no real relief to the ratepayer. Until they improved the authorities by which the public funds were distributed, and made it possible for the ratepayer to exercise greater vigilance over his own affairs, any attempt at reform in the direction indicated by the Motion would be merely pouring water into a sieve. The true friends of the ratepayers were those who advocated measures that would give permanent relief rather than those who would administer palliatives which left large grievances untouched.

MR. LONG said, that if the local taxation party in the House had not passed any measures, they had done negative good by opposing measures that would have increased the burdens of the ratepayers. There seemed to be a failure to appreciate the unanimity and strength of feeling on this subject that existed in the agricultural constituencies where it was believed to require attention before any other subject. But the Government preferred to postpone relief until they could rectify areas, to do which seemed to be the joy of Radicals. Until they could point to squares on a map they would put off reforms, which, to be of use, should be granted immediately. It was not everything to say that rates in rural districts had gone down. The question was whether, with the fall in the value of land and the difficulties of cultivation and occupancy, they could be paid as readily as before, and whether agriculturists did not pay more than their fair proportion of the charges that fell on rates. They were told that the difficulty should be met by a reduction of rent; but this was a remedy which had been frequently tried before, and which could not be done much further without involving dire distress. Besides, that answer was no sufficient settlement of their complaint that they were paying an unfairly high proportion of the rates of the country. What they demanded was pure and simple justice. If the Government were really anxious to pass a Bill, it was for them to put it in a position to facilitate its being passed; but, in his opinion, it was the duty of the Government to attend to the matter without delay, instead of waiting until they could introduce a measure which might possibly give satisfaction to themselves. The burdens under which the class he referred to were suffering might be met partly by subventions and partly by taxing articles which at present were not touched. Some portion of the expense of the roads might be met by taxes locally levied and collected; and he must say he had always regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the present Leader of the Opposition had thought fit to remit the horse tax. That he considered a very fair tax, and he believed that if it were now levied and applied to the maintenance of roads, it would be of great advantage in relieving that branch of local taxation. The roads in his own neighbourhood were cut up and worn out almost exclusively by waggons and their horses in their traffic to and from the stone quarries, and he thought that this was an instance in which the amount of local taxation might be fairly increased. He hoped the hon. Members who signed the Memorial to the Prime Minister last year would not again put themselves in a false position.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that the debate would be a landmark in the history of the question, because, after the speech of the President of the Local Government Board, it was impossible to pretend to believe that it was not the serious wish of the Government to deal with local taxation and local government. The present Government had been exposed to annual debates, in which they had been bombarded with assertions that they were playing with the question, and only desired to escape from immediate difficulties, without seriously intending to place any proposals before the country. It would have been as well if hon. Members opposite, before reproaching the Government which came into Office in 1880 with their neglect of that subject, had explained to the House why it was that they themselves had not dealt with it between 1874 and 1880, when they were in Office. In 1874 the question was at least as prominent as it was in 1880, and in the former year, during the elections, the Liberal Government was much blamed for not having settled the question. After the General Election of 1874, it was universally believed that the Conservative Government would at once take the matter in hand. That belief was strengthened when the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) became a Member of the Government. But some time after the hon. Member for Norfolk disappeared from the Government; and it was only after a good deal of reminding with regard to their election speeches, and a good deal of pressure from the Liberal side of the House, that in 1877 a meagre County Government Bill was introduced, but not seriously pressed forward. In 1878 another Bill was introduced, which was of a still more meagre and unsatisfactory character. Before, therefore, Members opposite preached such long, and loud, and eloquent sermons, they had better explain why it was that they were in Office so many years and practically did nothing, except now and then give out, in a very unbusiness-like manner, a certain amount of money in the form of subventions in aid of local rates, which subventions had been shown by many—and by none more clearly than his hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvonshire (Mr. Rathbone)—to have no result whatever in diminishing local burdens. All that had been done was to shift the burden from the ratepayer on to the taxpayer; while the total burden of rates and taxes had gone on increasing. That statement had been questioned; but the different Returns which had been obtained, and especially those which had been procured by his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), proved the truth of what he was saying. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Hampshire (Mr. Selater-Booth) spoke with great authority as a former President of the Local Government Board. He was surprised to find the right hon. Gentleman coming forward as the defender of the present system of local administration, which, he thought, was condemned with unanimity by both Parties in that House. But, after expressing pious horror at the revolutionary opinions of his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board, the right hon. Gentleman went on to advocate a number of reforms in local administration, and referred to the highway rates, the cost of relief of which, he said, ought to be partly thrown on the counties; of assimilating areas in counties, in respect of local government; and other improvements which ought to be effected in local government. The right hon. Gentleman had also theories as to valuation and county police. He thus showed himself to be a thorough Reformer. But the difference between the right hon. Gentleman and his right hon. Friend was that the right hon. Gentleman would deal with all those questions by piecemeal legislation, whereas his right hon. Friend was in favour of a large and comprehensive measure of Reform. Then the right hon. Gentleman had charged the Government with a desire to cut up the country into a number of administrative squares. That was an old charge, which was most frequently introduced in connection with the question of Parliamentary Reform and of electoral districts. He had often had the pleasure of co-operating in questions of local government with his hon. Friend the Member for North Wilts (Mr. Long), and they had effected great improvements in respect of administrative areas; but they had certainly done nothing in the direction of cutting up the country into squares. The truth was, that on the opposite side of the House there was a very great unwillingness to face the magnitude of this question. It was, no doubt, easy to taunt the Government with the fact that their plan was a large one, and might take some time to pass the House; but he thought he had a right to remind the House that the necessity of dealing with the question of local government had been recognized by hon. Members opposite themselves so far back as 1879; and that being so, he ventured to ask them how they were justified in saying that now, in 1884, the Government would be justified in giving it the go-by, and in merely repeating those operations of shovelling out money from the Consolidated Fund, which had had nothing but disastrous results? [Cries of "No!"] That was a matter of opinion. If hon. Members could show there had been any real relief to the ratepayers let them do so. The figures seemed to show that there had been a slight difference in the distribution between the taxpayer and the ratepayer; but there had been an increase in the burden upon both. But the very first thing to be done was to deal with this question of local government. The essential vice of the present want of system was that there was a complete separation, in many instances, between the spending and the rating authorities; between the authorities who imposed burdens by their expenditures on the ratepayer and the authorities who had to get that money from the ratepayer. For example, in the case of highway expenditure, except in the exceptional cases where the powers of the Highway Act of 1878 had been used, and the Guardians had taken over highway powers, the Highway Board and the Guardians were distinct. The former spent the money and got it from the latter by a precept, and the Guardians in turn got it from the parochial ratepayer through the overseers. But when the ratepayer complained of the heavy incidence of the rate he found that the members of the Boards of Guardians could disclaim all responsibility for the heavy expenditure, because it was not they, but a number of Highway Boards, among whose districts the Union was divided, who were responsible for it. The same argument held good in respect of many other rating authorities, who treated the common fund of the Guardians as a sort of milch cow; and that was why the first principle of reform was the concentration of authority over both taxation and administration. Then, again, the Act of 1878 threw one-half of keeping the roads in repair upon the county rate; but the county authority had no control whatever over the expenditure of the highway authority within its area. The highway authority might spend upon the roads double what ought to be spent, but the county authority could not refuse to pay, and in that way reckless expenditure was encouraged. He thought that was not an unfair description with which they had to deal. But it would be said—"What is the use of waiting all this time? Do you really contend that you will be able to produce a measure which will deal with these evils?" The contention of the Government was not only that they could meet them, but that the Bill was ready, and if produced to the House and the country would recommend itself both to ratepayers and taxpayers. The drift of opinion on this question had been clear for some years. The Sanitary Commission had recommended, in 1871, that the unit of area should be the same for all local purposes, "and that the larger areas should be, as far as possible, multiples or aggregates of that unit." And when the Act of the subsequent year had decided that the Union should be the chosen area of administration for the purposes of the Act, it became almost a certainty that the sanitary areas thereby constituted would become the future unit of local administration, and that the other areas would, sooner or later, have to assimilate themselves to it. Another exhaustive inquiry, in 1873, into the whole question of areas made the superiority of the Union tolerably clear; and the Education Acts of 1876 and 1879 accordingly followed the lines of the Act of 1872, and adopted the Union as the area of administration. A Committee, which sat in 1878, recommended the consolidation of the highway districts with the rural sanitary districts; and the Act of 1878 partially followed the recommendation. Another Committee, in 1879, made a similar recommendation in regard to the districts of Coroners, and embodied it in the Bill referred to it for consideration. At the same time power was given by Acts passed in 1876 and 1879 to the Local Government Board to alter and dissolve Unions, and to deal with divided parishes. The Union or rural sanitary district was the future unit of the local government and administration of the English rural districts for all the purposes compassed by the different authorities at present existing. To these purposes additions would from time to time have to be made, according to the necessities of time and place. A Committee of the House of Lords also, which sat in 1878 to inquire into the Highways Act, pointed to the fact that the rural sanitary district, or Union, was a district which must be taken as the basis of English local government. The inquiries were full and exhaustive. Therefore, it might be said that the Government had approached this question with the great advantage of having before it the accumulated experience, not only of previous Governments, but of influential and important Committees and Commissions. With that knowledge before them, and aided by those inquiries and studies which had been made by private individuals and independent Members of the House, the Government were able to approach this question with the prospect of knowing that they could find a road out of the present difficulties. In these circumstances, he could not put this point too strongly to the House—that the Government firmly believed that if the House would only allow this Bill to be introduced and the other Business to be proceeded with as it ought to proceed, the Bill would pass into law. But there was no prospect whatever of this Bill, any more than any other Bills, being introduced, if the present condition of Public Business continued. It was not the Government who were responsible for the condition of affairs which had rendered the introduction of this Bill impossible. It was quite certain that it was so understood in the country. The country would expect the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) and the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) to make their addresses in future to the hon. and learned Member for Bridport, and to ask him to remove all the blocks he had put down against the various Bills, and in order that time might be obtained some evening for the introduction of the Local Government and Taxation Bill. If this Bill were met by the arts of Obstruction, he would look forward with perfect satisfaction and equanimity to any county election in which he might be concerned directly or indirectly. He would hold in his right hand the Franchise Bill, introduced by the Prime Minister, and in his left hand the Bill which had been framed and with the outlines of which he was familiar, but which could not be introduced owing to the action of hon. Members among the Conservative Opposition, and would confidently appeal to the county electors to judge between the two Parties.

MR. CLARE READ: Sir, the noble Lord who has just addressed the House (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) began his speech by reviewing the history of this question from the year 1873; but I think it a pity that he did not go back a little further—namely, to the year 1872, because in that case he would have recalled to us the fact that the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) succeeded in carrying in this House during that year, by a majority of 100, a Resolution which formed the first step towards a relief of the burdens of local taxation that had been taken for many years. It is, however, a curious fact that the Government of the day took not the slightest notice of the expression of opinion thus recorded by the very large majority of Members of this House who voted for that Resolution, and that it was left to the Government over which Lord Beaconsfield presided, as soon as that Government came into Office, to give to the ratepayers that relief which the Resolution sought to procure for them—namely, to double the amount of the subvention then granted out of the funds of the State towards the cost of the police, and to give a fixed sum of 4s. per head in aid of the cost of maintaining lunatics. The noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has informed the House that although we in the agricultural districts have had this large remission of the burden of local taxation, amounting altogether to a total of something like £2,000,000 annually, our rates have, nevertheless, increased. Well, I would ask the noble Lord who was it that increased the rates? Who passed the Education Act?—a measure which no one in this House will deny has had the effect of increasing our rates very considerably. Then there have been certain Sanitary Acts which were, no doubt, very good measures in themselves, but, at the same time, they have been placed on an unfair basis; and there has also been an augmentation of the highway rates, which has brought about this result—that the disturnpiked roads have been thrown on real property for their maintenance. Therefore, Sir, although we are unable to say that taking our rates as a whole they have shown a decrease, yet at the same time there can be no doubt that they would have been ever so much heavier than they are at the present moment but for the remission of this £2,000,000 per annum which we succeeded in extracting from Her Majesty's Government—I do not mean the present Government, but the Government of Lord Beaconsfield. And, Sir, I should like to make a remark with reference to another point, and that is with regard to the prisons. There is a general belief in this country that the prisons cost a great deal more than they previously did, and the noble Lord (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) has said that if we have given anything to the ratepayers on the one hand, we have, on the other, made the taxpayers contribute a great deal more than they did before. I have here a Return, which was moved for by my hon. Friend the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), in which the expenditure for the different prisons throughout the country is given for a period between 1868 and 1881, both years inclusive. From this Return it appears that in 1868 the expenditure upon our gaols was £673,000, upon an average number of 18,000 prisoners, whereas in the year 1881, when entirely under Government control, there were exactly the same number of prisoners in the gaols—namely, 18,000, and the expenditure had decreased to £473,000, showing that there had been an actual saving effected for the country of £200,000, while the prisons had decreased in number from 113 to 67. Therefore, the House will see that there has been a very considerable saving all round. Well, Sir, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Carnarvonshire (Mr. Rathbone) has told the House that the Conservative Party have done nothing whatever to check the addition to that load of local taxation which fresh legislation proposed to heap upon the ratepayers. The hon. Member for South Liecestershire said, in a speech which he delivered in this House during the last Session, that it was a useful function on the part of the Local Taxation Committee that it should have considered 93 Bills which threatened to impose increased rates; and he added that it had arrested 73 of these Bills in progress, while 15 of them had been amended, and only four had become law. I think, therefore, that upon this showing the Local Taxation Committee has done something to avert an augmented load of taxation from being put upon the unfortunate British ratepayers. In the speech just delivered by the noble Lord (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) and in that also of the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) we have had what has really amounted to the introductory speeches on the first reading of a Bill, which, however, is not before the House. Instead of affording the House any hope or indication of a further proposal for relief of the local burdens, we have simply had a sketch of the proposed Government measure—a Bill we should certainly much like to see. In fact, so much of the noble Lord's address was devoted to the development of the intended Bill that he might very consistently have concluded his speech with the words, "I now move that this Bill be read a first time." But, Sir, it appears to me that the unfortunate ratepayer is to be allowed to starve until such time as the great and abundant crop of local administrative reform they are now endeavouring to sow shall have been fully matured. Upon the question of Reform, Her Majesty's Government gives us merely piecemeal legislation. They offer us only a portion of what ought to be a complete measure; and yet, when we agriculturists ask for only a small modicum of relief from the pressure of the burdens of local taxation, we are told—"You cannot have any relief whatever until this great, grand, and beneficent Act of Local Government Reform shall have been passed." I am afraid, however, that we shall have to wait a good many Sessions before that Act is passed. I say this with great pain and sorrow, because, for my own part, I have always said we required a reform of our local system of administration as well as a sound and substantial relief of the burdens of local taxation. I have observed from the speeches made by hon. Members opposite that they are one and all in the habit of asserting that Government subventions lead to extravagance. I beg entirely to differ from those hon. Gentlemen. I believe, on the contrary, that these subventions really conduce to efficiency, as well as to uniformity in the administration of the affairs of local government. Let us take, for example, the case of the police.

Mr. Clare Read

With respect to this body there has been no greater increase in the local expenditure since the Government have doubled the subvention from the Imperial Exchequer, although there have been a great many extra duties imposed upon it. For instance, the County Constabulary have had to carry out the work necessitated by the passing of the Cattle Diseases Act, as well as of various other Acts—such as that for preventing adulteration. In many counties the Education Act has given the police a great deal of additional work to do; and we have recently been asked by the noble Marquess the Secretary for War (the Marquess of Hartington) that they should also be employed as recruiting sergeants to help in the enlistment of our soldiers. But if anybody ever does ask for an addition to the force, or an increase in their pay, I should like to know, from hon. Gentlemen who sit near me, who it is that recommends it? Is it not almost universally the Inspector of the Constabulary, and not the Chief Constable of the district or the magistrates at Quarter Sessions? I should be very sorry to see our Police Force transformed into an Imperial Force on the principle that has been adopted in regard to the Irish Constabulary; but I do say with respect to the subvention we already receive, it might be really half the whole expense of the police, instead of being only half the cost of pay and clothing; for, instead of the subvention being one-half, what we do receive is hardly two-fifths. Certainly, it would be the duty of the Government to contribute half the pensions, because they are nothing more than pay. With regard to the question relating to the maintenance of lunatics, it is sometimes said that this exhibits an increase. At any rate, the increase cannot be said to be the consequence of the subvention. There can be no doubt that the Inspectors of Workhouses, when they happen to come upon such cases as those of troublesome idiots or mild lunatics, which have been in the workhouse for some time, naturally suggest that the proper place for such persons is not the workhouse, but the County Lunatic Asylum. But with regard to the Lunacy Commissioners, they are the men who are continually suggesting increase in the buildings, the provision of better clothing, and more amusements for the unfortunate inmates of the asylums, and, consequently, it is they, and not the local authority, who are the persons that augment the cost of maintaining these unfortunate people. Now, let us turn to the case of the Poor Law. There are some of the charges in the administration of the Poor Law which are paid, I think in one or two instances entirely, out of the Imperial Exchequer, while, in others, the Government contribute one-half. I will take, first of all, the schoolmasters and schoolmistresses employed in the different Unions. We shall, of course, be told that we wish, very naturally, to get all the money we can out of the Government; but what, I ask, has been the case in the rural districts lately? In a great many instances the Guardians have dispensed with the presence of schoolmasters and mistresses, and sent all the children to the neighbouring Board schools and elementary schools in the different districts, thus making the Government a present of the salaries they previously paid, and throwing the burden almost entirely on the shoulders of the ratepayers. I think I am right in saying that the Government pays half the salaries of the Union doctors. Well, Sir, I would ask this House whether they regard the Union doctor as an over-paid official? In my humble opinion, he is about the worst paid officer we have. But the House would naturally suppose, after what it has been told of the great extravagance to which these subventions on the part of the Government have led, that we are in the habit of paying that officer an enormous salary. Half the pay of the Medical Officers of Health and half the salaries of the Inspectors of Nuisances are also paid by the Government. These officials are appointed by the Guardians of the Poor, and their salaries are fixed by those bodies; but is it not constantly the case—and on this point I appeal to hon. Gentlemen who sit near me and who are well acquainted with the way in which the Boards of Guardians perform their duties—that the Local Government Board intervenes and tells us, not that we pay these men too much, but that we do not give them sufficient salaries? They contend if you want to get the best possible men for the performance of these duties you must pay them accordingly, and it may be that such men will in the long run be found much cheaper than a lower paid official. Be that as it may; it is the Government and not the local authorities who insist upon the payment of high salaries. Now, Sir, the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board has stated that the power of the local authority is very much diminished by these Government subventions and Government interference and control. The worst of it is that we have frequently to put up with all this interference and all this Government control, without receiving any equivalent in the shape of Government pay. As an example, let us look at what happens in the case of the indoor poor. For instance, the Poor Law Inspectors regulate the diet, the clothing, and the classification of the paupers. They say how many officers we are to have; they define the services to be performed and the number of appointments; they confirm the salaries we pay them and ratify the appointments; and it is only with their sanction that we can dismiss any of our officers. They lay down for us the sizes of the buildings we are to erect, the accommodation they are to provide, and the entire management and treatment of the poor is under their immediate supervision and control; and yet, on the other hand, the Government does not pay us anything. In my opinion, if we were to get one-half of the cost of the indoor poor, which, under the circumstances, we ought to have, from the Imperial Exchequer, we could not require any further interference and control on the part of the Government officials. I think I gathered from the speech of the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board that in the new Bill which he says is to be submitted to the House it is proposed that the county rate is to be charged with a contribution towards the maintenance of the indoor poor in the different Unions. This may be all very well as far as it goes; but I am fearful that the county rate will be levied on the same basis as the poor rate. What we want is, ~~not that we should~~ have an increase in the burdens imposed on real property, but that personal property should be made to contribute towards the relief of the poor. Some of this latter description of property has increased during the last 20 years to the extent of something like 300 per cent, while the increase that has taken place in the value of property in land has only been about 20 per cent, and I very much doubt whether in the last few years it has not considerably decreased instead of having undergone augmentation. The hon. Gentleman the Member for North Wilts (Mr. Long) has drawn our attention to the contribution made by the Government to the highways, and upon that point I must say that, as far as I am concerned, I think they give that subvention in the worst possible form to those counties which are still without the blessing of Highway Boards. For instance, in my own county—Norfolk—they give a dole to about 300 parishes; but what I contend is that it ought to be given in aid of the county rate, and not to the individual parishes. When the Highway Act of 1878 was passed, it was said it was necessitated by the almost crushing severity with which the disturnpiked roads rate fell on individual parishes, and it was considered right to make the area of contribution larger than the parochial area, and, therefore, half the expense was put on the county. In addition to this it was said that the Imperial taxation ought to contribute something—that these thoroughfares were not for the benefit of the immediate locality, and consequently an addition of £250,000 of Imperial taxes was voted two years ago by a reluctant Government. One would have thought that instead of giving the money to the individual parishes, which had already received half the expense of the maintenance of their main roads, the Government would have given it in aid of the county rates. The result is that small, out-of-the-way parishes, which are more hit by agricultural distress than any other portion of a county, have to contribute, first of all, half the expense of the maintenance of the roads which belong to great parishes and small towns that are in a more flourishing condition, and then, in addition to this, they have to pay one-fourth more as their contribution towards the general taxation of the county. This, in my opinion, is increasing the injustice we complain of three-fold. I think the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs said there was a regular scramble for this money throughout the country. I do not think that this is so; but when we see that this is the only chance which these unfortunate parishes have of getting anything at all out of the county rate or out of the Government grant in aid of their rates, it would not be very surprising to find that every one of them tried to make out that it had a main road. I know that when at a meeting of the Norfolk Court of Quarter Sessions some time ago, this was suggested by an individual magistrate, Lord Kimberley jumped up and said the first time local taxation was discussed in the Cabinet he should have the pleasure of telling his Colleagues in what way the Government money was scrambled for in Norfolk. But the noble Lord ought also to have told his Colleagues that that very week he presided as Chairman of a Board of Guardians who resisted the mandate of the Local Government Board with regard to the pay of the medical officer of health, because they had the best possible man and paid him £50, instead of £80 a-year. We, in Norfolk, at an expense of £50,000, maintain 5,000 miles of road, a cost of £10 per mile, one-half the cost of the main roads being £16,000; and I find that instead of Norfolk receiving £4,000, which it ought to have, according to the contribution offered by the Government, it only received £2,000, as stated in the Return. This, I think, is a proof the County Surveyor particularly insists on having really good roads that instead of, as one might have expected from what has been said by the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, the county having been extravagant in spending the money of the Government, it has only asked for the £2,000 it has received. Now, Sir, I consider that subventions from the Government constitute the only means we possess at the present time of making personal property contribute towards the local burdens; and I must add that I cannot possibly understand why it should be said that if more of these subventions are given, or if some of them were increased, they would stand in the way of a great measure of local administrative reform. In the year 1877 I had the honour of moving in this House the following Resolution, which was carried unanimously:—

“That no readjustment of local administration will be satisfactory or complete which does not refer county business other than that relating to the administration of justice and the maintenance of order to a representative County Board."

But I never thought for one moment that that reform of local administration need stand in the way of the relief of local taxation. I had always thought that some relief ought certainly to come first; and that after this had been achieved, we might hope for an improvement in our local administration. But, Sir, my idea of a County Board will, I fear, at the present day be regarded as old and obsolete. I have always thought it quite possible that we might have a Board composed two-thirds of Guardians and one-third of members of the Quarter Sessions, who should manage the affairs of the county. I believed that in this way we should have an assembly of business-like, common-sense, hard-working, and slow-speaking men, who, with their practical knowledge and experience, would be a great help to the management of county affairs. But, on the other hand, I am quite sure of this—that these are not the men who would be elected on a County Board, as they are decidedly not the men who would go to the trouble, annoyance, and expense of a popular election. I understood that last year the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) was desirous of having County Boards established, not so much for the purpose of economizing the rates, or of expending the money of the ratepayers more efficiently, but because he wished to educate the agricultural labourers for the exercise of the franchise. I very much fear from what I hear and see that they are likely to get the franchise and to vote for the election of Members of Parliament without in the first instance having obtained that elevating and educating experience which they might have acquired by participating in the election of members of the County Board. I am greatly afraid that this County Parliament with which I say we are now threatened, and which is to reform us all, and bring about such a large amount of good, will prove to be a great, unwieldy, partizan Board, something like an overgrown Town Council, and composed of noisy, spouting politicians, elected and swayed by Party politics, from which, I am happy to say, every Court of Quarter Session with which I am acquainted is entirely free. [Ironical cheers.] The hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings) greets that statement with ironical cheers; but I can furnish for the information of the hon. Gentleman an instance from the county of Norfolk, which is, I hope, still a Conservative county. The Courts of Quarter Sessions of Norfolk were until lately presided over by three able and excellent men, all of whom, notwithstanding the preponderance of the Conservative element in the county, were Liberals. I am afraid that if this Board be, as has been sketched out by the President of the Local Government Board, elected by non-rated householders, they would be found to be composed of men who will expend very lavishly funds to which they do not contribute. It was, I believe, said in this House during the last Session that these Boards are not only to govern the county finances throughout the country, but that they will also exercise in other ways the moral and social influence that will necessarily devolve on them; and on this point I may refer to such questions as those of local option, licences, and other troublesome problems which the Government would gladly shunt, and which will probably be handed over by the Imperial Parliament to be locally decided by the County Boards. I can only say that whenever these Boards are established, and whenever there arises a question that is expensive or troublesome, that question will, if possible, be shifted from the shoulders of Parliament and sent over to the County Boards to settle, leaving us, the unfortunate ratepayers, to pay the piper. We grumble at the present day at a county rate of 2*d.* or 3*d.* in the pound; but I feel assured we shall have some gigantic levies from the new County Board, which, I maintain, will be mountains when compared with the present mole-hills of our county rates. Sir, I demand, as a ratepayer, relief from present evils before I am called on to bear the heavy burdens of the future.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON, who had on the Paper an Amendment—which by the Rules of the House he was prevented from moving—to the effect—

"That this House, while fully conscious of the urgency of legislation, recognizes the connection, which must exist between the reform of local taxation and that of local government, to be so intimate that it would be detrimental to the interests of either question to deal with the one independently of the other,"

after explaining that the hon. Member for South Leicestershire had misunderstood the object of the deputation to the Prime Minister to which he had referred, said, that if Parliament were to grant fresh subventions in relief of local rates, the ultimate gainer would not be the tenant farmer, but the owner of real property. He believed that real property was at the present moment unfairly taxed. Originally it was the chief source of income and the chief form of property; but personal property, owing to the steady progress, in spite of commercial depression, of large commercial fortunes, had increased far more than real property. Truly the one was dependent on the other—that was to say, the large fortunes made in commerce increased the selling value of landed estates; but the value of land itself had increased from extrinsic, and not intrinsic, qualities. He fully agreed with previous speakers as to the justice of affording relief to real property; but this was a totally distinct question from affording relief to ratepayers. Thus the Resolution, which was apparently intended to benefit one particular class, would in reality, if adopted, benefit another. There was a prevailing opinion that leaseholders in large towns suffered severely because they paid all new rates the expenditure of which increased the value of the property of the ground landlords; and many Members would be glad to see the ground landlords made to pay a portion of the rates. The chief charge brought against his own Amendment was that it would involve delay. But the interests of the ratepayers were not likely to gain as much by some immediate relief of a patchwork and piecemeal nature, as they would lose in adding fresh complications to existing anomalies, and so increasing the difficulty of effecting a satisfactory settlement of the question as a whole. The suggestions made as to education, police, and pauper lunacy would, if attempted to be carried out, raise many controversial questions. How was it that the Party opposite when in power had not been able to deal with this question? [Mr. PELL: They gave £2,000,000.] How was it they had not dealt with it so as to render this debate unnecessary? The Resolution would leave untouched a state of things which was illustrated by the fact that in the West Derby

Union, Liverpool, there were 48 distinct and independent local authorities. As custodians of the public purse, Members ought to weigh very carefully the effect of adopting such a policy. By granting relief they would weaken materially their capacity to deal with the reform of local government. The complexity of our present system had helped to guard it from public condemnation. The question ought to be dealt with as a whole—first, on the ground that further subventions of public money, which were very doubtful in themselves, ought not to be handed over to be administered by a system largely irresponsible, whose very complexity baffled any effective public control; and, secondly, that it was necessary to make local relief conditional upon local reform, so that the one might give the stimulus to carry the other. Before Parliament agreed to relieve the local ratepayer at the cost of the taxpayer, it would be well if it were satisfied that the classes whose intention it was to benefit were the classes who would reap the benefit, and that the sums of money that were spent in relief were adjusted to the shoulders of those who obtained under our present system an unfair exemption. The class which would, perhaps, be the most largely affected by a measure of this kind were the tenant farmers of the several counties. But he would point out to the House that the present proposition, while purporting to benefit one class, would really benefit another; for if Parliament decided to give additional subventions towards local relief, the gainer would be, not the tenant farmer, but the landowner. The landowner fixed his rent with full consideration for the amount of the local rates, and if the latter were reduced he would find himself in a position to raise the rent, so that what the tenant did not pay directly he would have to pay indirectly. He wished to be distinctly understood in this matter. The landowner was entitled to relief through a measure specifically for that purpose; but he could not support a method such as was suggested, which could only afford a temporary relief to ratepayers, and must result, so far as it was possessed of a permanent character, in a benefit to real property, and not to ratepayers, purchased at the cost of the taxpayer in the most extravagant manner by means of a system which experience had proved to be most wasteful, and which would tend to complicate and retard a practical and efficient reform of local taxation. It was for these reasons that, while acknowledging and fully recognizing that there was much that was unfair under our present arrangements, he hoped the House would decline to regard this great and most pressing question of local government and local taxation except as a whole, based on a survey of the entire question and all its bearings.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, he cordially supported the Resolution before the House. It was unnecessary to specify the numerous abuses incident to our local taxation; we had got a little beyond that; all were agreed, to a certain extent, that the grievance was a great one. Both sides admitted the equity of the demand, and were almost agreed as to the remedy. He did not at all object to the remedy which had been shadowed forth by the Government; it would be a very suitable remedy, and the only thing they wanted to know was when, and to what extent, that remedy would be applied. And they were the more anxious to know that, after having heard from the President of the Local Government Board that their subventions were to be taken away and local licences substituted in their place. The real controversy before the House was the question of the continuous delay of the Government in reference to this matter. The Motion was well-timed—before the introduction of the Budget. When his hon. Friend brought the subject forward last Session, he was told by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he was too late because the Financial Statement had been made, and there was no surplus left. The position this Session was different, for the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not yet brought forward his Budget, and he hoped that the Division upon the Motion would show him that it would be absolutely necessary to make alterations in his financial proposals. Ever since 1853 the Prime Minister had been continually promising to deal with these questions; but, instead of dealing with them, he had been continually drawing bills on local taxation and always renewing them without discharging one of them. Fifteen years ago, in 1869, the Prime Minister said that the question was imminent and should be taken up immediately after the Irish Church Question had been disposed of. In 1870 and 1874 also the Prime Minister promised to deal with the question of local taxation, while the President of the Local Government Board only last year had likewise promised to place the matter on an equitable basis. But, notwithstanding all these promises, the Home Secretary had during the last three years introduced a Police Superannuation Bill, the effect of which would be to considerably increase the existing local burdens. They had heard much about the Franchise Bill of late; but he did not hesitate to say that Bills for the reform of local government and for the equitable readjustment of local taxation would be far more acceptable and much more welcome to the public at large than the Franchise Bill. They would remedy greater anomalies, would redress greater grievances, and confer greater benefits upon the very class upon which you propose to confer the franchise. The poor man who paid very little Imperial taxation would, he thought, rather have his local burdens reduced than the vote which it was proposed to give him. The poor man was much more affected by local burdens than the wealthy. Take the burning question of the day—the housing of the poor. No one could deny that local burdens pressed with exceptional severity on the houses of the poor, and that the poor man who, out of his savings, built or bought a house paid more relatively in the way of taxation than his wealthier neighbour. That exceptional taxation deterred the building of better houses, and on that question depended not only the health of the poor man's family but the virtue of his daughters. The removal or diminution of such burdens would bring great moral, material, and physical benefit to the poorer classes. Then the impositions upon land tended indirectly to increase the cost of the people's food; they afforded protection to the foreigner at the expense of the home producer, and hindered the application of capital to the improvement of the soil. Agriculture was in a more depressed condition than it had ever been within living memory; and at no time would the reduction of local burdens be more welcome than at present. That result was especially seen in the case of poor land where the margin between profit and loss was very small. And in view of the increased cost of labour, much of the poor land in the country must go out of cultivation. The case was much stronger and more serious now than it was in 1872, when he had the honour of carrying a Resolution on the subject by a large majority against the Government. Then there was the cost of education, which, in 1872, was only £72,000; while in 1883 it was £2,000,000. To that were to be added sanitary rates and highway rates. Increased rates proposed for national objects had more than absorbed all remissions. During the last 40 years Liberal Ministries had generally been in Office, and all these Imperial Services—Police, Lunatics, Education, &c.—during that period had been imposed on ratepayers. Conservative Governments had never imposed such burdens. He asked hon. Members opposite to name one such burden that had been imposed by the Conservatives. In 1841 local rates amounted in the aggregate to £8,000,000; in 1882 they were £28,000,000. The poor levy was £6,300,000; while in 1882 it was £14,000,000. Local debt then amounted to £67,000,000, of which Scotland bore £6,000,000, and Ireland £4,000,000. Local debt was now £150,000,000; and during the last five years that vast amount had been increased by £49,000,000. At the present rate of increase local debt would almost rival the National Debt, and we should, indeed, bequeath a heavy burden to posterity. The present system of local taxation was indefensible, as had been admitted by the President of the Local Government Board, who had said that people ought to contribute according to their ability and means, and not only in respect of the land and houses which they occupied. The right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) had also admitted that if landlords had a claim of relief in 1872, that claim was much stronger now. The present system of local taxation was opposed to every principle of reason and justice. Its only principle seemed to be convenience of collection. There was a fatal facility about the collection of rates. As the Prime Minister said last year, it was a very difficult and delicate thing to increase Imperial taxation, but comparatively easy to increase local taxation.

Sir Massey Lopes

There was no reason why they should not get relief before they got reform. Reform was not a necessary preliminary to relief. There was no reason why the Government should not forthwith hand over local licences to local taxation if the feeling of the Government was opposed to local subventions. A vast responsibility attached to the 31 Liberal Members who last year voted against this Motion, and whose convictions were in favour of it. ["No!"] Yes; because they signed the Memorial to the Prime Minister. Had they voted for the Motion it would have been carried by a majority of 50, and the result would be that the House would be discussing at this moment local taxation reform and relief instead of the Franchise Bill. The President of the Local Government Board said that the Government would produce their Bill if the Opposition would only consent to take franchise without redistribution; but these terms could not be accepted. The Government had never been in earnest with this question. They on that side of the House wanted no more evasions and deviations from the real question at issue—no more delay and no more prevarication. The question before them was simply whether the Government should be allowed to shunt and shelve this question Session after Session, or be made to redeem their pledges by dealing promptly and efficiently with grievances which had been long admitted to be a galling anomaly and a vast injustice.

MR. DODSON: In the first place, I may say that I am not at all surprised at the zeal and anxiety with which hon. Members both on that and on this side of the House have looked to this question of local taxation and local government. With regard to local rates, the pressure of local taxation is large, and is a growing burden, and it is one which is attended with a sense of injustice because the heavy burden of local rates falls upon one particular class of property which is—though it is not quite a strictly correct definition—called real property. Not unnaturally the ratepayers on that class of property, who see what is roughly described as personal property exempt from this burden, have the strongest feeling that there should be no further delay in making personalty contribute to relieve the burden. Many hon. Gentleman, however, who have spoken on this question, fell into a confusion of ideas, for they began by asking that personalty should be made to contribute, and then before long they proceeded to ask for grants in aid from Imperial funds. But this is not the same thing. Imperial funds are derived from the general Revenue of the country, which is not taken from property only, but from the wages of labour and other sources. There was also a further confusion, owing to the incidence of these local rates as between owners and occupiers being entirely lost sight of. On that subject I shall have a word or two to say presently; but I must remind the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) and the hon. Baronet who has just spoken (Sir Massey Lopes) that, in their historical review of this question, they entirely forgot the very important proposal of aid to local burdens made by a Liberal Government early in the day when the question came seriously under review. Both entirely lost sight of the fact that, in 1870 or 1871, my right hon. Friend the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) introduced a Bill which proposed to give considerable relief by surrendering a tax which would have afforded very large and substantial assistance to local rates.

MR. CLARE READ: Yes; to the City of London.

MR. DODSON: It was not confined to the City of London.

MR. PELL: More than one-half of it would have gone to London.

MR. DODSON: I allude to the proposal of my right hon. Friend to surrender the house tax. The hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) threw out a general challenge, which I cannot but think was a rash one. He said—

“I challenge hon. Members on that side of the House to point to a single rate that was ever imposed by a Conservative Government.”

All the rates, he said, were the doing of the Liberals. But I suspect, on a close examination of our rates, it will be found that the facts are not altogether as stated in regard to several charges. [“No!”] I will at once give hon. Members an instance. One very important rate, and the first of the great modern rates, was imposed, not by a Liberal, but by a Conservative Government—the police rate.

SIR MASSEY LOPES: Pardon me; the police rate was imposed by a Liberal Government.

MR. DODSON: It was imposed by Sir Robert Peel.

SIR MASSEY LOPES: No; by a Liberal Government, in 1856, when the present Prime Minister was Chancellor of the Exchequer. At first it was permissive, but it was made compulsory afterwards.

MR. DODSON: Well, the precedent and principle of the rate was introduced by Sir Robert Peel and by a Conservative Government. Then the hon. Baronet proceeded to say that these local burdens affected the poor man in regard to his dwelling. Sir, I will not undertake to raise the question how far the burden of local rates is taken into account in the erection of proper dwellings for the labouring classes. Nor will I enter into a discussion of the infinitely varying cases of distribution of rates between ground landlords, owners, and occupiers of houses. But I will say this, that you would give little or no relief to the poor man as to any share of rates he may sustain, directly or indirectly, in regard to his dwelling, if that relief is to be derived from Imperial taxation contributed to by the working man himself. The hon. Baronet went further, and made a singular and a most startling statement. He said that the effect of rates was to add to the cost of the poor man's food. This is the first time I ever heard that statement made.

SIR MASSEY LOPES: I said that the imposts upon land tended indirectly to increase the cost of food.

MR. DODSON: “The imposts upon land indirectly increase the cost of food!” It is the first time that I have heard that statement ventured upon in this House, and I should be curious to hear anyone who has ever devoted a few hours to the study of political economy attempt to prove that proposition. Rates upon land are not like a general tax upon a commodity which can be thrown off upon the consumer. Does the hon. Baronet mean to say that the price of wheat at this moment is increased by local rates even in the face of foreign competition? [Cries of “Hear, hear!”] Hon. Gentlemen opposite say “Hear, hear!” But I should be very glad to hear any hon. Member get up and state a definite argument to prove the proposition that a local rate, paid in the first instance by the occupier, but which, according to all rules of common sense, must fall upon the land, is one that can be thrown upon the consumer in the market. I venture to defy any hon. Member to prove such a proposition. And now I pass on to the Motion and speech of my hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell). My hon. Friend has been exceedingly careful and guarded in the proposal which he has submitted to the House in a speech of very great tact and great good humour. I watched my hon. Friend very attentively, and I observed that he most carefully abstained throughout his speech, as he had done in his Motion, from making any definite proposal or naming any amount which he proposes to give as a contribution in aid of local rates. The hon. Baronet who seconded him has been equally cautious in his speech. He also proposed no plan, and named no definite amount. But the hon. Baronet has been very frank, for he has gone further and has told us that he would not make any suggestion as to how the money to be given in aid of the local rates was to be provided, adding that he would not do so because it might disturb the harmony of the Party. The Resolution of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), together with his own speech and the speeches of those who have supported, him are matters upon which I must congratulate them on account of the dexterity with which both have been framed in order to catch votes without holding out any definite proposal. My right hon. Friend the Member for North Hampshire (Mr. Selater-Booth) was scarcely more specific than any other hon. Member on that side of the House. My right hon. Friend did, however, go as far as this—he told us the proper way of giving assistance to the local rates was in the shape of subventions, because it was so easy to give subventions; it did not require a Bill, we had only to get a Vote in Supply. Well, no doubt, that is a very easy way to give subventions in aid of the local rates. It is as easy as the descent of Avernus; but in this case it is just as difficult to retrace one's steps, and, no doubt, the right hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) who sits by his side, and who has tried the experiment, will tell him so. In 1874 the right hon. Baronet, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer—I think it was in the first or second year of the late Government—proposed subventions in aid of local rates; but he expressly stated then that he proposed those subventions only temporarily as a stop-gap, to give immediate relief. He added that he did not approve of the system, but he hoped shortly to be able to deal with the subject and to place contributions in aid of local rates on a more satisfactory basis. The right hon. Baronet found the same difficulty as others in carrying out his intentions. He took the easy step of giving subventions, but he was never able to retrace his steps and place the matter on a firmer and more satisfactory basis. The objections to giving subventions and to the manner in which they were given have been often stated. They tend to stimulate expenditure. [Cries of "No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen say "No!" I submit that that is a proposition which it is very difficult to controvert. You, in effect, say to the local authorities—"Whatever you spend, we will meet you with half." Surely the Government thus contribute to encourage expenditure? [An hon. MEMBER dissented.] An hon. Member opposite shakes his head; but that is not all. The Government not only themselves thus contribute to stimulate expenditure, but they actually send round officials to encourage the local authorities indirectly, if not directly, to spend more money. That has been the case alike under a Conservative and a Liberal Government. It is certainly the case in regard to the police. The difficulty of these subventions is that nobody can find a way to give them except in proportion to local expenditure. To give them, as has been suggested, in proportion to rateable value, would be to give them, not in aid of poverty, but of wealth. There is also the objection that by subventions, as now made, you relieve real property by taxes which are levied upon articles consumed by the community. With regard to giving aid to the local authorities, the Government hold three things. We say that the aid should be so given as not to impair the incentive to economy; next, that it should be so given as not to make the local authority to whom it is given the slave of the central authority; and, thirdly, that before we give a considerable increase, such as is proposed, to the large aid that is already given, there ought to be truly representative bodies in the different districts to whom the administration of the rates and the aid could be entrusted. There is only one other point I wish to refer to before I sit down. I have referred to the statement of the hon. Baronet that local burdens add to the price of a commodity to the consumer. But we have always heard aid asked, not on the ground of injury to the consumer, but on behalf of the owner and the tenant, and more especially the agricultural tenant. Relief is asked for the occupier as well as the owner of land, each of whom is in turn represented as bearing the full weight of the rates. But if the consumer pays the rates in the price of his food, their grievance is gone. If, however, relief be asked, as it has been, to save the tenant from ruin in these times of agricultural depression, I am afraid not even the total abolition of the local rates would aid the farmer much. The distress of the farmers of late years has not been caused by the rates being 3s. or 4s. in the pound, but because, owing to bad seasons, the produce of many an acre of land has been reduced in value by some £3 or £4. It is very difficult to trace the exact incidence of the rates. It has been reckoned that on an average a quarter of the rates falls on the agricultural occupier, and three quarters are paid by the owner and comes out of the rent. The agricultural rates have been differently estimated at from £7,000,000 to £10,000,000, and about one quarter of that amount—or from £1,500,000 to £2,500,000—is paid by the agricultural tenants. What would the remission of the whole of that one-fourth which falls to their share be compared with the loss of £25,000,000 or £30,000,000 which the tenants suffer by an unfavourable season? We talk of rates of 3s. or 4s. in the pound being a terrible burden; but supposing one quarter of them be actually paid out of the pocket of the agricultural tenant, the tenant's share of that would be, at most, 1s. in the pound. And what is the 3s. or 4s. in the pound levied upon? Why, upon the rateable value. And what is the rateable value? It is less than the rent. Therefore, the total rate means less than 3s. or 4s. in the pound of the actual rent; and the tenant's share really means less than 1s. in the pound upon his rent. If land in this country is, as some people think, permanently depreciated in value, and agriculture is not likely to recover, you will not sensibly relieve the tenant by taking off 3d. or 6d. or 1s. in the pound, or even 3s. or 4s. from the rates. I am not speaking of the landowner; but what the tenant must look to, if this be the case for relief, is a charge eight times heavier than the whole amount of the rates, and 30 times heavier than his share of them—namely, the rent. That is the source to which he must look if the land in this country is permanently depreciated in value for adequate relief. I am not going to enter into any abstruse theory as to rent; but I may state, in the simplest form, that the farmer is content to farm for the ordinary rate of profit upon the floating capital he employs. All that is realized above that profit is rent. That is the simple way of stating it. But if there is no such margin, one of two things will happen. Either the owner of the land must allow the tenant to have it rent free, or he must farm it himself for the sake of the profit to be made on the capital employed in its cultivation, and be content to forego interest on the capital he has invested in the purchase of the land. I do not want to detain the House with arguments upon this question; but I wish to keep two points clearly before hon. Members—That although it is quite right and proper that personalty should be brought to contribute in aid of realty to the burden of local rates, it is not desirable that taxes should be imposed upon labour for that purpose. Further, it is futile to calculate that the agricultural tenant can be kept on his legs by aid given to the local rates if the land is permanently depreciated and the agriculture of the country is doomed not to recover. I do not say that that is the case at all. I myself do not believe it. I do not think that land has depreciated in value permanently. I believe that in the natural course of affairs, with good seasons, things will come round again. With regard to the Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), I object to it on account of its vagueness, and of the still greater vagueness of the speeches by which it has been supported. The Government are thoroughly in earnest, whatever hon. Gentlemen opposite may say, in their desire to deal with the question. A Liberal Government, through my right hon. Friend the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), brought in the only Bill ever introduced which dealt comprehensively with the subject. I myself, when President of the Local Government Board, had a Bill prepared and on the eve of being introduced early in the Session of 1882; and I very much regret that the sad event, which all sides will remember, rendered it impossible that anything could be done in that year. My right hon. Friend, my Successor in that Office, now has a Bill prepared, and will introduce it as soon as the state of Business in the House will permit. Under these circumstances, I am not disposed to accept the vague Resolution of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell); but I will support the Motion for going into Committee of Supply.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I do not know whether it is altogether fair to describe the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire, and the speech he has made in its support, as being wanting in clearness, or being vague, or uncertain; but one thing I think is perfectly clear—that if the proposal and speeches of my hon. Friend and those who support him are vague, those of the Government, as represented by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, are a hundred times more vague. The right hon. Gentleman has given us a most glowing picture of all the good intentions on this subject with which the various Cabinets with which he has been connected since 1872 have been paved. He has laid great stress upon the magnificent proposal which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon made in 1872, which he characterized as a real, great, substantial proposal for dealing with this question of local taxation. Well, I do remember that there was a proposal made in that year by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon at that time; but I really forget what became of it, and I think very few people could tell us anything about it now. It remains in our minds as the vaguest possible shadow; and, indeed, as far as I can remember, although the proposal was brought forward, it never was brought to a discussion by the Government of the day. That appears in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman to be all that is necessary to do—to make some shadowy proposal, and not to submit it for discussion at all, and then to think that the Government have done a great deal. We did a great deal more, although my noble Friend the Member for Barnstaple (Viscount Lymington) looks upon it as so simple a matter that he quite forgot it. No doubt the grant we made is, in the eyes of hon. Gentlemen opposite, a very small matter in comparison with the magnificent results of the treatment of the subject by a Liberal Government. We have had the magnificent Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon, which never came on for discussion, and then we had something even better than that. We had a Bill which was actually drawn on the subject, which was actually drawn by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. We are told that it was drawn in the year 1882, just 10 years after the measure of the right hon. Member for Ripon. That, of course, was very far superior to anything that was ever done by the Conservative Government; but, unfortunately, that Bill never saw the light at all. We are, therefore, unable to contrast it even with the plan of the right hon. Member for Ripon. We know nothing at all about it, and what its provisions were we have no knowledge whatever of. Then, tonight, we have something that is a greater advance than anything else, because we have a Bill shadowed forth in the speech of the President of the Local Government Board. That appears to me to be the way in which the present Government always conduct their Business now. When they have a difficult subject to deal with, they do not put their views into the form of a Bill; that would be altogether wrong; but they embody them in a speech made by some Minister who is more or less connected with the subject-matter. And, Sir, on how many occasions have they done this in the course of the present Session? Certainly this is not the first time that such a course has been adopted. It is a verification of the old saying—“C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas la guerre.” It is in these circumstances that my hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) comes forward and says—“After all, with all these promises, are you going to do anything or nothing in the matter?" Even the poor £2,000,000 which my noble Friend the Member for Barnstaple (Viscount Lymington) thought entirely beneath his notice—even that I venture to think was better than nothing. But now we are told—"You do not ask for anything. You do not come forward and say this is what we ask and propose. You are so vague in your ideas that they are not worth taking notice of." We make no proposition in the matter, because we are conscious that in this matter we are in the hands of the Government. It would be absolutely impossible for my hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire, or for anybody on this side of the House, or for anyone, indeed, except Her Majesty's Government, to come forward with any practical proposal in the matter. We have no right to do so. It is a question of finance, and a question in regard to which the initiatory duty must lie with Her Majesty's Government, and my hon. Friend would have been to blame if he had come forward with some cut-and-dried scheme. Her Majesty's Government would at once have said that, the proposal being absurd and impossible, they were justified in setting it aside. My hon. Friend comes forward and says—"We have been waiting a long time. We are suffering greatly, and we ask for something in the way of real and substantial relief. You tell us, as you have told us scores of times, that nothing can be done until we have a reform or alteration of the system of local government." Well, Sir, my hon. Friend and we on our part are not at all unwilling to consider any proposals for the reform of local government which Her Majesty's Government may think fit to make; but for Heaven's sake give us something! At present you do nothing at all, and your proposals are so vague, and your schemes so magnificent, that you tell us this is not the time nor the season for dealing with them. I really would ask the House what is the upshot of the proposal of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster? What has he told us in the speech to which we have just listened? It is very difficult to get at his exact views of the situation. Does he propose to do anything, or does he not? Does he think anything is wanted, or does he not? Sometimes we thought he was admitting the pressure and burden, and was about to say that it was a matter the Government were prepared to relieve. At other times he seemed to say there was no burden and no pressure at all, and that it was nonsense to suppose the rates had anything to do with the depressed state of agriculture. It was not the rates, he said, but the rent. Now, that is a very easy way of getting rid of the matter; but we want to know from the Government, will they tell us that there is nothing wanted, or, if there is something wanted, are they prepared to deal with the matter, and give us the relief wanted? Let them give it to us in their own way, and let us have something to discuss. At present, they bandy a few words about the condition of agriculture; and they tell us that, after all, we do not understand political economy. That really is the upshot of what the right hon. Gentleman has said; and it brings me to the remarkable statement made by the right hon. Gentleman, in the course of his speech, that imposts upon land cannot increase the cost of food. To what extent they may increase it is one question; but that the imposts on the land have a tendency to increase the cost of the production of the land is a proposition which—we may be the "stupid Party"—but even the "stupid Party" can perceive. The hon. Member, in making his demand, has merely, I am sure, given utterance to cries of distress, which will find a response in the bosoms of the large majority of the agriculturists in this country. There can be no doubt whatever that the agriculturists are feeling strongly the pressure of these burdens upon them. They cannot help feeling the great pressure of the incidence of these burdens which are imposed upon them, not for local, but for national purposes; and they ask, in a modest and temperate manner, that some relief be given to a state of things which is fast becoming intolerable. Are we to be satisfied with the sort of answer which has been given to-night? I do not anticipate that those who are really suffering and feeling the pressure of these burdens will be satisfied with an answer of this kind. I think that my hon. Friend has done good service in calling attention to this matter on this occasion, and in demanding to have some satisfactory assurance from Her Majesty's Government.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he was sorry to interpose in the debate after the right hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House. He would have been prepared to address the House earlier, but he had unfortunately failed to catch the Speaker's eye. As, however, no Irish Member had spoken, and as he had heard the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster broach doctrines which would be considered the vilest heresy in his part of the country, he felt that it was necessary he should say a few words upon the subject before the debate was brought to a close. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had assured the House that the occupier only paid one-fourth of the rates, while the landlord paid the remaining three-fourths. It was exactly the opposite in his part of the country; the occupier paid three-fourths of the rates and the landlord only one-fourth. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had also assured the House that any aid given to local taxation would not affect the occupier at all—that if there were any remission of rates it would exclusively benefit the owner, and would be of no use to the farmer and occupier. Now, if there was one subject which his constituents, and particularly the farmers, were continually dunning into his ears, it was the necessity of some reform in the levying of local taxation and the desirability of obtaining aid from the Imperial finances towards the new rent the farmers were now called upon to pay. If the contention of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was right, then all he (Colonel Nolan) could say was that the farmers in his part of the country and all this constituents were wrong. His own opinion, however, was that they were perfectly right. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said, among other things, that the rates imposed upon the land did not affect the cost of food to the consumer. The right hon. Gentleman had been answered to a certain extent by the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), who had pointed out that they could not make food cheaper by putting heavy imposts upon the occupier in the shape of local rates. In some of the baronies with which he was acquainted rates amounting to 10*s.* and 12*s.* in the pound were of common occurrence, and the consequence was that the farmer's produce was deteriorated; for instance, the seed potatoes he was able to purchase were of an inferior description because he was unable to afford the extra cost of obtaining superior ones. He could point out numerous cases where the existing heavy rates had had a material effect in increasing the price of food; and he had no doubt, if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary were appealed to, he would at once say that the facts were not exaggerated. He did not think the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had got himself well up in his case, or he might have made a point against the Conservative Government when it was denied that they had imposed a new tax? What did they say about the explosives tax? That was put on by a Conservative Government, and it had to be paid for out of the very limited resources of the Irish people. The owners and occupiers of land in Ireland had not only to pay rates for the poor, but for cemeteries, and for sanitary laws, which were simply a piece of philanthropic nonsense in his part of the country. Sanitary arrangements might be suitable for large and densely populated towns; but in the country districts, where there was plenty of pure air and not always an over-abundance of food, they were in the habit of crippling the unfortunate occupier and taking away from him the means of obtaining food in order that he might improve the air. Then, in addition, the owners and occupiers of land had also to pay for the preparation of the voting lists, which was looked upon as a great grievance, and cost a good deal of money. He certainly hoped that before long the cost would be decreased, and he was of opinion that the charge itself should be borne by the Imperial Exchequer and not by the tenant. Then, again, the tenants paid heavily for doctors; but they did not object to that, because they did get advantage from the medical services rendered; but they had to pay for veterinary surgeons, for certain matters connected with emigration, and for many other purposes. In regard to emigration, he thought there were a great many charges thrown upon the rates which ought to be paid from Imperial resources. He must say that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was the only person who had attempted, in opposing the Motion, to evade the real question at issue. As a general rule all other speakers had alluded to the question, although they might not have argued it altogether fairly, and had said that they did not object to diminish the local rates. It was a fair question whether the existing charges ought to be borne by local taxation or by the Imperial Exchequer. No doubt, Imperial taxation was not named in the Resolution of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell); but it was well known to be most unpopular throughout the country to require the local rates to pay for charges which ought to be defrayed by Imperial taxation, and the President of the Local Government Board and the noble Lord the Member for Barnstaple (Viscount Lymington) both made assertions which might be tied up in a bundle and put aside for three or four years. They were excellent speeches in favour of the reform of local government when the proper time arrived; but they had very little to do with the question which the House had been called upon to discuss. The real question was, who was to pay for the maintenance of the poor, and the many other expenses he had enumerated which were now met by local taxation? He contended that they ought not to fall three-fourths on the occupier and one-fourth on the owner of the land, but that a certain portion of them should be paid by the fundholders and the personalty of the country. At present this description of property altogether escaped taxation, and he did not see why it should not be made to contribute its fair share. At the present moment the farmers, who were poor enough themselves, bore all the burden of the poor, except a very small portion of it that was contributed from Imperial taxation. A portion of it came out of the poor themselves, who had to pay a heavy duty upon the spirits they consumed, and a duty which had been raised within the last three or four years. They had also to pay a heavy duty upon tobacco, and to contribute out of their small resources to maintain an Army in Ireland, and to pay the English fundholder, while none of the Revenue arising from these sources was given towards the relief of their own local rates. The real question was—Why should they continue to pay these charges, which ought to be borne by the entire nation, and from the payment of which the fundholder ought not to be allowed to escape? He certainly failed to see why the locality should maintain its own poor. It ought to be a national expenditure, although there was no reason why a certain proportion should not be borne by the locality. Then, again, with regard to the expenses connected with emigration and some of the sanitary fads which were continually cropping up, he saw no reason why they should be paid for out of the local rates. He looked upon the present attitude of Her Majesty's Government and upon the Amendment proposed by the noble Lord the Member for Barnstaple (Viscount Lymington) as a deliberate attempt to shelve the question until the middle of next Parliament. If the Resolution of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) were not carried that night, he felt satisfied that the people of Ireland would obtain no relief for their local burdens. Probably they did not care much about the question in the boroughs; but so far as the Irish counties were concerned the matter was one of the greatest importance. He supported the Resolution, because he believed that the passing of it might have a material influence upon the forthcoming Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; whereas its rejection would only have the effect of continuing the excessive burdens now imposed in the shape of local taxation.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I think that holding the Office I do, and being in respect of that Office greatly interested in this question, the House will allow me to explain, in a few words, the course I propose to take on the Motion of the hon. Member. It appears to me that the question between us on this side of the House and the hon. Member is a simple one, and may be stated under three heads. We agree with the hon. Member upon one point, and that is, that in the readjustment of the local and Imperial burdens some relief should be given to the ratepayer. Upon that we are entirely agreed; but we differ from him on two other points—that is, we differ from him in respect of the authority to whom the relief should be given, and also in respect of the shape in which that relief should be given. Now, with respect to the authorities to whom the relief we propose to give should be given, hon. Gentleman opposite say that it should be given to the present authorities. Hon. Members opposite say that now at the present time relief should be given to the present authorities. We, on the other hand, say that the relief should be given simultaneously with the constitution of representative local government; and we have undertaken, following a Bill for the better government of the Municipality of the Metropolis, that the next large question shall be how to deal with the better constitution of the local authorities. So much for the question as to the authorities to whom relief should be given. Next, as to the manner in which the relief should be given. Hon. Gentlemen opposite say that the present system of subventions should be continued. Now, we, on the other hand, say that the additional relief should be given in the shape of power to raise and administer local revenues—that the body which has the taxing power should be the same as that which has the power of administration, just as we have given taxing powers to Municipal Corporations. In one sentence, that is the only difference between us; and I will only give one figure to show how our proposals and the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite differ with respect to the administration of the sum which has been named by several Gentlemen opposite. It is extremely difficult to judge of the precise extent to which hon. Gentlemen opposite propose that relief should be given. I have heard suggestions made in the course of the debate that relief should be given to the extent of £3,500,000, £4,000,000, and £5,000,000. Well, I will assume, for the sake of argument, that additional relief to local burdens should be given to the extent of £4,000,000. It has been asserted that the objects for which it should be contributed are mainly, or to a large and growing degree, education and police. Other smaller and growing charges have been mentioned, but still to a very much less extent than the local expenditure on education and police. Now, I would remind the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just spoken that Ireland has no charge whatever thrown upon her for education or police.

MR. HEALY: What about the Crimes Act?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): Of course, under special circumstances limited charges for police are paid by the localities; but I am speaking of ordinary circumstances. I say that the ordinary police charge in Ireland is entirely paid by the Imperial Exchequer, and is not a local charge. Nor is education a local charge in Ireland, although in this country many millions are defrayed by the local school boards. Ireland, therefore, has a very small portion of these local burdens to meet. Taking the £4,000,000, which has been suggested as a fair amount to be given in aid of local burdens, let the House consider for a moment the practical way in which it would be carried out if it had to come directly in the shape of subventions from the State. It would add £4,000,000 to our Imperial taxation. How could that sum be raised? It would either have to be raised by a 2*d.* Income Tax—and I greatly doubt whether hon. Members opposite would support such a proposal; or it would have to be raised by an addition upon articles of ordinary consumption; or it might be raised one-half in one shape and one-half in the other. Taking the last assumption, half of a charge, which is now entirely a charge upon real property, either in the shape of houses or land, would in future have to fall upon articles of consumption by the people; and I say that such a change in our method of taxation would be intolerable, and would be opposed by the great mass of the people. I undertake to say that such a proposal, whether under the present system of election or under the system proposed by the Franchise Bill, would be most unpopular even with hon. Gentlemen opposite, who would find it strenuously resisted by their constituents. What was done in 1874 was a very different matter. I did not then object to the relief of local burdens made by the late Government; but it must be remembered that I have never spoken against the relief of local taxation in that form. But then, if you remember, the Government at the time gave relief to the consumer, to the extent of £2,000,000, in the shape of remission of the sugar duties. It was not unreasonable for the right hon. Gentleman to propose and to carry out a transfer from the local to the Imperial taxpayer under those circumstances. But the proposal shadowed out by the opposite side is, in my opinion, one not only unjust in itself, but one which the taxpaying masses of the country can hardly be expected to agree to. Having, as I think, fairly stated the difference between the two sides of the question, I hope we shall adhere to the course we have indicated.

Mr. NEWDEGATE, who rose amid cries of "Divide!" said: My hon. Friends are aware that I am at all times very economical of words. In the present instance I wish in the fewest possible number of words to describe what appears to me the position of the question before the House. The hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) has recently made a speech, in which he justified a qualified amount of obstruction, I suppose, for the sake of affording a moderate amount of education. I do not make this suggestion, but such seems to be the inference of the hon. Member for Newcastle. His speech was addressed to the Hotspur Club. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has declared that the burden of rates falls in the proportion of three-fourths upon real property, and one-fourth upon the floating capital of the tenant; but the right hon. Gentleman is about to vote for placing the control of local taxation in the hands of those who, according to his own showing, pay only one-fourth, at the expense of those who pay three-fourths of the burden. Now, it has hitherto always been the maxim that, in matters of taxation, according to the respective weight of the burden ought to be the control of those who bore it; but the principle adopted by the Government, if they accept that of the Amendment standing in the name of the noble Lord (Viscount Lynton), is the reverse of that maxim; for they would sanction the principle that they who pay the least should have the largest control. Again, when the question of subventions in aid of local taxation was raised, what said the right hon. Gentleman? He said it would be impossible to give subventions out of general taxation in relief of local taxation, unless the entire control over the whole was placed in the hands of Government officials. Now, I am one of the "stupid Party." I am not enlightened like hon. Gentlemen opposite. I am supposed to be one of a minority in the United Kingdom; but I represent the financial opinions of the United States—indeed, of almost the whole world. When, however, you speak of the "stupid Party," you speak of the world at large. The French have a maxim, Toute la monde a raison; but hon. Gentlemen opposite do not accept that maxim. You are rather isolated in your enlightenment. You have long seemed proud of your isolated position; but look at the state to which you have brought this country. Is not agriculture depressed? Is not trade depressed? Yet, when we ask you for relief, you tell the majority of the labouring classes and the owners of real property—aye, and of much floating capital—that lest you should detract from the isolation in which your enlightenment has placed you, you will do nought to relieve this distress, nothing in equity for the relief of local burdens; but that you will entrust the control of local taxation to the body of occupiers who, by the admission of your Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, only pay one-fourth of the burden, to the virtual supersession of the owners of real property, who contribute three-fourths of the burden.

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Trevelyan, The Lord Advocate.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [24th March].

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON :

I do not know whether it is absolutely necessary that anything should be positively decided to-night as to the subject which we discussed last night—namely, the adjournment of this debate. Of course, the second reading of this Bill will be proceeded with as the second Order on Monday, and I believe it would be a great convenience to the House generally that there should be some understanding arrived at as to the period at which this debate should be concluded. From what I have heard, I believe it would be possible that it should be concluded in the course of next week, and that it would be a great convenience to the House generally, and to hon. Members in making their arrangements for the Easter holidays, if there could be an understanding as to the time when the debate will be concluded. As I said last night, if the right hon. Gentleman opposite was disposed to use his influence with hon. Members who have Motions on the Paper, so as to obtain Tuesday for the resumption of this debate, then I think it might be possible to conclude the debate next week.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE : I am not sure that it is possible to come to any definite understanding at the present moment; but I agree with the noble Marquess that we should not prolong the discussion on the second reading beyond the Easter holidays; and although there are a very large number of Members on both sides of the House who are anxious to speak, I believe it is possible that an arrangement might be made by which the debate might be closed before the holidays. I do not know that it will be so easy to close it next week; but I think it may be possible to conclude it by Monday week. At all events, with regard to the proposal of the noble Marquess that we should do what we can to continue the debate on Tuesday, I think that is well worthy of consideration, and I would appeal to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), and other Gentlemen who have Motions on the Paper for that day, to waive their rights in order to continue this discussion. I do not think we can now fix a time for the resumption of the debate; but I hope we may be able to approach an understanding.

Mr. CHAPLIN wished to put a Question to the noble Lord, or some other Member of the Government, with regard to their intention to make progress with the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill? He knew that some hon. Members below the Gangway were anxious to defeat the Bill; but the Government must remember that they were pledged to proceed with this Bill with all the despatch in their power. The Government were very anxious to press forward the Representation of the People Bill; but he had not seen any earnest endeavour on their part to obtain that despatch with the Cattle Diseases Bill to which they had pledged themselves at the commencement of the Session; and when he said that, he meant that he did not recollect a single occasion on which that Bill had been taken as the first Order of the Day on a Government night. He hoped there would now be some understanding as to when the Government intended to proceed with the Bill.

Mr. PELL said, he hoped the noble Lord would be able to give the House some notion on Monday as to what steps they intended to take with reference to the decision of the House this evening.

Mr. WARTON said the subject for which he had a place on Tuesday was one which he had brought before the House last Session; but the Government had not vouchsafed a single word with regard to what he then said. He had written to the noble Lord upon the subject, and he should wait till Monday for an answer.

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he had certainly understood that a Morning Sitting was to be taken on Tuesday next for the Contagious Diseases Bill debate.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: With regard to what has fallen from the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), it is impossible for the Government to give any undertaking as to the time when they will take any other measure until the second reading of the Franchise Bill is disposed of. With reference to what the right hon. Gentleman opposite has said, our experience is not very favourable to the idea of making any progress with the Cattle Diseases Bill at a Morning Sitting. After the experience we have had, we cannot think it worth while to ask the House to proceed with that measure at a Morning Sitting at the expense of losing the day on which we might make further progress with the second reading of the Franchise Bill, which I think it would be convenient to the House to dispose of, if possible, next week, and, at all events, at the earliest possible time before the holidays. With regard to what the hon. and learned Member for Bridport said, I do not recollect the circumstances under which he put forward his Motion last year; but he has communicated with me, and I will place myself in communication with the House, and if some means can be taken to prevent the inconvenience to which he has referred, I shall be very happy to make a proposal. I am quite sure the desire of the House is that the House shall not be taken by surprise. I hope, under these circumstances, that the appeal that has been made may receive favourable consideration, and that we may be able to take Tuesday for the debate on the Franchise Bill.

Mr. WARTON said, that after the kind statement of the noble Lord, he would withdraw his Motion for Tuesday.

Mr. EDWARD CLARKE said, the Motion for which he had the second place on Tuesday was one which he had once before tried to bring before the House, and one which many hon. Members wished brought forward; but he should give way at once, in order to proceed with the Franchise Bill.

(The Marquess of Hartington, The Judge Advocate, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Judge Advocate General.)

Mr. PARNELL said, he understood that Mr. Speaker had ruled that this Bill did not come within the terms of the amended Standing Order known as the Half-past 12 o'clock Rule, and therefore it might be taken as an unopposed Motion. He wished now to call attention to the question of flogging under the authority of foreign Sovereigns or Rulers. That was a most important question ; for, without any doubt whatever, the express terms of the Statute which was passed in 1881 for the purpose of abolishing flogging in the Army had been evaded in the case of certain Egyptians attached to the expedition of General Graham which succeeded in relieving Tokar and rescuing the garrison of that place. These Egyptian camel-drivers were attached to the British Army as camp followers, and, consequently, under the Army Discipline Act they were subject as soldiers to the provisions of British military law. On the return of the expedition from the relief of Tokar, or after the expedition against Osman Digna, Admiral Hewett considered that he had power, under the commission he had received from the Khedive of Egypt, to order these camp followers to be flogged for an offence committed while they were with the expedition ; consequently, as they were attached to the British military forces, they were flogged for an offence committed while they were undoubtedly subject to British military law. He thought the House would agree with him that it was a most unsatisfactory state of affairs that a British officer abroad should, under the authority he had received from a foreign Ruler, flog persons who, being attached to a British force, came under the provisions of British military law. He, therefore, wished to suggest, when the proper time came, that it should not be possible to put in force against persons attached to any British military expedition, and who were subject to British military law, any more excessive penalties than the British law allowed with regard to British subjects. By that law, when a British officer in command of a British expedition accepted the services of any persons, whether soldiers enlisted under the law of any foreign country, or merely natives of that country, those persons at once became subject as soldiers to the Army Discipline Act. It was exceedingly hard that it should be, in addition, possible to try them under British authority for an offence committed while attached to the expedition under the provisions of another code. It was highly improper that British officers should be permitted to have recourse to the barbarous practice of flogging, especially when that form of punishment had been especially condemned by Act of Parliament. They all remembered the discussions which had taken place on the question of flogging. He was certain that when the present Government brought forward their Bill abolishing flogging in the Army and Navy, it was not supposed it would be possible for any British officer in the future to run a coach-and-six through the Statute, and to flog persons without the authority of the law. It was in order to avoid a repetition of such a great scandal that he desired to draw attention, on the Committee stage of the Bill, to these matters, and to ask the House to insert provisions to prevent anything of the kind happening in the future. They knew that, under the provisions of the Egyptian Naval Code, Admiral Sir William Hewett had flogged men, utterly ignoring the English law ; and he (Mr. Parnell) would ask Her Majesty's Government whether they intended to assert that the Queen's officers were to be entitled to inflict that punishment ? It so happened that he could only ask the protection of Parliament for a very limited class of Egyptians who had been in the service of Her Majesty during the recent campaigns. As regarded the soldiers of the Regular Egyptian Army, they had been under the authority of their own officers, and he did not seek any protection for them. As a matter of fact a large number of those men, in addition to the 16 carriers or camel-drivers, had been flogged ; but, as they, undoubtedly, were not subject to the Army Discipline Act, but to the provisions of the Egyptian military law, he did not feel himself at liberty to interfere on their behalf. Where, however, it was established that persons subject to the British military law, had been flogged under another military code, and that punishments had been inflicted upon them that were disgusting to Parliament, and which had been expressly repealed and abrogated by Parliament, he had a right to ask that provisions should be inserted in this Annual Army Act which would render the recurrence of such a thing utterly impossible. He did not intend to prolong the discussion on this stage of the Bill ; but he wished to ask the Government whether they would afford an opportunity, in Committee, for drawing attention to this important matter at a reasonable hour, so that hon. Members might be able to enlist the sympathies of the House on the subject at a time when it would be possible to have it properly discussed?

MR. SEXTON said, that with regard to the disgraceful acts referred to by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), although it could be understood that British officers proceeding to a foreign country might receive authority which would give them new powers subsidiary to those already conferred upon them by the Government at home, it was not to be conceived that they could receive powers conflicting with those vested in them by that Government. The course he (Mr. Sexton) intended to pursue this year was the one he had pursued in former years as to the disgraceful condition of the law in regard to the liability of the military to maintain their wives and children. The first provision of the law to which he took exception was that which rendered it necessary, before the case of the woman who had a claim on a soldier as his wife, or of the woman who, not being his wife, had a claim on him in the matter of the paternity of her children, came before the Court—it might be in a place far distant from that in which the soldier was located—for such woman to lodge a sum sufficient to defray the expenses of the man to the Court and back again from the Court to the barracks. The next thing to which he took exception was that shameful order which enabled the soldier to use the plea of foreign service to avoid the claims of the woman; and the next was as to the amount paid by the soldier to the woman. He would ask that the Committee should be fixed for a day not earlier than Thursday, so that the House might have reasonable notice of its coming on.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I am sure Her Majesty's Government will be pleased to consider any proposal that may be made by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) in relation to the question which he has brought before the House. I do not know how it will be in his power to make provision in this Bill against the recurrence of what is alleged to have taken place at Suakin. It must be remembered that, as yet, we have no accurate account of what actually did take place. We have only the statements of newspaper correspondents on the subject; for all we learn from Admiral Hewett is that he punished—

he does not say in what manner—certain camp followers of General Graham who had disobeyed orders. There will be some difficulty, I am afraid, in putting into the Army Act provisions which will restrict the power of the Governor of a place invested with authority over the whole of that place by a Foreign Government. However, the subject is one for consideration in Committee. As to the question raised by the hon. Member for the City of Cork, as well as that raised by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), we have no desire to prevent discussion. We will put down the Committee stage for Thursday, and take it as the second Order of the Day. I trust it may be reached in time for the discussion of the points which have been now raised.

MR. HEALY wished to point out to the noble Marquess that the Government were endeavouring to fix Thursday for the Division on the Franchise Bill. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT dissented.] The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary (Sir William Harcourt) shook his head, but he (Mr. Healy) believed he was right in what he said. ["No, no!"] He was only repeating what had been said in the hearing of the House. If the Division were taken on Thursday, they all knew it would be late—no big Divisions ever took place until somewhere about half-past 2 in the morning. Surely such an hour as that would not be a time to take the discussion of a point like that raised by the hon. Member for the City of Cork; therefore, he might assume that if the Division on the Franchise Bill was taken on Thursday, the Committee stage of the Army Bill would not be taken on that day. As to the alleged cases of flogging at Suakin, the noble Marquess declared he had no information on the point, and that the statements which had been made on the subject had come from newspaper correspondents. Well, were hon. Members to dispute and refuse to receive the statements of newspaper correspondents when they were derogatory to the Army, and accept them only when they were in laudation of that branch of the Service? In the future, when newspaper correspondents described a brilliant charge, and the Army was accorded the fullest measure of unstinted praise that could be poured forth, were we to accept all that was said as true; but when our soldiers were accused of the assassination of their opponents, and our officers were charged with flogging offenders, we were to wait for the Admiral's despatches. In this matter the Government seemed to be playing the game of "Heads we win, tails you lose." He regarded many of the newspaper correspondents as conspiratorial liars, who might be relied upon, as a rule, not to say anything adverse to their country's honour. They were the greatest of "Jingoes;" and he did not believe that if they saw their own Army beaten they would say so—like the Roman warrior, they would cover their face in their cloak so that they might not see what was going on. Therefore, when he saw a newspaper correspondent chronicling such a circumstance as the flogging of unfortunate Egyptian carriers, seeing that it told against the correspondent himself, he (Mr. Healy) was inclined to accept it as the truth. The noble Marquess pointed out how difficult it would be to introduce into the Army Bill a provision of the kind described by the hon. Member for the City of Cork. What was it they wanted to provide against? They wanted to provide against a British officer, military or naval, acting in derogation of the Army Act. Well, he (Mr. Healy) himself could draw up a provision to do that in two minutes, and, no doubt, the noble Marquess would be able to do it in half the time. He would say that under no circumstances should any British officer take his power from any Foreign Government as to the infliction of corporal punishment, and that he should neither inflict, nor suffer to be inflicted, any corporal punishment other than that what might be allowed under the Army Act. It was simply absurd to set up this miserable Khedive—who, in reality, had no more power over Egypt or the Soudan than an imprisoned Potentate in Hindustan—as the person from whom these flogging powers were derived. He trusted they would have from the Government a distinct assurance, in the first place, to the effect that they would have an opportunity of debating the question in the course of the ensuing week; and, in the second place, to the effect that the Government themselves would bring in the required provision, and not put hon. Members on the Irish Benches to the trouble of doing it.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (MR. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, he did not intend to follow hon. Members into a discussion upon the Egyptian Question. It was suggested that Thursday should be fixed for the Committee stage of the Bill, and he wished to point out that the measure must become law by the 30th April, the date at which the existing Army Act expired. It must by that time pass through all its stages in this House, and through all its stages of the other House. According to the late ruling of the Speaker, they could proceed with it at any hour; but, at the same time, the Government were anxious to give opportunity for its discussion. If hon. Members would take the discussion on Monday, the Bill might be put down for Committee for that day.

MR. SEXTON: No; Thursday.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (MR. OSBORNE MORGAN): Very well. In any case, I hope the House will allow the Bill to be read a second time to-night.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

MOTIONS.

COPYHOLD ENFRANCHISEMENT BILL.

RESOLUTION. NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That all Petitions against the Bill, presented not less than three clear days before the sitting of the Committee, be referred to the Committee, and that such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, Agents, or Witnesses, be heard upon their Petitions, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against such Petitions." —(Mr. Halsey.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, it was impossible for the Government to agree to the Motion. Where were the counsel to be "heard in favour of the Bill against such Petitions" to come from? Who was to employ them? The Bill was one introduced for public reasons; those who supported it were Members of Parliament; and he must protest against Members being called on to argue against, it might be, scores and hundreds of counsel representing Petitioners. The Motion was one entirely without precedent.

MR. HALSEY said, he would not press the Motion against the view of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He (Mr. Halsey) had been asked to bring it forward in connection with a Petition he presented to the House a short time ago. If it was contrary to the general wish of the House, however, he would not press it.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Committee do consist of Thirteen Members."—(Mr. Waugh.)

Motion agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. George Howard be a Member of the said Committee."

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, he had to object to the name which stood first on the list, not because of any doubts in his mind as to the capacity of the hon. Member to serve on the Committee, but simply because the name was the first on the list. Amongst the names proposed he did not find that of a single Scotch Member. True, there were no copyholds in Scotland; but that was no reason why there should not be a Scotch Member on the Committee. This was a Committee to deal with a public question, and however English that question was in its character, it was only right that Members of all sections should take part in the inquiry.

MR. BUCHANAN said, he did not wish to oppose the appointment of the Members of the Committee, or to insist that Scotch Representatives should be put upon it; but he considered that a distinct omission had been made in nominating the Members. It might be said that Scotch Members would not be able to throw much light on the subject, as they did not possess copyholds in their country; but, no doubt, men like the hon. Member for Roxburghshire (Mr. A. Elliot), an English barrister, well versed in English law, would be able to do good service, particularly as the Bill was almost exclusively a Cumberland measure.

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. Baronet (Sir Herbert Maxwell) and the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Buchanan) had done good service by calling attention to this question. Both those hon. Members had put forward very reasonable claims. This question of copyholds, though it concerned England more than any other part of the United Kingdom, was also a subject in which Members from Scotland and Ireland might be supposed to take an intelligent interest. The Committee, as proposed, consisted of 13 Members, 12 of whom were English and one Irish—the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy). He would suggest that one of the English names should be struck out and a Scotch name substituted, or that the number of the Committee should be increased by the addition of a Scotch Member.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, there could be no objection to taking advantage of the desire of Scotch Members to serve on the Committee. As a rule, especially since the introduction of the Grand Committees, great difficulty had been experienced in manning ordinary Committees. They often heard Scotch Members say their desire was to have a separate Scotch Administration. [Sir HERBERT MAXWELL: No, no.] He knew that it was not the hon. Baronet's desire; but that, certainly, was the wish of many Scotch Members. There, however, could not be the smallest objection to putting on the Committee hon. Members for Scotland who desired to serve on it, and who were likely to have an interest in the subject to be considered and to understand it. It might be asked why Scotch Members desired to be on the Committee, seeing that they had no copyholds in Scotland, and the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) had no answer to give to the question; at any rate, he was reduced to speaking of the hon. Member for Roxburghshire, not as a Scotch Member, but as an English barrister. But if that hon. Member were present to-night in the capacity of an English barrister, one of the last things he would desire would be to have his time taken from him in the mornings when, under ordinary circumstances, he would be practising his profession; and the hon. Member for Edinburgh would not be likely to receive very warm thanks for his interposition. But if Scotch Members did desire to serve on the Committee, notwithstanding that they had no special, if, indeed, any, knowledge of the subject to be considered, he did not see that it was anyone's business to prevent them. If the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Herbert Maxwell) was anxious to serve on the Committee, and would get someone to propose him, the Government would accept his name; or, if the hon. Baronet opposite would propose the hon. Member for Edinburgh, and the hon. Member for Edinburgh would propose the hon. Baronet, both names would be accepted. In the meantime, he hoped hon. Members from Scotland would not carry their patriotism to the extent of excluding all English Members from the Committee and composing it exclusively of Scotchmen. He hoped the first name on the list would be now agreed to.

MR. WARTON said, he sympathized with the hon. Baronet and the hon. Member for Edinburgh, and held that the adoption of the proposed names, almost entirely English, would be the adoption of the first principle of Home Rule, and there was no knowing how far it might not be carried.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, he should be most happy, after the right hon. Gentleman's recognition of his protest, to withdraw his objection to the first name. At the same time, he must say he had always thought that Members were appointed on Committees not only to give information, but also to acquire it.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. ELTON, MR. CHARLES JAMES, MR. JAMES W. LOWTHER, MR. SOLICITOR GENERAL, MR. GREGORY, MR. MELLOR, MR. PELL, MR. CHEETHAM, MR. COLLINS, MR. WAUGH, MR. HASTINGS, and MR. HEALY, nominated other Members of the Committee:—Three to be the quorum.

MR. R. H. PAGET: I would now move to add a name to the Committee.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must give Notice of his Motion.

MR. R. H. PAGET intimated that he would give the necessary Notice.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY [ADDITIONAL OFFICERS, SALARIES, &c.].

RESOLUTION.

Committee to consider of empowering the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to appoint certain additional Officers of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and of authorising the payment of their Salaries and Allowances out of moneys to be provided by Parliament (Queen's Recommendation signified), upon Monday next.

MR. HEALY said, he supposed this was the formal Resolution upon which the Bill of which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant gave Notice in the debate on Sunday week would be founded.

MR. TREVELYAN: That is exactly the case. I think, after what passed on the occasion referred to, hon. Members will hardly oppose the Resolution.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain the Bill on its introduction?

MR. TREVELYAN: I trust the hon. Member will allow the Motion to be moved in Committee on Monday without explanation. There will be an opportunity given to hon. Members to discuss the Bill when I introduce it.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain the Bill on its introduction?

MR. TREVELYAN: Yes.

WATERWORKS CLAUSES ACT (1847) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. TORRENS, Bill to declare and explain the sixty-eighth section of "The Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847," ordered to be brought in by Mr. TORRENS, MR. SCLATER-BOTH, MR. ARTHUR COHEN, and MR. RITCHIE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 159.]

House adjourned at half after One o'clock till Monday next.

ADDRESS OF CONDOLENCE TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, it was my painful duty on Friday last to announce to your Lordships the death of His Royal Highness Prince Leopold, the Duke of Albany—a death rendered all the more lamentable by its suddenness and the youth of him who has thus passed away. I rise now to ask your Lordships to join in the Addresses of Condolence of which I have given Notice it was my intention to move. Ten years ago, the question of a Parliamentary Grant gave occasion to the Leaders of both the political Parties in the two Houses of Parliament to speak of Prince Leopold in words of praise such as are not often applicable to so young a man. Public opinion has since that time pronounced its verdict, that there was no mere flattery and exaggeration in the words which were at that time used. Ill-health, which so often destroys the energy and faculties of its victims, in Prince Leopold's case only turned his thoughts into intellectual channels. He studied letters, science, and art in different lines; and, in imitation of his illustrious Father, and very much in the same spirit, he applied the results of those studies in persistent efforts to raise all classes, and especially the lower and poorer classes, in this country to a higher level of enjoyment and of knowledge. It was only three years ago that His Royal Highness became a Member of this House, and if he did not take a leading part in your Lordships' discussions it was exclusively owing to that judicious determination of the Members of the present Royal Family that it is better that they should not be mixed up in political and Party strife. In all other respects he was qualified to take a foremost part among your Lordships—he had the voice, the manner, the culture, and the thought necessary for a first-rate speaker. He took great interest in political questions, in home politics, in foreign politics, and especially in Colonial politics. He gave frequent assistance to the Queen in Her Majesty's manifold daily political work, and his own strong wish—I may say his concentrated ambition—was to be employed in the service of the State. I do not think it is here or now necessary for me to dwell upon the merits of his private life. There are many of your Lordships who know full well his capacity for friendship, his affectionate feelings, and his simplicity and modesty of bearing, although associated with the consciousness of mental power. I ask your Lordships to join in these Addresses. They express not only your own feelings, as one of the greatest Bodies in the State, but they are typical of the universal sympathy felt in this country, and in the great Dependencies of this country—of sympathy with the widowed Mother, the most prosperous Sovereign who ever ruled over this country, but who yet has received such heavy blows in her domestic relations; and they express feelings of sympathy with that young Widow, soon about to become for the second time a mother, who has seen in one short moment shattered the unalloyed happiness of a marriage which was based on mutual attachment and on love. My Lords, I beg to move the Address which stands in my name.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I rise to perform the melancholy task of seconding, on behalf of the noble Lords who sit on this side of the House, the Motion which the noble Earl has made. I am sure that all your Lordships will be anxious at this moment to proffer your sympathy to the Sovereign and to the Widow, and to give expression to feelings which have found voice, not only among every class in England, but wherever the English tongue is spoken. The bitterness of a bereavement lies in the sudden contrast that a few hours may make, and there never was a contrast more sudden or more terrible than this. An exalted position, high intellectual powers, rapidly unfolding gifts of eloquence and culture, great popularity, a recent and happy marriage—all these things were his on Thursday night, and were all swept away in the few short hours of Friday morning. If ever the sympathy of subjects can carry any balm of consolation for so great a grief to those who have suffered so suddenly, I am sure it will be freely offered, and I am sure it will be kindly and graciously received on the present occasion, even though our words can do little to efface the sting which death has left. My Lords, the loss is not merely an individual loss; it is a loss to the whole nation, and to every class of it. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) has dwelt in vivid but fitting terms on the great powers possessed by the deceased Prince, and on his great anxiety to use them for the Public Service. He had given proof—though he was not able to do it in this House—he had given proof outside of many of the gifts which he had inherited from his Father, and which, by constant industry and culture, he was developing, and which promised a brilliant future. It was his lot to take part in many movements for the elevation and benefit of the people of this country. He threw himself into them with cordiality and heartiness, and, in addressing himself to subjects which, by the very generality of their interest, might have a tendency to become common-place, it was always his gift to touch, in his speeches upon these subjects, some new chord of sympathy, and to give proof of special penetration, of fresh and unhackneyed thought. There was every prospect, if life had been spared, of a career of devoted service to the public, of great and singular talents in a position singularly fitted for their effective exercise. All that hope has been cut off. We have now only to reverence his memory and mourn his loss. In carrying this Vote of Condolence to the foot of the Throne, and to the Wife whom he has left behind him, your Lordships will be expressing your sorrow for a grief which has smitten not only the Throne, but all classes of this country.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to express the deep concern of this House at the great loss which Her Majesty has sustained by the death of His Royal Highness Prince Leopold George Duncan Albert, fourth son of Her Majesty the Queen, and to condole with Her Majesty on this melancholy occasion :

"To assure Her Majesty that this House will ever feel the warmest interest in whatever concerns Her Majesty's domestic relations ; and to declare the ardent wishes of this House for the happiness of Her Majesty and of Her family." —(The Earl Granville.)

On Question, agreed to nemine dissente.

Ordered, That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF ALBANY.

ADDRESS OF CONDOLENCE TO HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUCHESS OF ALBANY.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I beg to move the second Resolution of which I have given Notice.

Moved to resolve, "That this House do condole with Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Albany on the loss which she has sustained by the death of His Royal Highness the Duke of Albany." —(The Earl Granville.)

On Question, agreed to nemine dissente.

Ordered, That a message of condolence be sent to Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Albany, and that the Duke of Richmond and the Duke of Bedford do attend Her Royal Highness with the said message.

RAILWAYS—CONTINUOUS BRAKES—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR asked Her Majesty's Government, When it is proposed to introduce the Railway Brakes Bill?

LORD SUDELEY: I am informed by the President of the Board of Trade that he intends very shortly to introduce into the other House the Railway Bill which was referred to in the Queen's Speech at the opening of this Session, and that in this Bill the question of continuous brakes will be dealt with.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—THE MAHDI.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD COLCHESTER, in rising to ask, Whether Her Majesty's Government have any information leading them to believe that the Mahdi is disposed to accept the offers made to him relative to Kordofan ; whether such acceptance would imply the abandonment of all temporal or spiritual pretensions outside that province ; and, whether the forces lately in conflict with British troops in the Eastern Soudan were not avowedly in arms for the purpose of establishing the authority of the Mahdi in that region ? said, the Question he wished to put to Her Majesty's Ministers bore on a point which had never been distinctly made clear in any of the explanations given, either in that House or "elsewhere." The revolt, headed by the Mahdi, before Her Majesty's Government entered on their recent policy, was one the objects of which could not be limited to any one Province or even to the Soudan itself, being directed to establish a supremacy for a Leader who claimed to bear the commission of a Prophet over all Mussulman lands which it could overrun. Her Majesty's Government, however, had considered that, by recognizing the independence of the Soudan, they would stop the tide of that movement. They relied, apparently, on the language of Colonel Stewart, pointing out that, but for the oppression of the country, the Mahdi would not have been able to light that conflagration, a statement by no means necessarily implying that now that numbers of followers had accepted the Mahdi's mission, and that victories like those over Hicks and Baker had led them to believe his cause irresistible in its power, they would be ready to set bounds to their progress, till, as had partly occurred, their strength had been broken. The first thing they had heard after General Gordon's mission was that he recommended no direct dealing with the Mahdi. The next thing was that he proclaimed him Prince of Kordofan. This, they had been told, was recognizing an established fact. But recognizing such a power as that of the Mahdi was making the fact more significant, which, if it was unconnected with any conditions, tended only to make him more confident in his pretensions. They did not know the terms of that offer, or how it had been received. He had seen that one of the organs of the Liberal Party in the Press stated, as a fact, that the Mahdi was favourably disposed to England, which, no doubt, made it appear more strange to many that we should be engaged in a struggle with his lieutenant, Osman Digna. The same report stated that El Obeid was in complete anarchy, the Mahdi having performed no administrative acts beyond certain executions, a state of things which, if true, did not augur well for the success of the policy which recognized him as a Sultan. He (Lord Colchester) did not wish to express any particular censure of the operations lately undertaken in the vicinity of Suakin, though it was natural enough that those who did believe in the policy of the Government, those who did think that a solution of the question was to be obtained by leaving the Soudan to itself, might have been bitterly disappointed at such a result, and disposed to denounce, as useless slaughter, that warfare against those they had been told only desired to be rid of Egyptian oppression. It might seem repugnant that men of determined valour should be slain by thousands by the mere mechanical superiority of the arms of European troops; but it was clear that the followers of Osman Digna were desperate and dangerous fanatics, neither giving nor accepting mercy, and whose triumph meant the extermination or slavery of all who, whether Christian or Musulman, did not accept their Prophet's mission. If the views of Her Majesty's Government were, that it was necessary to allow no troops professing allegiance to the Mahdi to approach the

Lord Colchester

Red Sea shore, he did not dispute that it might have been a right policy. But their satisfaction must be diminished by finding that all their victories resulted only in driving the enemy into a country a few marches inland, where they could not be followed. Since the Notice of the Question had been given there had been still graver news from Khartoum. It appeared that the policy of withdrawal from a liberated Soudan had ended by involving us in a war with the Mahdi, a war alike by the Nile and the Red Sea, the practical purpose of which must be to compel him to take the step he could hardly do without ruining his cause—that of abdicating the position of a quasi-Caliph to accept that of a local Prince. He would conclude by asking the Question of which he had given Notice.

EARL GRANVILLE, in reply, said, that the answer to the first part of the Question must be in the negative. Her Majesty's Government had no information of the kind the noble Lord asked for; and, that being the case, he was unable to give any answer to the second part, which was dependent on the first. In reply to the third part, he believed there was no doubt whatever that the Natives, who fought against Her Majesty's troops near Suakin, professed to do it for the purpose of establishing the authority of the Mahdi in that part of the country.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN) — RELIEF OF GENERAL GORDON.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STRATHNAIRN was understood to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether the arrangements which were reported to have been made for the departure of our troops from Suakin could be delayed or postponed, as it would be a great advantage if the Government could devise some means—the road to Berber and Khartoum being now open, and there being plenty of water—to render assistance to General Gordon? They would probably meet with no resistance, and would be of the greatest service in relieving General Gordon in his task of defending the lines of Khartoum. He should like also to have some information respecting the health of the troops.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I do not wish, on my own personal authority, to controvert anything that has been said by the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Strathnairn). There is no doubt whatever that we have reason to be deeply grateful for the general state of health of the troops near Suakin at this present moment, for it is very satisfactory. At the same time, your Lordships will remember that very great hardships were for some time endured by them, and great difficulties experienced in respect to obtaining a supply of water; and I rather think that the noble and gallant Lord will allow that a march of 240 miles into the interior, when the climate is becoming worse every day, is hardly the same thing as the late advance of a few miles inland from Suakin. As to defending the lines at Khartoum, no doubt, it is very desirable they should be properly protected; but I must remind the noble and gallant Lord that General Gordon is undoubtedly a very great General; and not only so, but he is one of the most distinguished members of the Engineer Corps of this country.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I had hoped that the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) would have taken advantage of the opportunity of these two questions to have made some statement to the House with respect to the present anxious and lamentable position of affairs in Egypt, and would have given us some indication of the policy which Her Majesty's Government are prepared, under the circumstances, to pursue. I should have been glad if it were possible for the noble Earl to tell us in what manner it is intended to hold Suakin, and in what manner it is intended to relieve General Gordon; for I imagine that both of these objects must be constantly present to the mind of Her Majesty's Government, and that they must surely have formed some plan for achieving them. I must confess that, as far as matters have gone at present, although I can quite understand the hesitation which the military authorities in this country may well feel before authorizing a march from Suakin to Berber—an undertaking which, although sanctioned by the great authority of my noble and gallant Friend (Lord Strathnairn), yet is evidently one that is surrounded with difficulty—although I can understand their hesitation in this respect, yet the particular objects and aims of the policy of the Government are to my mind more shrouded in mystery than they ever were before. As far as the gallantry of our soldiers or the ability of our officers is concerned, we must look back on the last few weeks with the most unfeigned congratulation. There has been nothing but that which we can felicitate ourselves upon; but if we ask ourselves what are the results that have been obtained by this campaign, I do not see that we can give any other answer than that some 6,000 Blacks and some 200 Whites have been killed. I cannot see that any other result has been obtained. The lines of Suakin are just as defensible now as they were then, and they were just as defensible then as they are now. No change whatever has been made in that respect by the operations which were undertaken. There is no doubt that a great advantage might have been gained if it had been possible to impress the Native mind with any permanent and abiding belief in our power and the fear of our resentment. But have we been able to impress them with any such feeling? Is there any sign that such a conviction has reached their minds? On the contrary, is not that sudden retirement certain to impress them with the very opposite conviction? They do not understand the mysterious ways of your policy; they cannot understand that you have made such a great expedition with the mere object of shooting so many Blacks and then coming back again. They must have thought that there was some ulterior object which we intended to achieve, and it is perfectly clear that we have not achieved it by immediate retirement. They can draw no other conclusion than that your campaign has absolutely failed. I regret very much that this should be the result; but the impression of which I speak is the natural result of what I must think the hasty and uncalculating action of Her Majesty's Government. They do not seem, at any stage of these long troubles, to have looked for two or three months a-head of the very period in which they were acting. They appear to have never asked themselves—"If this move fails, what will be the next move to take?" And the result is that we find ourselves forced by the climate to withdraw our troops at the very moment when some advantage might have been obtained from the sacrifices that we have made, and the blood that has unfortunately been shed. This has been simply the result of the miscalculation of the Government. I suppose they have formed some plan for the future. I suppose that there are some arrangements by which trustworthy troops will be left to defend Suakin, the defence of which has been held hitherto to be the great object of all our efforts. Then, I suppose that the gallant man who has gone to Khartoum, with his life in his hand, in order to retrieve the blunders of English policy, will not be abandoned to his fate; but I shall be glad to know by what means Her Majesty's Government propose to attain objects which appear to be so unattainable.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, that before this Question was passed, he would like to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether Her Majesty's Government had received any official confirmation of the news which had appeared in the newspapers with respect to the defeat of General Gordon at Khartoum?

EARL GRANVILLE, in reply, said, that he had heard—and he was sorry to say the news was perfectly true—that a sortie had been made by the garrison from Khartoum, which had not been successful; but the Government were awaiting fuller information with respect to the engagement and the position of affairs at Khartoum. He wished to add, however, that Her Majesty's Government had confidence in General Gordon as to his maintaining his position at that place.

MEDICAL ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Lord President.)

(NO. 34.) REPORT.

Order of the Day for Consideration of the Report of Amendments read.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, he was anxious that the Bill should reach the other House of Parliament before the Easter holidays; and he proposed that its third reading should be taken on Thursday. He had an Amendment, which he would move on Thursday, relating to the constitution of the Medical Board in Ireland. Having added a representative to the Board from the Medical Colleges and Corporations in Ireland, he had time, to give an additional member to be elected conjointly by the Irish Universities; and he had had, as he thought, reason to think that that proposal would be acceptable. Since the last stage of the Bill, he understood, on the contrary, that the proposal was extremely unacceptable, and he found it necessary to give it up. He would put an Amendment on the Paper that evening which would have the effect of giving an additional representative on the Board to each of those Universities.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he could not conceive how there should be any such haste in proceeding with the Bill; because, even if it went down to the other House before Easter, was there any chance of that House proceeding with the measure for a very long time to come? At an early part of the Session the noble Lord the President of the Council told their Lordships that he was extremely anxious to proceed with the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill, that it might go down to the other House and be discussed there. Well, that Bill had gone down to the other House, and they knew well the condition in which it now was. It had been put down for a Morning Sitting, and the result was that several Members made long speeches, and the House was obliged to adjourn. That was not the way in which the Government, if it were in earnest about passing the Bill, should have treated it. During the last stage of the Bill now before their Lordships, the noble Lord had come to an understanding with his noble and learned Friend (Earl Cairns), and agreed to introduce a clause in reference to the representation of the Universities and Medical Corporations on the Board.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL): I assure the noble Duke that the proposal I make is entirely consonant with what passed between me and the noble and learned Earl opposite (Earl Cairns), and is found in the Amendment of which I have given Notice. I privately informed the noble and learned Earl that I was about to propose the Amendment; and I now suggest that it would be convenient that I should propose it on Thursday.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: As I understood the noble

and learned Earl (Earl Cairns) and the agreement referred to, there were to be four members in each University and in each Corporation. I understood the noble Lord the President of the Council to modify that, and to say that there were to be three members in each University and one other member to be chosen.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL): I have given that up.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: If the noble Lord is proposing to insert, on the third reading, a clause that will have the effect of giving four members to each University and three to each Corporation that is an alteration to which I should not object.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL): That is precisely the effect of the Amendment of which I have now given Notice. My Amendment, as now proposed, will give four members on the Board of each of the Universities and three to each of the Corporations.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: I should not have troubled the noble Lord if he had explained that at first.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL): I think if the noble Duke had followed the progress of the Bill he would have understood it.

LONDON AND SOUTH WESTERN RAILWAY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BRYCE said, the Bill proposed, among other things, to take, for the purposes of their undertaking, certain small portions of Barnes Common, one of the open spaces set apart for the enjoyment and recreation of the inhabitants of the Metropolis. In consideration of the importance of the subject, he should have deemed it his duty to oppose the Bill, if it had not been that the London and South-Western Railway Company had recognized the justice of the claim put forward on behalf of the public in that part of London, and had agreed to throw into the common certain pieces of land belonging to them larger in extent than that which they proposed to take. Under these circumstances, he did not intend to oppose the Bill, and he ventured to mention the matter as a precedent which he thought might be advantageously followed by Railway Companies in other cases.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

SOUTHAMPTON CORPORATION (CEMETERY, &c.) BILL (by Order.)

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. W. H. JAMES, in rising to move the insertion of a clause for the amendment of Section 72 of the "Southampton Marsh and Markets Act, 1865," said, it would be in the recollection of the House that at the time of the second reading of the Bill he had moved an Amendment to the effect that it was undesirable for the House to sanction the taking of common land in the neighbourhood of a populous town for the purpose of enlarging a cemetery. That Amendment was defeated by a considerable majority, and it was defeated mainly on the ground that there was a clause already in existence, in the Act of 1865, which regulated the open spaces belonging to Southampton, which provided that no portion of this land should be taken for enlarging the cemetery without previously holding certain meetings of the Vestries, and without convening a special meeting of the Town Council. What he now proposed was, that that portion of the clause which excepted applications to Parliament for authority to take portions of the open spaces belonging to Southampton for various purposes, and among others for the enlargement of the Cemetery, should be repealed; so that, in the event of any application being made to Parliament at any future time for land for the enlargement of the Cemetery, it should be necessary, in the first place, to obtain the sanction of the inhabitants of Southampton to the application being made. His chief object in proposing this clause was to provide that the ratepayers of Southampton, in regard to any future steps it might be considered desirable to take with the view of appropriating any portion of this common land, should receive adequate and sufficient publicity. It might be alleged that sufficient means already existed in the provisions of the Act relating to borough funds. Under that Act it was necessary to hold a public meeting, and also to hold two special meetings of the Town Council; but the provisions would be undoubtedly more stringent under the clause which he had placed on the Paper; because the Vestries of Southampton—and he believed there were five existing parishes which had Vestries—must each of them consider the question, if it were proposed at any future time to enlarge the cemetery by appropriating a further portion of the common land. In point of fact, each Vestry must pass a separate and distinct resolution, and there would be a further safeguard in holding the two special meetings of the Town Council. Another object he had in moving the insertion of the clause was this. He was satisfied that many hon. Members who voted for the second reading of the Bill did so because they felt that full publicity would be given to these points by the Committee to whom the Bill was referred. With the permission of the House, he would state what actually happened. In the first instance, the Corporation of Southampton opposed, upon the question of locus standi, the only opponents of the Bill who had petitioned, and they threatened with opposition on locus standi other persons in the town who were not in favour of the scheme. The result was that all opposition to the Bill was practically withdrawn; and therefore the measure so far as it affected the people of Southampton, had really never been considered at all. It was not simply in the interests of the town of Southampton that he had raised the question, and he did not think the House would look at it merely in that light. He thought that any proposal which involved the taking of common land belonging to the inhabitants of a town was a very bad one; and he was quite certain that his hon. Friend below him (Mr. Lee), and the other hon. Member for Southampton opposite (Mr. Giles), would agree with him in that proposition, even so far as the interests of the people of the town of Southampton were concerned. He had no doubt that both of those hon. Members would go a long way in admitting the principle he was anxious to establish. All that they wished was, that an exception should be made for their own town in this particular instance. But if the principle were once established, and they allowed this common land to be taken for a Cemetery, they would soon have some other community coming before Parliament for the purpose of taking common land for hospitals or reformatories; and he was therefore anxious to lay down a precedent for the future guidance of the House. If something of this kind were not done, when future applications were made, it would be said—"You have done this in the case of Southampton, and why should not the same thing be done in the case of Brighton, Barnstaple, or any other town for which a measure of the same kind is proposed?" He thought that if a clause of this character were inserted in the Bill it would provide that full publicity should in future be given to every application of this character. Unless something of the kind were done, he entertained a strong opinion that the interests of the public would not be sufficiently or adequately protected by means of the Private Bill legislation of the House; but that they would be effectually shut out from obtaining a hearing. In the first place, they would be out of sight; and in the next out of mind. There was one small matter connected with the clause as it stood on the Paper which he must refer to. As it now stood, it related to applications to Parliament for authority to take portions of common land for the defence of the Realm. He was told that some opposition was likely to be raised by the War Office to that part of the clause, and therefore he proposed to strike out the words "for the defence of the Realm."

New Clause:—

(Amendment of section seventy-two of Southampton Marsh and Markets Act, 1865.)

"So much of sub-section (c) of section seventy-two of 'The Southampton Marsh and Markets Act, 1865,' as excepts applications to Parliament for authority to take portions of common land for enlarging the Cemetery, or enlarging the Cemetery from the operation of the said sub-section, is hereby repealed; and, after the passing of this Act, no application to Parliament whatever for taking or using any part of the said common lands for any purpose other than the purposes for which the same are to be so devoted and kept shall be made, supported, or assented to directly or indirectly by the Corporation, unless the application has been previously assented to, as in the said sub-section is provided,"—(Mr. W. H. James),

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time.

MR. H. LEE said, he trusted that the House would not accept the clause which the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. W. H. James) had moved. It did not seem to him that the hon. Member had assigned a sufficient reason why the clause should be inserted in the Bill, inasmuch as the Corporation of Southampton had not abused the powers which had previously been vested in them, but had acted throughout in strict accordance with the provisions of the Act of 1865, which required them to convene meetings of the inhabitants and of the Town Council before any application was made to Parliament. Section 72 of that Act made provision for keeping the common land always open, except where application was made to Parliament for authority to take any part of it for the defence of the Realm, or for enlarging the Cemetery or waterworks. Before making an application to Parliament, it was necessary to obtain the assent of the Town Council and three-fifths of the rate-payers present at Vestry meetings of three out of the five parishes of Southampton. There was no ground whatever for presuming that, in the future, the Corporation would be likely to act in an improper manner. The circumstances under which this addition to the Cemetery was required had already been stated to the House. He might, however, explain briefly that for 40 years 15 out of 375 acres of common land had been used for a Cemetery; and the Corporation of Southampton now sought to add 12 acres more, in order to avoid the very large expense which would be incurred if they were compelled to go outside the borough in order to obtain a new Cemetery. They were empowered by the Act of 1865 to go to Parliament, even without a preliminary meeting of the inhabitants of the borough; but there had been no opposition whatever on the part of the inhabitants of the borough to the taking of these 12 acres. There was one Petition against the Bill; but it was withdrawn; and even that Petition owed its origination more to outside influence than to the action of the inhabitants of the borough. He trusted, therefore, that the House would reject the clause as it had been drawn by the hon. Member on the ground that it was altogether unnecessary. It was hardly likely that the Corporation of Southampton would seek to take any portion of this common land without the consent of the inhabitants. They were the natural custodians of the land, and they had no desire to see that common land used for any improper purpose, or for any purpose that would diminish the power of the inhabitants to make use of it as it was intended. Therefore, if the House consented to insert the clause proposed by the hon. Member, they would throw upon the Corporation of Southampton a stigma they did not deserve; because they had already taken every step they were required to take by law in order to bring the matter publicly before the inhabitants. A meeting of the inhabitants had been convened, and if the people did not attend in large numbers it was not the fault of the Corporation. At that meeting a resolution was passed by a considerable majority empowering the Corporation to make their application to Parliament. The clause now proposed would really make very little difference. The effect of it would be very little greater than that of the requirements of the law as it now existed at the present moment under the Borough Funds Act. He would not weary the House by going further into the matter; but he trusted that the House would reject the clause, and pass the Bill as it had been sent down from the Committee.

MR. GILES said, he altogether protested against the insertion of the proposed clause. The second reading of the Bill had been passed by a very large majority—a majority of 218; and he thought that the attempt now being made to force upon the Corporation of Southampton a clause which would take from them the power they sought, and which was practically given to them by the Act of 1865, would, if successful, amount to a reversal of the verdict already arrived at by the House. His own opinion was that the objection raised by the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. W. H. James) was only a sentimental objection, because not only the Corporation of Southampton, but the ratepayers were—he would not say unanimously—but greatly, in favour of utilizing a portion of this common land for the enlargement of the existing Cemetery. He therefore hoped the House would not listen to the proposal made to it to reverse the policy already adopted, but would at once reject the clause.

MR. BRYCE said, he was not quite sure, from the remarks which had been made by the two hon. Members for Southampton (Mr. Lee and Mr. Giles), whether the House would clearly apprehend what the real point at issue was. The case stood thus—By the general law, a Corporation proceeding in this way were required to go through certain formalities; but they had been exempted by a local Act of Parliament from going through these formalities in case of taking land for the defence of the Realm, or for the enlargement of the existing Cemetery. All that the clause of his hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead

(Mr. W. H. James) proposed was that, in making any future application for taking common land for the purpose of the Cemetery, they should proceed precisely in the same way as would be necessary in the event of proposing to take the land for any other purpose. Surely there was nothing unreasonable in that. It was only fair and right that every opportunity should be afforded to the inhabitants of Southampton for expressing their opinion on the question; and all his hon. Friend asked was that such an opportunity should be given for publicity. The clause could not prejudge the question in any way. It merely asked that, in any application to Parliament for power to take common land in future, every publicity should be given to the inhabitants of Southampton in order that they might be able to express their opinion upon the matter. He thought it was desirable that the clause should be inserted, so that it might form a precedent in the case of similar applications being made by other Municipal Bodies hereafter.

MR. LEWIS said, the object of the Amendment was practically to repeal a portion of an Act of Parliament which was at present in existence; and, in that case, the onus rested on those who proposed the clause and opposed the Bill to show that the legislation in question should be altered. No attempt had been made to satisfy that condition; and the House was simply asked, in the interests of an indefinite number of unknown persons, to subject the Corporation of Southampton to inconvenience in dealing with this public property—an inconvenience which the Legislature had deliberately considered, and had deliberately refused to inflict upon the Corporation. It was not necessary that he should go into the question whether the objection was a sentimental one or not. He would only say that if they exercised their common sense they would refuse to entertain it. The House was asked to repeal a portion of a section of a well-considered Act, and without any reason whatever being assigned in justification of the alteration. He hoped the House would refuse to accept the Amendment which had been proposed.

Question put, and negatived.

Bill to be read the third time.

MOTION.

PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR. BRADLAUGH).—RESOLUTION.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER acquainted the House that Mr. Bradlaugh, one of the Members for Northampton, had addressed a letter to Mr. Speaker, which was read by the Clerk as followeth :—

20, Circus Road, St. John's Wood, N.W.
28 March 1884.

Sir,

By the Order the House was pleased to make against me on the 21st February, I am excluded from access to the Library of the House. For my defence in the argument on the hearing of the suit commenced against me on behalf of Her Majesty for my votes in the House on February 11th, and in which suit issue has been joined, it is material to me to have access to records of the House, which, so far as I am aware, can only be perused in the Library of the House. I therefore, through you, Sir, respectfully ask the House, notwithstanding its Order of the 21st February last, to grant me, until the hearing of the said suit, the entry to the Library hitherto always accorded to all other Members of the House. I beg, respectfully, to add that I still hold myself bound by the undertaking contained in the letter from myself of February 21st last, entered on the Journals of the House of that date.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your mo. obedt. servt.,

C. BRADLAUGH.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Mr. Deputy Speaker, I had communicated to me yesterday by Mr. Speaker the letter from Mr. Bradlaugh which has just been read at the Table. It appears to me that nothing could be more reasonable than the request which Mr. Bradlaugh makes in that letter, and certainly it was not the intention of the House to exclude him from access to the Library. I therefore beg to move that Mr. Bradlaugh be permitted to use the Library of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Bradlaugh be permitted to use the Library of this House, being otherwise subject to the Resolution of the 21st February."—(Sir Stafford Northcote.)

MR. HEALY: I have no objection whatever to this Motion, and I do not rise to oppose it; but I wish to ask you, Sir, as a point of Order, why this letter from Mr. Bradlaugh should have precedence over every other Business of the House?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Questions involving the privileges of a Member of Parliament have, according to the Rules and Practice of the House, precedence over all other Business.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That Mr. Bradlaugh be permitted to use the Library of this House, being otherwise subject to the Resolution of the 21st February.

QUESTIONS.

EGYPT—POLICY OF HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can now state when he expects to be in a position to make a general explanation of the policy of the Government in Egypt?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, in reply to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman, put to me this day last week, I renew—although I will not repeat it in detail—the protest which I then made against the assumption which that Question appears to involve—that I had undertaken, on the part of the Government, to make any statement with regard to the general policy of the Government in Egypt. As regards the Soudan, I am able, after communication with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, to repeat the assurance which I gave last week, that the Government will endeavour, either by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister—or, in his absence, I will endeavour to take his place—to communicate to the House such information as may be possible with regard to the state of affairs in the Soudan generally. With regard to the question of the future defence and protection of Suakin, to which reference is made in a subsequent Question by the noble Lord the Member for West Essex (Lord Eustace Cecil), I hope we shall be able to give tolerably full information to the House. With regard to the state of affairs in Khartoum and to the position of General Gordon, we will communicate to the House such information as we are able to give; but I am not able, in the present state of communication between Khartoum and Cairo, to say how far it will be possible for us to make a complete statement on that subject. I hope, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman will renew the Question on a subsequent day before the rising of the House for the Easter Recess. Perhaps, in order to anticipate Questions that may probably be put, I may state that we have received from General Gordon a message that generally confirms the statement that was made in The Times of this morning, although it does not contain any reference to the alleged treachery of any of the Egyptian officials. The message, however, does contain a statement from General Gordon of a reassuring character as to his own security and as to the security of Khartoum.

MR. MACFARLANE: What was the date of that communication?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The date was the 16th.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I do not think, Sir, that the answer of the noble Marquess is a satisfactory one. He has not answered the Question I put to him. In the first place, I beg to remark that I did not imply or express that the noble Marquess had promised to make any particular statement. I wanted to know when it would be possible for the Government to make such a statement—and I do not confine myself to the question of the Soudan; but I think that it would be right for the House to ask for a general explanation of the policy of the Government. I would ask the noble Marquess, who says that some statement will be made before the Easter Holidays—it cannot be far from the Holidays now—to tell us, first, when the Holidays will begin; and, secondly, when that statement will be made?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, as regards the commencement of the Holidays, we propose, if possible, that the House shall adjourn from its rising next Tuesday until the following Monday week; but that arrangement will be contingent, of course, upon the conclusion of the debate on the second reading of the Franchise Bill, and also on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department being able to find an opportunity of introducing the Bill for the better government of London. I am afraid that it is impossible for me, at present, to make a more definite statement in regard to the Holidays than that. If the right hon. Gentleman will renew his Question on Thursday, I will communicate in the meantime with my right hon. Friend, and will endeavour to arrange, either that the statement shall be made on Thursday, or to name the day on which it will be made.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I am very reluctant, Sir, on account of the peculiar circumstances of the Business of this evening, to interfere with that Business in any way, and, therefore, I will postpone my Question until Thursday; but, unless I receive a satisfactory answer then, I shall feel it to be my duty to press that Question by every means in my power.

MR. ONSLOW: May I ask the noble Marquess this Question? The noble Marquess says that he will place, as far as he can, information before the House as to General Gordon. What my right hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote) wishes to know is, what is the policy of the Government with regard to Egypt, and not merely what information the Government has received with regard to the Soudan and Egypt? I would ask the noble Marquess, whether, considering the very critical position of General Gordon at the present juncture, he cannot, before Easter, tell us what measures Her Majesty's Government are going to take in order to relieve General Gordon from his difficulties?

MR. J. LOWTHER: I beg to ask the noble Marquess, whether any definite information has been received from General Gordon? The noble Marquess says that he has received a telegram from General Gordon. Can he communicate it to the House?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, the telegram we have received, as I have said, generally bears out the statement which appeared in The Times of this morning. In fact, General Gordon, in his telegram, refers us to the statement in The Times, because, I think, he says that he has not time to write at any great length. The telegram does not contain any official statement as to the alleged treachery; and it concludes by the assurance, to use General Gordon's own words—"They are all right at Khartoum."

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS) — HYDE PARK—THE ACHILLES STATUE.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER asked the First Commissioner of Works, If he has taken any and what steps, since the 29th March 1883, to arrest the decay, by corrosion, of the "Achilles" statue in Hyde Park; and, if not, if he would explain the cause of the delay?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, I have had the Achilles Statue carefully examined, and find that its defective state is due to the imperfect amalgamation of the metals in the original casting, which has led to serious corrosion. Before dealing with the matter, which may involve a very expensive process of repair, it is thought better to wait and see how far the flaws in the metal extend. At present there is no immediate danger to the statue.

THE NEW FOREST—WOODS AND PLANTATIONS—RECEIPT AND EXPENDITURE.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If there is any account of the expenditure on the woods and plantations in the New Forest during the last fifty years, and of the revenue actually realized from the sale of timber and trees during that period?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, I am desirous of giving the information for which the right hon. Gentleman asks in as complete a form as possible. The preparation of it involves a good deal of labour, and I must ask him to be so good as to defer his Question for a week.

ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—CASE OF PATRICK MALLEY, OF ROSSMUCK, TURLOUGH, CO. GALWAY.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state what was the amount allowed to the Law Life Assurance Society in the case of Patrick Malley on the townland of Rossmuck, E.D. of Turlough, Galway, under the Arrears Act; whether the amount allowed to the landlords included all the ordinary annual rates and taxes, according to the agreement between Malley and the landlords; whether since the award under the Arrears Act, Malley and the other tenants on the estates have been ordered by a decree at the Oughterard Petty Sessions to pay rates for a period of two years or two years and a half; whether he is aware that the tenants thus treated are in a condition of such distress that they had to walk both to the Sessions and back, a distance of 40 Irish miles, many of them without the price of a single meal; and, whether, in case the sum awarded to the landlords under the Arrears Act was calculated on the landlords paying all rates and taxes, the subsequent proceedings for rates against the tenants were legal?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, that he was informed by the Land Commissioners that in the case of Malley £5 was the sum paid, being the amount the landlord was entitled to under the Arrears Act. This sum was irrespective of the arrears of rates and taxes. He believed it was the case that Malley and other persons were subsequently decreed against for arrears of county rates; and he understood that, being poor people, they had to walk a long distance to the Court. He (Mr. Trevelyan) was advised that the magistrates had no option but to give a decree.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Then, am I to understand that the facts stated in my Question are correct?

MR. TREVELYAN was understood to assent.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the £5 paid in the case of Malley was more than the landlord was entitled to under the Arrears Act.

LIGHTHOUSES (IRELAND)—THE ARDGLASS HARBOUR LIGHT.

LORD ARTHUR HILL asked the President of the Board of Trade, How soon he intends to remove the existing insufficient light at Ardglass Harbour, county Down, from its present position, and to erect it in its proper place—namely, on the pier?

MR. J. HOLMS: Sir, the Board of Trade have nothing to do with improving the local light at Ardglass. By the 11th section of the Ardglass Harbour Act, 1876, the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland are required, at the outer extremity of the works at the harbour, to exhibit and keep burning from sunset to sunrise such light or lights, if any, as the Commissioners of Irish Lights may direct. I am not aware whether the Board of Irish Lights have made any direction in the matter, or that they have been negligent in their duty respecting it.

ARMY (INDIA)—THE KIRWEE BOOTY.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Secretary of State in Council has had his attention called to the recent judgment, by Lords Justices Cotton, Bowen, and Fry, in the Court of Appeal, in the case of "Kinloch v. The Queen and v. The Secretary of State for India in Council," and to the sympathy which all those able Judges expressed for the position of the Troops who claimed the alleged balance of their prize money; whether he will consider the desirability of advising Her Majesty to refer the long unsettled question respecting the residue of the Kirwee Booty to the decision of the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice, under the Act 3 and 4 Vic. c. 65, s. 22; and, whether the residue of the property, taken from the Ex-Princes of Kirwee, should, under sections 2 and 12 of the Statute 1 Vic. c. 2 (the Civil List Act), be paid over to the Consolidated Fund, if it is not distributed as prize money to the Troops?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Sir, I cannot find, in the shorthand notes of the three judgments, any remark which bears the interpretation placed on the views of the Lords Justices by the right hon. and gallant Member (Sir John Hay), unless an expression by Lord Justice Fry, of his sympathy with the motives of Mr. Kinloch, can be held to bear that construction. There does not appear to be any reason for re-opening the question of the alleged residue of Kirwee Booty, which was settled by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, after full consideration and hearing counsel, in 1869 and 1870.

MR. STEWART MACLIVER asked the hon. Gentleman, whether it was correctly reported that the Government of India had refused to give an account of the prize fund; and, whether, seeing this fund came into their hands in 1858, and was not distributed until ten years afterwards, while some of it was still disputed, it was not incumbent upon the Secretary of State to interpose his authority in behalf of those interested in the matter?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Sir, this Question, I am told, does not arise upon that which I have just answered; but refers to the sum, shown as the balance of the Military Prize Funds, in the Finance and Revenue Accounts. It is not the fact that the Government of India have refused to furnish a statement of those balances. On the contrary, they did furnish a statement in considerable detail, and I have asked them to supply still further details.

THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND —THE EXAMINATION IN ARTS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is the fact that a Fellow of the Royal University set the same questions in the honour paper at the second University examination in Arts, last September, in English language and literature, as he had set to his own class at the sessional examination in Cork Queen's College; and, can he explain why this paper is omitted from the College Calendar just published?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I regret very much that this Question was put on the Notice Paper of the House of Commons, as it will be read as conveying an imputation of favouritism which is quite undeserved. There were, I am informed, 12 questions in each of the examination papers referred to. There was one question common to both, and in one other case a superficial resemblance between two questions; but I really put it to any hon. Member who knows what University examinations are, whether such a circumstance could possibly convey any charge? The Professor who prepared the papers states that this very partial reproduction of the questions was entirely unconscious on his part, and that he had not the first paper before him when he set the second, which was prepared during absence from home. He adds that, if he had had the first paper before him, he would have avoided the one repetition referred to. With regard to the non-appearance of the paper in the College calendar, papers are frequently omitted, sometimes by accident, often by design. In the present instance, it was accidentally omitted, owing to circumstances with which the Professor was wholly unconnected. In fact, he was not even aware of the omission.

MR. HEALY: May I ask how many Cork students presented themselves for honours at the University?

MR. TREVELYAN: That is a matter of importance to the gentleman concerned, and I do not like to mix it up with anything else, beyond vindicating his character.

MR. HEALY: Then I shall put the Question again on a future day.

PAYMENT OF WAGES IN PUBLIC-HOUSES PROHIBITION ACT, 1883—EVASION OF THE ACT.

MR. BRYCE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has ascertained if it is the case that the Act prohibiting the payment of wages in public-houses, passed last Session, is being evaded to a considerable extent in some parts of London; and, whether, if such is the case, he will take steps to have the Law enforced?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, there appeared to have been some cases in which the law prohibiting the payment of wages in public-houses had not been observed. The persons had been warned upon the subject, and he was informed that the police had orders to see that the law was strictly observed.

EGYPT (ARMY OF OCCUPATION)—THE
SOUDAN—ALLOWANCES TO SUB-ALTERNES.

COLONEL MILNE-HOME asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office, If it is true that officers in the Expeditionary Force to the Soudan were deprived of their Colonial allowances from the day they left Cairo, thereby suffering considerable pecuniary loss; and, if so, whether the loss so incurred will be made good to them?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: No, Sir; it is not true. I have made special inquiries since the hon. and gallant Member for Horsham (Sir Henry Fletcher) put this Question to me on the 22nd of February, and I find that the officers were not deprived of their Colonial allowances when they went with the Expeditionary Force to the Soudan.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVATE BILL COMMITTEES.

MR. CRAIG-SELLAR asked the Chancellor of the Duchy, Whether, having regard to the recent discussion on Private Bill Legislation, and considering the difficulty, under the new arrangements for the transaction of Business, by means of Standing Committees, of securing an adequate number of Members to serve on Private Bill Committees, he will move for the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the best means of improving the existing system; or, if he does not see his way to move for a Committee, whether he will inform the House if Her Majesty's Government propose to take any steps to remedy this admitted evil?

MR. DODSON: Sir, I said recently in debate that I considered the subject was one of such gravity and complication that it could only be effectually dealt with on the initiative and responsibility of the Government, and that it was desirable that it should be so dealt with as soon as the time and opportunity had arisen. Holding these views, I am not prepared, on behalf of the Government, to move for the appointment of a Committee to consider, or devise a plan for, this purpose.

MR. CRAIG-SELLAR: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the latter part of my Question?

MR. DODSON: The latter part is, whether I will move for a Committee?

MR. CRAIG-SELLAR: No; whether the right hon. Gentleman proposes to take any steps to remedy the grievance?

MR. DODSON: I answered that in the first part of the Question, when I said that the subject was one which ought to be dealt with on the initiative and responsibility of the Government.

ARMY—THE EXPEDITIONARY FORCE IN THE SOUDAN.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, looking to the rapid approach of the hot season, and the reported enfeebled condition of many of our soldiers, he is now in a position to state what arrangements have been made for establishing a permanent garrison at Suakin, and for relieving the regiments at present stationed in the Soudan?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I have already made some reference to this subject in my answer to the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote), deferring any detailed answer until Thursday next, when the right hon. Gentleman will renew his Question; but I may say that although it is apparently the fact that on a very severe and trying march a large number of troops were seriously affected by the heat of the climate, yet there is no reason whatever to suppose that the force now at Suakin can, under ordinary circumstances, be described as being in an enfeebled condition. On the contrary, General Graham has reported that the health of the troops is remarkably good, there being no more than 2 per cent on the sick list.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he would repeat on Thursday that part of his Question that referred to the establishment of a permanent garrison at Suakin.

COUNTY COURTS (IRELAND)—JURISDICTION AS REGARDS WORKING MEN.

MR. BROADHURST asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether the jurisdiction of the Irish County Courts is limited to the sum of £50; and, whether, since this limitation of jurisdiction places Irish working men at a disadvantage compared with British workmen, in the case of suing an employer for compensation under the Employers' Liability Act, and compels them to appeal to a higher court, he will introduce a measure to relieve them from incurring greater cost in obtaining justice?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Sir, the jurisdiction of the Irish County Courts in an action for damages is limited to £50; but the jurisdiction of the English County Court is so also. In both England and Ireland an action under the Employers' Liability Act can be brought in the County Court only; and, whether the Employers' Liability Act has or has not the effect of extending the jurisdiction of the County Court, the English and Irish working men are precisely in the same position, and it is quite a misunderstanding to suppose they are differently circumstanced.

CUSTOMS—LANDING CARGOES OF TEA IN IRELAND.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If there is any prohibition, statutable or other, to the direct landing of cargoes of tea in Ireland from China or India?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): No, Sir; I have communicated with the Commissioners of Customs, and I am informed by them that there is no prohibition of any sort to the direct landing of cargoes of tea in Ireland from either China or India. There are, I believe, 16 ports and three creeks in Ireland at which cargoes of tea may be landed.

REGISTRY OF DEEDS (IRELAND).

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Royal Commission which, in 1880, inquired into the Registry of Deeds in Ireland, recommended an improvement in the position of the members of the clerical staff of that office; whether there are seventeen members of the Third Class whose services range from eight to twenty-three years; and, whether it is intended, in accordance with the recommendation of the Commissioners, to incorporate them with the Second Class, or otherwise remove their causes of complaint?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will inquire whether a memorial was received from the clerks of the Registry of Deeds Office on the 14th February 1882, the prayer of which the Treasury declined to grant; whether the Third Class clerks recently submitted another memorial to the Registrar of Deeds, which he declined to forward; whether five clerks of the Third Class have asked the permission of the Registrar to seek transfers to other departments; and, whether the Treasury will permit the remaining clerks of the Third Class to rise by regular annual increments to the maximum salary of the Second Class as recommended by the Royal Commission?

MR. FINDLATER asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is not the case that, prior to the passing of "The Registry of Deeds Office (Ireland) Holidays Act, 1883," the clerks in said office were allowed certain holidays (if the state of business permitted); whether the object and intention of said Act was to carry out some of the recommendations of a Royal Commission and grant additional holidays, so as to place the staff in the same position as the employés in other Public Departments in Dublin; and, whether the boon intended to be conferred upon the said clerks is materially diminished by a Treasury Letter, dated 8th June 1883, directing that no addition shall be made to the number of holidays theretofore enjoyed by the staff, which has led to the absolute deduction from the holidays previously granted of a number of days equivalent to the additional holidays allowed by the Act of 1883?

Mr. COURTNEY: Sir, I will answer the three Questions together. There are 17 third-class clerks of five to 23 years' service; the senior man having that service would long since have been promoted were it not for his unfitness. There was a petition two years ago the prayer of which was refused; the application, I am told, was recently renewed; but the Registrar very properly declined to endorse it, the circumstances being now more favourable to the men than they were two years ago. Some clerks have asked to be transferred, and one has been so; and the Treasury would be very willing to encourage transfers, so as to reduce the class more rapidly. There is no reason for thinking that the present scale of salaries is low in proportion to the duties to be performed, or with regard to the amount paid in other Departments for similar work, and there is no intention of adding to it. The Royal Commission's recommendations were connected with a large change in the law which has not yet been carried into effect. As regards the holidays, the men formerly did not get regular holidays; but they now get as much holiday as is allowed in analogous offices, the pressure which existed at the time of the Royal Commission having ceased. The object of the Act referred to was to enable this office to be closed on the same days as others.

INDIA (MADRAS)—THE PRINCESS OF TANJORE.

Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the fact that the Princess of Tanjore, daughter of the late Rajah, is at present in a condition of poverty; and, whether the Government view of all the circumstances reconsider the decision come to confiscate all the real estate of the Rajah on his cision censured by the late Lord Kingsdown and by the Right honourable Gentleman the Member for Birmingham?

Mr. J. K. CROSS: Sir, I am not aware what are the present circumstances of the Princess of Tanjore, who, however, I learn, receives a pension of 36,000 rupees a-year. Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to re-open any of the questions affecting the Tanjore family, which were finally settled 22 years ago. I may add that it was not the case that all the real and personal property of the late Rajah was confiscated at his death. On the contrary, his private property was distributed among the members of his family.

STREET TRAFFIC (METROPOLIS)—THE REFUGES AT HYDE PARK CORNER.

Mr. J. G. HUBBARD asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he will provide that the authorities to whom the care of Wellington Place is to be assigned, through the Hyde Park Corner Improvement Bill, shall remove the refuges recently formed upon the level by iron posts flanked with blocks of stone projecting into the roadway, to the great danger of vehicular traffic, and replace them by refuges constructed like those of the parish of St. George's, Hanover Square, with a raised floor and iron posts fixed well within the edge of the curb?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, I cannot undertake to compel the local authorities to make the change in the refuges desired by the right hon. Gentleman; but when the Bill has passed, it will be open to my right hon. Friend himself to address the Vestry to whose charge they will fall.

INDIA (RAILWAYS)—THE SELECT COMMITTEE—REPRESENTATION OF NATIVE INTERESTS.

Mr. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether Government will pay the necessary expenses of the attendance of the representatives of Indian Native Commercial and Transport interests before the Special Commission of Indian Railways; and, whether he can state that the Committee will not close the taking of evidence till time has been given for the selection and despatch of witnesses rep-sentative of the Indian Native interests involved in the question of the extension of Railways?

MR. J. K. CROSS, in reply, said, publicity was given to the fact that a Select Committee on Indian Railways was about to sit; but no Representatives of exclusively Native interests had offered to give evidence, and therefore the question of payment of the expenses of such persons had not arisen. He could not say how long the Committee would sit; but, of course, the hon. Member would know that it was not a question for him, but for the Committee to decide.

IRELAND—THE COUNTY SURVEYOR OF KERRY.

MR. BLENNERHASSETT asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the following resolution adopted by the Grand Jury of Kerry at the recent Spring Assizes:—

“That we repeat the request that has been so often previously made to the Government to divide this county, being fully persuaded that the duties devolving on the county surveyor cannot be fulfilled by one man;”

and, whether, when the Government decided to oppose the unanimous opinion of the grand jurors, cesspayers, and magistrates of Kerry, it had been brought under their consideration that there are 2,000 miles of road spread over an area of 1,185,918 acres to be inspected four times a-year?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, in the form in which this application was originally put forward, it might, had the Government of the day seen fit to do so, have been complied with; but it was refused in the public interests, because it was not considered that competent men could be obtained for the small salary which would be payable if the office, and consequently the salary, were divided. It was ascertained, at the time, that there were other counties in Ireland with an equal or greater mileage of roads, and which were in charge of one county surveyor. The proposal has more recently been put forward in a shape which would involve increased expenditure in respect of salaries. In this form the Government have no legal power to comply with it, except by Act of Parliament.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CATHOLIC AND ORANGE WITNESSES.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the Catholic witnesses in the Ballymote shooting case, including several respectable farmers, were taken third-class by rail to Galway to give evidence at the Assizes, while the Orange witnesses, travelling by a later train, were provided with second-class tickets; why, after the engagement of the Right honourable Gentleman, on the 6th instant, that James and Joseph Murray would be proceeded against for aiding and abetting in the affray, the resident magistrate, Mr. Molony, R.M., did not call upon them to answer to the charge until the 20th instant; whether, though the Galway Assizes, at which it had been arranged that the Murrays should be tried, as well as the accused on the other side, had been fixed to begin on the 26th instant, Mr. Molony, R.M., on the 20th, took no step to expedite the cases, but accepted, in the absence of the accused James Murray, a statement that he “would be going to Galway to-morrow, and was unable to attend,” issued no warrant for his arrest, and put off both cases for another fortnight, the Assizes occurring in the meantime; and, whether the cross-case in which the Murrays are witnesses will now be proceeded with, on their evidence, at the current Assizes, while the case in which they are the accused will be held over, as a consequence of the facts set forth above, until some future time?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Catholic witnesses were sent in a third-class carriage according to the usual practice in the case of persons in their rank of life. The witnesses on the other side were treated exceptionally only on account of the state of James Murray's health. He had been seriously ill, his life having been for some time in danger; and the doctors attending him certified that it would be dangerous to allow him to travel third-class. His sons, who are themselves in delicate health, and his daughters, who are of tender years, were allowed to accompany him, as they did not think it would be safe for the old man to travel alone. The statement which I made on the 6th instant, and which the hon. Member refers to as my "engagement" was simply this—that the Attorney General had directed that Joseph Murray should be summoned for aiding and abetting in the riot. This was done, and the summons was issued for the first Petty Sessions day, which followed—namely, the 20th of March. James Murray was summoned for the same day. As to what occurred on that day, I have received a Report which does not make the matter quite clear to my mind, and I shall answer the Question further on Thursday.

MR. HEALY: Has the right hon. Gentleman made arrangements to try the Orangemen by a Catholic jury and the Catholics by a Protestant jury?

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—DISQUALIFICATION OF DISPENSARY DOCTORS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the Catholic Bishop of Achonry, the Poor Law Board of Tubbercurry, and the clergy and many of the leading inhabitants of Tubbercurry (county Sligo) and the surrounding district, have applied to Colonel E. H. Cooper, Lieutenant of the county of Sligo, to recommend the Lord Chancellor of Ireland to appoint to the Commission of the Peace Dr. Flannery, of Tubbercurry, for the convenience of that town and of the barony of Leyny, a populous district to the south and west of the town, comprising nearly a hundred square miles, in which district no magistrate resides at present; whether Colonel Cooper has replied that he had already recommended to the Lord Chancellor Mr. J. Ormsby Cooke, who lives in the barony of Corran, six miles to the east of Tubbercurry, and remote from the district referred to in the application to Colonel Cooper; and, what course the Lord Chancellor will adopt in the cases of Dr. Flannery and Mr. Cooke?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is not the case that Doctor Flannery of Tubbercurry, who, it is alleged, has been recommended by various parties for the Commission of the Peace, is the Dispensary Doctor of the district, and is, as such, disqualified from being made a magistrate, in accordance with previous rulings of the present Lord Chancellor?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I understand that the facts with regard to the recommendation of these two gentlemen for the Commission of the Peace are as stated in the Question. In the case of Dr. Flannery, the Clerk of the Union has been informed by the Lord Chancellor that, being the doctor of the dispensary district of Tubbercurry, he cannot, according to an existing rule, be appointed a magistrate for the county of Sligo. I presume that the rule in this case is the same rule which is followed by the Lord Chancellor of not appointing publicans. That rule does not profess to be statutable; but I think the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) will see that there is some reason for this rule, because a dispensary doctor is an officer of the Board of Guardians, and, being an ex officio member of the Board by reason of his being a magistrate, he might therefore be his own master. The recommendation on behalf of Mr. Cooke remains for his Lordship's consideration.

MR. SEXTON: Well, then, on an early day I will ask the right hon. Gentleman, how he can reconcile this rule with the case of Dr. Nash, of Manorhamilton, who is a magistrate of the county and also pensioner of the Crown?

STATE OF IRELAND—MEETINGS OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE—INTRUSION OF A CONSTABLE.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has received from the Reverend Patrick O'Donnell, C.C., President of the Doon (county Limerick) branch of the Irish National League, a complaint that on the 10th March Constable Brereton refused to withdraw from a meeting of that body held in a private house, when requested by the owner of the house to do so; that at a subsequent meeting on 17th March, Brereton threatened to break in the door when it was closed upon him; that he effected an entrance by a back door in a state of intoxication, and used offensive expressions, and threatened those present with arrest; whether the truth of these complaints is vouched by the Reverend President, Treasurer, and Secretary of the meeting; and, whether their application for a public investigation with respect to the conduct of Brereton will be acceded to?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I did receive such a letter, and I made inquiry on the subject. It is the case that the constable attended a meeting which was being held in a shop, and refused to leave when requested by the committee; and, on a subsequent occasion, he entered the house by a back door. He was not in a state of intoxication; and distinctly denies that he broke or threatened to break open the door, used offensive expressions, or threatened any persons with arrest.

MR. O'BRIEN: Then, Sir, is the right hon. Gentleman satisfied that the mere statement of this policeman is sufficient against the statement of the rev. President, Treasurer, and Secretary of the League; and will there be no inquiry made into this man's most offensive conduct?

MR. TREVELYAN: I did not say that I was depending on him only. I made the statement that he was not intoxicated on the authority of his commanding officer, who was present on the occasion.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—EXTRA POLICE, CORK CITY.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that, at the Cork Assizes, on the 20th instant, only seven bills for criminal cases were sent before the City Grand Jury; whether these cases were of a trivial description; whether one jury was sufficient for all these cases, and got through them by five o'clock in the afternoon; whether past Assizes for a number of years back show the same record, so far as criminal cases arising in the city of Cork are concerned; and, whether, in view of this absolute freedom of Cork from serious crime of any kind, and its almost absolute freedom from crime of any sort, he will continue to maintain an extra force of police there?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, seven bills were sent to the City Grand Jury at the late Assizes, and there were none of them of a serious character. Two juries disposed of the cases, which finished at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. The criminal business has been very light for some time past; but the Bench of Magistrates and the local Constabulary authorities, having carefully considered whether the extra police could be withdrawn, thought that it would be impossible to perform the duties efficiently with a less force than at present.

MR. PARNELL: I beg to give Notice that on the Motion that the House do adjourn for the Easter Recess, I shall call attention to this subject of the extra police tax in the City of Cork.

SCOTLAND—PRESERVATION OF THE CASTLE OF ST. ANDREWS.

MR. WILLIAMSON asked the First Commissioner of Works. What steps, if any, he is taking to prevent the outer wall of that interesting ruin, the ancient Castle of St. Andrews (which is national property), falling into the sea, a misfortune at present imminent?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, steps will shortly be taken by the Government to prevent the further wasting of the cliff by the action of the sea, which, if allowed to continue unchecked, might in time endanger this interesting ruin.

PRISONS (IRELAND) ACT, 1877—CON- VEYANCE OF PRISONERS.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will take immediate steps to assimilate the Law in Ireland to that of England, with regard to the expense of the conveyance of prisoners, and relieve the counties of the expense, on signing the warrant by the committing magistrate?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I understand that it was the intention of the Government of the day that the provisions of the English and Irish Acts of 1877 should be identical with regard to the cost of the conveyance of prisoners; but, owing to a variation of phraseology, it has been held judicially that English counties are relieved from the time of the issue of the warrant of committal, instead of from the time of reception into prison. I have communicated with the Treasury on the matter, and find that they admit the inequality, and think that it should be removed. It would probably be difficult to alter the English law in the sense originally intended; and, therefore, it seems inevitable that the Irish law should be altered and assimilated with the English. I am unable, at this moment, to say precisely when we can undertake to propose this change to Parliament.

PORTUGAL—THE MOZAMBIQUE
TARIFF—DUTY ON TEXTILE FABRICS IN SHIPS ENTERING THE CONGO RIVER.

MR. CRUM asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, if, referring to the letter of the Foreign Office to the Manchester Chamber of Commerce of the 15th March, he could state whether the intention of the Mozambique Tariff to make the duty on textiles about 10 per cent has been realized; and, whether British vessels, when entering the Congo, would be subject to quarantine regulations, from which the proposed Treaty liberates them when departing?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, the intention of the framers of the Mozambique Tariff, that the duties on textiles shall be about 10 per cent ad valorem, has, it is believed, been realized. In regard to the application of that Tariff to the Congo, Her Majesty's Government pointed out to the Portuguese Government that, owing to the character of the goods sent to the Congo, the specific duties in Articles 21 and 22 of the Tariff would exceed that amount. I am now glad to be able to inform my hon. Friend that, in answer to these representations, Her Majesty's Minister at Lisbon has been informed that the Portuguese Government will make the necessary alterations, so that the duties on cotton textiles and on other articles, except tobacco, guns, brandy, and gunpowder, shall not exceed 10 per cent. My hon. Friend is aware that on several important articles the ad valorem duties are already lower than 10 per cent.

NATIONAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND)—SUPPLIES OF BOOKS, &c.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will consider the propriety of giving directions that books, maps, and apparatus may be supplied gratis to the National Schools of Ireland, instead of obliging managers to supply them?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I am informed that, if this proposal were carried out, it would involve an increase in the Parliamentary grant of £30,000 a-year, and be simply a relief to the parents of the children of the price of the school books. Managers very rarely supply school books gratis to the children. I am not prepared to ask the Treasury to consent to an increase in the grant for this purpose.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that in the Model Schools books were supplied gratis?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, he thought his hon. Friend had got enough out of the Treasury to-day.

EGYPT—ALEXANDRIA INDEMNITIES—AWARDS OF THE COMMISSIONERS.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What arrangements Her Majesty's Government intend making for payment of the amount of the awards of the International Egyptian Indemnity Commissioners for the properties destroyed at Alexandria during the war; if the sums already awarded amount to about four millions sterling; if Her Majesty's Government will be good enough to inform the House the total amount of the deficit at present existing in Egyptian finance; whether it is intended to ask the European Powers to modify existing arrangements for repayment to the bondholders by charging them with the cost of collecting the interest upon their properties in lieu of the Egyptian Treasury; and, whether it is intended to consolidate the whole of the bondholding debts, declare limited protectorate, and reduce and guarantee the rate of interest during such protectorate?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, the amount of the indemnities already allowed is, approximately, over £4,250,000. The question of the payment of the awards is under consideration. In reply to my hon. Friend's Questions on the subject of Egyptian finance, I must refer him to the reply which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave to the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) on Monday last.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: On this point I should like to ask the noble Lord a Question. He spoke of the amount already awarded. Is it contemplated that such amount will be much added to, or have the labours of the Commissioners nearly terminated?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: It is not contemplated that there will be any material increase; but the exact figures have not yet been received, and, therefore, I gave what may be called the general result.

POST OFFICE—POSTAGE OF PRINTED MATTER.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Postmaster General, Whether, having regard to the fact that in the larger countries of Europe a lower rate of Inland Postage for printed matter under one ounce than a halfpenny has long since been established, he is prepared to advise the reduction of the rate of Inland Postage on printed matter to one farthing for any single package not exceeding one ounce in weight?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, after giving careful consideration to the suggestion of my hon. Friend that there should be  $\frac{1}{4}$ d. rate of postage for printed matter not exceeding one ounce, I have come to the conclusion that it would not be expedient to adopt it. The loss of revenue which would ensue would be considerable, being estimated at certainly not less than £250,000 a-year.

MR. DEASY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If the appointment held by Major General James, R.E. as Assistant Commissioner of Public Works in Ireland, is a permanent appointment; if the statutory constitution of the Board directs that it shall consist of the Commissioners only, and how, when, and by what authority the place of Assistant Commissioner was created; do the functions of the Board stand permanently in need of this Assistant Commissioner; is Mr. Lefanu, one of the Commissioners, about to retire; and, is it intended to appoint Major General James in his stead, with the result that the Board would be composed of two General Officers and one civilian?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the appointment held by General James is temporary, and its continuance is matter for consideration. There can be no doubt of the power of the Treasury to create such an office. I am glad to say the public are in no danger of losing the services of Mr. Lefanu; and it is, therefore, unnecessary to answer the closing portion of the Question.

TRAMWAYS AND PUBLIC COMPANIES (IRELAND) ACT, 1883—THE GUARANTEE CLAUSES.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If Tramway Companies, who obtained Orders in Council for the construction of lines before the passing of "The Tramways and Public Companies (Ireland) Act, 1883," can obtain the benefit of the Guarantee Clauses of that Act without beginning de novo; and, if not, whether the Government will give facilities to enable such Companies to get Supplemental Orders in Council for such guarantees without the great expense of beginning de novo?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I am advised that Tramway Companies, who obtained Orders in Council before the passing of the Act, cannot obtain the benefit of that Act without beginning de novo. I understand, however, that there are only two Companies in existence having such Orders which have not been carried out. There is no power under the Act to grant Supplemental Orders in Council for guarantees.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE RIOTS AT LONDONDERRY—REPORT OF THE COMMISSION OF INQUIRY.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE, who had the following Question on the Paper on this subject:—

"To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, When the Report of the Londonderry Commissioners, presented on Friday the 21st instant, will be placed in the Library for inspection, and how soon it will be printed?"

said, he would withdraw it, as the Report had been issued that morning.

MR. SEXTON: In reference to this Question, I would ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, if it is true that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has called upon certain magistrates in Londonderry to explain their conduct on the 1st November last?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Lord Chancellor has communicated with some of the magistrates of the City of Londonderry; but I think it would be highly desirable not to state what the Correspondence is until it is laid on the Table.

REVISION COURTS (IRELAND)— COUNTIES OF ANTRIM AND CORK.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many days were occupied, in the past year, in the revision of voters' and jurors' lists, by the Recorder of Belfast and County Court Judge of Antrim, and by the Recorder of Cork, in their respective jurisdictions?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, in 1883 the Recorder of Belfast sat for 116 days, and was, in addition, 20 days occupied in Revision Sessions. The Recorder of Cork sat for 125 days, and was, in addition, 11 days occupied in Revision Sessions.

EGYPT—SLAVERY IN THE SOUDAN.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the following telegram from The Times correspondent at Suakin, dated March 24th:—

"In point of fact the English Government at present practically protects slave owners and dealers, chiefly by reason of the absurd construction of the convention, which ought to be burned. One simple method should be adopted. This is to ignore the evidence of domestic slavery, and to give masters no redress if the slaves choose to leave them. In Suakin such a measure would produce a wonderful effect, for the numerous rich residents here live by farming out the labour of their slaves. They ill treat them if they do not produce each evening the stipulated sum; thus driving the men nearly to starvation, and the women to the worst possible courses in order to satisfy their demands."

and to the following telegram of the same date from the correspondent of The Daily Telegraph at Suakin:—

"According to the English Consul Baker, and others of our authorities here, the Egyptian Convention is in force, and the British must protect Egyptians who have property in human chattels. We have already sent back several slaves to their Egyptian masters, who, the Arabs say, without us, would remain on the Red Sea Coast. Scarcely half-an-hour ago, a slave of a local dignitary, Sinawi Bey, who fondly thought the presence of the English freed him, ran away, alleging that his master ill-treated him, and took service with a fellow correspondent. Consul Baker says that the man must be returned to Sinawi, who now has two unruly slaves in the police station, where they are being beaten into a tractable condition;"

and, whether he will cause inquiry into these matters to be made, and, at the same time, inform all English civil and military authorities in Eastern Soudan that they must not protect slave dealers and slave owners, nor insist upon or aid in the return of escaped slaves to their masters?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I stated last week that we were extremely unwilling to address inquiries to our officers, civil, military, or naval, in Egypt and the Soudan upon vague and indefinite statements in newspapers with respect to their conduct, because it might cause them to infer that there was some doubt as to the manner in which they discharged their duty; but I said, at the same time, that if any definite and well-authenticated statements were brought to our notice we would make inquiries on the subject. With regard to the two paragraphs in the Question of my hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere), the House will see that the first contains a statement which is absolutely vague and indefinite, and does not contain any evidence whatever in support of that general statement. With respect to the second part of the Question, I am not quite certain whether my hon. Friend accepts the authority of The Daily Telegraph as definite and well-authenticated; but, if he does, I would point out to him that the statement is as to something Consul Baker is stated to have said, and does not have any reference whatever to anything Consul Baker has done. I do not think that there is anything in this statement that gives sufficient cause for further inquiries of our officers in Egypt or the Soudan.

MR. O'DONNELL: Without making inquiries, could the noble Marquess say whether instructions have been, or will be, given to the English civil and military authorities in the Eastern Soudan not to assist and protect slave dealers or slave owners, or to assist in the recapture of escaped slaves. Can the noble Marquess answer that Question, without making the inquiries which it seems would be indelicate of him to make?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No definite instructions on this subject have, I believe, as yet been sent to our civil and military authorities in the Soudan, because, until we receive some proof to the contrary, it must be assumed that those civil and military authorities are acting according to what they consider to be their duty.

PORTUGAL—THE CONGO RIVER TREATY.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the honourable Member for Manchester, What course he intends to pursue in reference to the Motion which stands in his name relative to the Treaty with the King of Portugal in regard to the Congo and adjacent Territories?

MR. JACOB BRIGHT, in reply, said, that it was his intention to proceed with the Motion which he had on the Paper as soon as he could get an opportunity. He had balloted frequently, and had failed. He might mention that the Prime Minister had given a distinct pledge upon this question, and the right hon. Gentleman was not accustomed to break his pledges. He assumed, therefore, and had the fullest right to assume, that it was impossible for this Treaty to be ratified until the House had had an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon it.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. E. M. ARCHDALE, J.P., AND MR. M'CLINTOCK, J.P.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is now in a position to announce the decision of the Lord Chancellor with respect to the conduct of Mr. Edward M. Archdale, J.P., on the occasion of the riot at Dromore, and of Mr. M'Clintock, J.P., County Grand Master, in reference to the Orange counter demonstration at Londonderry?

MR. TREVELYAN: This matter is still under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Lord Chancellor has arrived at any conclusion in connection with the case of Robert M'Clintock, J.P., D.L., who signed the documents calling the Orangemen to assemble at Derry on the 17th March, and at Tark in January; and, if Mr. M'Clintock still retains the Commission of the Peace?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Lord Chancellor informs me that he has not had time to arrive at a decision in this case yet. Mr. M'Clintock is still in the Commission of the Peace.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—SEIZURE OF A HORSE FOR TAXES LEVIED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. O'BRIEN asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it is the fact that, on 26th March, Sergeant Cavanagh, of Whitchurch station, county Cork, acting on a warrant to distrain for 11s. 7½d., tax levied under the Crimes Act, seized one of a pair of valuable horses, engaged in ploughing, on the farm of Mr. John Daly, at Glencoum; whether Mr. Daly pointed out that there were on the farm at the time 24 head of cattle, beside sheep, colts, and pigs, and that the seizure of one of his team at the plough at the present season would seriously interfere with the working of his farm; whether the policeman nevertheless persisted in seizing for a debt of 11s. 7½d. an animal valued at £40; whether it is true, as stated by Cavanagh, that "his instructions were to take the horse;" if so, who gave the instructions, and under what legal authority; and, whether, if an action be taken against the policeman for over-distress, he will be defended at the public expense?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Sir, it is the fact that, on the 26th March, Sergeant Cavanagh, acting on a warrant to distrain for a sum amounting, with costs, to 11s. 7½d., leviable under the Crimes Act, seized one of a pair of horses engaged in ploughing on the farm of John Daly. The sergeant went for the money on the 21st March, when Daly informed him he had no money; but that, on the next day he called, he would give the money or value. The sergeant went again on the 26th March, and demanded the amount. Daly said he had no money. The sergeant replied he should be obliged to execute the warrant, and seize one of the horses. Daly said this would interfere with his farm work. He told the sergeant that he might take a sheep or heifer. This was all he stated, but he did not point out any such animal; and, on the sergeant replying that he did not show him any sheep or heifer, Daly then said he might take a wild colt. The sergeant declined this offer, as he could not catch or bring away an unmanageable wild colt; and, after reading the warrant, and telling Daly he could easily pay if he liked, seized the horse, which was value for about £30, and it was subsequently sold, and, it is believed, bought in for Daly, and the surplus proceeds were tendered to him. The sergeant did not say his instructions were to seize the horse, and he had no such instructions. If an action be taken against the policeman the usual course will be taken of defending the officer, if it appears he acted in the discharge of his duty.

MR. O'BRIEN: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman mean to say that a colt and a pair of horses were the only objects of value worth 11s. 7½d. to be found on the premises of a rich farmer?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I am speaking on the information supplied to me, which I am informed is correct.

MR. O'BRIEN: The hon. and learned Gentleman has omitted to answer a very important portion of my Question, which is, whether, if an action be taken against the policeman for over-distress, he will be defended at the public expense?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) was understood to reply in the affirmative.

MR. O'BRIEN: I beg to give Notice that on the first opportunity I shall call attention to this subject.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—FOOD ADULTERATION.

MR. DUCKHAM asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether he has seen the following Report of a Committee of the New York Senate, appointed to inquire into the adulteration of dairy products, as published in The Standard of the 24th instant:—

"Of thirty samples of butter two-thirds were only remotely traceable to milk. The refuse fat of pigs and bullocks was the chief and most savoury ingredient, but often spoiled greases were used which had been deodorized by nitric and sulphuric acids of a strength sufficient to rot a workman's cowhide boots, to cause the finger nails to fall off, and induce various lingering diseases. The material was also found to contain ingredients which are fatal to infants. The doctors, upon oath, declared that the consumption of this compound had a distinct bearing upon the death rate. The Committee advises the total prohibition of the manufacture of oleomargarine;"

and, seeing that an enormous quantity of oleomargarine and cheese is brought into this Country from the United States, whether he will cause an inquiry to be instituted as to the correctness of that Report, in order that the public may be assured that such deleterious food is not sold to them?

MR. DODSON: Sir, we have applied to the Foreign Office to obtain information from the American Government on this subject.

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL—THE THAMES PILOTS.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE asked the President of the Board of Trade, If, at any Conference for the purpose of considering the various provisions of the Merchant Shipping Bill, he is willing that the Thames pilots, whose interests are affected by the measure, should be represented?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, that he had already seen a deputation of pilots—and the deputation included in its number some representatives of the Thames pilots—and it was then understood that they would prepare and forward to him a scheme of compensation, in case their interests were injuriously affected by the Bill. He promised to give that proposal careful consideration, and as soon as he had received it, if it were their wish to have a further interview, he should be very glad to have arrangements made for it before this part of the Bill was dealt with in Committee.

MR. GORST asked, whether it is true, as was assumed in the Question, that there was going to be a conference between the right hon. Gentleman and the shipowners with reference to the Merchant Shipping Bill; and, if so, whether he would take some means to enable the seamen to have their views represented?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, he could not give a positive answer to that Question at present; but he might say that proposals for certain Amendments in the Bill had been under the consideration of the Board of Trade, and had been by them communicated to some of the leading shipowners; and if the shipowners were desirous to see him and the Solicitor General with reference to any changes which they suggested might be made in the Bill, he should be glad to give them an interview. He should also be glad to give an interview to any persons qualified to represent the seamen on this subject.

EGYPT (RE-ORGANIZATION).

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Sir, a Question of which I have given Notice has been so altered and cut down that I can scarcely recognize it, and, by whomsoever it was done, it is an unwarrantable liberty, for the chief point of the Question has been entirely eliminated. That point is, whether Mr. Clifford Lloyd, though he removed a number of officers on the alleged ground of reorganization and economy, introduced, on the other hand, a number of his own nominees; whether the Inspector General, Baker Pasha, receives £1,500 a-year; whether three deputy Inspectors General are not now receiving £1,000 a-year each; whether three additional Inspectors are not appointed at £700 a-year; whether the commandant in Cairo is not receiving £600 a-year; whether Lieutenant Colonel Walsh, late of the 44th Foot, is not getting another £1,000, and numerous other officers receiving proportionately high salaries? I wish to say that, by whatever authority—[Cries of "Order!"—]—this is a matter of personal privilege—I wish to intimate to you as Deputy Speaker, and would say it to the Speaker if he were in his place, that by whatever authority this alteration was made in my Question without any communication with me, or any authority from me, it was a piece of liberty which I resent. The Question, as asked, was as follows:—Whether Mr. Clifford Lloyd has, on the alleged ground of reorganisation and economy, dispensed with the services of several officials connected with the police in Egypt; whether Major Barrow, Captain Fenwick, and Lieutenant Rhodes are Commissioned Officers on full pay, and whether there is any precedent for full pay Officers being employed in such manner under the command of a person no longer holding a commission; and, whether Sub-Inspector Gibbons will be allowed to count his service in Egypt towards promotion in the Constabulary in Ireland?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, I can, of course, only answer the Question on the Paper. Her Majesty's Government have no information with regard to the details of the Departmental changes in the Ministry to which Mr. Clifford Lloyd belongs. The officers named by the hon. Member are on the active list; but while temporarily lent to the Egyptian Government for Constabulary duties, they are not receiving any pay from Her Majesty's Government. There are many precedents, I am informed, for officers being similarly employed. It is not within my province to reply to the third part of the hon. Member's Question, as the subject of it is purely Irish.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—MR. ADAM MITCHELL, CROWN PROSECUTOR FOR THE KING'S CO.

MR. MOLLOY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been drawn to the following language alleged to have been used at a meeting of the Birr Union of the 8th March by Mr. Adam Mitchell, one of the guardians, in reference to The Midland Tribune, a Nationalist journal, tendering for a contract, together with another paper written in the Conservative and Orange interest, to which latter Paper the contract was eventually given—

"Mr. Mitchell said he felt very strongly that Mr. Wright should get the contract, because he has discharged his duties up to this with satisfaction. He thought it unfair and unjust to give it to parties who do not hesitate to use the strongest language towards members of this Board, and who vilify everything honest and respectable. He would go further and say that that Paper has pointed out gentlemen of this Board for assassination;"

if this same Mr. Mitchell is a Justice of the Peace, Sessional Crown Prosecutor for the King's County, and a member of the Orange Society; and, if the Irish Government will continue him in the Commission of the Peace and as the Sessional Crown Prosecutor?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that Mr. Mitchell did think that the contract should be given to the paper edited by Mr. Wright, inasmuch as he had given satisfaction in fulfilling the contract since the Birr Union was established, and because he believed that a saving would be effected thereby. He used language unfavourable to another newspaper, believing that he was justified by the facts. Mr. Mitchell is not a Justice of the Peace. He states that he is not, and never has been, a member of the Orange Society. He has acted as Sessional Crown Solicitor for the King's County for 17 years, during which time he has discharged his duties very zealously and efficiently. The Attorney General for Ireland does not propose to remove him. I may state that I would be extremely slow to interfere with the manner in which debates are conducted in elected local bodies by elected members.

MR. MOLLOY: I wish to ask, whether this gentleman, as Crown Solicitor of the King's County, used the language attributed to him?

MR. TREVELYAN: I do not know whether this is a proper way of ascertaining that, because there is no official reporter present on these occasions; but Mr. Mitchell does not seem unwilling to allow that the words quoted were used by him.

MR. MOLLOY: Will the right hon. Gentleman ask this gentleman whether, as Crown Solicitor for the King's County, he used these words?

MR. TREVELYAN: I have asked him, and he admits having used them.

MR. HEALY: Might I ask why this man, having alleged that a particular paper incited to assassination, did not, as Sessional Crown Prosecutor, institute a prosecution against it?

MR. TREVELYAN said, that he had no power, neither was it his duty to do so.

MR. MOLLOY gave Notice that he would call attention to the matter on the Estimates.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—THE KING'S COUNTY MAGISTRATES.

MR. MOLLOY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it be a fact that the "King's County possesses ninety-two magistrates, of whom eighty-six are Protestants. Of the six Catholics, one resides in London, another in Dublin, and a third in Maryboro'. With regard to the three Catholics resident within the county, two of them are gentlemen of notoriously Conservative tendencies. One of them figured as a signatory to the protest against the dismissal of Lord Rossmore, and is at present a Member of the King's County Constitutional Association;"

and, what steps he proposes to take for the appointment of justices of the peace representing the creed of the vast majority of the people?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Government, considering the matter to be of much importance, recently consented to a Return, giving, so far as could be ascertained in the absence of official records, the aggregate number of the magistrates in each county belonging to the several religious denominations. The hon. Member will see, by a reference to that Return, that his figures are not quite accurate. The number of Roman Catholic magistrates in the King's County appears by that Return to be 11. The Government did not consider it right to make personal inquiries as to the religious professions of individuals; and I have, therefore, no means of saying whether or not the personal details which the hon. Member quotes are correct. The Lord Chancellor informs me that the present Lieutenant of the county, who has only recently been appointed, has evinced the strongest desire to redress all inequality in the representation in the several denominations on the Bench. He has made four recommendations for the Commission of the Peace already, all of which have been adopted, and two of the gentlemen so appointed are Roman Catholics.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—SHORE-DITCH AND EGHAM BOARD SCHOOLS—CASES OF EXCESSIVE PUNISHMENT AND OVERWORK.

LORD ALGERNON PERCY asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether his attention has been called to the evidence given before the Shore-ditch Board of Guardians, on the 19th of March, in the case of a boy "Wiles," aged 10, when two doctors reported the boy to be insane, and the child's mother attributed his insanity to over pressure at school, and stated also that the child had complained that a pupil teacher had beaten him on the head with a rule; to the evidence given by Mr. George Andrews, surgeon, at the coroner's inquest held on the death of a girl named Rachel Gibbons at Egham, on the 17th of March, and the verdict of the jury that "deceased died from inflammation of the brain by over work at school and lessons at home;" and, whether he has caused any inquiries to be made into the above cases, and will state the result of those inquiries?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, the first case involves a serious charge against a teacher of the London School Board, and I understand it is now undergoing investigation; the second has been referred to Her Majesty's Inspector, whose Report will, no doubt, be received in a day or two. I shall be very glad to submit both Reports to the noble Lord as soon as I receive them.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Will the Papers be presented to the House?

MR. MUNDELLA: I shall be glad to present the Papers on the subject.

INLAND REVENUE OFFICERS—THE OUT-DOOR DEPARTMENT.

MR. PULESTON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, by the provisions of the General Order of 17th January, 1884, issued by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, a number of Division Officers in the out-door department are now in receipt of smaller salaries than other Officers who are their juniors in rank and service; and, if so, whether the Commissioners of Inland Revenue contemplate taking any action in the matter?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, this inequality has arisen in a few cases, but to a very small extent; and it can only exist for a brief period. The Inland Revenue Board do not think it necessary to take any action in consequence of it.

PORTUGAL—THE CONGO RIVER TREATY.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is able now to renew the assurance given to the House on 3rd April 1883, that the Treaty with the King of Portugal relative to the Congo River—

“Shall be made known to Parliament in such a way, and with the intervention of such an interval, that Parliament shall be enabled to exercise its judgment upon it?”

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am afraid that the hon. Baronet labours possibly under some misapprehension. I am not aware of having at any time spoken of what is commonly understood as giving facilities on the part of the Government. I daresay that the words referred to—though I do not know—are correctly cited, or in substance correctly cited. I think, if I remember right, that when the formation of the Treaty was contemplated, it was observed in this House that the Treaty might be ratified before the House had any opportunity of considering its provisions; and I have no doubt that I answered, and I recollect well having answered, that ample opportunity would be given by allowing a considerable time between the formation of the Treaty and its ratification. That is the position in which the matter stands; but I certainly never did undertake, and could not, I think, have undertaken, to give a Government night for the purpose of discussing this question, in total ignorance, as I should have been at the time, of what the calls upon the Government might be. There is, I believe, no practical difficulty at present in the case. There is no immediate pressure or necessity for the ratification of the Treaty, and I have no doubt that my hon. Friends and those who are interested will use their efforts to bring the matter under consideration of the House, and I should think it would be reasonable to expect that they would find an opportunity before the time comes, which need not be a very early time, for the ratification of the Treaty.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that, as it was quite evident the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) had mistaken the meaning of the pledge which the Prime Minister gave, he would repeat the Question as to what course the hon. Gentleman intended to take in reference to his Motion on this subject?

MR. JACOB BRIGHT, in reply, said, that he assumed that such an opportunity would be given; and, of course, the hon. Members who were interested in the discussion would exert themselves to get the opportunity.

MR. RITCHIE asked, if the House were to understand that the Treaty would not be ratified until an opportunity had been afforded for its discussion?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he could only repeat that there was no intention of proceeding to an early ratification of the Treaty, and nothing should be done in the matter without the full knowledge of Parliament.

MADAGASCAR—PROTECTION OF BRITISH SUBJECTS AND COMMERCE.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the destruction of British trade to the extent of nearly £1,000,000 a-year, besides much loss of property, owing to the action of the French in Madagascar since June 1883, the Government intend to take any steps to protect the commerce and property of British subjects in Madagascar?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : I informed the hon. Member, on the 18th of February last, that a British man-of-war had been ordered to proceed to the station, and the Consular Staff in Madagascar had been strengthened, in order to afford to British subjects the protection to which they were entitled.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. PELL asked, What action the Government intended to take with regard to the Resolution which was agreed to by the House on Friday night respecting Local Taxation?

MR. CHEETHAM asked, whether, having regard not more to the result of Friday's Division than to the views of hon. Members representing county constituencies on his side of the House, the Government would be prepared to consider the expediency of giving precedence, after the Representation of the People and the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bills had been disposed of, to the measure dealing with the whole question of local government and local taxation, which they had been given to understand was ready for introduction?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had had no communication from the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) on this subject; but he had received that afternoon from his noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) a communication to the effect that the hon. Member had forwarded him a note. [Mr. PELL: I posted it on Saturday afternoon.] He was not finding any fault, and was only explaining why it was not possible for him to communicate with his Colleagues upon the matter. The subject was one of great importance, and had been distinctly referred to in the Queen's Speech. Therefore, if the hon. Gentleman would postpone his Question, he thought he should be able to answer it in a manner befitting the importance of the occasion.

MR. PELL said, he wished to explain that he distinctly gave Notice on Saturday morning that he would put this Question to the Government. His Notice was received with a smile by the noble Marquess and the Secretary of State for the Home Department. He took it in good part; but thought that the Government would have answered the Question.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Pell) was quite correct. If there was any blame, it rested with him; but the Question did not appear on the Notice Paper, and he did not receive the hon. Member's note until late on Saturday evening, not in time to enable him to communicate with his right hon. Friend.

MR. PELL gave Notice that he would repeat the Question to-morrow.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he wished to ask the noble Marquess, whether the House were to understand that the important question of local taxation, on which the Government sustained a serious defeat on Friday night, was not considered by the Government sufficiently important to occupy their deliberations at Saturday's Cabinet Council?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was afraid he should not be entitled to state what took place at a meeting of the Cabinet.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)— RUMOURED ORDERS FOR CLOSING CATTLE MARKETS.

MR. STORER asked, Whether it was true, as reported, that the Orders were issued, or were about to be issued, closing markets for cattle and store stock for a further period?

MR. DODSON, in reply, said, he was happy to say that he was able to relieve the apprehensions of the hon. Gentleman, who appeared to have fallen a victim to an unfounded rumour.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS— THE OFFICE OF SPEAKER TO THIS HOUSE.

MR. DILLWYN gave Notice that he would to-morrow ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he would take such steps as appeared to be desirable by which some Member of the House might be chosen by the House to occupy the Chair in the event of the absence from illness or other cause of the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was sure there would be general regret that the Deputy Speaker should have been called upon to fulfil actively the duties of the Chair at serious inconvenience to himself, and that the House were much obliged to him for the ready manner in which, notwithstanding that inconvenience, he had yielded to the demands of Public Business. The Government would think it their duty to ask the House not to prolong the Sitting to a very late hour. With regard to the debate on the Representation of the People Bill tomorrow, two hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House, who had priority for their Motions, had kindly agreed to waive their privilege, and there were other Members who had also agreed not to press their Motions. The hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) had a Motion on the Paper, and he wished to make a public appeal to him, to allow the debate to be resumed on Tuesday, as that was manifestly the general wish of the House.

MR. PARNELL: My hon. Friend the Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) is not in his place, and all I can say is that I shall see him and do my best to persuade him to comply with the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman in this respect. With regard to the Business to-night, I should be glad to know whether the right hon. Gentleman proposes to agree to an adjournment of the debate on the Representation of the People Bill sufficiently early to enable the Revision of Jurors and Voters Lists (Dublin) Bill to be reached before the adjournment of the House? The Bill is unblocked, and consequently escapes the half-past 12 o'clock Rule.

MR. GIBSON: It will take two hours' discussion at least.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he hoped that if the Bill to which the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) referred was unblocked now, it would remain in that happy condition, and that there would be an opportunity of taking the debate on some future night. But as he believed some time would be required for the discussion of the Bill, it would not be possible to break off the debate on the Representation of the People Bill at such an hour as would enable the former Bill to be taken without making it an imperfect night.

MOTIONS.

—o—

DEATH OF H.R.H. THE DUKE OF ALBANY — VOTE OF CONDOLENCE.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, before the Orders of the Day are reached, and in conformity with the loyal and immemorial usage of this House, I rise to make the Motion of which Notice has been given in my name. The intelligence which reached this country on Friday afternoon, of the sudden and absolutely unexpected death of His Royal Highness the Duke of Albany, when it was made known, gave a sharp and painful shock to the whole feeling of the nation. Her Majesty the Queen is well aware, from experience, that the joys and sorrows of the Royal Family are the joys and sorrows of the country; and so well is that understood and established, that it could hardly be said that there was a formal necessity for an expression of feeling by this House in order to give an assurance of it. But we should ill do justice, I am sure, to the sentiments which every Member of this House entertains in his own breast, were we to omit to carry to the Throne an assurance of the expression of our warm sympathy and our deep concern on the announcement of a calamity, with respect to which, undoubtedly, the suddenness has been a very great aggravation of the blow. We cannot look upon the case of His Royal Highness the Duke of Albany as that of a person who carries no mark except that of high descent and lofty station. The Duke of Albany has been taken from us and from his family at a period which, perhaps, most of all appeals to the natural sentiment of the human heart. When those are removed from this mortal scene who have reached advanced age, even though a sentiment of regret may gather round them, yet it is felt, at any rate, that their work is done. When, in extremely early life, it is the will of Providence to cut the thread of that life before the bud has in any degree opened into flower, deep regret is felt; but, at the same time, no one can measure the loss experienced. But in the case of the Duke of Albany, he had reached an age sufficient to indicate to the country that it had in him a Prince in every way worthy of the highest associations of his station, and possessed of every capacity and every desire to do good service to his country. The Duke of Albany's mental gifts were indeed of no common order, and they had been carefully cultivated from his youth upwards by the assiduous care of his parents, and cultivated, also, and latterly with yet greater effect, by his own mental determination. He was a person in whose case it could not be said that the possession of a Princedom was likely to be a barren and idle distinction. His whole idea of his position was in its association with public duty and with public service, and both the gifts which it had pleased Providence to bestow upon him and the cultivation which had been incessantly applied to them gave the richest and most certain promise that, if it had been happily permitted to us to have witnessed a prolonged career in his case, that career would have been marked in every point of its progress by acts as well as by words, which would have given him an honourable place in the history of his country. Sir, the Duke of Albany, both from his rich endowments, and likewise from the cultivation of those endowments, recalls in no small degree the memory of his illustrious Father; and I think that those who have made themselves acquainted with the sentiments of the Duke of Albany upon the various occasions upon which he has appeared before portions of his fellow-countrymen, for the purpose of putting forward some great public object, will have been pleased to trace, both in the general turn of mind and even in the form of expression—in the whole shape and manner of proceeding—that the Father was in a certain sense revived in the Son. Sir, under these circumstances, it will be felt that the words of the Address to be presented by the House of Commons will carry with them an unusual force and meaning. The primary object of that Address, of course, is Her Majesty the Queen, whose motherly feelings have received, upon this occasion, so severe a shock, and who is thrown back by this sudden loss upon the recollection of others not less, and in one sense even more, crushing. But there is also another Person who is entitled to claim a large share of our sympathy, though, according to the usage of our Constitution, we approach her only through the Sovereign—I mean the Duchess of Albany. The Duke of Albany had, within a period comparatively recent, assumed the position of the head of a family; and it is well-known to the world that, in the choice he made, he exhibited that sound judgment and that careful discernment which are so important in the case of every marriage, but most of all in the case of the marriage of persons of high social distinction. The short experience which this country has had of the Duchess of Albany has sustained the opinion and judgment which had already been formed by those most intimately concerned on the ground of their previous knowledge, and has amply shown that she was well qualified both to fill her high position as a British Princess and likewise to fulfil the duties of a Wife and Mother—the wife of a man of the high character and distinguished gifts of the Duke of Albany. Upon her, indeed, the blow has fallen with unusual severity. It is very little we can do by this Address, either for Her Majesty or for the Duchess of Albany, for the purpose of mitigating such an affliction. They look, without doubt, to higher consolation than any that human heart or human kindness can administer, to be their true support in such a grievous contingency. But yet there is something, Sir, in the sympathy and concern of a people—there is something in a loyal tribute such as we now propose to carry to the foot of the Throne, and convey to Her Majesty and the Duchess of Albany, with the authority which the Houses of Parliament can give to any expression of their sentiment. That alleviation—at least, such as it is—it will be the desire of every Member of this House to administer, with only regret that it cannot be more effective. But whatever can be done by genuineness, and earnestness, and warmth of sentiment, springing out of the deep, the old, and, I may say, affectionate loyalty to the Throne, will, I am sure, be done on this occasion, and may a little, if not greatly, avail in the hour of a sad and crushing calamity. I beg, Sir, to move—

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I am sure, Sir, that the whole House is rejoiced to think that the right hon. Gentleman has been able to be present with us this evening, and that it is through the voice of our Leader, and of the great ornament of the House, that the feelings of the House are conveyed on this sad occasion. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has, in his appreciative sketch of the character of him whom we lament, done no more than justice to the great qualities which were as yet not thoroughly developed, but which were being rapidly developed in the Prince whom we have lost. Those who were acquainted with His Royal Highness had always great hopes of his future, and those who have noticed from time to time with how much learning, with how much ability, earnestness, strength, and power of expression he has thrown himself into the various classes of questions in which he has taken an interest, and the appearances which he has made upon public occasions, must have felt that we had in him one for whom, indeed, much was to have been hoped and expected. Nor is this all. We also know that His Royal Highness, though he might have found, in very delicate health, an excuse for shrinking from work and public life, was one who was bent upon making a mark for himself; and he would, I am sure, have made a great and notable mark upon the position and history of this country. But though there are various topics which suggest themselves at such a moment as this with regard to the Prince whom we have lost, I feel sure that the one great feeling which dominates all others in the mind of the House and of the country is the feeling of sympathy with those who are the two chief mourners in this calamity—the widowed Mother and the widowed Wife. Sir, upon such occasions as the present we feel towards the Queen rather in her private than in her public character—if, indeed, it be possible to separate the two in a character so singularly blended and so marked as is that of Her Majesty for the association of public duty with private affection. She has an affectionate, sensitive, and sympathetic nature; yet she has never allowed her own sorrows either to deter her from the fulfilment of her public duties, or to kill the sentiment of sympathy with others. She is emphatically one of those whom sorrow has not made selfish. We feel that, with one who is herself so forward in sympathy, it is no idle act to condole, for we know, by what she feels for others, how she appreciates that which others feel for her. One word more, perhaps, I may be permitted to say. The life of His Royal Highness the Duke of Albany, who has been taken from us, has been one which has been marked by much of suffering, and by many near approaches to the end which has at last come upon him. That gave him a greater interest, perhaps, in the eyes of all who saw, or knew, and watched him; and certainly must have done so in the hearts of those who were nearly related to him. From time to time we were in suspense lest the blow was about to fall; yet time after time he was restored to us, and, rejoicing in the thought that he had in her whom he had taken as his Consort a worthy and affectionate helpmate, we had just begun to think that his health was established, and that there was before him a happy, a peaceful, and a useful life, when suddenly the prospect which contained our hopes has been so rudely shattered. But in our sorrow we are glad to know that she who has come among us as the Bride of one of England's most distinguished sons will feel that the sympathies of England are extended to her, England's adopted Daughter. I beg, Sir, to second the Resolution which the Prime Minister has proposed.

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to express the deep concern of this House at the great loss which Her Majesty has sustained by the death of His Royal Highness Prince Leopold George Duncan Albert, Duke of Albany, Fourth Son of Her Majesty the Queen, and to condole with Her Majesty on this melancholy occasion:

To assure Her Majesty that this House will ever feel the warmest interest in whatever concerns Her Majesty's domestic Relations; and to declare the ardent wishes of this House for the happiness of Her Majesty and of Her Family.

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That this House do condole with Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Albany, on the great loss which she has sustained by the Death of His Royal Highness the Duke of Albany.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE
BILL.—[BILL 119.](Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr.
Trevelyan, The Lord Advocate.)

[THIRD NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [24th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House declines to proceed further with a measure, having for its object the addition of two million voters to the electoral body of the United Kingdom, until it has before it the entire scheme contemplated by the Government for the amendment of the Representation of the People,"—(Lord John Manners,)

—instead thereof.

Debate resumed.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, it appears to me that the question before us is not the principle of this Bill, but a question of time—whether the measure should be passed this Session or not, and whether it should be passed with or without, before or after, a Dissolution of the present Parliament. It appears to me that the real object of the Amendment of the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Manners) is to render a Dissolution the more probable; and if that be his object I think it is skilfully framed. It says we ought to have the scheme of redistribution on the Table of the House before proceeding to re-arrange the franchise. What does that mean? I think it means an appeal to every interest that would be likely to be affected by the present measure—small boroughs, for example, and dissatisfied Representatives of large towns, with a view to delay the passing of the Bill. Again, if a scheme of redistribution were introduced now, we can easily imagine what an opportunity it would afford for much discussion as to what would be the just share of Members which England, Scotland, and Ireland ought respectively to have. I do not imagine that the noble Lord and his Friends suppose that the Amendment will succeed in its object immediately; but I can understand that they hope that the prominence that may be given to local questions by the discussion of this Amendment may do something towards hastening a Dissolution; and they may hope that, by their action upon this stage of the Bill, they may make it easier for the House of Lords to take such a course with regard to the Bill as might force the Government to dissolve. For my own part, I hope that, should such action be taken by the House of Lords, the Government will very seriously consider whether it will not be their duty to give that House another opportunity of considering the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] I rather imagine that hon. Gentlemen opposite wish for a Dissolution. They screw themselves up to that desire, and hon. Members from Ireland below the Gangway opposite may wish for a Dissolution also, for I strongly suspect that they have some sort of fancy that they have reached the high tide of their prosperity, and that it would be well to have a Dissolution before the ebb tide sets in. The great body of the Conservative Party, in fact, are, I think, looking forward to such a result. There are special foreign difficulties at the present time. This we do not deny; but whatever may be our opinions on this side as to the way in which they have been met by the Government, we think it is probable that they would not have been more successfully contended with by Gentlemen who sit opposite. I do not intend to mix up any foreign question with the discussion of the Franchise Bill; but it is not unfair to say that Gentlemen opposite may have a feeling that it is an ill-wind that blows good to no one, and that those difficulties may, if an appeal is made to the country, make it more likely that they, the Conservative Party, would get what they, no doubt, patriotically desire—namely, the disposal of the destinies of the country. When the Conservatives lay stress on the feelings of disappointment which may be rife in the small boroughs where disfranchisement is feared, and on the fact that some farmers do not look forward with joyful expectation to the addition of their labourers to the lists of voters, it is, perhaps, reasonable that they should hope for success. I do not, however, believe that they would obtain it. When an Election comes on, many questions are asked which are not so much asked in Parliament, and there may be questions as to who are the Leaders of the Conservative Party; to what goals are they leading the Conservative Party; above all, what are the principles of the Conservative Party? But I am quite certain that whatever else may be the result of a Dissolution, if there are any farmers who are desirous of staving off the time when their labourers will be given the franchise, and will share with them the right of voting, they will be disappointed; and they may rest assured that the return of the Conservatives to power would not long postpone that time. Everyone who regards the temper of the times and looks back at the history of Electoral Reform must feel that if the Conservative Party defeated this Reform Bill and came into power, and thereby got hold of this Reform Question, the same course would be taken as before, and they would themselves bring in a Household Franchise Bill for the agricultural labourers. Judging from the past, there may be an attempt, as there was upon the Borough Franchise Bill, to bring in some fancy distinctions and side clauses; but if they were brought in, they would be disagreed with, and there would, as before, be a Franchise Bill pure and simple. But in that case, no doubt, hon. Gentlemen opposite would have the control of the consequent Redistribution Bill; and, judging from their past efforts in redistribution, I think that would be a calamity much to be regretted. Anything I may say will not alter the views of hon. Members who believe that the carriage of the Amendment will bring about a Dissolution; and I am so convinced that this is the real object of the noble Lord that I cannot bring myself to think it worth while to take up much of the time of the House by answering the arguments in favour of his Amendment. Those arguments appear to be mainly two, and both of them depend on the supposed disadvantages of a Dissolution after the passing of the Franchise Bill, and before the Bill for the redistribution of seats is brought in. It is quite true that if there was an Election after the passing of this Bill, and before redistribution, we should have some of the county constituencies as large as some boroughs. We should have the Divisions of Lancashire and the Ridings of Yorkshire competing with Liverpool, Manchester, or Glasgow. No doubt that would be inconvenient; but what is inconvenience compared with injustice? It would be rather inconvenient to the wire-pullers and the candidates; but, after all, it is better for the constituents that they should get their right to vote in company with a very large number than that they should not get it at all. One of the most curious arguments is, that these new voters will be injured in that it is not right to give them votes without accompanying the reform with a redistribution of seats. Well, of course, the anomaly of the present representation will be increased; but it is better that these voters should have votes even among a vast number than that they should have no votes at all. But beyond that I think that argument is rather unfair, as it assumes the truth of a suggestion put forward by the opponents of the measure that the Franchise Bill may not be followed by a Redistribution Bill. Apart from the assurances of the present Government, I believe that any Government would, in the next Session after the passing of a Franchise Bill such as this, feel themselves compelled to deal with the question of redistribution. The other argument that has been used is a complete change of front. It is said—what right have these new voters to have any influence over the proportionate number of Members, when the redistribution takes place? I say, why not? I hope the Government will bring in a Redistribution Bill, which, by its justice, will commend itself to the House and the country, and which will be passed. No doubt it will have many difficult questions to solve; and, if these cannot be settled without a fresh Election, it is much better that these 2,000,000 voters, who have been hitherto excluded for many years, should have their share in the settlement of this redistribution question. I will not dwell further upon the arguments in favour of the Amendment, the real meaning of which is the desire of hon. Gentlemen opposite to have this question of Reform and Redistribution left in the hands of the Conservative Party; and I do not blame hon. Members opposite for desiring to produce that result; but they can hardly expect hon. Members on this—the Liberal—side of the House to join in such an endeavour. There is, however, another question, which though not raised in the Amendment has been raised in the course of the debate, and that has reference to the inclusion of Ireland. I am not sure that what I am going to say on that point will meet with much approval in any quarter of the House. I think it was a most difficult question to decide whether Ireland should be included, and that it was one not to be decided off-hand; but for myself, so far as I am concerned, after giving the subject my own careful consideration, I came decidedly to the opinion that Ireland ought to be included. But I do not, and cannot, deny that there are to some extent plausible arguments against it. The first, of course, is the one pointing at the condition of the great majority of the householders who will get votes under the Bill. They are, certainly, many of them, badly housed and badly off; but that is no reason for their exclusion. As to the Irish agricultural labourers and the small cottier farmers in the West, they, of all Her Majesty's subjects, are undoubtedly the worst off and the least represented of any classes, and, putting these two facts together, I much doubt whether they would have been so badly off if they had been better represented in this House. But their miserable condition is no argument against their inclusion in this Bill. Then, again, they are declared to be uneducated. Although the Irish peasants now are not so well educated as the English, I believe they are as well educated as the English artizans were in 1867; and if the English artizan at that time was entitled to a vote, the Irish peasant is also entitled to the franchise. Then there is another argument used, that of the exceptional legislation at present existing with regard to Ireland; but I do not see much force in that. It is true that we have special crimes in Ireland that require special laws. There are secret societies to contend with, assassination plots to meet, and intimidation to put down; but these are not by the people of Ireland, but by individuals. That is not a reason for depriving the Irish people of their electoral rights. At any rate, if you say political rights cannot be given to the Irish people because of the condition of the country, you should go further, and establish a state of siege. There is, no doubt, a Party in Ireland which is in favour of disunion and separation from England, who do not conceal their hatred of England, and who, with more or less violence, declare against English rule and English government. I do not wish to say anything offensive; but I think it will be admitted that it would be foolish to say that that Party is not represented in this House. It is asked, "Why should we increase the power of that Party in Parliament?" But that is no reason why Ireland should be excluded from this Bill. That argument, if it means anything, means this, that the Irish householder is not fit to have a vote because he may be an anti-Unionist, a Home Ruler, or a Separationist. For my part, I do not think it is just to exclude him on that ground. There is no one more desirous and determined than I am to maintain the Act of Union; but it is, after all, only an Act of Parliament, and it is not an unconstitutional action for any hon. Member, or any number of Irish Members, to endeavour to get rid of it; and, for that reason, I do not think the argument is a good ground for the exclusion of Ireland from the Bill. I feel certain it would be inexpedient, most impolitic, and most unwise if we do not allow these feelings in Ireland Constitutional expression; for if we do not, we must expect to have them expressed unconstitutionally. I, for my part, would rather meet the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and any following which he might chance to get in this House, in any attempt he may make to change the written law, than to have to support a Government in preventing him or his Successors in establishing, in spite of the Government, his unwritten law in Ireland. I am not at all sure that the hon. Member for the City of Cork will increase his followers by means of this Bill; but, however that may be, I feel certain that a very large majority of the Parliament of the United Kingdom will be opposed to the dissolution of the Union, and I am also certain that the Irish Government will be in the future, as it has always been in the past, strong enough to put down any illegal action. But, although the result would be the same, let us look at the difference in the two cases—the case in which Ireland is included, and the case in which it is not; in one case, we should have debates in this House, and, in the other, the necessary employment of force. Well, now, there are those who fear not merely that the hon. Member for the City of Cork would not only become, as it has been stated on the other side of the House, the "Grand Elector" for Ireland, if Ireland were included in the Bill, but that by the strength of Party spirit in this country and in this House, and by the constant changes in the power of Parties, he would also become the arbiter of the destinies of the Parliament of the United Kingdom—that he would so make his support useful, that he would be able to get really almost what he wanted by controlling the action of the different Parties. I do not fear that result. I believe that Party men in this House are too patriotic. [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Oh, oh!] Well, the noble Lord does not appear to believe in the patriotism of Party men in this House. He may, perhaps, believe in this, that if they are not patriotic enough to avoid such a contingency, there is a sufficient power behind Parties—namely, the power of public opinion—to make them cease from acting in such a manner. The householders of Great Britain would make very short work of any Government who allowed the dictates of a small minority to sway them against the interests of the country. But I am afraid of something very different, and what it is is this, that if these attempts be made, it will become most damaging, too damaging, for any Party to have the aid of the Irish vote, even for a good object, and it will become very difficult to pursue the course of Irish reform and progress. There is one other powerful and overwhelming argument for the inclusion of Ireland, and that is, I know not how we can struggle for the maintenance of the Union, if we do not make this inclusion. The very idea of union is based upon union upon terms of equality in individual and political rights; and, therefore, if we refuse this inclusion, we must drop the idea of union, and we must either assent to separation, or we must absolutely and openly resort to subjection. Well, then, having very carefully weighed this question, I have come to the conclusion, as strongly as it is possible for me to do, that the Government have done right in including Ireland; and I must add these few words, that if it be clear that the balance of opinion is in favour of this course being taken, then to my mind, it is also clear that it must be adhered to; and, again, I confess that I have come to the conclusion that it would be the duty of the Government to resist and reject Amendments having for their object the exclusion of Ireland, from whatever quarter of the House they may come, even at the risk of losing the Bill, or their own power, or compelling the Dissolution of Parliament. Now, I suppose there will be some hon. Gentlemen who might think that I have omitted one question of great importance in the consideration of this Irish matter, and that is, they would say that this Franchise Bill, if carried out, would cause great discouragement to the Party in favour of the Union, and would, in fact, practically mean disfranchisement to them, because it would so overpower them. I do not wish to lose sight of that matter; but I do not myself believe that their position will be made worse than it is now. I am, however, quite prepared to admit—and here I must particularly ask the attention of the House for a moment—that, as the case stands at present, this overpowering of the minority in a large portion of the constituencies of Ireland is a serious matter, and one that ought to be very carefully considered by the Government in framing their plans in regard to the redistribution of seats. What are the facts? The statement of the hon. Member for the City of Cork is, that he has the control over the representation of three Provinces in Ireland, and of one or two counties in the Province of Ulster. There was no proof of that at the last General Election, though, considering recent elections that have taken place, there is, perhaps, some ground for that boast. Even granting that, we have this other fact, that throughout Ireland, in the South and in the West, there is a large number, a very large number, of voters who in no way share the opinions of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, and who most earnestly desire to be represented. Now, this brings up the minority question which is before the attention of the public in a way in which I think it comes before us in no other part of the United Kingdom. The minority ought not to have more than its fair share of representation; but it ought to have something approaching to a fair share in the representation. I can only say that I will not now discuss the question how this state of things is to be met; but I think it is the duty of the Government to consider it. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War said the other night that, after all, the minority in Ireland must look to the majority in England and Scotland to support them. I am bound to say, however, that that is not an argument that carries conviction to my mind. I entirely admit, however, on this minority question, as upon the general franchise question, that Ireland should not be treated exceptionally; but I repeat that all the arguments in favour of due consideration of minorities are much increased by the consideration of the case of Ireland, and are brought out in great prominence. We must remember that the constituencies in Ireland are so like one another that there is very little of that variety which is found in England and Scotland. Again, I think, we cannot deny that the minority in Ireland is more influenced, or, perhaps I may say without offence, more cowed, by the feeling of the majority than that in England or in Scotland. These are reasons why that matter of the representation of the minority ought to be thoroughly considered; nor can we, I think, altogether forget this fact, that, after all, the real question which divides Parties in Ireland is the question of the Union with this country. That is the real question between the Unionists, those who wish to be connected with England, and those who do not; and while I would not refuse to Ireland her fair share in the representation, or to her householders their fair share, because they may hold views on this most important Union Question differing from mine, yet I do say that the fact that this minority are in favour of the connection with England is no reason why they should be prevented from getting their fair share in the representation. I am afraid I must touch on another Irish matter, and that is not merely the redistribution in Ireland, but the apportionment of votes to Ireland—that is to say, the share which Ireland ought to have as compared with England and Scotland. I confess I am sorry to have to say a word about this question; but my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister—I am so glad to see him here to-night—will excuse my saying that I feel it to be almost necessary, after the statements he made, and also after what was said by my right hon. Friend the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright). I should have been quite content if the effect of the statement of my right hon. Friend had merely been that fair consideration should be given to the claims of Ireland when the Government had to consider the question of redistribution; but I must say that I cannot be committed to the doctrine either that the present numbers of the Members of the House must be increased, or that the number of Members from Ireland must not be diminished, whatever may be the change in circumstances. My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham quoted the Act of Union with reference to this particular question. He seemed to think there was a one-sidedness with regard to this Act in one particular Article, which Article was to be as a law of the Medes and Persians; but no other Article was to have the same effect. That argument does not carry much weight with me. The Acts of Union with Scotland and Ireland treated the question of the apportionment of Members in precisely the same manner and on the same grounds. The Irish Act, giving 100 Members to Ireland, corresponds almost entirely with the Scotch Act of Union, which gave 45 Members to that country; and in neither of those Acts—or, at any rate, in the particular Articles of those Acts referring to this question—is there any attempt to bind future Parliaments. Yet there are certain Articles which bind future Parliaments. There are, for instance, the Articles with regard to the Church in both countries. Those Articles are almost precisely similar in their wording; but do not let hon. Members suppose that I think those Articles ought to have prevented the passing of the Irish Church Act; nor let it be supposed that, in my view, any advocate of the Scottish Church would have much faith in its security if he thought its continuance depended on the Act of Union. Any Act of Parliament must be capable of modification according to circumstances, if those circumstances have become sufficiently changed to require such modification. This applies, as it seems to me, in every case. Scotland has been increasing with greater jumps in the last than it has in several former decades, and it is impossible for anyone to say that it will not go on increasing in similar proportion. Ireland during the same period has been decreasing, both in population and in wealth; but it is said that the number of Members given to Ireland must remain the same. In the year 1707, the number of Members for England and Wales was 513; 45 Members were given to Scotland by the Act of Union, making 558; and 100 were added in 1800 to Ireland by the Act of Union, thus making 658 Members. At the present moment the number is 652; but the vacant seats might be filled up at any moment almost. There has been a very strong feeling, during the whole of this century, that the number of Members of this House should not be increased. The Reform Bill of 1832 gave eight additional Members to Scotland and five to Ireland; the Reform Bills of 1867 and 1868 gave seven Members to Scotland. This made an addition of 20 Members to these two countries, and the whole of them were taken from England. I do not say that that was not fair enough at the time; but I do say that I do not consider that that is the condition necessary for all ages in the future; and the fact is worth bearing in mind when we hear it said that there should be a fair proportion kept up between the three countries. The Act of Union is a dangerous illustration for those who say that the Irish representation ought necessarily to remain as it is at present, because it is impossible to forget the principle upon which the apportionment was then made. Speeches which were then made prove that this principle was that the Members should be apportioned in the Three Kingdoms upon a combination of population and taxation. I do not suppose that our Scotch Friends would object to that rule of taxation rather than that of population, for I imagine they would rather gain by it. But, on the other hand, Irish Members would object to it, because it would reduce their representation far lower than anything I have imagined possible; and at once I will tell them I should support them in their objection because it is contrary to my ideas as regards representation, and contrary to the ideas held by a large majority of the Liberal Party, to look at taxes in preference to human beings. Perhaps, however, I may be allowed to state my opinion that if there are any hon. Members opposite who think they could get a better redistribution from the Conservative than from the Liberal Party, that has not been the doctrine of the Conservative Party hitherto. My right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), in a very important speech which he delivered during the Recess, said he thought the registers would be the best guide; and he prophesied that figures would show that Ireland ought to have a share in the entire representation of the United Kingdom which it has not at present. When, therefore, some figures were produced by the Prime Minister in bringing this Bill in, I not unnaturally considered these figures, and found that they arrived at a result which would make a very great change. I myself, however, admit that not only numbers should be taken as a fair test, but I would also take into consideration the number of voters rather than the number of votes. But from this point of view it must not be forgotten that, while England and Scotland have been increasing by vast strides in population, as well as in wealth, Ireland has been decreasing in both. Questions have been asked as to what is likely to be the case in the middle of next year, when it is supposed that the Redistribution Bill may be under discussion in Parliament. As far as I can discover from careful examination of the Statistical Returns, Ireland ought then to have 91 Members, instead of 105; Scotland 71, instead of 60; and England and Wales 496, instead of 493. There is only one other figure which I think it necessary to trouble the House with, and that has reference to the number of families as shown in the last Census Returns. I allude to this, because the principle of the present Bill seems to me to be family voting—that is, that the heads of families are to have the voting power. Taking it on this principle, Ireland would lose 17 Members, Scotland would gain 11, and England 6 Members. With these facts before us, can you be surprised that we decline to pledge ourselves to the propositions, either that the numbers of this House must be increased or that the numbers of the Irish

Members must not be reduced? How will any Redistribution Bill work? In the first place, some boroughs must necessarily be disfranchised, and their seats given to the counties and the large towns; and, above all, a number of Irish boroughs will have to be disfranchised. Some hon. Members say that when we have disfranchised certain Irish boroughs, we must give the seats so obtained to Irish counties or towns, notwithstanding the fact that there may be many English or Scotch counties and large towns which are much more clearly under-represented. I cannot accede to that proposition. Such a proposition may be supported as a concession to Irish Members; but to my mind such a concession would be a very dangerous precedent, especially when we bear in mind the views and the plans of Irish Members. I have already said that I would not refuse Irishmen a vote because they may wish to separate from us; but, on the other hand, neither would I give them more than their share of representation on that account. The utmost that any Irishmen have a right to demand is, that they should be treated on terms of the most perfect equality with the inhabitants of the rest of the United Kingdom; while we, on our part, ought to treat them without fear and without favour. This Bill has been rather cleverly called by the hon. Member for Rutland (Mr. J. W. Lowther), in his very able speech, which shows that in his person we have secured a real accession to the debating power of the House, "a Centrifugal Bill;" and, perhaps, the most plausible argument that has been put forward on behalf of giving Ireland more than her fair share of Representatives is that she is so far away. The theory that the further a place is from London the more Representatives it ought to have may have been a good one in times gone by, but it does not apply now. When the roads of England were scarcely worthy the name, and when it took weeks to get from the South-West of Ireland to Liverpool—as at the time of the Union—the argument might have been a good one that the Representatives should be increased in proportion to the distance from London; but it would be an absurdity in the present day, with our swift steamboats and our railways. The reason, Mr. Disraeli used to say, why so many places had two Representatives was, that if one were killed on the road, his Colleague might be able to reach London. But what is the state of things in this respect in the present day? We see the hon. Members who represent the Cornish or Scotch constituencies quite as frequently as we do those from any other part of Great Britain; and, certainly, the fact that Ireland is some distance from London does not in the slightest degree prevent our hearing of Irish grievances. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister made a special remark in reference to London, It is altogether beyond doubt that, in any redistribution scheme worthy of the name, the Metropolis must get a large increase of representation. Everybody admits that. I do not, however, suppose that London will get anything like its fair share. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Why not?] The right hon. Gentleman says "Why not?" I am glad to hear him make that remark. There is no real reason why London should not obtain its fair share of representation; but I do not think it will, because it can only get that fair share from other constituencies, and they will fight very hard for their seats. Yet, there is nothing in the condition of London that makes it just or reasonable that it should not have its fair share of representation. London is not only the largest City in the world, but it is the most orderly and most easily-governed City in the world, and it is the most law-abiding City, and therefore I fail to see why it should be treated exceptionally in this matter. Why should London be treated differently from the Metropolis of every other country, whether we take those of Germany, France, or Italy? In respect of education and general intelligence, London is not inferior to the other large towns in England. [Mr. LABOUCHERE: No, no!] The hon. Member for Northampton cries "No!" but, in my humble judgment, the charge of want of intelligence cannot be brought against the majority of the inhabitants of London, although it may apply, perhaps, to certain newspapers which are published in it. The contribution of London to the taxes is notoriously far above the average of other English towns. But London is not only the richest City in the world—it contains many thousands of the poorest of the Queen's subjects. I see no reason why its riches or its poverty should stand in the way of London obtaining its fair share of representation. Indeed, in its poverty, I see a strong reason why it should receive its fair share; because, if it had been better represented, the question of the relief of that poverty might have received better attention at the hands of this House. Indeed, it is more difficult to obtain expressions of public opinion and to get the action of popular opinion in London than in any other part of the United Kingdom; but it must not be damaged by any notion that there is anything in its condition to make it just or reasonable that it should be treated unfairly in the matter. In conclusion, I might appeal to those who, like myself, are very earnest in this Reform matter, but who, like me, may not entirely approve the hints which have been thrown out with regard to redistribution. I will support the Government in its policy of the separation of the two questions of the extension of the franchise and of redistribution, and I shall not be tempted by any amount of argument with regard to redistribution to endanger the Bill. I care so much for the Bill that I will not support, but will do my best to oppose, any Amendment which will endanger it; and I apply that to the clauses of the Bill, as well as to the redistribution question, although there are one or two which I would rather have seen differently framed. I regret that plurality of votes for property is maintained, and that county votes in boroughs are to be retained; but, if the Government feel that, to make any alteration in those respects, will endanger the Bill, I accept their view; and, after all, those are details which are not to be weighed for one moment with the great principle of the Bill, either in theory or in practice. It is true that by the help of these clauses, a few men may keep more votes than they ought to have; but by the Bill 2,000,000 of voters, who ought to have had the vote long ago, will have it now. I will not for a moment disparage the magnitude of this measure. There are some who honestly fear what may follow, and there are others who may have hopes that, by the help of this progress in popular government, they may be able to promote movements for which I have no sympathy, and to pass measures which I should do my best to oppose. This is not the time, nor the occasion, to trouble the House with the reasons why, on the one hand, I do not share those fears, or why, on the other hand, I think it probable that those hopes may be disappointed. But let me make one remark applying it to all Members of the House. Pride in our institutions is not a monopoly of the Conservative Party. There is, to my mind, a true Conservatism which is one of the principles of true Liberalism. But, depend upon it, that true Conservatism, no more than true Liberalism, would be endangered by the further development of that principle of self-government which has been one great cause why England is what she is. The doctrine of numbers pervades and must pervade the representative system. That was made clear by the Act of 1867. On the passing of this measure, not property, not interests, but numbers—human beings—will be acknowledged even more clearly than by the Act of 1867 to be the basis of popular power; and in the belief that that basis is the most sound and the most safe that we can obtain, I thank the Government for this Bill, and I will do what I can to secure its passing.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, the House has listened, of course, with a great deal of interest, to the speech of my right hon. Friend who has just resumed his seat (Mr. W. E. Forster). He has done that which was not done by the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) on the last occasion of this debate—namely, he has referred to the Amendment of my noble Friend behind me (Lord John Manners), and has told the House what the object of that Amendment was. He said the object of the Amendment was to hasten a Dissolution. Now, I apprehend the object of this Amendment is, that which was aimed at in 1866, to induce the Government to give to the House a complete scheme. But my right hon. Friend went on to say that he recommended the Government, in the event of the Lords throwing out the Bill this Session, to give the Lords a second chance. That was a sentiment which was cheered on the other side of the House. It was quite evident why it was cheered. It was because it would give a great number of hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House an opportunity of occupying themselves in another Session of Parliament—an opportunity which they probably would not have if there was a Dissolution. But my right hon. Friend said that he was convinced that the object of the Amendment also was, if it succeeded, to place the handling of the representation of the people and the manipulation of the redistribution of seats in the hands of the Conservative Party. Why, of course, it stands to reason that, if the Conservative Party succeed in giving expression to the general feeling of the country in turning out the Government, they would naturally have the opportunity of manipulating the representation by the Bill, if they thought it necessary. Then the right hon. Gentleman referred to Ireland. He is, in my opinion, a man of most robust faith. He has given us a dissertation on the state of Ireland, and he said—"I do think that the Union cannot be maintained unless this Bill is passed and includes Ireland." Now, I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to say that he is one of the most expert political tight-rope dancers I ever saw in my life. He has made that statement; but I cannot help feeling that his speech must have been very displeasing to the Government. I imagine that the Government, in the midst of their many defeats, in the midst of their military disasters, and in the midst of the political discredit in which they are, must be pretty well sick of the consolation of their candid Friends. What do we find? There is my right hon. Friend the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose Burghs (Mr. Baxter), the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and there are others on the Liberal side of the House, who are candid Friends of the Government. In fact, to me, coming back to the House as I do, after a brief absence, it appears that all the clever men are everywhere but on the Treasury Bench, and all the corners on the other side of the House are occupied by refugees, who have fled the Government in disgust, and yet, one after the other, they have given us a series of the most compromising reflections upon this mutilated piece of machinery of State Government which is called the Government Reform Bill. I have observed that there is no surer test, no more certain indication of the crumbling-up of a Government, than when they are assailed by the repeated candid assurances of their quondam Colleagues and allies. Of course, putting aside the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the House—which was not particularly lively—I think this debate has worn a rather languid aspect. It is perfectly true that the hon. Gentleman the Parliamentary Secretary of the Local Government Board (Mr. George Russell) said, on the last night of the debate, that it was high time for him to strike a livelier chord. I respect the abilities of my hon. Friend; but when he talked of striking a livelier chord, the chord must either have snapped in his fingers, or else he forgot the tune, for it was curious to observe how indifferent the House was to the merits of a Bill which had been clearly introduced, not in the high patriotic spirit mentioned by the Prime Minister, but for the purpose exclusively of giving a Party manipulation to the electoral franchise. Now, when I make use of the expression "languid," of course I must exclude the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. The right hon. Gentleman spoke in most unmeasured terms on the last night of our debate, and with a license that would have been more suitable for a platform at Wolverhampton—[An hon. MEMBER: Birmingham.]—than for the arena of the House of Commons. I refer to Wolverhampton, because the speech which we heard here was almost a repetition of a speech which he made at Wolverhampton. He proceeded to make a speech the most mischievous, the most inflammatory, and, if I may use the expression of my noble Friend (Lord George Hamilton) on Thursday evening, the most ill-conditioned that perhaps ever was delivered from the Treasury Bench by a Cabinet Minister. Why, from his handling of the Reform Bill—and, recollect, he went off on a side issue, and never referred to the Amendment of my noble Friend—one would have supposed that we were on the eve of a revolutionary epoch, for the right hon. Gentleman, in very vindictive terms—and it ought to be remembered that he had as Colleagues the noble Marquess and the right hon. Gentleman, whom I am glad to see in his place again, in that Government of Compromise—made the most direct appeals that I ever heard to the very worst passions that can be engendered by ignorance, by poverty, or by a sense of injustice. No doubt, his words are ringing still in the uncomfortable ears of the Treasury Bench; but, in my opinion, they ought to be placarded all over the country in order, to show the people the man who is the Colleague of right hon. Gentlemen opposite. I will give an extract from the right hon. Gentleman's speech with regard to the delay in bringing in a Reform Bill—

"What has happened in consequence of the agricultural labourers not having a voice? They have been robbed of their lands, they have been robbed of their rights in the commons, they have been robbed of their open spaces. These proceedings are going on still. The agricultural labourers are still being robbed. We cannot go into a single country lane"—

I wish the House to note the maliciousness of what follows—

"In which you will not find that the landowners on each side of the road have already enclosed lands which for centuries have belonged to the people. But that is not all. It is not merely with reference to the land that this injurious operation is going on. It is going on also with respect to the endowments of the poor."

I maintain that this is a direct appeal to mob violence. I maintain that this is a direct holding out of a bribe to the most ignorant classes of this country—["No, no!"]—not the most enlightened, at all events—as an inducement to support the most Radical section of the Government when they receive the franchise. There is another point to which I would call the attention of the House, and that is the eager disposition of the right hon. Gentleman, as a Member of the Cabinet, to charge his political opponents with having committed robbery, or something worse. We all know that there are charges which he has made with regard to the mercantile classes of this country. If that is the language to which they are treated in dealing with this question, we shall know how to meet it. But, of course, we know perfectly well that, in this Government of Compromise, these extraordinary statements of the right hon. Gentleman will be duly watered down in the proper course by his less ardent Colleagues. A remark was made on Thursday by a supporter of the Government which was worthy of notice. It was that the present Government came into power for two objects. One was to reverse the policy of Lord Beaconsfield, and the other was to pass this Reform Bill. This is not the time to deal with the reversal of Lord Beaconsfield's policy. It is enough to contemplate the ridiculous position in which the Government have placed themselves in their endeavours to reverse that policy. But as regards Reform, if they were elected to bring in a Reform Bill, and they have delayed, as my noble Friend the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) has pointed out, to introduce their Bill till 1884, why have the supporters of the Government been so listlessly indifferent? Why, I can see that they hate it. The right hon. Gentleman who spoke before me had hardly a good word to say for it. ["Oh, oh!"] The real truth is, that "the best House of Commons in this century," as it has been called by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, cannot reconcile itself to this measure. Why is that? Why, because it is evident that the attention of the country and of Parliament is absorbed by the current events of the day. We are all eager for some sound, useful, domestic legislation other than this Bill. We are all anxious for such legislation. The Government had a lesson on Friday night—a lesson which I hope they will not forget. If they do forget it, I trust that the Opposition will be careful to impress it upon them. That lesson shows the sense of the House in favour of some sound useful legislation. I recollect that a Question was recently addressed to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department upon the Lunacy Laws. There cannot be any Question more proper to be addressed to the Government in their present dilapidated condition. The right hon. Gentleman, in his reply, on that occasion, made one of the most sensational speeches that we have had from him this Session. Now, what is the reason of all this? Why is it that this Bill cannot engage the attention of the House? We all know the truth is, this Bill has been thrown upon that Table—has been thrown in our faces—as a compromise with the Radical section of the Government, and in order to redeem a hasty pledge which everybody on this and many moderate Liberals on that side would have been very glad to get rid of. ["Oh, oh!"] I speak for myself; but I am certain that I speak the opinions of a great many on this side of the House, when I say that nobody would be opposed to a fair and equitable measure for the good of the country, if it were proved to be necessary. [Laughter.] I refer, of course, to Reform. But what have we in this measure? It is nothing less than an attempt to assign to 2,000,000 of people, amongst whom are many of the most ignorant—"No, no!"—certainly, the most inexperienced, in this country, the immediate and the absolute control of the vast machinery of the State. What is the reason of that? The Prime Minister gave us the reason on introducing the Bill. He said that the object of the Bill was to rally, in one solid compact mass, all classes of the community around the ancient Throne. That is very beautiful and very decorative language; but it is entirely different from the language we heard from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. His was an appeal to mob violence. Rallying around the ancient Throne never occurred to the right hon. Gentleman. All I can say is, that if the ancient Throne stands in need of those crude and ill-digested schemes of our advanced Friends, its foundations are certainly not as secure as the Constitutional feeling of this country would wish to see them. I do not think much can very well be said about this Bill. It is so thoroughly incomplete in all its parts; and the right hon. Gentleman the hon. Member for Bradford, in his speech, which, as I have said, was not of the liveliest kind, produced the impression that he was sensible of the paucity of arguments in favour of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham, in answering the speech of the noble Lord who moved the Amendment, said my noble Friend had not said a word to show whether he was in favour of the extension of the county franchise or not. Is that to be wondered at? Is there anything extraordinary in that? [Laughter.] Why, the Prime Minister, on whose countenance I am glad to see a smile, spoke for two hours in introducing the measure, and did not condescend to give one single good reason to prove the necessity for its introduction. Personally, I object to the Bill, because it involves great and mysterious changes; and, except on the part of a convocation in a county town, composed of a few scientific Radicals, who are as devoid of judgment as of common sense, there have been no knocking at the doors of Parliament, as I have heard in years gone by, clamouring for some measure of this kind. There is nothing in my humble judgment to induce the present excellent House of Commons to sign a blank cheque for their future political extinction. It is true that the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) gave us a speech. The right hon. Gentleman always speaks with authority in this House; but his speech was a very disappointing one, compared with his speech in 1866, when he electrified Parliament by the arguments he used; and the reason he now gave was the absence of arguments, which was so great that he claimed to speak with "a little freedom." My right hon. Friend generally does speak with a little freedom. He said he thought there was nobody against the Bill. There was, I think, a good deal of freedom in that expression. He also said that during the last few months there had been more unanimity on this question than there had been on any question for many years; but he abstained from proof, which was the very thing wanting. Of course, that is what the French call a façon de parler. In speaking with a little freedom, in the absence of arguments, the right hon. Gentleman brought in the "Old Woman of Warwickshire," who had written to him, as if that had anything to do with the Amendment, and the Conservative Peer who had told him that it was a good Bill. It is not for me to question the propriety of the right hon. Gentleman's aristocratic relations; but, as he said that the hon. Member for the City of Cork was not a fool, he mentioned a category to which, undoubtedly, the "Old Woman of Warwickshire" and the Conservative Peer belonged. And then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that he took his stand on the Act of Union. Sixteen years ago the right hon. Gentleman called the Act of Union a rotten old piece of parchment; but it suited his purpose then so to describe it. It is a pleasure for me, who have known him for 35 years, to see him taking his stand upon anything. During the whole of his distinguished political career, his attention has been directed to knocking down everything; and it is refreshing to observe the right hon. Gentleman standing up for anything which, at all events, savours in some degree of one of the fundamental principles of the British Constitution. But when the right hon. Gentleman took his stand, his well known finger of scorn was pointed with a good deal of emphasis to the Irish Benches. As he had said, the right hon. Gentleman said that the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork was no fool. Anyone must be a fool if he could not read between the lines of the part of the speech which the right hon. Gentleman addressed to the Irish Benches. It was meant to catch the Irish vote. But after four years of blundering, after suppression of the freedom of the Press, and the right of public meeting, after coercions without number, and the most inconceivable errors into which the Imperial Government have fallen in the administration of affairs in Ireland, it is too late to catch the Irish vote. It is too late to win back the sympathies of the Irish people after the truculent vagaries of Radical misrule. Why, they are too late in everything; they are too late everywhere; and I hope they will carry the principle of being too late to its logical conclusion, in becoming nothing more than the late Administration. Taxation and population were the bases of the arrangement under the Act of Union; but, at that time, Ireland had one-third of the population of the Three Kingdoms, and now only about one-seventh; and there are now in Ireland 21 constituencies with an average of 378 electors, or only one-third of the number in the borough I have the honour to represent. I am surprised at the right hon. Gentleman putting forward the "for ever" argument. All diplomatic Treaties pledge the parties to amity and peace "for ever," only to be broken at the first opportunity; and it will be so, I hope, in the case of the Kilmainham Treaty. But when it is argued that the Act of Union arrangement must be maintained, it is forgotten that statesmanship must be progressive. It must progress with the progress of events. The question of redistribution is of the greatest possible importance, and Parliament ought not to consider it separately. What was said by the noble Marquess opposite? He seemed to be the victim of uncertain opinions just at the time when the country would rejoice to see him take his stand with a bold and determined front; but he said that the demand of the Opposition respecting the redistribution of political power was a reasonable one, and he thought the House was entitled to have the general lines of what was proposed by the Government in regard to redistribution. Nothing could be fairer than that, and all the Opposition asked was that what was conceded in 1866 should be conceded now—namely, that the Franchise and Redistribution Bills should be taken together. It is impossible for us to pledge ourselves to a half measure, when we ask to have the whole plan. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham said that the Earl of Derby had probably changed his opinions; but the House will recollect a speech made by the Earl of Derby, in 1866, so conclusive that it never was answered, showing the necessity of introducing measures of franchise and redistribution, and of treating them together. If there was any force in the argument of the noble Earl at that time, it must have 10 times more force now. It is true the Government have said that they intend to pass this Bill this Session; but I doubt very much whether they will be able to carry out that programme. I am not so sure that there are not Members of the Government who think it will be very difficult. The Secretary of State for the Home Department himself, and the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice), gave us an idea that they thought it was not possible for the Government to pass this measure. The words of the Secretary of State for the Home Department were these—"I am sorry to say that it is absolutely impossible for the Government in its present condition to pass any Bill upon any subject." I admit that the right hon. Gentleman made use of that expression in one of his moods of uncertain temper; but, nevertheless, that was the expression he employed, with a good deal of force. I would wish the House of Commons to bear in mind the speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen). His speech was full of the most sensible and pungent remarks. Appealing to the moderate Liberal Party, the right hon. Gentleman said—"I want to know will the Liberal Party be prepared to back the Prime Minister in the pledge given that English boroughs are to be disfranchised in order to maintain intact the existing distribution in Ireland?" I think there was great force and weight in that remark, coming, as it did, from behind the Ministerial Benches opposite. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), who may be supposed to represent Scotch opinions and views on this subject, also made a speech—a speech of a candid Friend, of course, because he is not one of those who have left the Government in disgust, but his disgust is that he never was called upon to join it. Speaking as the Representative of the opinions of the Scotch Members, the right hon. Gentleman said that—“Until the Redistribution Bill was introduced they—the Scotch Members—felt themselves unpledged, and would take whatever course they thought best, and unless the Prime Minister was careful about his redistribution scheme, he might find himself in a minority.” I must say, however, I dissented from him when he said that he had witnessed the introduction for 30 years of measures of Reform, and that he thought this was the greatest and best of them all. I, like the right hon. Gentleman, have seen every Reform Bill since 1850 introduced into this House, and I must say it is really very curious and interesting to observe the circumstances of the birth and the early decease of all those Reform Bills. I have here a statement of the several measures introduced, with the Queen’s Speeches upon them, and it really affords us a lesson. It shows that there is nothing absolutely of very pressing importance to hasten the passing this measure now. We had Reform Bills in 1852, 1854, 1857, 1859, 1860, and 1866. On every one of these occasions the Prime Minister addressed Parliament on the subject through the Queen’s Speech. Lord John Russell, in 1852, said—

“This is the fitting time for calmly considering whether it may not be advisable to make such Amendments in the Act of the late Reign relating to the Representation of the Commons in Parliament.”

Out he went. Lord Aberdeen came in in 1854. Here was the Queen’s Speech—

“It will also be your duty to consider whether more complete Effect may not be given to the Principles of the Act of the last Reign, whereby Reforms were made in the Representation of the People in Parliament.”

You will observe that the word “calmly” was dropped in this case, because we were on the eve of the Crimean War. Out he went. Lord Palmerston was Prime Minister in 1857. In the Queen’s Speech he said—

“Your attention will be called to the Laws which regulate the Representation of the People in Parliament, with a view to consider what Amendments may be safely and beneficially made therein.”

Out he went. In 1859, Lord Derby was Prime Minister. Here was the Queen’s Speech—

“Your attention will be called to the State of the Laws which regulate the Representation of the People in Parliament, and I cannot doubt that you will give to this great Subject a degree of calm and impartial consideration,” &c.

Out he went. In 1860, Lord Palmerston again tried his hand. Here is the Queen’s Speech—

“Measures will be laid before you for amending the Laws which regulate the Representation of the People in Parliament.”

He was far too cunning to try it, and he remained in till his death. In 1866, Lord John Russell was Premier. Here is the Queen’s Speech—

“I have directed that Information should be procured. . . . When that Information is complete, the attention of Parliament will be called to the result thus obtained, with a view to such Improvements in the Laws which regulate the Rights of Voting in the election of Members of the House of Commons,” &c.

Out he went. In fact, with the single exception of the case of Lord Palmerston in 1860, who made a Queen’s Speech, saying that measures would be laid before Parliament and immediately dropped the subject, in every case these Reform Bills were dropped, and the Ministers went out, probably, a good deal in consequence of their having introduced them. Why should we not ask the Government to introduce a Redistribution Bill now? It was asked and was refused in 1866. I recollect the present Prime Minister was then the Leader of this House, and introduced the measure, which was an Enfranchisement Bill, without any reference to redistribution. Lord Grosvenor—the present Duke of Westminster—moved, on the second reading, an Amendment to the effect that it was inexpedient to discuss the Bill until the entire scheme was before the House. There was an eight nights’ debate on that, and the Government only rejected it by 6 votes. In consequence of the smallness of the majority, the Government did introduce a Redistribution Bill on the 7th of May. The debate was continued upon that Bill; but the Government was beaten—not upon the redistribution scheme, but upon a Motion of Lord Dunkellin for substituting rateable for clear annual value, the Government being placed in a minority of 11. I must express my thanks to the House for the patience with which it has heard me. In the opinion of some hon. Gentlemen opposite this may be a great Bill. In my opinion, it is a most mischievous Bill; and I do hope that the House of Commons, as in 1866, will not give the Government a Party triumph at the sacrifice of principle. This Bill, believe me, never can satisfy the people of this country. We all know the ridiculous position in which, unfortunately, the Government is placed. This Bill is introduced with the intention to divert public attention from the terrible events that are going on. This Bill, in fact, is intended to throw dust in the face of that growing discontent which re-echoes its murmurs from county to county and from borough to borough in condemnation of the policy of the Government. All that we ask, all that any sensible man, I think, will be inclined to ask, is that, if it is necessary to introduce some rational scheme for the representation of the people, it should be based upon some plan of taxation and population combined. The Government refuse to assent to that. They give us half a measure, a mutilated measure—just as if the Radical Party in this country can off-hand, as they think, amend, improve, and reform a Constitution that has taken generations to build up. Recollect, Sir, we have in the British Constitution a most complicated piece of machinery—perhaps, the most complicated the world has ever seen. It was well said by one of the greatest writers—perhaps the greatest man who ever lived—

“Happy and well-governed are those States where the middle part is strong and the extremes weak.”

If you unduly strengthen the extremes, whether in the direction of an Aristocracy or a Democracy, you will, in my opinion, weaken the leading merits of our Constitution. I am in favour of any fair and equitable measure that may be judged to be necessary. I voted in 1867 for the Bill that was then before Parliament, and I am quite ready to grant political power now to those whose industry, whose intelligence, and whose character give them a legitimate stake in the country; but I shall vote for the Amendment of my noble Friend because I believe the measure of the Government will subvert the existing order of things, and therefore it cannot add to the welfare, the happiness, or the prosperity of our country.

MR. ORAIG SELLAR said, it was not his wish, even if he had the power, to follow the interesting and lively argument which they had just heard from the right hon. Baronet; but he was sure the House might be congratulated on the return, after a short absence, of the right hon. Baronet. He knew he was speaking the sentiment of very many on the Ministerial side of the House when he said they were delighted to hear from the Front Opposition Bench a speech so lively and interesting—a speech, in fact, more lively and interesting than any they had heard from that Bench for the last four years. But, lively and interesting as the speech was, it only seemed to him to be an additional testimony to the wisdom of the Government in introducing what the right hon. Baronet had called a “mutilated piece of machinery.” Had the Government introduced a measure dealing both with franchise and redistribution this Session, there would have been no chance of its passing. If he were to criticize the measure, he would say that, if anything, the Bill was overloaded. In a great Reform such as this the commencement ought to be comparatively small. He had thought all along, and he still thought, that if, instead of one complete and rounded measure, the Government had followed precedents, and had introduced three measures extending the franchise to England, to Scotland, and to Ireland, there would have been less chance of serious hostility or opposition, and that the cause of Reform would have been hastened rather than retarded. But he was bound to say that, considering the comprehensive character of the measure, and the uniformity which it proposed to introduce, it had the merit of being one of the most skilfully drafted Bills he ever saw. It was simple and well rounded, and he thought it would be found difficult to assail in Committee, because of the elaboration and care with which it had been prepared. The central idea of the Bill was the establishment of universal household suffrage. That was a good suffrage. It was only right and reasonable that the man who, by his industry and energy, had acquired a household, and had become the head of a family, should not be deprived of the benefits of citizenship. But, more than that, universal household suffrage was a reasonable resting place. They had heard in the course of the debate indications of the idea that there was no finality in this question of Reform; but he was glad to hear from the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) that the basis of this Bill was so broad that it was good enough to satisfy at least a generation. There was no doubt that under this Bill there would be many districts where the houses were very poor, and where the people were very ignorant, and perhaps not over industrious. In future these houses would convey the franchise; but he was bound to say that every year, even in the poorest and most congested districts of England, Scotland, and Ireland, the standard of comfort was rising, and would be helped by this measure. The franchise was a great educating agency. He believed the gift of the franchise raised a man's self-respect, and, what was more, it raised respect for him amongst those around him; and it would act through the United Kingdom as a stimulus to raise the humbler, the poorer, the less educated and experienced people in the path of civilization. That brought him to what he considered the most original and, perhaps, the most valuable provision of the Bill—the service franchise. The hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings) spoke of this franchise, it seemed to him, in terms of depreciation. The hon. Gentleman stated that it would enfranchise a certain number of gamekeepers and a certain number of gardeners. Speaking for Scotland, he knew a good many more gardeners and gamekeepers in that country than the hon. Gentleman did, and he knew there was no class of men in Scotland who were more entitled to the franchise. This provision would have the effect of giving votes to the cream of the unenfranchised people of Scotland. Indeed, but for it he considered that the Bill for Scotland, and especially for the South of Scotland, would have been a comparatively useless measure. A county with which he was well acquainted, but would not name, and the present electorate of which numbered between 1,000 and 1,200, by the operation of this service franchise would have the number increased by 2,100, consisting of agricultural labourers, miners, and others, living in their employers' houses. The occupation of houses in lieu of wages was customary in the whole of the South of Scotland, and he hoped to hear from his hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh (Mr. A. Elliot), who, it was an open secret, was mainly instrumental in bringing the necessity of this franchise before the Government, and from his hon. Friend the Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks), the condition of things in these counties. He was sure no Parliament and no Government would ever have any cause to regret that they abandoned the old groove in which the extension of the franchise used to run, and that, by means of this service franchise, they enfranchised the cream of the peasantry of Scotland. The provisions with regard to the extinction of faggot votes had been received—he would not say with enthusiasm in Scotland—but they had been accepted. There was no doubt that the system of faggot votes was the curse of the representation of Scotland, and had been since 1832. They would have been glad to have seen a more root-and-branch reform of this system; and if they had had a separate Bill for Scotland, he believed they would have been able to introduce such a reform. But they were a practical people. They knew that the Bill dealt with the United Kingdom franchises of the kind of the 40s. freeholder, and that those franchises were not to be extinguished in England and Ireland, and they accepted it, though they regretted the rather meagre provisions they were to have for the extinction of fictitious voting in Scotland. He could say with the utmost confidence that throughout the whole of Scotland the people welcomed this Bill, and considered it to be the greatest Reform Bill of the century, and they hoped that before the end of the Session it might be safely berthed in the quiet haven of the Statute Book. But they did not accept with equal satisfaction the statement of the Prime Minister as to the probable redistribution of seats. With the most of that statement, however, Scotch Members sitting with him did agree. He was pleased to hear there was no intention of introducing any system of electoral districts; that there would be no displacement of the old Constitutional traditions of the country with regard to the franchise; and also that it was considered necessary to retain the distinction between the town and county. There could be no doubt that the interests and associations of urban constituencies were not always similar—indeed, that they were sometimes antagonistic to the associations and pursuits of rural constituencies. Of that they had a marked illustration in the recent debates on the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill; and it seemed to him that it would be more than a misfortune if the distinction between urban and rural constituencies was not retained. He was also glad to hear the Prime Minister say that he did not consider it necessary that closely concentrated populations should have the same amount of representation as wider and more scattered districts; and, above all, the people of Scotland and their Representatives were glad to hear that there was to be a substantial increase of the Representatives for Scotland. But it was with regard to the provisions that were to be made for that increase that their path began to diverge from that of the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman was definite and precise as to the nature of the disease; but when he spoke of the remedy he was less definite—indeed, he was almost vague. He mentioned two alternative remedies. The first was that the small boroughs of the South of England should yield seats to make up the representation in Scotland. But there were only 40 of these small boroughs, and he should have thought that most of them, at least, would be required to satisfy the wants of London and all the great unenfranchised towns of England and the counties that would want further representation. Indeed, he should have thought that if they were to sweep away the whole of the small boroughs in England, there would hardly be material enough to satisfy the requirements of the unrepresented districts of that country. The Scotch Representatives could not forget how the Bill of 1831 was lost. General Gascoigne's Instruction to the Committee to the effect that the representation of England and Wales ought not to be diminished was fatal to the Bill; and Scottish Members believed that the spirit of that Instruction might exist in this House in 1884. They hardly thought it was possible that England, with all her generosity, could sacrifice a single seat for Scotland; and they were satisfied that if they trusted to the smaller boroughs of England for additional seats for Scotland, that they should be trusting to a broken reed. The other alternative of the Prime Minister was one which, certainly, appeared more hopeful, but which he thought, from the words of the right hon. Gentleman, he was not very sanguine of himself. It was that a limited addition should be made to the number of Members of the House. Was it likely that the House would assent to an addition to its numbers; or that such a proposal would be listened to out-of-doors? He was aware that there was "no magic, no cabalistic charm," as Mr. Disraeli said, in the numerals 658; it was purely a question of convenience what the number of Members of the House should be. In Scotland they should be only too glad to take their additional Members from this source; but they believed that the House would not readily assent to such a proposal—at least, until it had tried every other source. Now, was there any other source? He must look at this as a Scotch Member, and the answer brought him to the point at which his path diverged from that of the Prime Minister. There was another source, and that was the over-abundance of the representation of Ireland. The Prime Minister stated that he would not reduce the proportional share of representation accorded by law to Ireland. What was the history of the allotment of Members to Ireland? At the Union, the Irish Parliament proposed, and Mr. Pitt accepted, taxation and population as a joint basis, and on that joint basis the number was fixed at 100. At that time the population of Ireland was 4,200,000. In 1832 the population had increased to nearly 8,000,000. The taxation at the Union was £3,000,000, and it had increased in 1832 to £4,000,000. In 1832 seats were added to the five largest cities—Limerick, Galway, Belfast, Waterford, and Dublin; but in 1880 the corrupt boroughs of Sligo and Cashel were disfranchised. These seats, however, were not distributed, and the number remained at 105, that number being fixed when the population was 8,000,000, and being still retained now with a population of 5,000,000. In 1832

one Irish Member represented 73,000 people; to-day each Irish Member represented 46,000; while each English Member represented 54,000, and each Scotch Member 64,000 people, or 18,000 more than each Irish Member. On the score of population, there was really no justice in keeping the law of 1832 intact. Taking the question of taxation, the total amount of taxation of the United Kingdom was £73,000,000, or about £110,000 per Member. England contributed £58,000,000, or £118,000 for each Member; Scotland, £8,000,000, or £133,000 for each Member; and Ireland, £6,600,000, or only £64,000 for each Member, being only half of what was represented by a Scotch Member. According to population, England should have 494 Members, Scotland 71, and Ireland 93. According to taxation, England should have 526 Members, Scotland 72, and Ireland 60; but taking the mean of population and taxation, which was the best criterion, England would have 510, Scotland 71, and Ireland 77. There were many other ways of looking at the question; but the best argument was provided by an examination of the figures bearing on the subject. Looking at the comparative prosperity and comparative decay in the three countries, in England the population decreased between 1871 and 1881 in 30 counties and in 30 boroughs; in Scotland, in the same period, there was a decrease in 13 counties and in one borough; but in Ireland there was a decrease in every county but two, and in more than half the boroughs. In England the number of inhabited houses increased more than 250,000 between 1871 and 1881; in Wales they had increased by 15,000; in Scotland the increase in inhabited houses was known to be very considerable, though the figures could not be accurately ascertained; while in Ireland the decrease was as remarkable as the increase in the other countries, the number having decreased in every county except Dublin; and although in boroughs there was a slight increase over head, there was a decrease in 16 out of 32 boroughs. Would it be a natural thing to give the larger share of government to the country which contributed largely to the Exchequer and received little from it, or to the country which contributed little and received largely? Ireland contributed every year to the Exchequer £8,000,000 sterling, and received back £7,000,000; Scotland contributed £9,000,000, and received back £2,600,000. Scotland, therefore, contributed £1,000,000 more and received £4,500,000 less, and was thus £5,500,000 to the good. From any point of view, Scotland was entitled to additional Representatives, and Ireland to less. After all, the strongest argument against the Prime Minister's proposition was the weakness of the defence. The arguments in support of that proposition were not addressed to reason, but to compassion. They were arguments ad misericordiam. The right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) had taken his stand on the Act of Union; but the 4th Article of the Act of Union stated how the 100 Irish Members were to be allotted. There were to be two for each county, two for the City of Dublin, one for the University of Trinity College, and one for each of the 30 most considerable cities, towns, and boroughs. If they took their stand on the sanctity of the Act of Union, the counties of Carlow and Louth, with a population under 100,000, would retain four Members, while the boroughs of Portarlington, Mallow, Downpatrick, Dunganon, Bandon, Kinsale, Inniskillen, and Youghal, with 35,000 all told, would have eight Members. The right hon. Gentleman said the Treaty of Union had no doubt been infringed; but these infringements were with the consent of the weaker party. But suppose the population of Ireland, which was now 5,000,000, were reduced to 2,000,000, which, probably, was the amount of population that, from an agricultural point of view, Ireland was capable of maintaining, would they still adhere to the 105 Members? That argument was addressed rather to the heart than to the head. There was no justice in the proposal that the number of Members from Ireland should not be reduced. It had been dictated by the over-abundant generosity of the Prime Minister; but they must be just before they were generous. When generosity to one part of the country inflicted, or threatened to inflict, injustice on another part, its Representatives could not hold their peace. The Chief Secretary said that the people of Ireland had a very keen sense of justice and injustice in their own affairs. But so had the people of Scotland. The argument he had been submitting had nothing to do with the proposal to extend uniform franchise to England, Ireland, and Scotland. He believed that in Scotland the Liberal Party were unanimous in thinking that it was just and proper of the Government to make this proposal. If the extension did not apply to Ireland, Irish Members would have a real grievance—a grievance which would excite sympathy on his side of the House; but while they approved of this proposal, they must enter their caveat against the other proposal of the Prime Minister. He (Mr. Craig Sellar) held himself free to act exactly as he thought right when the question of redistribution came forward next year. He could not support, and had no intention of supporting, the Amendment to the second reading of this Bill. He went further, and would ask hon. Gentlemen opposite if they were acting with their usual prudence in giving an embittered resistance to this measure? A Bill of this character was inevitable, and had been made inevitable by the action of the Conservative Party in 1867. If in this or the other House they threw out the Bill, would they advance the interests of moderation and Conservatism? The Bill was, no doubt, far-reaching; but it was a Conservative Bill. The statement of the Prime Minister indicated a thorough-going scheme of redistribution, safeguarded by propositions which commended themselves to moderate and practical men. If they threw out the Bill, was there not a danger of throwing out what was moderate and practical with it? At the present moment the country was quiet, because it had confidence in Her Majesty's Government, and confidence that they would pass this Bill. If the Bill were thrown out, would the country remain quiet? It would not. He said that in no menacing spirit—he said it as an indisputable fact. The tranquillity of the country would give way to agitation, and the agitation would not be for a measure which commended itself to moderate men, but for something very different; and they might depend upon it, it would be the “something very different,” and not this reasonable measure, which would ultimately find its way into the Statute Book.

Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that he had been struck by the words of the Prime Minister in introducing this Bill, where he had talked of giving a slight sketch of a Redistribution Bill, when the whole House and the whole country was in a state of excitement to hear what the scheme of redistribution was to be. Then the Prime Minister had told them that what he was going to sketch out was only to be taken as his own view. Judging from the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman's Colleagues, he thought that the Prime Minister was right in making that reservation if he was to say anything at all on the subject. It was all the more necessary that they should have before them a scheme which expressed not only the view of the Prime Minister, but of the joint stock company which formed the Cabinet. The Prime Minister had told them that he proposed to take away their Representatives from the small boroughs in the South of England, but that the number of Irish Members was not to be diminished. He would like to ask Her Majesty's Government—if there had been a Member of it present—in what way the conduct of the Irish during the last four years merited the boon it was now proposed to give to Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) had talked of justice to Ireland; that had been sufficiently answered. Then he had referred to the Act of Union; but in referring now to that Act of Union, not only was the right hon. Gentleman proving himself inconsistent, but he was giving a strong argument to the Irish Members when they asked for the repeal of the Union. What had really given birth to the proposition, contrary as it was to the welfare of the United Kingdom, was the dire necessity on the part of the Government to conciliate the Irish vote; but, judging from the conduct of the Irish Representatives in that House, he doubted whether the Government would gain much by the offer of their bribe. The only result would be the return of a stronger phalanx of Irish Members to wring still more from the Government, from whom they had already wrung so much. It was the duty of everyone who valued the integrity of the United Kingdom to resist such a proposal as had been made. Then the Prime Minister had said that he took his stand on the broad principle that as many capable citizens as possible should be admitted to the franchise; but he had given them no standard of capacity. It might include universal suffrage, or the admission of women to the franchise, or of soldiers and sailors, or of domestic servants; in fact, it gave no limit whatever. Then the Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. George Russell) had given them a most interesting speech, in which he had referred more particularly to the agricultural labourers. For his own part, while he did not deny that the agricultural labourers possessed all the qualities which had been attributed to them, especially tenacity of opinion, he was bound to say, with regard to their political knowledge, that he thought it was somewhat limited. He remembered being on a canvass on one occasion and asking an agricultural labourer was he going to vote for him? The labourer said he was not, as he was going to vote for Mr. Gladstone, and from the next observation he made he showed he believed Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Gladstone were in the same Cabinet. If it had been intended that that class should receive a proper share of representation, he should not have looked with so much apprehension on the proposition; but to give them the power of outvoting all other classes was more likely to prove a curse than a blessing both to them and to the country. The feeling in France among the lower classes of that country just before the outbreak of the Franco-German War was so strong and so warlike that no Ruler could with safety to his Throne have resisted it. The lower they went down in the social scale the greater tendency they would find to excitement of that sort; and it was most desirable that a preponderance of political power should not be placed in the hands of the lower and more excitable classes. Again, the agricultural interest, if that Bill passed before they had a proper scheme of redistribution, would be swamped in many parts of the country, and particularly in counties like Northumberland, Durham, and portions of Yorkshire, where there existed a very large mining population. They knew from past experience that the Party sitting on the opposite side of the House had not that regard for the agricultural interest in these matters to which it was entitled; and when they reflected on the enormous magnitude and importance of that interest, its just claims would be seen to be well worth fighting for. For these reasons he should support the Amendment, maintaining that there was no reason why that Bill should be made an exception to the rule which required redistribution to be coupled with enfranchisement, and that it was calculated more than any former measure of the same sort vitally to alter the character of the national representation.

Mr. CHARLES RUSSELL said, that the considerations for and against the Amendment of the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Manners) had been repeated with almost tedious reiteration, and he would not trouble the House with more than a passing observation on the general question; but, as regarded Ireland in relation to the Bill, he thought there were special considerations affecting the question which had not, in view of their great importance, yet been brought with sufficient fulness before the attention of the House. He would admit, on the general question, that there were plausible reasons in favour of uniting the Franchise Bill with a complete scheme of redistribution—reasons sufficient to catch the votes of those who were anxious to satisfy themselves that they should vote against the Franchise Bill. But he denied they were satisfactory or convincing reasons to those who believed that the broadening of the representative basis on which the Constitution stood would be a gain on the whole, although the measure of that gain might be greater or less, according to the manner of redistribution. Precedent was against the inclusion of a scheme of redistribution in a Franchise Bill. Convenience was opposed to it on this occasion, and either the present or the next Parliament might safely be trusted to deal upon just and right principles with that question. There had run through all the speeches in support of the Amendment one staple argument, and it was in relation to the inclusion of Ireland in the Bill, and to the prospect or promise held out by the Prime Minister that the present number of Representatives from Ireland should not be lessened. He desired to consider this part of the question in some detail. It was to him astounding that hon. Members, especially hon. Members on the Opposition side, could not see that to introduce a Franchise Bill and not to include Ireland was a political impossibility, and would be a grave political mistake, if possible. He was surprised hon. Members opposite did not see that such a course would strengthen, immeasurably, the position of those who maintained that, although these countries were a United Kingdom in name, they were not a United Kingdom in reality. The argument took another form, and the impossibility of excluding Ireland was made a reason for postponing the Franchise Bill altogether. On that hypothesis the measure was to be regarded as just and statesmanlike; but was it to be said that large numbers of people in England, Scotland, and Wales, who, on that argument, were entitled to the franchise, should not get it, because some persons considered it would be impolitic to grant equal rights to Ireland? But he desired to put the case of Ireland on much higher grounds. He affirmed that, even if no Franchise Bill were introduced for England, Ireland had a case for special consideration. In, he thought, three Queen's Speeches during the present Parliament, certainly in two, a Franchise Bill was promised for Ireland by the Government of the day, and it had not yet been passed. Was it right, or wise, or statesmanlike, that that promise should remain unfulfilled? He would explain the differences between England and Ireland. In England the borough franchise—speaking only of the principal franchise—was exercised in respect of any rated occupied house, or any separate dwelling in a house. In Ireland it was in respect of a house over £4 rateable value, which was equivalent to £5 or £6 rental, and that rental was equivalent to an £8 or £9 rental in England. In counties in England a rated occupation of a tenement of £12 or upwards gave the right to vote—he was still confining himself to the main qualification—but the valuation in England approximated closely to the rental value. In Ireland it was nominally the same valuation; but, practically, there was a great difference, for the valuation of £12 in Ireland was equivalent to a rental value of £18 or £20. It was remarkable that, while the educational standard in the counties in Ireland was about equal to that in the Irish boroughs, the educational standard of English counties was considerably below that in the boroughs. The best way to show the different practical results of the existing franchise in England and Ireland respectively was to give a few concrete instances. He was about quoting from a pamphlet, recently issued, on Irish statistics, by Mr. Costello, and he would contrast some of the English and Irish boroughs and counties. Tiverton, which returned two Members, had 1,405 voters, its population being 10,462. The population of Dundalk exceeded that of Tiverton, and yet it had only 414 voters—that was to say, they had equal populations, and yet the English borough had 1,400 voters, while the Irish borough had only 400. He (Mr. Russell) was taking the figures at the time of the last Census. Take Galway Borough and the borough of Boston, which latter, with a population of 300 less, had nearly three times as many electors. The figures were—Boston, 3,043 voters; Galway, 1,024. He could multiply similar instances. With regard to the counties. Take, for instance, the North Riding of Yorkshire, and compare it with Galway. The population of Galway County was 222,000, which population had only 4,800 voters. In the North Riding of Yorkshire, which had the same population as Galway, there were 20,212 voters. Donegal had a population of 205,000, which was about the same, rather less, perhaps, than West Kent; and while the English county had 157,000 voters, Donegal had only 45,000. These were startling results. Then there was the mud-cabin argument, which was ventilated in Dublin by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith). It was simply Mr. Lowe's argument about small dwellings, with a new face. As a matter of fact, the Registrar General's Return showed that, dividing the dwellings in Ireland into four classes, and putting mud cabins in the fourth class, they were only about 6 per cent of that class. The percentage of these mud cabins, too, was greatest in certain counties, the general position of whose inhabitants was not the lowest in the country. He referred particularly to the County Limerick, where the percentage was 15, and to Kerry, where the percentage was as high as 17; but they found in these two counties that low and inferior dwellings were not allied with degradation or immorality of the inhabitants, nor were they coincident with a low educational standard.

In dwellings which were pointed at as of mud, and as having only a few windows, it was to be noted that lowness of physical condition existed with purity of domestic and social life. He came now to the argument that Ireland would be exceptionally treated if she were left her present quota of Members. That argument was not well-founded if they adopted the basis given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster)—namely, that the Members should be proportionate to population. He objected entirely to calculations being based upon the probability of the population in Ireland going on decreasing. Why had it been a decreasing population? No doubt hon. Members in the House, who had had charge of the destinies of Ireland, could answer the question to their own satisfaction. He had every reason to hope that the population of Ireland would not continue a decreasing population. He believed a greatly increased, if properly distributed, population over the country might be maintained. Now, excluding the Metropolitan district, his opinion was that England, on the whole, was over-represented. The Metropolitan district contained a population of 3,600,000, and had 22 Members. If it had its full quota of Members, at the same ratio as the rest of the country—namely, about 55,000 of population per Member—it ought to have 68 Members. What hon. Member had yet said that the London Metropolitan district should get 68 Members? No one said so. The most that was suggested that she should get was 40 or 50 Members. How stood it, then, excluding the Metropolitan district, with the rest of the country? England had 420 Members; she should have 390 Members. Wales had 30 Members; she should have 25 Members. Scotland had 60 Members; she should have 70 Members. And Ireland, excluding the two University Members, had 101 Members; it should have 97 Members, and, adding the two University Members, she would have 99 Members. He was arguing on the ground that the Metropolitan district should not get 68 Members; and, not getting that number, Ireland would be entitled, out of the number which that Metropolitan district would not secure, to at least 4; so that, adding these 4 to the 99, she would have her present quota of 103, Sligo and Cashel being disfranchised. Therefore, he would say from these figures it was demonstrable that, on her population, Ireland was entitled to her present quota of Representatives. But the claim of Ireland rested on grounds much broader and much more important than these. It was said that the bulk of the people of Ireland were discontented, and that the effect of the change made by the Bill would be to sweep away and swamp the Loyal Party; while it would enable the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) to come back to the House of Commons with an increased phalanx of followers of a non-satisfactory character. There was no part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Robert Peel) that he (Mr. Charles Russell) enjoyed more than that part in which he adverted to the speeches of two right hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House—the Members for Ripon and Bradford. These two right hon. Gentlemen seemed to hold in commission the office of the “candid friend” of the Government. This much he would say of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford—that if a speech that savoured of want of generosity towards Ireland had to be delivered, he ought to leave it to someone else. He listened with interest, too, to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon, partly because of his great knowledge of affairs and his great ability, and still more because of the uncertainty that always attended his utterances. There was something inviting in listening to a man and not knowing for certain on which side he would speak or vote. The right hon. Gentleman generally gave his vote to the Government, and his speech to the Opposition; and the Government, he believed, would be quite willing to dispense with both vote and speech. On the point of redistribution as it affected Ireland, both these right hon. Gentlemen were very strong; but what, after all, was the meaning of this argument about the disaffected and the disloyal? Was it that a large mass of the Irish people were dissatisfied with the present state of things? If so, it was quite true; and he would say that the large mass of the Irish people ought to be dissatisfied with much that existed in Ireland. The truth of this matter was that the Irish people were divided into three classes. There was an extreme Party, who were a small minority, who wished for no change, because a change would destroy their status and importance. There was another extreme Party with extreme views, and who pursued those views by means of which he could not approve. But between these two extreme Parties there stood the great mass of the Irish people, dissatisfied, and justly dissatisfied, with many things that required to be redressed, not unwilling, but anxious, that these should be redressed by Parliament, and not opposed to maintaining the English connection so long as it was apparent to them that they were not sacrificing the good of their country, and the peace of their country, to that connection; but who thought also that Ireland's voice ought to be potent in managing Irish affairs. But then it would be said the so-called Loyal Party would be swamped. Well, he would say little about the Loyal Party. The Loyal Party was mostly composed of the landlord party in Ireland. In their present position, he would say little about them. Many of that Party were at present suffering for the sins of their fathers; and their history was now being written, but imperfectly written, in the records of the Land Commission. This, however, he would affirm of the Loyal Party—and no one who had read Irish history would deny it—that the so-called loyal minority had not been an aid, but a hindrance, to any solid union between England and Ireland. They had been loyal indeed; but this loyalty had had a close relation to their own status and their own interest. But then, again, it would be said that this measure would have the effect of returning an increased phalanx of Members to support the hon. Member for the City of Cork, and a phalanx of an unsatisfactory kind. Unsatisfactory to whom? Since when had it become a Constitutional doctrine that men should return Representatives satisfactory to any but themselves? Were English constituencies to return Members satisfactory to Ireland and Scotland, and Scotch constituencies to return Members satisfactory to England and Ireland? The very essence of Parliamentary institutions was that the people should return Members representing their own views; and surely the day was past when any persons in that House, and statesmen of any Party, would desire to have hidden from them the real state of things in Ireland. Was there, then, on this Franchise and Redistribution Bill, to be a hocus-pocus, so that the real views of the Irish people should not be made known through the ordinary channel of representation and by Constitutional means? But was it certain, after all, that the hon. Member for the City of Cork would be more powerful with his increased phalanx? Every Party admitted—and he (Mr. Charles Russell) supposed what everybody admitted must be true—that, whether this Bill was passed or not, the hon. Member for the City of Cork would come back with an increased phalanx of supporters. That being admitted, he would ask every reasoning politician whether the hon. Member would be more powerful with 100 Members with a great grievance redressed, or with 50, 60, or 70 Members with a great grievance unredressed? Well, admitting that the worst would happen as to the Members sent by Ireland if this Bill were extended to Ireland, surely it would be true statesmanship and a wise policy for men of every Party to encourage the belief in the efficiency of Constitutional agitation in Ireland, and the hope that redress was possible from that House. He would ask this question—Was it desired by any Party in that House that the fulcrum of Irish politics should be in America? There were only two methods of redress in a free State—revolution and reform. A distinguished statesman belonging to the Party opposite said that, in Ireland, the first of these remedies was impossible, for a great and powerful country, England, was united with one, Ireland, comparatively weak. “Therefore,” said Mr. Disraeli—for he was the politician—

“The first being impossible in Ireland, it was the business of England to do by reform what the country itself, under different circumstances, would do by revolution.”

These words were uttered many years ago; but they were as true to-day as ever they were. He would say, finally, that the condition of Ireland was exceptional, and that wisdom and justice alike demanded that, on this question of redistribution, she should receive not only just but generous treatment. Why? First, because hon. Members from Ireland, men holding even his views, did not represent opinions that were popular in that House; next, because they addressed themselves to questions not fully understood by even the most painstaking in that House; but, above all, because they (the Irish Members), always in a minority, had not behind them, backing them up and giving weight and substance to their contention, that influence which English and Scotch Members had of a great public opinion which that House always recognized as a force in that House. He need not say that they had the public opinion of Ireland to back them up; but that was an opinion which rarely arrested the attention of the House—which rarely had any influence there, except when accompanied by agitation—aye, even lawless agitation! For these special reasons, he would say that, on this question of redistribution, any Government should be slow to lessen the number of Irish Representatives. What was the position in Ireland that day? Englishmen governed in England, Scotchmen governed in Scotland, but Irishmen did not govern in Ireland. An Englishman Lord Lieutenant, an English Chief Secretary, and, by way of variation, a Scotchman Under Secretary; and they governed by means of stipendiary magistrates, who were accountable to them, and not to the people. Even on the Boards of Ireland, which were mainly administrative, the leading posts were filled by Englishmen and Scotchmen. How would Englishmen or Scotchmen like it if Irishmen ruled in England or in Scotland? It was true—strictly true—to say that there was no country on the face of the earth—except it might be Egypt—in which, at this time, the people of the country had so little control in the government of their country as the Irish people. But more; the Government of Ireland was a Government by Governors who were not, and who did not consider themselves, responsible to the people whom they governed. He was not to be understood as attacking persons, but principles. The Governors of Ireland were responsible, and considered themselves responsible, to that House, in which Irish opinion was, under ordinary conditions, little felt, and in which Irish Representatives, even if united, had no controlling voice. These were some of the reasons why the Irish people were gravely—justly—dissatisfied with the existing state of things in their country. They were also some of the reasons why, upon these questions of franchise and redistribution, statesmen of all Parties should treat Ireland with at least even-handed justice. The Irish problem had taxed, and taxed in vain and for years, the statesmanship of England. It seemed still far from its satisfactory solution, yet its solution was more important for the prosperity of the Empire than any other question, home or foreign. How and when its solution would come no man could tell. But one might at least say, with certain confidence, that one important factor in the solution of the problem would be weakened if, at this juncture, either from perversity, or perplexity, or distrust, Parliament dealt otherwise than with justice and with generosity on these questions of franchise and redistribution with the Irish people.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had based his whole speech upon the actual fact that Ireland was a part of the United Kingdom, and every one of his sentences and arguments had sprung from that admission and that fact. Yet when the hon. and learned Gentleman came to deal with the Irish people and their Government, he complained that they were governed solely by Englishmen, who were not responsible to the Irish people, but to the House of Commons. But the House of Commons represented the United Kingdom; and as the whole argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman was based on the fact that Ireland was part and parcel of the United Kingdom, the governors of Ireland were responsible in the House to the Irish people. As to the Bill before the House, it had one great merit, and that was that there was no doubt about its meaning; and that was the point upon which the Prime Minister prided himself when he made his statement on the introduction of the Bill. The Prime Minister had said the Bill was complete in one vital respect—it was absolutely complete as to its area. They had not, however, only to deal with the Bill as introduced; but they had to deal with the matter, as the Prime Minister had said in his introductory speech, negatively as well as affirmatively, and in doing so he found a series of matters, any one of which would show how far from complete the Bill really was. The Bill—to borrow a word employed by the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) in one of his Lancashire addresses—was “smitten” with incompleteness. He was not at present going through all those matters to which the Prime Minister had alluded; but there was one particular point to which he must refer, because it had been dwelt upon with so much force and energy by the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down. It was the question of Ireland. Ireland was, no doubt, the part of the United Kingdom in which the Bill would have by far the largest effect; and since the measure was one which vitally affected Ireland more than England or Scotland, they were entitled to ask, before they granted this lowering of the franchise, for a distinct answer from the Government as to how many Members Ireland was to have. In connection with that point, he would also like to ask whether the statement of the Prime Minister was made upon the authority and with the concurrence of his Cabinet? The statement made by the Prime Minister as to his authority was to the effect that he had not the least objection to make a little sketch of his own views; and although he could not commit his Colleagues absolutely, yet he would not submit them to the House if he believed they were vitally in conflict with the views of the Cabinet. That, however, in his opinion, was not saying much. Then the noble Marquess, too, had felt this same difficulty. The noble Marquess said that the declaration of the Prime Minister was made with the consent and concurrence of his Colleagues, and this view was generally accepted and concurred in by the other Members of the Cabinet, although he did not say that it embodied everything they might wish to be carried into execution. He thought they were entitled—and the noble Marquess would see there was an element of reason in the demand—to ask the Government to make a distinct statement as to what were their views upon this particular point; because upon the question whether Ireland was to have 105 Members or not they were still at a loss to know how the matter stood. The Prime Minister had, it was true, said that the smaller boroughs, of which there were so many in the South of England, must give way to Scotland and the North of England. But it also appeared that the small boroughs of England were to be disfranchised in order to give Members to Scotland, and also to keep the number of Members for Ireland as they were now. But the noble Marquess had rather modified the statement of the Prime Minister in that connection. The House was, therefore, entitled to have a distinct declaration on the part of the Government whether it was intended that Ireland should retain the 105 Members which she now sent to that House. In the course of debate hon. Members had stated that the number of 100 Members was fixed by Mr. Pitt. The fact was that it was fixed by the Irish Parliament; or, at any rate, it was mainly owing to the action of the Irish Parliament itself that Mr. Pitt eventually fixed upon 100, which number was accepted. It was not settled according to population alone, or by the money which Ireland contributed to the common purse. Both elements were taken into consideration. The contribution of Ireland was one-seventh of the contribution of Great Britain, and the population was two-fifths; and, taking the two together, the number was fixed at about one-fifth of the number of Members sent by the constituencies of Great Britain. Five Members were added to the 100 in 1832, for the constituencies of Belfast, Limerick, Waterford, and Galway. But those additional Members were given not directly in respect of contribution or of population; but because of the interests which had grown up in those boroughs, and of the trades and manufactures which had sprung up in them. He had listened attentively to the speech of the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down, who had argued in favour of the numbers standing as they did now. But if they went by population, they found 5,000,000 in Ireland, as against 30,000,000 in Great Britain. In respect of contributions, they found £58,000,000 from England, £8,000,000 from Scotland, and only £6,000,000 from Ireland; so that by no possible combination of the two elements could Ireland claim the same number of Members as she had at the time of the Union. But the hon. and learned Member had argued that if they were to take population, there was London to be considered, which would be entitled to 68 Representatives. Well, if that line was to be taken, Lancashire would be entitled to about 65 Members; but he did not suppose that she would have that number allotted to her. Then the hon. and learned Member said that London must be struck out of the calculation. Thus the only reason he could urge in favour of his argument depended upon the exclusion of London from consideration. They were, therefore, entitled to a clear answer from the Government on that point. No one had spoken more strongly against Ireland still having 105 Members than the right hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), or than the hon. Member for the Haddington Burghs (Mr. Craig-Sellar). There was another much respected and honoured Member of the Liberal Party, and a former Member of that House, who had spoken in the same sense. Mr. M'Laren had recently described the proposal as a most extraordinary and dangerous one, which ought to be strenuously resisted. He hoped the Government would take all those facts into consideration, and that they might have from them a distinct and authoritative declaration as to whether they meant to keep 105 Members for Ireland or not. He would now deal with another point. The Bill said that there was to be one uniform household franchise established in all counties and boroughs throughout the United Kingdom; and the Conservative Party were told that if they were opposed to that Bill they were opposed to all Reform; and that as they would have to give way they had better do so with a good grace, and accept the Bill as it stood now. The Prime Minister placed the Bill simply on the ground that it let in an enormous number to the franchise who had it not at the present moment; and the right hon. Gentleman had told the House that to the present constituency of 3,000,000, 2,000,000 were to be added—twice as many as were added in 1867, and four times as many as were enfranchised in 1832; and he went on to say that that was something worth doing. No doubt it was, if you proved that those 2,000,000 ought to have votes. The Prime Minister said the Bill was worth fighting for, simply because it added those 2,000,000. Then the right hon. Member for Birmingham took exactly the same view.

That right hon. Gentleman said that they were going to call up to the highest functions of citizenship 2,000,000 of men, and that it was just and expedient to do so. No doubt it was if those men ought to have the franchise. He supposed they were all agreed that the franchise was not to be looked on as an abstract right. The very framework of the Bill was against that idea. The only abstract right he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) knew that an Englishman, or the inhabitant of any country, possessed, was that he should be well governed, and remain as free as possible. He had not an abstract right to govern; but an abstract right to be well governed. The Bill was intended to establish a uniform household franchise. But it only did so in name and not in fact, and it would create greater anomalies than already existed. The hon. and learned Member who had just sat down gave instances of that in Ireland, and had complained—justly and properly complained—that there was really a higher franchise in Ireland than there was in England. The county franchise was £12 in each country; but in England that sum much more nearly represented the real rent than in Ireland. In fact, in Ireland, it might be taken that there was really an £18 franchise, and not a £12. After this Bill passed there would be still greater differences between one part of the country and another. In many parts of the country there would be men who were voters, and yet who were inferior in social status and in intelligence to others who had not got a vote in towns. Therefore, the demand for another Reform Bill would come, and the representation of the towns would be lowered to the standard of the counties. He had never been against the extension of the franchise as extension. There was no practical distinction between the great suburbs of great towns and the towns themselves. It was absolutely necessary, in common justice, that those persons should be enfranchised. In his own county (Lancashire) there were 45 places having more than 10,000 inhabitants each, and they did not possess the franchise. They ought, undoubtedly, to have the franchise by some arrangement of grouping or otherwise. If they went from England to Ireland the anomaly would be greater. No one could pretend that the inhabitants of the Irish cabins were in anything like the same social scale, so intelligent, or so well educated, as the men who had the franchise in the English boroughs. Therefore, by the proposed uniformity they clearly let in a lower class, and what was called uniformity became an utter sham and unreality. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) had said the other day that the agricultural interest would be well represented under this Bill, because the agricultural labourer would represent it; and that if the farmer and the landlord suffered from the way in which the labourer exercised the franchise that was their own fault, because they ought to have educated him long ago. Taking the North-Eastern Division of the county of Lancashire, which the noble Marquess represented in everything except politics, he found that the population in Parliamentary boroughs was 178,730, while the population outside the Parliamentary boroughs was 238,355. From that body they had to get the agricultural interest, which was to be so fairly represented according to the noble Marquess. Out of the 238,355 people there were living in eight towns of from 10,000 to 25,000 inhabitants no fewer than 147,000. Those were really borough constituencies for all practical purposes. If the Bill passed in its naked form where was their agricultural interest? The result was that they had only left as a really rural population about 70,000 persons; so that unless they had a Redistribution Bill which took the boroughs out of the rural population, the 70,000 would be swamped by the 147,000 in towns. Was it not an absurdity to call such an arrangement as that one calculated to represent the agricultural interest? The Government were on the horns of a dilemma as to Ireland. If the Bill was to go on, he agreed that it would be very difficult not to extend it to Ireland, although not to the same extent. But he, unhesitatingly stated that whatever might be the state of Ireland, the moment they presented this Bill their Coercion Laws should be given up. He did not believe that in the history of the world there was ever a nation where the Government said to the people—"We offer you a freer Constitution than you now possess; but we shall keep the exceptional fetters with which you are bound still on." If they kept these fetters on the Irish they could not find fault with the latter if they used the power with which it was now proposed to endow them for the purpose of striking off those fetters. If, as the Chief Secretary and other Members of the Government told them, they could not govern Ireland without these penal clauses, then they ought not to extend the franchise in that country. It had been said—"Let these irreconcilables come into Parliament that we may hear their arguments." But if their object in coming was to make Parliamentary government ridiculous, if their avowed object was to bring about a separation from this country, then those who were determined to maintain the integrity of the Empire could not too soon put down their foot and say—"We do not want separation, and therefore we do not want to hear your arguments." The right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) had said that the only remedy for the state of things in Ireland was to give the minority a fair share of political power. But the House had heard nothing upon that point from the Members of Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had remarked the other day, in reference to the representation of minorities, that the system was absurd, ridiculous, and irritating. The noble Marquess himself said it was desirable that the franchise and redistribution should be dealt with in one Parliament, and he also admitted it was desirable that they should, if possible, be dealt with in one Session. The only way to do this would be by a general desire to co-operate. At all events, a whole Session should be given up to dealing with this great question of Reform. Probably, if they had had only this one Government measure with redistribution at the end, they might have been able before the close of the Session to make a considerable advance towards the desired object. He thought that Lord Derby's speech had never been answered. His Lordship, then Lord Stanley, said in 1866—

"What we really want is some guarantee that the body which deals with the question of enfranchisement shall be in a position also to deal with the question of the redistribution of seats."—(3 Hansard, [182] 1169.)

A Dissolution might take place, and then there would be no redistribution of seats. The result would be this

anomaly. There would be an appeal to the country under a provisional Constitution. Some time ago they heard about the question of registration, and it was stated that a Registration Bill was to be brought forward. Had the Government never contemplated what would occur if a Dissolution took place before such a measure was passed? To have a Dissolution on such a franchise as was proposed without redistribution and without a better system of registration would lead to frauds which it would be impossible to check in placing voters on the register. What they really wanted was some guarantee that the same body which dealt with the franchise should be in a position also to deal with the question of the redistribution of seats. Both of these subjects ought to be dealt with in one Parliament, and certainly not in two. It had been said that if a large body of Members in that House determined to ignore Reform there would be an agitation in the country. That was not a fair way to put the matter. They on that side of the House were not against Reform. ["Oh, oh!"] He could honestly say for himself that he had never made a speech against it; but he would not vote for a Bill which did not tell its own story; which pretended to be complete and was incomplete; which affected to be a reality and was really only a sham. If they were to go to the country they would tell the people the truth, and the whole truth. They would say they wanted to see the scheme of Reform in its full extent to which the country was to be committed; and that when it was brought forward they would be prepared to make the best reform which was possible for the interest not of one class only, but for the interest of all the classes of this great community, and the welfare of this enormous Empire.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) was a serious and a weighty one, such as might be expected from a statesman with such a deep sense of responsibility. The speech of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel) was the very reverse. It was flighty; it was amusing; it was illogical. Every Gentleman on this side of the House must be glad again to hear the voice of the right hon. Baronet, and to admire his style, which has great charms that conceal a multitude of offences in substance. From his speeches at Huntingdon we were led to believe that the right hon. Baronet would take his seat beside the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), and play second fiddle in that little band of militant Conservatives below the Gangway. But, to our surprise, the right hon. Gentleman has taken his seat on the Front Opposition Bench, among staid and respectable ex-officials. Speaking from that place, his speech does not appear to be altogether appropriate; and the occupants of that Bench appear to be rather frightened at the right hon. Baronet's excesses, and to regard him in a manner which recalls the homely simile of a bull in a china shop. The right hon. Baronet did not add much to the arguments that have been used; but he indulged in what have been called the fallacies of vituperative personality, which were directed against my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, who appears to occupy the proud and enviable position of a lightning conductor to the Government, and to attract to himself and divert from his Colleagues all the vulgar abuse which is in the air. But, in 1866, the right hon. Baronet sat on the Liberal side of the House, and a reference to Hansard shows that he voted against an Amendment analogous to this, although in Committee upon the Bill he voted for the Amendment, which had the effect of turning out the Government. The right hon. Baronet says that this Bill will enfranchise 2,000,000 of the most ignorant part of the population—a description which was cheered by the hon. Member for Mid Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin)—although many of the new voters are identical in condition with many who now have the vote; and it will not be forgotten that the remark and the cheer came from that side of the House. The Government are charged with pandering to the Irish vote; but in the same breath we are told that coercion and the truculent vagaries of the Government will risk that vote, so that the two charges destroy each other. It is curious to trace the similarity in form and substance between the Opposition speeches in 1866 and in the course of the present debate. In 1866, being hostile to the Bill, and not wishing to meet it with a direct negative, the Opposition produced an Amendment which differed from the present only in this—that it had a Preamble, now wanting, and that Preamble declared that the Opposition were prepared to consider any proper measure of Reform. Are the Opposition more hostile to Reform now than they were then? Precisely the same things were said then as now. The Franchise Bill was declared to be inopportune; it was incomplete; it was not required; there was danger in deferring redistribution, and the existing constituencies would be swamped. In 1866 these assertions were novel enough to produce a certain number of Liberal defections, so that the Government had a majority of only six. The Government felt itself bound to produce its scheme of redistribution; and immediately the zeal of the Opposition for redistribution disappeared, they commenced an intrigue to defeat it, and to throw out the Bill. That intrigue succeeded, and the Bill and the Government were at the same time defeated. The sequel was that the Government of Lord Derby came into Office, and found themselves under the necessity of introducing a measure of Reform far more Democratic than the one which they had thrown out in the previous year. But while their Bill was more Democratic, it contained the most narrow scheme of redistribution ever introduced into the House. Lord Derby felt it impossible to carry a wide scheme of redistribution and a Franchise Bill at the same time. That was their excuse for proposing such a redistribution as not only left the existing anomalies untouched, but, in fact, increased them, and made them more conspicuous. It is quite clear that, on the one hand, if a real scheme of redistribution—one likely to be lasting—is introduced at the same time as the Franchise Bill it cannot be passed, because it would accumulate against it the Members for the threatened boroughs, and the passing of such a measure would be rendered impossible. On the other hand, if a measure of redistribution is introduced at the same time as a Franchise Bill, on such a basis as would afford a possibility of its passing, it would be certain to be an inefficient measure, which would not be a settlement of the question. On these grounds I think the Government have, on the present occasion, acted wisely in not mixing up the two questions in the present Bill, but in dealing, in the first instance, with the franchise. It is said that if the Government attempt to deal only with the franchise now they will not be able to carry a Redistribution Bill until after the Dissolution of Parliament; so that the two questions would have to be dealt with by different Parliaments—one elected by the present constituencies under the present franchise, and the other under an extended franchise. If that were so, it would not be the fault of the present Government, whose deliberate intention is, if possible, to deal with the question of redistribution next Session. Every motive of self-interest would certainly impel them in that direction, because no one can for a moment doubt that, as long as a Redistribution Bill is hanging over the heads of certain boroughs in the country, it will certainly not be in the interests of the Liberal Party that the question should remain unsettled. So long as redistribution is hanging over those boroughs it is pretty certain that the Members representing the threatened boroughs will have a bias in favour of the Party opposite. Therefore, it is distinctly the interest of Her Majesty's Government that the question of redistribution should be finally settled before a Dissolution takes place. It will not, under these circumstances, be the fault of the present Government if redistribution is not settled next year. But suppose, through the action of the Party opposite, that redistribution should not be settled next year, and that something should occur which would render it necessary to appeal to the constituencies. In such a case, after all, a Parliament elected under an extended franchise must be ultimately the arbiter. It will determine our Government and our laws, and even if we carry a Redistribution Bill in the present Parliament, and that Redistribution Bill is not considered sufficient, but is a very small one, it will still be open for a new Parliament to deal with the question again and extend the redistribution. Therefore, I say, that even supposing that the question should stand over until a new Parliament, I own that I do not, for my part, think that any injury would result to the Constitution. It may be convenient, and it may be far better, that the two questions should be dealt with by the same Parliament; but I do not see that evil would result to the Constitution from the course being adopted which I have pointed out. I will repeat that it is the deliberate intention of the present Government to deal with the question of redistribution, if they possibly can, during the present Parliament, and in the next Session; and it will not be their fault if they do not succeed in doing so. The question of Ireland in regard to this Bill is a very much more serious one, and I may have to deal with it at greater length. I am glad to observe that none of the hon. Members who have spoken on the Opposition side of the House have contended that Ireland should be dealt with in the Bill now under consideration. Some of the hon. Members who have spoken in opposition to the Bill admitted that if the franchise is to be extended it must be extended in Ireland as well as in England; and although outside the House, before Parliament met this year, it was seriously contended by various persons who represented the Tory Party that Ireland should be excluded from the Franchise Bill, I have not heard a single speaker on the other side of the House who has ventured to make that proposition during the present debate. I therefore take it for granted that if the Franchise Bill is to be passed it must be extended to Ireland as well as to England. What has been said is this—hon. Members opposite have used the case of Ireland as an argument against any extension of the franchise at all; and they say it would be dangerous to the Loyal Party in Ireland if any such course be adopted. It has been frequently argued that the extension of the franchise in Ireland will extinguish the Loyal Party in that country. I think the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) went to a further extremity than any other speaker on this point. He charged the Government with a deliberate intention of extinguishing at once and for ever the voice of the Loyal Party in Ulster; and he went so far as to say that the Bill would enfranchise barbarism. It has been also urged in many quarters that the Bill should not be allowed to pass into law without some means being devised for protecting the Loyal Party in Ireland. I would venture to ask the House, is it true that this loyal minority will be completely extinguished if this Bill passes? I do not believe that that will be the case. I speak in the presence of a good many Irish Members, and I have paid some attention to the subject myself, and my deliberate conviction is that it will not extinguish the loyal minority, but that the Loyal Party will maintain its representation, even under an extended franchise, in proportion to its real force in the country. Let me take matters at the worst; let me suppose that the Loyal Party in Ireland is confined to the Protestants in Ireland, with a small sprinkling of the Catholics, which, however, would be hardly worthy of computation. What are the real facts of the case? The Protestants of Ireland are said to comprise one-fourth of the whole population; they are not spread thinly over the whole of Ireland, but are mainly concentrated in the Province of Ulster, and the Province of Ulster contains one-third of the entire population of Ireland. If I except three counties in Ulster in which the Catholics preponderate—Cavan, Monaghan, and Donegal—so large is the number of Protestants that the remaining counties of that Province actually contain one-fourth of the whole population of Ireland, and it would show a majority of Protestants to the extent of 60 per cent. I believe that it is absolutely certain in those districts of Ireland the Protestants, if they are united, will carry all the elections. ["No, no!"] If any right hon. Gentleman opposite is in doubt upon that point I hope he will contradict me; but I think it is perfectly certain that in that part of Ulster, in which the Protestants are in a majority of 60 per cent, they will carry all the elections. If, therefore, the representation be evenly distributed over Ulster, which is not the case at the present time, although it is not far from it, the Protestants of Ireland will secure a number of Members equal to one-fourth of the whole representation.

MR. GIBSON: No, no; that is out of the question.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I have made some inquiries from Irish Members upon the subject, and I do not believe it is out of the question. The right hon. and learned Gentleman will not dispute the fact that, leaving out the counties of Cavan, Monaghan, and Donegal, the Protestants in the remaining counties are in a majority of 60 per cent. There are one or two counties where they are on an equality with the Catholics; but, considering that the Protestant Party have nine-tenths of the wealth and all the influence of the Province, I think it is certain that they would carry the elections in all those counties, and therefore they would secure one-fourth of the representation of Ireland. That is exactly the proportion to which their total numbers in Ireland entitle them. But now let me consider what would be the case if a scheme were adopted such as that which has been suggested for securing the representation of the loyal minority in Ireland, on the assumption I have made that the loyal minority is represented by the Protestant Party, which I hope is not altogether the case, although I assume for the purpose of argument that they are, and would only secure one-fourth of the representation. But if the minority is to be represented, the Catholic minority in Ulster would claim a proportional representation in Ireland; and with a view to secure the representation of the loyal minority we could not do otherwise than adopt the same principle in regard to England. Then the House must recollect that there is a large minority in England of Irish Catholics. I have endeavoured to ascertain the number of that Irish Catholic minority, and I find from the Census Returns that there are living in England 800,000 Irish Catholics who were born in Ireland, and there are almost as many more Irish Catholics living in England who were not born in Ireland, but were born in England of Irish parents. Adding these two together in England and Scotland, they amount to no less than 1,500,000 Irish Catholics now living in England, and who, on any principle of proportional representation, would be entitled to be represented and to have the power of sending Members to Parliament. By uniting these together under any scheme of proportional representation that minority would be able to secure a representation in proportion to that which their numbers entitle them to of about 30 Members. It appears to me, therefore, that the Loyal Party in Ireland have more to lose than to gain by any such scheme as that. ["No, no!"] I say, yes; they would certainly not lose anything like 30 votes. If proportional representation is followed, they would not be entitled, in any case, to more than 30 Members; and in England, on the other hand, there would be 30 Members returned by the Irish Catholic Party. I need hardly remind the House that the Irish Catholics in England are quite as extreme and equally as Irish as the Irish themselves. ["No, no!"] Hon. Members say "No;" but I venture to assert that the Irish Catholics in our manufacturing districts have shown themselves, in the course of the last three or four years, to be in entire sympathy with the extreme Party in Ireland; and I believe if they had the power of combining or grouping themselves together for the purpose of returning Members, they would return men who would sit and vote with the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). Therefore, I contend that it is beyond contradiction that any scheme of this kind would be most unfavourable to the Loyal Party in Ireland, and it would give a larger representation to the extreme Irish Party in this House than are now represented. But are we really right in assuming that the extension of the franchise in Ireland would have the effect of returning an increased number of Members belonging to the Irish Party? Is it true that all the new voters would vote absolutely in the same manner as the present voters in the rural districts in Ireland? I think that is an assumption we are not justified in making. One of the principal features in the present condition of Ireland is that the constituencies consist merely of one class—namely, the tenant farmers. The effect of the extension of the franchise would be to add a large class of agricultural labourers; and I cannot but think that after a time questions would arise of difference between those two classes of persons. As it is, there have been questions raised between them, showing that they have separate and distinct interests; and the tenant farmers have, I believe, not shown any alacrity in carrying out the provisions of the Land Act in favour of their labourers. No doubt the labourers will claim privileges under any amendment of the Land Act which would put them at once in hostility with the tenant farmers, because such privileges cannot be obtained except at the expense of the tenant farmers. Therefore, it is inevitable that there will be a diversity of interests between these two classes of persons; and my belief is that the effect of giving the franchise to the agricultural labourers of Ireland would have a steadying effect upon the tenant farmers themselves, and that we may see before very long a difference of opinion between the tenant farmers and the labourers of Ireland. That difference is already beginning to show itself; and I may quote the different policies propounded by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and by Mr. Davitt, as an illustration of that difference. I cannot but hope, therefore, that differences of this kind may in the future have a very important effect upon the elections in Ireland. But this much I will say—that if we desire that these differences should exist, and if we hope that some effect may result from them upon the Irish elections, the best thing we can do is to include Ireland in the Franchise Bill. I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) emphasized that opinion, that the only principle you can apply to Ireland is a principle of equity, and that that principle must be applied in all the various questions that are certain to arise under the Franchise Bill. If you do anything to create a sense of injustice and wrong among large classes of the people in reference to the franchise, it is quite certain that you will do your best to unite all classes in Ireland against the Government, and against the Legislature of this country. I do not deny that the question of redistribution of seats in Ireland is a very important, or a very difficult question; but this I will say—that if in England and Scotland we were to adopt the plan of equal electoral districts, based upon numbers, it would be extremely difficult not to apply the same principle also to Ireland. Treating Ireland as an integral portion of the United Kingdom, there would be a strong argument in favour of a reduction of its numbers; but if, on the other hand, you do not adopt that principle—and no part of the statement of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister received more general accord than that in which he repudiated the principle of electoral districts based upon equal areas of population—if we are not to concede to populous districts and to a concentrated population the full number of Members to which they might be entitled on the basis of population—if that principle be not adopted, and its repudiation was certainly received with general accord by the House, the views of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) is a right one—that you must give Ireland the benefit of the principle as well as England. The necessary complement of any such principle would be that the rural portions of England and the outlying districts—such as Wales, and the Southern and Eastern Counties—would all be somewhat over-represented in proportion to population, as compared with London and the other big towns. Therefore, it may well be that Ireland, being a poor country, not having a concentrated population, but being only a thinly-populated country, will have a right to claim that the same principle shall be accorded to her, and that her numbers shall be apportioned to her on the same principle as the Members for Wales and the outlying districts of England. I will not go further into that argument. I have only alluded to it to show that the whole question admits but of one treatment; and that if, in regard to populous districts, you are going to lay down the principle that concentrated populations in London and in the manufacturing districts are not to have their full measure of representation according to numbers, it may well be a question whether the same principle should not be extended even to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) actually ventured to say that the agricultural interest in England would be entirely obliterated and extinguished in this country. ["Hear, hear!"] Notwithstanding the cheers of hon. Members opposite, I say there was never a more absurd statement made in this House. Has it ever been contended that the manufacturing interest of this country was extinguished by giving votes to the labouring class? And yet, according to the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire, if we give votes to the labourers in the rural districts, we shall extinguish the agricultural interest. ["No, no!"] That seems to me to be the logical result of his observations. Now, the agricultural labourers will have a very large proportion of the votes to be created under the Bill—I think about one-half of the new votes will be given to them. ["No, no!"] That is my computation—that of the total number of votes in the counties under the Bill, nearly one-half will be given to the agricultural labourers. I do not say that that will be so in some counties, like Lancashire, because in Lancashire there is a large urban population.

MR. J. LOWTHER: What would be the case in Cumberland?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I am not able to speak as to what the effect would be in Cumberland; but in most of the agricultural counties of England the agricultural labourers will comprise nearly, if not more than, one-half of the new voters. Why should the addition of that number in the agricultural districts destroy the agricultural interest? The labourers will be as much interested in any question affecting the true interests of agriculture as any other class connected with agriculture. What would be extinguished is the hope fostered by the right hon. Gentleman, that if at some time the Tory Government is restored to power there will be a return to protective duties. ["Question!"] Hon. Members opposite cry "Question." I repeat, that the effect of giving votes to the agricultural labourers would extinguish at once and for ever any hope of returning to protective duties. [Mr. J. Lowther: Why?] Beyond all question the agricultural labourers will never be induced to vote for a return to Protection. I fully admit that the questions to which I have just adverted are irrelevant to the main issue before the House; but my remarks have been addressed to the Amendment, which is altogether irrelevant to the question of extending the franchise. The real question before the House is, whether the franchise should be extended to the counties? For my part, I frankly admit that I am not one of those Members of the Liberal Party who desire at an early period to re-open the question of Reform. I was one of those who hoped that the settlement effected in 1867 might be a permanent one—at all events, for a generation. Looking at the immense work before Parliament, much of which still remains undone, I was not myself desirous that we should spend the best part of two Sessions in again considering Reform. But as time went on, after 1867, it became more and more clear that that Act was not a settlement, and could not be defended on any grounds of justice, logic, or expediency. The very magnitude of the franchise then conceded, which was far beyond the intentions or expectations of its authors, inasmuch as they thought they had got hold of a great principle in personal payment of rates which would limit the number of votes, but which turned out to be non-existent—I say the very magnitude of the extension of the franchise then conceded has operated to prevent the settlement from being a permanent one. As time went on, it became more and more clear that the question must be re-opened. There were two great classes of the community left out of the settlement of 1867, and during the last few years they have been clamouring for admission—I mean the miners of England and the agricultural labourers. As far as I recollect, those two classes did not demand votes in 1867; and it is only within the last few years that they have demanded the franchise. There was another consideration which weighed with me personally, even more than that to which I have alluded, and that is the present condition of the agricultural labourers of this country. I think it is impossible to regard the condition of the agricultural labourers of the country, and especially of the rural districts of the West and East and middle of England without very great concern. I believe they are the only class in the country of whom it can be distinctly said that, within the last few years, their condition has not only not improved, but has somewhat gone back—["No, no!"] Hon. Members say "No, no;" but I venture to repeat the assertion on authority which cannot be gainsaid. What is the reason of this non-progression or deterioration of the large class of agricultural labourers? I believe it is not far to seek. The fact is, that for many years past there has been a constant drain of the best men from the rural districts into the manufacturing towns, and those who have remained behind are not equal to those who have left. There has been a constant drain from the rural districts of all the most intelligent, able, and competent men engaged in agricultural operations; and, as a rule, those who have been left behind have been inferior in point of ability and intelligence. Some hon. Members have said "No;" but I could quote to them many passages from the Report of the Commission on Agriculture, and the evidence given before that Commission. I will, however, content myself with only one passage, although I can assure the House that there are many others of equal force. Mr. Doyle, who investigated the condition of agriculture in all the Midland Counties, from Gloucestershire up to Warwickshire and Northamptonshire, says—

"The labourers, generally speaking, are at present not the younger and more active and intelligent class of men one hears and reads of. A great number of the labourers on farms now are old men, or men of weakly constitutions. The truth is that the younger men are drawn off by other sorts of industry—the result is that the farmers generally tell you, and I think with considerable truth, that none but the refuse, as they put it, of the labouring population is left with them."

I can quote 50 passages to the same effect from the evidence given before the Royal Commission as to the state of the agricultural labourers in the Southern and Eastern districts of the country. A remarkable article was published not long ago by Dr. Jessop, a Norfolk clergyman, who had spent many years of his life in that country. This is what he says, after an experience of 35 years of the agricultural labourers—

"There has been, and there is, a constant drain of the best men from the villages to the towns; and physically and morally a steady deterioration in our labourers has been, and is, going on. This is undeniable. It is deplorable; it is menacing."

It appears to me that this is not at all unlikely to be the case. What are the inducements to the labouring man to remain in the purely agricultural districts? He can never hope to become the owner of any portion of the land; he can never hope even to become possessed of his home; he must always be in a state of dependence, and cannot hope to become independent. In many parts of the country the number of large farms have increased, and all the small holdings have disappeared. All the steps by which an agricultural labourer could hope to rise to a higher status have been taken away. What, then, is the inducement to these men to remain in the rural parishes? The House will see that it is very small indeed; and the result has been that a constant drain has been taking place from the rural districts of the best men; and those who are left behind are, on the average, not so good as those who have gone. It appears to me that this is a very serious question, and I commend it to the attention of the House. After all, the agricultural labourers are the backbone of the labour of this country, and the reserve of the labour market for the manufacturing districts. It is, therefore, a serious thing to know that the condition of the agricultural labourer is so bad. What is the remedy? I do not propose to consider at any length what the remedy is; but what I do say is, that the very first thing we ought to do for them is to give them an opportunity of stating their own view in this House. It seems to me of the utmost importance that we should give to the agricultural labourers the opportunity of stating their case; and, with this object, the very first and most important step to be taken is to raise the status of the whole class by giving them the rights and duties of citizenship, not merely in regard to their local duties, but in the Parliament of the country. It is for this reason I feel convinced that it is wise and expedient on the part of this House to pass this measure speedily; and I feel further convinced that a measure such as this, giving a widely comprehensive, but yet moderate extension of the franchise, is one of the wisest measures the House could pass, and would be permanently beneficial to the interests of the country at large.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."—
(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL :
Before the Motion for Adjournment is put, I wish to make one remark in the nature of an appeal to the noble Marquess the Leader of the House, and it is to this effect—I think the noble Marquess and the House generally are anxious to conclude the debate before the Easter holidays; but the probability of that arrangement being arrived at will become exceedingly remote if the debate is to follow the course it has followed for the last three nights. I will not say a word about the positive inhumanity of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works in detaining the House to an intolerable length, when he was aware that the Prime Minister had intimated a desire, with a view, Sir Arthur Otway, to your convenience, that the House should adjourn at an early hour. I will not allude further to that matter; but I wish to point out this in respect to the Motion for Adjournment—that the whole, or nearly all the debate, has been entirely monopolized by the two Front Benches, and the right hon. Gentlemen who occupy those Benches generally appear to be under the impression that except, at the dinner hour, the intervention of any private or independent Member is an unwarrantable intrusion which is not to be tolerated. I think we have the right to appeal to the noble Marquess to protect the rights of private Members in this matter. He must know that everything that has fallen from the First Commissioner of Works has been said over and over again, both by himself and the Prime Minister, and the time of the House has, therefore, been uselessly taken up by the right hon. Gentleman. The First Commissioner of Works followed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), who also spoke at great length, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel), who followed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster), have also taken part in the debate to-night. It appears to be the belief of right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Benches that it is their privilege, not only to monopolize the right of speaking, but always to speak at a length not less than an hour and a-quarter, or an hour and a-half. Under these circumstances, I think I ought to make an appeal to the noble Marquess, so that if the debate is not concluded at the time the two Front Benches have arranged to conclude it, I may anticipate any charge of Obstruction and waste of time that may be made against private Members who feel themselves called upon to take part in the debate.

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD: I wish to express my deep regret that up to the present time Members, such as the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst), have been unable to participate in the discussion. The adjournment of the debate was moved on one night by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), on another by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster), and now, on the third, it has been moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach). On Thursday night and to-night, not a single English private Member sitting in this quarter of the House has taken part in the debate, although the interests of many of them will be materially affected by the Bill. I certainly think it would be a great advantage to the discussion if men like the hon. Member for Stoke were allowed to take some part in the debate.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: Before the noble Marquess replies to the question of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), I should like to put another to him on another subject. I wish to ask him to be good enough to explain how it happened that no Member of the Government was in his place on the Front Bench between the hours of 9 and 10 this evening during the very interesting speech delivered by my hon. Friend the Member for Wilton (Mr. Sidney Herbert), and also during part of the able speech delivered by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell)? My experience of the House enables me to say that such a state of things is not only without precedent, but it is also, in some sense, disrespectful to the House. I may add that long after 10 o'clock there was no Member of the Cabinet on the Front Bench. In my recollection, it has always been the custom for the Government to be present during a debate of this importance; and I really hope that the noble Marquess, having regard to the antecedents of the House, will take care that there is not a recurrence of this very undesirable circumstance.

MR. SEXTON: I do not rise for the purpose of making any complaint on the part of the Members of the House with whom I have the honour to act in regard to the management of the debate. We have not chosen, so far, to intervene in the debate, or to express our opinions on the great questions before the House, or the course which the debate has taken. For reasons of our own, we have deliberately refrained from addressing the House; and in regard to the future, when it occurs to us to address the House we shall know how to secure a hearing. I think there is some force in the observation of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) that this debate has been conducted, so far, in a manner which has not been favourable to the rights of English private Members, considering that they are so much interested in the question. The opinions of the two Front Benches are well known, and the course of the debate should have been directed to an endeavour to discover the opinions of the independent Members; whereas we have had the not very edifying spectacle of seeing the debate confined to the two Front Benches, and to those "corner-men," who have been humorously described in the debate as "refugees." I hope the noble Marquess the Leader of the House will give to the appeal or note of warning of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock the attention which it deserves; and that before the Government endeavour to precipitate the conclusion of the debate they will make an arrangement to secure a fair, full, and attentive hearing for the general body of independent Members of the House.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: When the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) rose, I thought he was going to reply for the Front Opposition Bench to the charge that had been made against the two Front Benches of monopolizing the debate. That charge, so far as it has any validity at all, applies more to the Front Bench opposite than to the Bench on which I have the honour to sit. I was not present myself at the time alluded to by the right hon. and learned Gentleman; for, as the experience of the right hon. and learned Gentleman must teach him, it is quite impossible to attend during the whole of the debate without having some interval for refreshment. As to the part which has been taken by the Government in this debate, I conceive that it has been somewhat smaller than is even usual in a debate of such importance. On the first evening the only Member of the Government who adressed the House was myself. On the second evening my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. George Russell) spoke before the dinner hour, but at no great length. The only other Member of the Government who spoke on that evening was my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain), whose contribution to the debate cannot be called immaterial, seeing that it has afforded abundant material for criticism to hon. Members opposite. On the present occasion my right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works has been the only Member of the Government who has addressed the House. I quite admit that it is inconvenient and extremely undesirable that in a debate of this kind an undue share should be monopolized by any particular quarter of the House; but I have found that the Government are sometimes exposed to a totally different charge from the present, and that when they do not take part in a debate they are charged with observing a policy of silence. It is difficult for a Government to take an even course between these two extremes; and all I can say is that it will be the endeavour of myself and my Friends to shape our course so as not to render ourselves liable either to the one charge or the other. As to any arrangements that may be made on the other side of the House, I need hardly say we have no control whatever over them; and I would ask the noble Lord to appeal to his own Friends, with whom he assured us the other day he is on terms of the most intimate cordiality. All I can say is that, as far as we ourselves are concerned, I hope that we have not spoken at undue length.

MR. CHAPLIN: I think it was high time that the rights of private Members should be vindicated, because it would appear from the remarks of my noble Friend that there has been on this occasion an arrangement, not only as to who should speak, but as to the time when the debate should terminate. Probably the two Front Benches may find themselves mistaken in that matter. Upon the question of adjournment I wish to ask the noble Marquess if he proposes to take any further Business to-night? I understand that the object of adjourning the debate is to liberate the Deputy Speaker from the Chair. I find, however, that there is a Bill down on the Paper as the second Order, in which great interest is taken; and, as far as I am able to gather, there will be no opposition to the next stage—namely, that the Speaker should leave the Chair, if an undertaking is given by the noble Marquess that the Bill shall not be proceeded with in Committee until after the second reading of the Representation of the People Bill. If there is a general understanding in the House to that effect, I hope there will be no objection on the part of the Government to take this stage of the Bill, which would only keep the Deputy Speaker in the Chair for a few minutes.

MR. KENNY: In reference to the second Order of the Day, it is not proposed by any hon. Gentleman sitting on this side of the House to object to the Motion that the Speaker do now leave the Chair, on the understanding that the consideration of the Bill in Committee is not proceeded with until after Easter, and that we have a guarantee from the noble Marquess that it will not be taken on the day the House re-assembles.

MR. LEAMY: I wish to mention that several hon. Members have left the House under the impression that no other Business would be taken, and I am afraid they will be taken by surprise if they find that this Bill has been allowed to go into Committee. Indeed, it was understood that the House would have been adjourned at a much earlier hour than this. I do not think, under these circumstances, that any further Business ought to be taken.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I do not know whether I am in Order; but, in answer to the Question which has been addressed to me, I should like to say that I should have been very glad, if it had been possible, to follow the arrangement suggested by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), and to take another stage of the next Bill on the Paper. I am also much indebted to the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny) for the expression of opinion which he has just given. At the same time, I think an arrangement suddenly proposed, at a time when many hon. Members are absent, might be liable to misunderstanding and imputations of breach of faith. I believe it was understood, after the statement of the Prime Minister, that it was not proposed to proceed with any other Business after the Representation of the People Bill to-night. Under those circumstances, a large number of Members are not present who might take objection to the arrangement now proposed. I therefore think it would be better, however much we might desire to do otherwise, to ask the House not to proceed with any further Business.

Motion agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: In accordance with the announcement made by my right hon. Friend this afternoon, and on account of the state of your health, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn. I am sure the House is very much indebted to you for having come down to-night at great personal inconvenience.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I am sure, Sir, that that feeling is shared by the whole House.

Debate further adjourned till Tomorrow.

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock.

FRESHWATER FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 43.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained that its object was to extend the powers of Boards of Conservators in fishery districts, for the better protection of fresh water fish. The meshes of nets were frequently so small that immature trout and young salmon were destroyed in the operation of catching larger fish, and the Bill was intended to prevent this. It enabled Fishery Boards to make bye-laws for determining the mesh of nets, and the instruments to be used in fishing; it also extended Section 6 of the Fresh Water Fisheries Act, 1878, thereby enabling a Board to be formed for the protection of coarse fish. Clause 3 extended the powers of water bailiffs from the districts marked out by the Fresh Water Fisheries Act, 1868, and the Salmon Fisheries Acts, 1861 to 1873, to the districts intended to be protected by the Bill. It was not to extend to Scotland or Ireland, or to the counties of Norfolk or Suffolk.

—(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY was understood to say, that the Bill would affect many private rights, and would prevent small fish being caught for bait. He did not wish to oppose the second reading of the Bill; but he now gave Notice that it was his intention to propose some limitations in Committee, so as to secure the rights and privileges of those who possessed several fisheries.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

ISLE OF MAN HARBOURS BILL.

(NO. 47.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD SUDELEY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the object of the Bill was to amend the Acts of 1872 and 1874, as some of the provisions in those Acts had been found impossible to be carried out. Under the Act of 1874 harbour dues might, with the approval of the Board of Trade, be imposed on all vessels using the harbours of the Island. It had been found impossible to impose these dues, as it would seriously interfere with the trade of vessels calling at the ports of the Island on their way from England to Ireland. If these vessels were charged with dues on their tonnage it would not be worth their while to call, as the amount of freight was often very small, and the result would be that a large amount of shipping would be kept away altogether from the Island. To remedy this it was proposed by Section 5 of the Bill that when tonnage dues were imposed they should be charged on the cargo landed, and not on the registered tonnage of the vessel. In Section 3 power was taken to levy tolls on docks, piers, or quays. A costly iron pier was lately erected at Ramsay, and was used for landing passengers and as a promenade. A local Act was passed authorizing its construction and contemplating the tolls; but it had been found advisable to have the insular legislation confirmed by Parliament. There were also clauses relating to ferries. The Bill was warmly supported by the local Legislature, and a Resolution approving it was carried without a dissentient voice.

—(The Lord Sudeley.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD.

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

EARL DE LA WARR asked the Lord President of the Council, Whether a copy of the Report from the School Management Committee of the London School Board in February last can be laid upon the Table of the House; also a copy of the Memorial forwarded to the Education Department relative to the examination of young children in schools.

Moved for—

"Copy of the Memorial forwarded to the Education Department relative to the examination of young children in schools; with the answer of the Education Department thereto."
—(The Earl De La Warr.)

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL): My Lords, the Memorial to the Education Department can and will be laid upon the Table, together with the answer which the Department has made. With respect to their Report from the School Management Committee the case is different. I have no doubt that the noble Earl is entitled, as a ratepayer, to see it if he pleases, though, if there is any difficulty about it, I shall be glad to assist him in the matter; but it would not be usual to make these Reports Parliamentary Papers.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—INTRODUCTION OF BILLS INTO THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD WAVENEY inquired of Her Majesty's Government, Whether, in consideration of the present system of transacting the Public Business, it might not be expedient to introduce such Bills as did not interfere with the Privileges of the House of Commons or touch the imposition of taxation, more frequently in the first instance into the House of Lords? The noble Lord said, he asked this Question because he found in Her Majesty's Speech a large number of Government Bills mentioned, and he supposed that the Government intended to proceed with them during the Session, and carry them through Parliament. They had now arrived at the end of the second month of the Session, and, with the exception of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill, they had had no measure of any importance introduced for their consideration in that House. He thought that there were a good many questions brought forward in Her Majesty's Speech which they might fairly claim to have had brought under their consideration in the first instance. The result of the present system was that the Empire was deprived of a part of its legislative force. He did not lay claim to any spirit of prophecy; but no one could shut his eyes to the fact that there was a movement going on around them of unknown forces in unforeseen directions, and he thought that their Lordships would do well not to overlook the tendency of the public mind.

EARL GRANVILLE, in reply, said, he feared that the answer he was about to give would hardly be satisfactory to his noble Friend, although he quite sympathized with the object of the noble Lord's Question. The fact was that for 25 years, whenever he had been in Office, he had had to answer the same sort of Question at least once, and generally twice in the Session. He never omitted any opportunity of impressing upon his Colleagues the question of whether some particular measure might not be introduced into their Lordships' House. He did not believe that there was any disinclination on the part of his Colleagues to take that course; but, somehow or other, there was always a reason given why it was more advantageous that a particular Bill should be introduced into the other House. He did not think that this was attributable to any prejudice on the part of the present Administration, for he remembered that some 30 years ago Lord Aberdeen, in answering that identical Question, had said that he had heard that Question asked in the House of Lords 50 years before. That being so, he thought there must be some idea that important measures were not so well received when they came down from their Lordships' House as when they were specially introduced into the other House in the first instance.

ARTICLE 107 B.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

EARL DE LA WARR, in rising to call attention to the Education Code, which is laid on the Table of the House till Wednesday next; and to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to direct that after the word 'Examination' in Article 107 B. of the new Code of Regulations issued by the Committee of the Privy Council on Education the following words be added 'but infants till they have attained the age of five years shall be exempted from examination in reading, writing, counting, and needlework,'" said, that he must apologize for the short Notice of that Motion, he having only within the last few days become aware of the fact that the time which the document to which he was about to refer lay upon the Table of the House had nearly expired. He wished to ask their Lordships' attention to some few points connected with it. It appeared that the Privy Council derived their authority to issue a document like that upon the Table from the Elementary Education Act of 1870. It was clear that the avowed object of that Act was to give what was usually understood by the term "elementary education," and in the regulations issued by the

Lord Carlingford

Education Department of the Privy Council in the Code elementary education was defined to be instruction in reading, writing, arithmetic, and needlework. That seemed to be very well. But what did they find further? There were what were called optional subjects. They were singing, English, geography, elementary science, history, algebra, Euclid, and mensuration, mechanics, chemistry, physics, animal physiology, botany, principles of agriculture, Latin, French, and domestic economy. But not content with that it was also added—

“Any other subjects, other than those mentioned in this Article, may, if sanctioned by the Department, be taken as a specific subject, provided that a graduated scheme of teaching it be submitted to and approved by the Inspectors.”

He was at a loss to know how schools in which all those subjects were taught could come under the class of elementary schools, as intended by the Elementary Education Act of 1870. It was true those higher subjects were called optional; but if they were to be taught at all, the school must be provided with a class of teachers who were competent to give the instruction. It really amounted to this—that the education given in those schools was sufficient to prepare for any profession—he could not suppose that the Elementary Education Act was intended for that—schools, let it be remembered, which ratepayers were compelled to support, and in which there were children whose parents were receiving an income, in some cases, as they were informed, of £400 or £500 a-year. Then there was another evil attending that discretionary power vested in the Education Department of the Privy Council. The regulations which were issued periodically were perpetually changing. The Lord President, or the Vice President of the Privy Council, might hold entirely different views about education from their Predecessors in Office, and changes were made. Thus they found the Code of 1882 required less than the Code of 1884—teachers and children were overworked, and serious consequences were the result. The Code of 1882 required that a child should have attended 250 times before being presented for examination by the Inspector; but the Code of 1884 required only that the name of a child should have been on the register for 22 weeks in the year before it was presented for examination. The attendances in the 22 weeks might have been comparatively few, and to enable the child to pass the examination great pressure must probably have been used. And as regarded over-pressure and the system of cramming children, often to the injury of their health and that of their teachers, in order that they might pass the examination, there could be no doubt that the system which had been adopted of payment by passes lay at the root of the evil. The object was to gain as large a grant as possible by getting the largest number of children through the examination without reference to anything else. There were other matters connected with that subject to which, at a future time, he desired to ask their Lordships' attention. But there was the important question which he desired to bring before the House, whether the education which was then being carried on at so large a cost to the country, and was becoming a serious burden to local ratepayers, was an education that was based upon sound principles? The Return of the Education Department showed an expenditure for 1883 of £2,846,000 being an increase of £44,000 over 1882. He asked whether, with that enormous cost, they were acting upon principles which would benefit the moral and social condition of the people? The principle of the Education Act seemed to exclude that. The dread of religious education had led to the consequent exclusion, also, of moral education. The Inspectors of schools were forbidden “to inquire into any instruction in religious subjects” given in schools; and could moral teaching be separated from religious? An Inspector did not inquire whether a child even knew the Ten Commandments, or what the Bible was; and it was asserted that since the passing of the Education Act of 1870 many young persons, from ignorance of the Bible, had arrived at mature years unfit to be sworn in a Court of Justice. Previous to the Act of 1870 it was indispensable to the obtaining of a Government grant that the Bible should at least be read. He might quote the words of the late Archbishop of Canterbury, who stated that—

“In one large town of this country there were more than 12,000 children in Board schools who receive no week-day religious instruction of any kind.”

He left that question, then, with the hope that it might meet with their Lordships' serious attention. On referring to Article 107, it would be found that all scholars—that was including infants—must be presented to the Inspectors for examination, and that this was carried out was shown by the Reports of School Boards. He believed he might mention the London Board, for the Reports of which he had that day asked. He found it stated—"That the Committee were of opinion that the examination of infants in reading, writing, counting, and needlework should be discontinued until they have reached their fifth year."

And that—

"A large proportion of the time of infants between three and five be devoted to healthful recreation, lively occupations, games, and physical exercises."

A statement relative to this question was recently made, as reported in the public Press, by Dr. Forbes Winslow, whose name must be well known to their Lordships. He said—

"As one who had had many opportunities of observation, he was able to bear testimony to the direful effect of the over-pressure which was going on at the present moment in ruining the health of young children, and that the lunacy statistics were a sufficient evidence of the evils resulting from endeavours to force into the brain knowledge which it was incapable of holding."

The view of the question which he had stated seemed to be consistent with common sense, and he hoped the noble Lord opposite would not object to the Amendment in the Code which he now begged to move.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to direct that after the word 'Examination' in Article 107 B. of the new Code of Regulations issued by the Committee of the Privy Council on Education the following words be added 'but infants till they have attained the age of five years shall be exempted from examination in reading, writing, counting, and needlework.'"—(The Earl De La Warr.)

LORD NORTON said, the noble Earl had seized the last moments allowed for criticism of the annual re-edition of the Education Code. He pointed out that to-morrow was the last day on which this new edition of the Code would lie on the Table of the House, after which its fresh alterations would become law. There was not a single instance in which the annual edition had not included alterations of a character to make that which was already complicated enough still more complicated from year to year. Each edition had been recommended to Parliament as intended to contain the last changes on the subject. He agreed generally with the criticisms made by the noble Earl. He had brought to notice, in his speech, one particular effect of the working of the present Code. Any reasonable man, he thought, would consider it a defect in this Code that it attached educational grants to the intellectual performances of children of three years old. There was no country in which such an absurdity was adopted. In Germany—a country which was always favourably compared with ours in educational matters—such a thing was not attempted. Infants of this tender age were left either to nurses or crèches, or infant asylums, or to little schools kept at private cost. A public receptacle for the care of children three years old was little more than a foundling hospital. It was taking babies away from the care of their mothers, and placing them at schools at the public expense under the pretence of giving them education. But this was only one of many bad features inseparable from a system of education based on a radically false principle—namely, that of providing for national education by the payment of the teachers by grants upon detailed results of performances in various kinds of instruction. He could hardly conceive a more ridiculous scheme for national education than ours, which proposed to give 1s. grant for every child taught needlework; 1s. for singing, or 6d. if taught by ear; 1d. for elementary subjects, among which the art of reading was enumerated as a subject; then passed on to higher grants for higher subjects still as elementary. These schools were supposed to be elementary, yet elementary subjects were paid for much lower than subjects not elementary. Thus, 2s. were given as a grant for what were called class subjects, and 4s. for specific subjects including science and foreign languages. Now, he wished to impress upon their Lordships that nowhere else in the world did a school grant system like that of England exist. He believed that the noble Viscount (Viscount Sherbrooke), whom he did not see in his place at that moment, was the author of this very quaint system. The noble Viscount had taken, it would seem, a commercial view of the subject. The idea was a fear of value not being secured by uncertain tests of the teachers' work and of the teaching paid for. There was a wish to secure a quid pro quo—to ascertain that they should get their money's worth. But he should like to point out that the quo meant the expenditure of millions for the general education of the working classes; the quid was only specified performances by specified groups of children, which was anything but the national education wanted. The complaints which were now being made, not of over-education, but of over-pressure in bad education, sprang entirely and necessarily from the action of this false principle. It was an obstacle to all that was worthy of the name of education. The teacher had to make an income to pay his last year's bills by getting up some of the children to earn for him, as the phrase was, the highest grants, and the highest grants were attached to the highest subjects. For this, teachers and pupil-teachers were straining, and children were worked over hours, and were crammed instead of being educated. Those children who could not be so crammed, or backward scholars, were neglected as unprofitable earners of grants. Most irrelevant answers were made to these complaints—such as that there was no over-expenditure, that room was still wanted for more children, and that a few richer children wanted higher education, who were taking the poorer children's bread. But the question was not of too much education, but of the system of school-managers farming little children for grants on sham education and calling it a national system.

EARL STANHOPE said, he remembered, as a former member of the London School Board, that a number of children under five years of age were sent to school simply because their parents were away working, and these children mostly passed their time lying on the floor. The by-laws provided for the education of children between the ages of five and 13 years. That was quite right, though in some cases five might be somewhat too early; but the present proposal of individual examination of infants under five seemed to him to be extraordinary, and therefore he trusted some explanation would be given of it. He could see no advantage of children under five years of age being presented to Her Majesty's Inspectors for examination. Such a course was not only objectionable and useless, but it was positively mischievous to the health and intellect of tiny infants.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, the discussion that had taken place was a striking illustration of the way in which certain noble Lords in that House travelled from the Notice of Motion under discussion. He had innocently come down prepared to deal merely with the question relating to infants under the age of five, and whether they ought or ought not to be examined. But two of the noble Lords had travelled over a number of questions that arose under the Code. It never occurred to him that these would be started. The noble Earl had raised the question whether there should or should not be a Code at all, or very nearly that, and, if any Code, what Code; whether payments by results were or were not good; whether all the world was right or the noble Lord. It was strange that the noble Lord had not discovered that the Code introduced by Lord Spencer and Mr. Mundella last year, and altered this year, as the result of experience, by the Circular of Mr. Mundella, was entirely in the noble Lord's direction. It was no doubt true that the Education Department were not able to go far on the same road with the noble Lord. With respect to the treatment of the younger infants, he was in hearty sympathy with the noble Lord, who was preaching on this subject to those who were already converted. His Motion was an anachronism. It might have applied to past Codes, but it did not to the present. The noble Earl did not appear to understand the effect of the existing Code. It gave no individual grant to children in infant schools, and it did not require the individual examination of infants under five.

EARL DE LA WARR remarked that the Code required that the infants should "present themselves for examination."

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) repeated that this did not mean individual examination. There was no obscurity on this point among those who administered the Code. It merely meant that the infants should attend, and that the Inspector should have an opportunity of seeing them and ascertaining whether they had been properly attended to. That was a necessary provision, unless they were prepared to allow the teacher to work his own sweet will; but it was only a muster, and there was no attempt at individual examination. The Department and the Inspectors knew quite well what was meant, and that it did not imply an individual test. The payments in infant schools were fixed grants on attendance, and there was also a general merit grant earned by the teacher upon the general character of his school; but there was no unwholesome stimulus to earn a grant upon the results of the examination of these infants. Whether there was or was not an objection to the system of payment by results, it could not arise in the case of these infant schools. There was no such system in those schools. There were some 400,000 little children below the age of five in the schools of this country earning, no doubt, a very important contribution for the schools. He supposed the noble Earl did not wish there should be no inquiry or inspection as to whether those children were neglected. The inspection under the present Code was only of a general character, and he could hardly think the noble Earl could desire that those children should be absolutely ignored by Her Majesty's Inspectors, considering the large amount of public money paid in respect of them. The noble Earl might rest assured that the provisions of the new Code need afford him no anxiety on this particular point, and that there was no reason for any such change as that proposed in the Motion.

EARL DE LA WARR said, he believed it was evident that individual examinations had really taken place. What he asked was that such a practice should be discontinued.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL) said, it was merely a matter of fact that nothing was to be earned by individual examinations. A particular Inspector might think it his duty to examine the children one by one; and there had been a habit among Inspectors—in the belief of the Education Department carried beyond the necessities of the case—to insist on that kind of individual examination, although it earned no individual grant. It was, however, by no means desired that that habit should be encouraged.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

House adjourned at quarter before Six o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

INDISPOSITION OF MR. SPEAKER.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the continued indisposition of Mr. SPEAKER, and of his unavoidable absence from the House this day:—

Whereupon Sir ARTHUR OTWAY, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table as Deputy Speaker, and 40 Members being present, took the Chair pursuant to the Standing Order.

QUESTIONS.

THE INLAND REVENUE OFFICE—PRO-MOTION OF OFFICERS.

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the father of the officer of Shaftesbury second Ride, Weymouth Collection, who was recently specially promoted over the heads of others in the Inland Revenue, was ever a Collector in that Department; is the father of the officer of Higham Ride, Northampton Collection, who was recently specially promoted over the heads of others, attached to the head office, Somerset House; on what grounds was this officer specially promoted over some 230 others; what are his special merits; could none of the 230 over whom he was placed be found capable of performing the work in which he is now engaged; would he lay a copy of the letter specially recommending him upon the Table of the House; what percentage of Collectors and Inspectors have specially recommended officers for special promotion within the last twelve months; and, is he aware that the present system of special promotion has given rise to much dissatisfaction in the Service?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the Shaftesbury officer referred to in the hon. Member's Question was not specially promoted; but he is the son of a former Collector. The Higham officer, also referred to, is the son of a clerk in one of the subordinate departments at Somerset House; he was specially promoted because specially recommended by his superior officer, and because he was considered, on the best available evidence, more competent than others to do the higher work. The confidential Reports upon which such promotions are founded cannot be published. Five per cent of the Collectors and Inspectors have made special recommendations in the last 12 months. No doubt there is some dissatisfaction in this, as in other cases of promotion by merit, among those who are passed over; but the principle is essential for the Public Service.

THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND —MEDICAL DEGREES.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to the following extract from the Ordinances of the Queen's Colleges (page 317)—

"No Professor shall be entitled to claim the fees of any Class of Students, except so long as that Class shall be required by the Council to attend his instruction; and it shall be the duty of the Council to revise and amend the Regulations prescribing Courses of Study from time to time, whenever they deem it conducive to the interests of education and of the Students so to do, irrespective of considerations affecting the incomes of Professors."

Whether medical students who intend presenting themselves for the degree of M.D. at the Royal University are, in the third year of their Course, compelled to pay for a Course of Lectures in Practical Anatomy to prosecute their dissections; has the practice only been a few years in existence; and, could he state when it began, and will it be continued?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I have received Reports which go to show that there are no improper charges made; but if there are, they will be examined, and reported on, together with other matters which will come within the scope of the inquiry which the Government propose to institute. If I were to answer all the bearings of the Question, the answer would carry me to a great length.

MR. HEALY: Are these illegal and improper charges still to be made; and can the right hon. Gentleman say how soon the inquiry will take place?

MR. TREVELYAN: I will make a statement as to the inquiry on Thursday.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND) — THE CORK DISTRICT LUNATIC ASYLUM —DISPOSAL OF DECEASED PATIENTS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the Inspector of Anatomy for Cork resides in Dublin, and if, such being the case, he can efficiently discharge the duties of superintendence required by the third section of the Anatomy Act; whether the Board of Governors of the Cork District Lunatic Asylum are the proper custodians of the unclaimed bodies of deceased inmates of that institution; whether, such being the case, their permission is necessary, before removing their bodies to the dissecting room of the Queen's College, Cork, and if there is any distinction between the post mortem examination stated to be allowable in such cases, and the process of dissection admitted to be practised at present; and, are students in Cork Queen's College charged dissecting fees when it is admitted that bodies are supplied to the College free of charge?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Inspector of Anatomy for Munster is allowed to reside in Dublin. He is required to keep an office in Cork, and the arrangement is open to review should inconvenience arise. The other three Provinces of Ireland are under one Inspector, who also resides in Dublin. Before the arrangement as to the Munster Inspector was sanctioned, it was ascertained that there is but one Inspector for all Scotland, and there are two for England, both of whom reside in London. It is, therefore, clear that in no part of the country is continuous residence on the spot considered necessary for the discharge of the duties of these officers. I stated, in reply to a former Question, all that I feel myself called upon to say with regard to the powers and duties of the governors of lunatic asylums in this matter. I pointed out that the law does not require the publication of details as to dissections; and, in the interests of humanity and of medical science, any attempt to force publicity is greatly to be deprecated. With regard to the last paragraph of the Question, I think it must be perfectly clear to anyone that no School of Anatomy could be carried on without incidental expenses, and I am sure that there is no such school in the country which students can attend without paying fees. If any of the students at Cork think that any improper charge is made in their case they should address the College authorities. I am informed that nearly 150 students of Queen's College, Cork, presented an address to the Professor of Anatomy on Friday last, stating that they heard with regret that action had been taken to make the class regulations in anatomy and physiology the subject of Questions in Parliament, and so tend to create an erroneous impression in the public mind regarding the relations subsisting between the Professor and students in these departments. These relations, they say, have always been of the most cordial character, and any representation of them as otherwise must incur their unqualified repudiation. I am informed by high medical authority in Dublin that if these Questions are continued a feeling may be aroused among ignorant people which would render it impossible to carry on anatomical studies at Cork, and, perhaps, in any other part of Ireland.

MR. HEALY: I beg to give Notice that after the right hon. Gentleman has needlessly read out the address presented to this Professor by the students—[“Order, order!”]—I will expose on a future day the process of intimidation—[Loud cries of “Order, order!”]—I am perfectly in Order. I always am in Order—I will expose on a future day the process of intimidation by which this address was obtained.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS IN THE MALLOW UNION—ALLEGED INTIMIDATION BY THE AGENT OF A LANDLORD.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the bailiff of Sir Henry Wrixham Beecher went around to the tenants, who are leaseholders, and threatened that they would suffer, unless they voted for the candidate nominated by their landlord for the Poor Law guardianship of the Ruskeen Division of the Mallow Union; whether such conduct is legal; if illegal, what remedy exists for landlord intimidation at Poor Law elections, in view of the declaration of the Government that the Intimidation Clause of the Crimes Act is not applicable to such cases; and, whether, having regard to the repeated and unpunished violations of freedom of voting, in the case of Poor Law elections, the Government will, this Session, introduce their promised Bill to establish voting by ballot at such elections, or will give facilities for the passing of a Bill introduced by private Members with that object?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, it is not the case that Sir Henry Wrixham Beecher nominated a candidate for this election, or used any intimidation. His brother informs me that he was not even aware that there was a contest in the division. I should be very glad to introduce the Bill mentioned in the last paragraph, though it has no bearing on the case mentioned in this Question, about which the hon. Member was, I think, misinformed.

HIGHWAYS (SCOTLAND)—COUNTY ROAD TRUSTEES OF BERWICK-SHIRE, &c.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into applications made by the County Road Trustees of Berwickshire, the Justices of the Peace for the county of Northumberland, and the Norham and Islandshire Highway Board, has yet been considered by the Secretary of State, and the determination approved by him; when it is probable that the determination will be presented to Parliament, in pursuance of the ninetieth section of "The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878;" and, whether, after the determination has been laid upon the Table, a Copy of the Report can be furnished to the three parties directly interested?

MR. HIBBERT: Sir, the Report referred to in the Question of the hon. Baronet has not yet been fully considered by the Secretary of State; but he expects to be able to present the determination approved of by him to Parliament before the House adjourns for the Easter Recess. In the case of the Glasgow and Carlisle Road Trust, the Report itself was not furnished to the parties directly interested. The Secretary of State must, therefore, reserve his decision as to whether he can furnish a copy of the Report until he has more fully considered the subject.

THE WINE DUTIES—SPANISH AND GERMAN SPIRIT.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in negotiating with Spain in regard to a Commercial Treaty, he will bear in mind that at the present time thirteen millions of gallons of German spirits come into England from Spain under the disguise of wine, paying a much less duty than is charged on English spirits; and, whether any steps will be taken to prevent the admission of this so-called wine at one shilling duty, and of a higher strength, causing damage to the English distiller, and to the largest source of our revenue?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The hon. Member has apparently taken the whole importation of wine in cask—namely, about 13,000,000 gallons, to represent the importation of wine from Spain only, and he has then assumed that the whole quantity is German spirit under the disguise of wine. I may, however, state, to avoid misapprehension, that the total importation of wine from Spain is about 5,000,000 gallons; but there is no evidence as to the quantity fortified with any particular class of spirit. There are, at present, no commercial negotiations proceeding; but, in any that have taken place, care has always been taken to provide against the introduction of spirits under the guise of wine.

THE DUBLIN MURDER TRIALS—COMPENSATION TO MR. FIELD.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Collector General of Dublin has obtained a legal opinion as to his right to enforce payment of the Tax levied upon the people of Dublin for compensation awarded to Mr. Field under the Crimes Act; whether the Tax is now being collected along with the Consolidated Rate; whether that course is legal; and, whether, if the rated occupier refuses to pay the Tax, it can be recovered from him solely, or whether it should be recovered from every occupier of any part of the premises?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Collector General did not obtain a legal opinion, as no question could arise as to the validity of the warrant of the Lord Lieutenant under which he acted. The tax is being collected with the Consolidated Rate, and I am advised that there is no legal objection to its being so collected. I cannot go into the hypothetical query contained in the last paragraph. If any cases of refusal arise they will, no doubt, be considered on their merits.

EMIGRATION (IRELAND)—SLIGO BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether there is any provision in the Law by virtue of which the Reverend Thomas Heany, Rector of Calry, county Sligo, is entitled to serve on the Emigration Committee of the Sligo Board of Guardians, taking part in their deliberations and acting as if a legally elected guardian? In putting this Question I would also ask whether the Rev. Mr. Heany is one of the persons who, as chaplain of Orange Lodges, signed a circular calling on the landlords of the country to give all vacant farms and situations to Protestants?

MR. GIBSON: And is this the rev. gentleman who denied that he ever did any such thing?

MR. SEXTON: He never denied.

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I think the hon. Gentleman should give Notice of that Question. The emigration from the Sligo Union is conducted by the Board of Guardians, who are responsible for all proceedings in relation to it. It appears that a Committee, consisting of a number of gentlemen, were appointed by the Board to take charge of the matter, and the Rev. Mr. Heany was one of them. Although there is no specific legal authority for the formation of such a Committee, the Local Government Board do not consider that they can object to the Guardians utilizing the information and help which such a body can afford.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to give Notice that I will ask the right hon. Gentleman on a future day whether he considers that a rev. gentleman who signed the circular referred to is a fit man to conduct the emigration of Catholics; and, in reference to the remark of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to say that I did put the inquiry on the Question Paper; but for some reason beyond my comprehension it was struck out by the Clerk at the Table.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—SLIGO UNION.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a complaint has been made to the Irish Local Government Board, that Mr. Thomas Simpson, of Cannatogher, county Sligo, a candidate in the recent election of Poor Law Guardian for the Drumcliffe West Division of the Sligo Union, did, after the distribution of voting papers to the persons entitled to vote in the said division, illegally take possession of and carry away the voting papers left with certain of such voters, and keep them for several hours in his possession; whether Mr. John M'Govern, also a candidate in the said election, lodged with the returning officer, the clerk of the Sligo Union, before the declaration of the return, a protest embodying the above complaint; whether, nevertheless, the relieving officer declared Mr. Thomas Simpson duly elected; and, what course the Local Government Board will take in regard to the election?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Local Government Board informed me that a complaint has been made to them to the effect described in the Question, and that they will proceed to make such inquiries as may be necessary under the 23rd section of the Act of 6 & 7 Viet., with the view of determining whether or not Mr. Simpson is entitled to act as an elected Guardian.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—LAMBETH SCHOOL BOARD—ADDITIONAL SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether his Department has consented to the erection of a School to contain 1,200 children, for which a site has been purchased, and which is now being cleared of houses to provide additional School accommodation for Blocks E. F. H. I. J. K. Lambeth, where the School Board authorities report that there are now 1,876 vacant places, and where the South Western Railway Company is on the point of pulling down houses in which it is estimated that 500 children reside; where the houses in the neighbourhood are already unhealthily crowded; and where there is no unoccupied land on which additional houses can be built?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, the Department in 1881 consented to the provision of a school for 1,200 children in Upper Kennington Lane to meet an admitted deficiency in three out of the six blocks mentioned. A site for the schools has been purchased, and the houses upon it are being cleared. The clearance by the South Western Railway will only affect a part of this district. It runs through blocks E, F, H, and does not touch I, J, and K. This school is to provide for H, I, and K. The School Board reports that the number of children living within the limits of deviation is 390. The plans of the proposed schools have not yet been approved by the Department, and it will have to be considered to what extent, if any, the size of the school should be diminished by the decrease of population. I have consented to receive a deputation of the managers of the voluntary schools upon the subject. The number of vacant places referred to in the question means the difference betwixt the average attendance and the accommodation; but the actual attend-

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — OVER-PRESSURE IN BOARD SCHOOLS.

LORD ALGERNON PERCY (for Mr. ECKROYN) asked the Vice President of the Council, If his attention has been directed to the death of Ellen Barker, aged eleven years, at Habergham, near Burnley, which is believed to have been caused by over pressure of school work; at the inquest, held on the 14th instant, the girl's mother stated that her daughter came home from the day-school on Monday afternoon the 10th. At 7 o'clock that evening she complained of pain in her head and illness. She grew worse until Wednesday, when the doctor was sent for; but she died before his arrival. Witness could not say whether overwork at school had caused her daughter's illness; she had only complained about her "home lessons;" the coroner said he had had several cases of that kind, where overwork at school had apparently brought on the illness. A juror remarked that children were too heavily worked at school; and another juror said that there was scarcely a house in the village in which complaint was not made of such overwork; the jury returned a verdict of "Death from natural causes, probably accelerated by overwork at school;" and, whether he will make further inquiry into all the circumstances of this case?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, Her Majesty's Inspector has made a full Report on the case of Mary Barker, of Habergham, of which the following is a summary in his own words:—

"Habergham, All Saints, N.S. (Gawthorpe, Lancashire). Mary (not Ellen) Barker died from a sharp attack of peritonitis, of which the first symptoms appeared in the evening of Tuesday, the 11th of March, and which ended fatally 24 hours later, in the evening of Wednesday, the 12th ult. The family doctor, who arrived after death, is definite on this point, and the parents agree in thinking the cause of death inflammation of the bowels. Two sisters were seven days later attacked with typhoid fever, said to be caused by smells from drains. The landlord is examining these drains, as I am told by his manager. The girls in question are now ill. Mary Barker was, apparently, in good ordinary state of health up to the night before her death, went to school, and worked in the mill as usual. There is nothing to lead to the belief that anything but the disease named caused or conduced to death, and the statement of the parents expressly excludes school work.

The school is in my own parish, is managed by Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth and Colonel Dugdale, has always done extremely well, and is very popular. I have lived here for nearly five years, and the charge appears to be baseless. (Signed) F. A. S. Freeland, H.M.I."

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. HASLETT, J.P., BELFAST.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can now state what course the Lord Chancellor has taken in the case of Mr. Haslett, J.P., of Belfast?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, that it was the Lord Chancellor who was concerned in this matter. It was true that on a former occasion Mr. Haslett took part in adjudicating on a licensing case in which he should not have done; but there was no reason to believe that he showed any partiality, or that justice was not done in the case. In his capacity as magistrate he punished the woman very severely, and in his capacity as landlord he had her put out of the house on account of her misconduct. Under these circumstances, the conclusion of the Government was that the matter did not call for further proceedings.

MR. KENNY: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that Mr. Haslett, having subjected himself to a fine of £100 and to a liability to be dismissed from the Commission of the Peace, is now to go scot free?

MR. TREVELYAN: This is what I would mean. The man acted inadvertently; but as Judge he showed severity, and as landlord of the public-house punished also.

MR. HEALY: A house of ill fame.

MR. TREVELYAN: The Government are quite satisfied that he acted without a knowledge of what he was doing.

MR. KENNY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the evidence before the magistrates showed that he was perfectly cognizant of the fact that he was adjudicating in his own case?

MR. HEALY: The policeman told him so three times.

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)—MR. OWEN, ARCHITECT TO THE BOARD.

MR. KENNY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, if Lord Orichton's Commission of Inquiry recommended that Mr. Owen, Architect to the Irish Board of Works, should be called upon to resign; for what reason the recommendation in question has never been carried out; if Mr. Owen, while holding the position of Architect to the Board, was also Chairman to a Discount Company which became insolvent; and, whether he has likewise, in recent years, acted as Director of several commercial speculations which resulted in failure; if Mr. Owen, whilst an Architect to the Board, officially concerned with the business of dealing with applications for loans of public money to tenants and other persons, was also Chairman of a private Loan Company; and, whether, in consideration of his resigning the Chairmanship in question, the Treasury allowed him an increase of salary of about £200 per annum; and, what is the explanation of the course pursued with regard to Mr. Owen?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, no such recommendation was made as that stated in the first paragraph of the Question, and accordingly it could not have been acted upon. The Crichton Commission did not recommend Mr. Owen's retirement; but they advised that he should cease to be Director of a private Building Society, and this has been carried out. The recent increase to his salary has nothing to do with this retirement, but depended on the increase of his duties. Mr. Owen states that he was at one time Chairman of a Discount Company, but resigned nearly two years ago, since which the Company has become bankrupt, otherwise he has long ceased to be concerned in any commercial speculation.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART—SCOTTISH METEOROLOGICAL SOCIETY—MARINE ZOOLOGICAL STATION AT GRANTON.

MR. BUCHANAN asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether an application has recently been made to the Lords of the Treasury by the Scottish Meteorological Society for a grant in aid of the Marine Zoological Station established at Granton on the Firth of Forth; and, what were the grounds upon which this application was refused?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, an application was made as stated by my hon. Friend. There were three reasons for declining to accede to it—first, similar work is now being done at the public expense both by the Scotch Fishery Board and by the Trawling Commission; secondly, it did not seem right to add to the sum of almost £30,000 provided for scientific grants in this year's Estimates; thirdly, it seems anomalous to intrust money for the purposes of marine zoology to a Meteorological Society.

MR. BUCHANAN asked if the hon. Gentleman would lay the Correspondence on the Table?

MR. COURTNEY said, he thought all the particulars embraced in the Correspondence were contained in what he had stated; but if the hon. Gentleman wished to see it he could do so.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENTS OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES—DENMARK.

MR. JAMES HOWARD asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether his attention has been directed to the Reports on the Agricultural Departments of Foreign Countries (No. 9), issued last week?

MR. R. H. PAGET asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether he will be good enough to obtain details of the Scientific Schools and Experimental Farms referred to in the Report on Foreign Agricultural Departments recently issued; and, whether he will, from time to time, publish, as part of the ordinary business of the Agricultural Department over which he presides, any information so received which may appear to be of practical value to the agricultural interests of the United Kingdom?

MR. DODSON, in reply, said, he did not understand that the Royal Society for Agricultural Economy in Denmark occupied the same position or discharged the same functions as those eminent Societies, the Royal Agricultural Society of England, or Ireland, or the Highland Society of Scotland. As at present advised, he did not think it would be for the advantage either of the country or of those eminent Societies to connect those Societies with a Government Department in the manner proposed. They had several Reports and documents relating to this matter which he proposed to place in the Library of the House for the inspection of the hon. Member, or Gentlemen interested in the question. With regard to a somewhat similar Question put by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. R. Paget), the Department would be glad at any time to publish any matter which appeared to be of practical value to the agricultural community.

EGYPT (FINANCE).

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will, without waiting for the Budget, state to the House whether any, and, if any, what interference the Government contemplate with regard to Egyptian finances?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, on behalf of my right hon. Friend, I have to reply that it is quite out of his power to say now when any statement may be made to the House as to Egyptian Finance, or whether the Budget, which he hopes to open on the 24th instant, will contain any reference to that subject.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— DEFEAT OF GENERAL GORDON.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that General Gordon's Forces sustained a severe reverse at Khartoum; and, whether General Graham's Troops are being recalled from Suakin without opening the Berber road? He said he had also a further Question, of which he had given private Notice—Whether his attention had been called to a statement in the Khartoum Correspondent's letter in The Times of to-day, in which the following statement occurred:—

"We are daily expecting British troops. We cannot bring ourselves to believe that we are abandoned by the Government. Our existence depends upon England?"

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is true, Sir, as stated yesterday, that the troops under General Gordon met with a somewhat serious reverse in the operations which had been undertaken against the Arabs, who appeared to be threatening Khartoum. As it now appears, that reverse was caused partly—to some extent, certainly—by the treachery of some officers commanding General Gordon's troops. My attention has, of course, been called to the paragraph in The Times to which the hon. Member referred. We have, however, received news from General Gordon up to the same date as The Times telegram, in which General Gordon does not appear to have made any reference to the expectation that assistance by British troops would be rendered, and in which he states that he considered he was quite safe, and that supplies were coming in freely. With regard to the second part of the Question, I should prefer postponing any statement as to the roads from Suakin to Berber until we can make such statement as may be in our power, and which we have undertaken to make, in reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Did I rightly understand the noble Lord yesterday to say that General Gordon, in his despatch, referred to the report of The Times Correspondent? If so, would that imply that General Gordon, by his silence on any one point contained in that report, denied the accuracy of the report?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I think General Gordon's reference to The Times telegram referred solely to the account of the action which had taken place on the previous day. He stated distinctly that he had not had time on that occasion to send a full account, and referred Sir Evelyn Baring to those telegrams. The telegrams, both from The Times Correspondent and from General Gordon, are of subsequent date—I think a week later.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Is it true, then, that General Gordon is to be left to share the fate of Tewfik Bey?

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE CIRCUITS— THE JUDGES OF THE PROBATE DIVISION.

MR. NORWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, since the liability of the Judges of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High Court to go Circuit is limited by Clause 8 of "The Judicature Amendment Act, 1875," as follows, "so far as the state of business in the said division will admit," and that the amount of business now before the Admiralty Court is such that a suspension of the sittings of that Court would entail serious inconvenience and loss on the mercantile community, Whether, in the arrangements now being made for Circuit, the names of two Judges of the Probate Division will therefore be excluded from the list?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that the question of the two Judges of the Probate Division going on Circuit was under consideration, and that he would represent to the Lord Chancellor the views of the hon. Member as to the inexpediency of that practice.

MERCANTILE MARINE—KINGSTOWN HARBOUR.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that a new and valuable vessel was lost in Kingstown Harbour, during the month of February, by running, during a gale, on the south-western foreshore of the harbour, between the Royal Irish Yacht Club and the coastguard station; whether other vessels or yachts have been lost on or near the same part of the harbour in former storms; whether the above-named portion of the harbour, not being fitted with a quay wall or with a timber framing, and the foreshore being composed of projecting rocks, is a cause of danger to ships at anchor during the prevalence of easterly gales, and if the Government intends to complete this portion of the said harbour with a quay wall or timber framing, from which vessels could be warped off in case they dragged their anchors or broke from their moorings during a storm; whether he is aware that, during one of the recent storms, a large American vessel, the G. B. Sutton, with a valuable cargo of grain, went on shore in Kingstown Harbour, and would have been lost had not a Liverpool tug-boat, which was fortunately at hand, gone to her assistance, and that the sum of £260 was demanded and paid for the services rendered by the tug-boat on the occasion; and, whether the Commissioners of said harbour will make arrangements in future to have a steamer ready during dangerous gales, to render assistance to vessels in distress in or about the said harbour?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, I have inquired into this matter, and find that a vessel of 179 tons, and at least 30 years old, was lost in the way described on the 1st February last; one other vessel was so lost about 10 years ago, and another in 1861. The piece of foreshore where these wrecks occurred is left on purpose without a wall in order that the waves may break there; were it not for this the anchorage space would be diminished. I have ascertained that the G. B. Sutton did not go ashore; but, as she showed signs of drifting against the mail pier, she was assisted by the tug which had brought her over from Holyhead. As experience shows that such cases may be expected only once in 10 years, it would not be proper to sanction a large expenditure from public funds to provide against them.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the fact that this House, in the terms of the Resolution carried on Friday last, pledged itself not only as to the urgency of affording local relief, but also to be ready to entertain any necessary reforms in local administration, he will undertake to introduce, on an early date after Easter, the Local Government Bill which the Right honourable Gentleman, the President of the Local Government Board, has stated to be already prepared?

MR. CHEETHAM asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the Resolution of the 28th March, Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to consider the expediency of giving precedence next after the Representation of the People and Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bills to the measure dealing with the whole question of Local Government and Local Taxation, which the President of the Local Government Board has informed the House is now prepared and ready for introduction?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the subjects of these Questions connect themselves together. The answer cannot be given in a very few words; but I will endeavour to make it as clear as I can. As regards the Question of my noble Friend, I think it is obvious that there will be no practical advantage gained by introducing, at a very early date, the Bill of the Government, which is prepared, unless we were able to form some reasonable and confident expectation as to the time at which we could go forward with it. Therefore, I consider the question rather as merging in the larger inquiry of my hon. Friend behind me. With regard to that inquiry, the speech from the Throne gave the first place in the legislative work of the Session to the Franchise Bill, and the second place to the subject of local government. Then it explained that the subject of local government was not one which could be comprised in a single Bill; that a Bill would at once be presented, subject to what had been said about the Franchise Bill, with reference to the Municipality of London; that further measures had been prepared, and reference was particularly made, as has been explained by my hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board, to the Bill for local government in England, to which the Question of my hon. Friend refers. Well, Sir, these two Bills are really parts of the same subject. The important financial operations which belong to the question of local government are equally dependent upon the one and the other. In truth, they are, if possible, more dependent as regards the populous area of the Metropolitan District, because there it is that the want of adequate local authority is most palpable and conspicuous. Therefore, Sir, I think, in the first place, that after what has taken place, the distinct pledges and intimations that have been given, we cannot consistently postpone proceeding with the London Government Bill. But, Sir, my hon. Friend will say, "What of the Local Government Bill?" I will say this—we considered very carefully what it was reasonable to expect from Parliament, judging by the experience of former years, and knowing as we did know that Parliament was very sensible of the arrears of Public Business, and hoping, as we were entitled to hope, that Parliament would have a great desire to get on with Public Business, our opinion was, and is, that it was and is perfectly practicable to deal with the Franchise Bill, which we have made as simple as we possibly could, with the London Government Bill, and with the Local Government Bill in the course of the present Session. That was our distinct and deliberate opinion. We believe it will be greatly to the honour of Parliament to deal with these measures, and that it will not be greatly to the honour of Parliament should it fail to fulfil these expectations. I need not say that, as far as the Government is concerned they certainly will shrink from no effort for the purpose of putting forward these questions. I may remind the House of the importance of not extending beyond what has been in other times the customary and established limits of Parliamentary discussion. We shall do all we can to promote the views of my hon. Friend. We are not omnipotent; we feel with him the utmost desire to put forward this measure; and we are convinced also that the credit of Parliament, and not only of particular Members, is involved in it.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—LOCAL TAXATION.

MR. PELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What action Her Majesty's Government intends to take in respect of the Resolution of Friday 28th March, deprecating the postponement of relief acknowledged to be due to ratepayers in counties and boroughs?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Resolution at which the House arrived on the 28th of March deprecates, as the hon. Member truly says, the postponement of further measures for the relief acknowledged to be due to the ratepayers. Sir, I have had to read that Resolution in conjunction with a former Resolution of the House of Commons, which that Resolution did not question or rescind. The former Resolution, which was carried by a small majority—but still by a majority a trifle larger than that which voted for the Resolution of the hon. Member—in the Session of 1883, likewise indicated a great desire that relief to local ratepayers should not be postponed. But it did two things. It coupled the question of relief to ratepayers with legislation on local government, and, which is the point I have now especially in view, it pointed out the mode and form in which that relief to the ratepayers was to be given. The House resolved last year that the relief granted to the ratepayers in counties and boroughs should be by the transfer to local authorities of the revenue proceeding from particular taxes or portions of taxes. That declaration of the House of Commons, I presume, had the approval of the hon. Member; at any rate, it remains entirely untouched by the Resolution of the other evening, and, therefore, that declaration is in force and is binding on us. The effect of that will be that the settlement of the financial part of the local government question, which is a very large subject indeed, involves the question of the removal of a great number of items from the immediate jurisdiction of this House. It involves the allocation of various taxes or parts of taxes; and it might involve the finding of substitutes for those taxes. Consequently, the hon. Member will see that the meaning of the second Resolution, as the hon. Gentleman appears to view it—if it is to be considered without qualification—is that the Business we are engaged upon with respect to the Franchise Bill is to be postponed until we have dealt with the financial part of the local government question. I do not believe that to have been the intention of the House when they passed the Resolution of last week. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that it was the intention of the House, it is for him to suggest the expression of that intention in an intelligible manner. The Government do not think that was the intention of the House, and, therefore, they are not prepared to postpone the Business now before the House with respect to the Franchise Bill. In our opinion it is much too late to deal piecemeal in the unsatisfactory manner Governments have been compelled to adopt hitherto upon this question. We ought, for the benefit of all parties, to make the relief effectual and complete by passing a large and important measure. We are most anxious and desirous to find ourselves in a position to approach that measure; but we are not prepared to put such a construction as the hon. Member appears to do upon his Resolution of Friday last—namely, that the proceedings of the Franchise Bill shall be suspended for the purpose of dealing with the financial part of the local government question.

MR. PELL: I throw myself on the consideration of the House; but I hardly think the right hon. Gentleman has answered my Question. We have had a very long exposition of the views of the Government. I ask again for a simple answer to a plain Question. It is a Question of a financial nature, in which I cannot move—namely, What action the House may expect the Government to adopt in conformity with the distinct expression of the view of the House last week?

MR. GLADSTONE: The only action we can take is to press forward to the best of our power the Business of the House. We have it in contemplation to deal fully with the subject of which, a few days ago, the hon. Gentleman presented a particular aspect to the House. The meaning of his Motion, if it has a practical meaning, is the displacement of the other Business of the House; it means the displacement of the Business with respect to the Franchise Bill, and that displacement we are not willing to accede to.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: After the three statements of the right hon. Gentleman, perhaps he will be kind enough to answer one more Question. It is this. Are we to understand that the ratepayers of the United Kingdom are not to expect any financial relief until the Franchise Bill, the London Municipal Reform Bill, and the Local Government Bill have been decided upon and passed?

MR. GLADSTONE: That is a wider statement than I have made. It is for the House to consider at what time the financial part of the question with regard to the ratepayers can be considered. All I have said is this. We are not prepared to intercept the action of Parliament with respect to the Franchise Bill for the sake of taking up the financial part of the question of the relief of ratepayers; nor, I am bound to say, if I am asked with respect to the Local Government Bill, do I believe we can effectually approach the question of the relief of ratepayers until we have dealt with the subject of adequate and competent local authorities.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he had understood the right hon. Gentleman to state that the London Bill would take precedence of the Local Government Bill, and that the Franchise Bill, the London Bill, and the Local Government Bill were all three to be decided before the question of financial relief was taken up; were they to understand that he did not put the London Bill before the Local Government Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg pardon, Sir. I thought I had distinctly stated the position of the London Bill. I consider the Question of the noble Lord to be comprised within that of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire. Our views are perfectly well known, and they were supported by the Resolution of the House last year. The House has now passed a Resolution of a vague and indefinite character—[“Oh!”] In my humble opinion, if I may have one in the face of those great authorities who interrupt me, it is of a vague and indefinite character. Like the hon. Gentleman, I deprecate all this postponement; I deprecate all the delays in the transaction of Public Business, which are alone responsible for this postponement. If the old methods had prevailed we should have reached this subject long ago. It is for the House to determine, but our opinion is that the local authorities ought to be established before the full and final measure of relief of local ratepayers can be given. That was voted by the House last year, and our opinion is that that vote was a sound and right one.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: But does the right hon. Gentleman think that the vote of Friday last made no difference in the situation?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have stated my view of the effect of the vote of Friday last; it is for those who think it had some other effect to state their view.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON: Are we to understand there will be no proposal made in the Financial Statement in consequence of the Resolution of my hon. Friend?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in no circumstances will it be possible to include in the Financial Statement so vast a subject as that which is involved in the relief of ratepayers as defined by the Resolution of last week. The time has come now for the Financial Statement to be made; it would be made on Monday next if it were possible that the debate on the Franchise Bill could be completed, and undoubtedly no statement could be included in it with reference to this question.

PARLIAMENT—THE DEPUTY SPEAKERSHIP OF THIS HOUSE.

MR. DILLWYN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will take such steps as may appear desirable to provide for the Chair being taken by some Member to be chosen by the House in the event of the absence from illness or other cause of the Speaker and Deputy Speaker? He said, he had put the Question on the Paper in consequence of the uncertainty which prevailed as to the course to be adopted in the case of the continued illness of both the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker. He had not himself much doubt as to the course that ought to be adopted. [“Order, order!”]

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, we have been, undoubtedly, upon the brink of a considerable danger—a danger which it was hoped had been obviated in all reasonable probability by the arrangement made in the appointment of a Deputy Speaker; and I cannot deny that, considering how near we have come to a danger even under the present arrangement, it is well worth considering whether a further provision ought to be made. There are two points that I must keep in view in answering my hon. Friend. One is that it is very material to determine whether the provision can be made by Resolution of this House, or whether it would require an Act of Parliament. The second question is this, that, as it appears to me, it would be idle to hope to make a provision for this purpose if it were to be a subject of contest and lengthened debate, such as we have had upon most points connected with the Procedure of the House. What I propose to do is in the course of the next few days to inform myself as well as I can as to the method by which we might proceed, whether by Resolution or Act of Parliament; and, secondly, as to the disposition which might exist to supply a remedy for this case of difficulty if it should again arise. But I wish clearly to state that we cannot add another controversy upon this subject to the many controversies that are already before the House.

PARLIAMENT—MR. BRADLAUGH—THE LIBRARY OF THE HOUSE.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir Arthur Otway, I wish to put a Question to you as to your interpretation of the Resolution passed yesterday, permitting Mr. Bradlaugh to use the Library of the House, but otherwise still subjecting him to the Resolution of the 21st of February. As Mr. Bradlaugh has repudiated the Resolution of the 21st of February, I wish to know whether you are of opinion that he is precluded from coming within the outer doors of this House, which are kept by the doorkeepers?

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (Sir ARTHUR OTWAY): There can be no doubt as to the interpretation to be put upon the Resolution which the House came to yesterday. Mr. Bradlaugh, in his letter addressed to the Speaker, requested permission to have access to the Library for certain purposes. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) stated that this was a reasonable proposition on the part of Mr. Bradlaugh, and moved to resolve that Mr. Bradlaugh should have access to the Library, but that the Resolution of the 21st of February in all other respects should remain in force. Mr. Bradlaugh has by the terms of that Resolution access to the Library only.

THE SUAKIN GARRISON.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked the Secretary for War, Whether he was still of opinion that the Egyptian troops were unfit to take part in active service; and, if that were his opinion, whether the Government had determined to send those troops to take charge of the important garrison of Suakin?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: That is a Question of which I might reasonably ask for Notice, but to which, if I received Notice, I should be inclined to give the same answer as I have given to the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett). It is a point on which I would defer my answer until the time when the Government are able to make such general statement as they are able to make respecting the affairs of the Soudan. I do not know what the hon. and gallant Member is quoting from when he asks if I am still of opinion that the Egyptian troops are unfit for active service.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he would give Notice. But the statement with regard to the sending of Egyptian troops to Suakin was in every paper in the country. The observation of the noble Marquess with reference to the unfitness of Egyptian troops for active service was made in reply to a Question which he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) put as to whether the Government intended to send a battalion of Egyptian troops to act with British troops at Suakin.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I do not think I ever made use of the expression which the hon. and gallant Member attributes to me. I think I said that under the peculiar circumstances of the duty which General Graham's forces were to undertake, and the uncertain character of the operations, it was not thought desirable to send alongside British troops a force the capabilities of which had not yet been tested.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY.

MR. MACFARLANE: I beg to ask the Prime Minister, Whether the Government have any proposal to make for to-morrow with the view of proceeding with the Franchise Bill? I have every reason to believe that with regard to the second reading of the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday Bill, which will be the first Order of the Day, that there is an intention to talk out the Bill, and, if so, the Sitting will be practically useless.

MR. GLADSTONE: It is not our intention to propose to take the debate on the Franchise Bill to-morrow, inasmuch as the subject of debate for the day is one of some importance, and it has not been the usage to set aside the Orders for Wednesday for the sake of proceeding with Government measures.

MOTION.

NOTICES OF MOTIONS AND ORDERS OF THE DAY.

MOTION FOR POSTPONEMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Order for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Second Reading of the Representation of the People Bill have precedence, this day, of all Notices of Motions and Orders of the Day."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. PELL said, he wished to take the opportunity which this Motion gave him of making some observations upon what he might almost term the speech of the Prime Minister at Question time with reference to the Resolution on local taxation. They were asked to arrange the order of Business in that House. He would not raise any objection to that. The Representation of the People Bill might justify such a demand; but if the House agreed to the Motion, they ought to have from the Prime Minister some distinct explanation as to the arrangement of Business after the Franchise Bill had been disposed of. They ought to know whether the giving effect to the Resolution of last Friday was to be deferred until the Government had had an opportunity of bringing under the Notice of the House their Bill with regard to local government generally. If the Government did not, when the Budget was brought forward, offer some relief to the ratepayers, he should feel it his duty, as far as it laid in his power, to interfere with the arrangements which the Government might think well to make. He was as anxious as the right hon. Gentleman himself to see reform on these points; but he was more anxious that effect should be given to the deliberate opinion of the House of Commons; and if the Government found themselves pressed on that point, it would be one of the main inducements for them to proceed on an early day with their measure in reference to local government reform. The Prime Minister had stated that they must read the Resolution which was agreed to on Friday in connection with the decision which was arrived at last year upon this subject. In his opinion, the right hon. Gentleman should consider Friday night's vote as a reversal of the Resolution of last year. It was a reversal, because many of the Members who voted with the Government last year had, he would not say voted against them on Friday, but crept out of their places and refused to support their previous vote. He did not think the Prime Minister should fall back upon an Amendment which was carried by a small majority of Members who did not on Friday support the views which they held last year.

MR. CHAPLIN said, the Prime Minister must be sanguine indeed if he supposed that the answer which he gave earlier in the evening would give satisfaction to hon. Gentlemen who sat on the Opposite side of the House. If that answer meant anything at all, it was a flat refusal to do anything for the purpose of giving effect to the Resolution of Friday night. He gathered from the action of the Government that they were going back to their old practice of deliberately ignoring declared Resolutions of the House of Commons. Last year they ignored the Resolution on the importation of foreign cattle, and this year they were evidently prepared to take a similar course with reference to the Motion on local taxation. He did not hesitate to say that the Franchise Bill was nothing whatever to hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House. He was opposed to the measure under the circumstances in which it had been introduced; and so long as the Government were careful to conceal the whole of their scheme, he believed the Conservative Party in general would oppose it. He did not understand that the way to offer an effective opposition to the Bill was to give unusual facilities for passing it through the House. Considering the course which the Front Opposition Bench had taken, however, he was not prepared to oppose the concession asked for by the Government. He should leave the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) to make his own terms with the Government with reference to the local taxation Motion; but he thought the time had come when the House should have a distinct assurance from the Government as to the course which they proposed to take with respect to the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill. He hoped the Prime Minister would assure the House that after the second reading of the Franchise Bill he would take the Committee stage of the Cattle Bill, and proceed with it without interruption until that stage was concluded. Unless he received that assurance, he should join his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire in offering further opposition to the arrangements of the Government.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he could not concur in the remark which had fallen from the two hon. Gentlemen who had just spoken, that the responsibility of dealing with the questions referred to now rested with Her Majesty's Government. On the contrary, it appeared to him that the responsibility rested with the Leaders of the Opposition. The House arrived on Friday at a certain decision, and there was a difference of opinion between the Government and the Leaders of the Opposition as to what that decision meant. Members on the Opposition side asserted that it meant something; Her Majesty's Ministers thought it meant nothing; and, more than that, the Prime Minister, stating that the Resolution meant nothing, challenged the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) to invite an expression of opinion by the House on the subject. Under these circumstances, a private Member of the Conservative Party having, as had been done before, gained a victory over the Government for the Opposition, he had a perfect right to call on the Leaders of the Opposition, now that the battle had been fought, to come to his assistance, take up the challenge thrown down by the Prime Minister, and at once place on the Table of the House a Resolution expressing the dissatisfaction, or, if they liked, the Censure of the House on Her Majesty's Government for not having taken immediate steps to carry out the Resolution of the House. If the Leader of the Opposition would take that course, it would be absolutely necessary for the Government to give him facilities for bringing forward the Resolution after the challenge they had thrown out, and he would certainly assist great numbers of county Members on that and the other side of the House who were really earnest in their wishes and their anxiety to benefit the ratepayers of the country.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: My noble Friend is very adroit and agile in the positions he takes up; but this is the first time I have seen him perform the part of "bonnet" to the Government.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that, whether the noble Lord acted the part of "bonnet" of the Government or not, he had no doubt that the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) was quite right in saying that the entire Conservative Party was opposed to the Franchise Bill. He had risen, not to interfere with the discussion on that Bill, but to endeavour to lead to something which would expedite its progress. On the first reading of the Bill they had an excellent speech from the Prime Minister, going into full details in regard to all the matters of the Bill, and upon the second reading they had another speech from the noble Lord the Minister for War; but since then they had suffered greatly from the obstructive loquacity of past and present officials and ex-Cabinet Ministers. On Thursday the debate lasted about six hours, and four of those hours were taken up by past and present officials and ex-Cabinet Ministers, and yesterday not one English Member who did not belong to either of those classes had an opportunity of addressing the House. He had listened with great pleasure to the speeches of right hon. Gentlemen; but a minor official of the Government ought on no question to indulge in the luxury of an opinion. They knew perfectly well what his opinion was before he got up—that he would accept any Bill brought in by the Government, otherwise he would not be on that Bench. With respect to these minor officials of the Government, and also ex-Cabinet Ministers, their speeches, he was bound to say, were somewhat lengthy. They caught the Speaker's eye, and they did not seem able to resume their places. He had made a calculation, and their speeches on an average had been above one hour. Now, considering the short period that they existed, he might almost say, in this world, but considering the very few hours they existed in that House, because they all went away to dinner, and there were only four or five hours during which the debate assumed a practical form on any evening, he did think that if this were to be continued the debate would go on for some interminable period. So far as he was concerned, he believed that the nation had issued its mandate—"No, no!"—and the best thing they could do was to accept the Bill, and vote for it without saying a single word. ["Oh!"] If that was not the view taken by the House, and if the system which had prevailed up to the present time were to continue, they should not be able to enjoy that Easter holiday which they all anticipated with so much pleasure. The country did not care sixpence whether they had an Easter holiday or not. Whether they passed the second reading this week or next was a thing which concerned Members themselves, and not the country.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR observed, that he could speak on this subject with perfect impartiality, because in the course of this debate on the Reform Bill he had no intention of intervening. He was told by those of more Parliamentary experience than himself that there was a time when it was not the unwritten rule of the House that the Speaker should invariably call on a Member of the Front Benches when he got up. If that was so once, it was so no longer. Under these circumstances, the Front Benches were strong; but, though strong, they were not merciful in the exercise of their power. He had been informed that they had not, in this debate on the Franchise Bill, even allowed unfortunate private Members the hours from 8 to 10—those hours sacred to humble mediocrity and budding genius, during which the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War, as he told the House last night, was always in the habit of retiring for refreshment—they had not allowed private Members the undisturbed enjoyment even of those hours in which they might meekly express their opinion. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had put his finger on the difficulty. It was not that too many Gentlemen on the Front Benches spoke, but that they spoke too long. He could not believe that anyone could not express his opinion on so well worn a subject as the Reform Bill in less than 90 minutes. And yet any Gentleman of the rank of a Privy Councillor seemed to think that the House and the country at large would feel aggrieved if he compressed his speech within shorter limits.

Mr. ONSLOW said, he felt this grievance very much indeed. This was now the fourth night of the debate on the second reading, and five right hon. Gentlemen on the Bench below him, four right hon. Gentlemen on the opposite Bench, and three right hon. Gentlemen, "corner-men," had spoken—[Cries of "Refugees!"]*—*the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), and the right hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter). And he was informed that the right hon. Gentlemen—also "corner-men"—the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) and the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) were going to speak. In such a case, if they were to have such long and interminable speeches as the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) made last night, there was no chance of independent Members saying anything. The two Front Benches seemed to have come to the conclusion that they would not speak during the dinner hour; and, as a consequence, they spoke from 6 to 8 and from 10 to 12. Accordingly, private Members had only the hours between 8 and 10. He knew there was a practice on the part of private Members of going to the Speaker in order to be called on at a particular time. Personally he had always objected to that practice. He had never gone, and never would go, to the Speaker to ask to be called on, because it would be unfair to private Members that he should have that advantage by quietly whispering into the ear of the Speaker. He would, therefore, suggest that they should have a Morning Sitting on Friday—["No, no!"]—only in order that the two Front Benches might be allowed to talk and to exhaust themselves, so that private Members who took a deep interest in the question might have an opportunity of addressing the House.

Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY wished to call attention to a question which concerned himself and his Friends. He had secured Friday for the discussion of a Motion of extreme importance, and about which he saw Notice of a Question upon the Paper to-day by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). He would like, therefore, an assurance from the Government that if there was a Morning Sitting on Friday, their position with regard to this Motion would not be damaged. He thought that considering the number of Members who sat near him who were interested in the question, he was entitled to some consideration in this matter, as it was a subject which affected all parts of Ireland.

Mr. GORST asked whether the Prime Minister approved the growing disposition of right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Front Benches to monopolize so much of the time of the House? They all listened with pleasure to the right hon. Gentleman himself, and to the Leader of the Opposition, and no one objected to their occupying a very considerable portion of the time of the House. The complaint was that the Colleagues of those two right hon. Gentlemen occupied too much time. He admitted that their Colleagues were extremely eloquent; but in the present debate the House wanted richness and variety. In the orations delivered from the Front Benches they missed the element of variety. No one on the Front Ministerial Bench dared differ from the Prime Minister, nor did anyone on the Front Opposition Bench dare differ from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon. The Colleagues of the Leaders of the two Parties were not free to think for themselves. They were accustomed to accept the opinions that came from their Leaders. Of course, they were quite right to hold those opinions; but having heard them once from the mouth of the Prime Minister and the right hon. Member for North Devon, the House did not care to hear them any more. He wanted to know also whether the Members of the Government would pay attention to the debate on the Franchise Bill supposing that the Notices of Motion were postponed? On Monday night between 9 and 10 o'clock, when one of the most important speeches yet delivered—namely, that of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. O. Russell)—was made—the only speech yet delivered from a purely Irish standpoint—the Treasury Bench was almost empty. During part of the speech one of the Lords of the Treasury was present, and during another part the First Commissioner of Works was in the House. No other Members of the Government, he believed, heard any part of the speech. He wished to know whether the Government would pay more attention to the subject that evening?

MR. GLADSTONE: With regard, Sir, to the Question put to me by the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), all I have to say is that I take my stand on the Resolution of last year, and that I do not find that that Resolution has been reversed or set aside by the terms of the Resolution of the present year. With respect to the subject raised by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), all I need say is that he is aware that we have made some efforts to push forward the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill, and that we have found a disposition to occupy a much larger share of time with discussion on that Bill than was anticipated when the subject was first brought to the attention of the House. Nevertheless, I am very desirous to do all that I can in this matter; but it is impossible to undertake to give a continuous progress to that Bill to the detriment of all others. But if the House should be disposed to take a Morning Sitting on Tuesday, the day after our first meeting after the Recess—presuming that the House meets on the 23rd—we should be ready to devote it to the consideration of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill. We are very desirous that the judgment of the House should be given upon the proposals before it with respect to that measure. Coming now to the speeches of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), who has just sat down, and of other Members, I find that they are attacks more or less severe upon official and ex-official Members of the House, and upon minor Members of the Government. As regards minor Members of the Government, I cannot help saying that the state of things which has been brought about is worthy of note. I think it is most desirable that Members of this House individually should know to what degree the character and credit of the House are at present being staked—and I am afraid not being staked upon favourable circumstances—by the alteration in the habits of Business. When I first entered Parliament—I think I can support what I say from memory—it was the desire and pleasure, and I may even say the delight, of the House, that minor Members of the Government, as they are called; that is to say, the young men who have been chosen for their merit in early life and who represent the future Ministers and statesmen of the country—[Cries of "No!"]—well, to a great extent; do not suppose that I mean exclusively—that they should have considerable opportunities given to them of speaking in general debate, and not only in discussions on subjects connected with their particular offices. Well, I may say that now there is nothing so rare as for any of these minor Members of the Government—I do not speak of the present Government alone, for the same thing, I suppose, applied to the late Government—to find an opportunity for opening their mouths at all. Whoever are responsible for the delay of Business, assuredly they are not the minor Members of the Government. As regards ex-official Gentlemen, they naturally divide themselves into classes. I must honestly say, in the first place, that there is no man who is less responsible for the unnecessary length of speeches, or for the difficulties in which we stand, than the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote). I must make that confession. It is not for me to comment on the conduct of Members on the Front Opposition

Bench; but it is for me to say a word with regard to those who sit upon this Bench. I must point out that those who are in Office are in this difficulty—that while occasionally they are criticized for excessive speaking, they are also exceedingly liable to be criticized for insufficient speaking; and sharper and fiercer attacks are made upon them in cases in which it is thought that they ought to have spoken when they have not done so. Well, four Members of the Government have as yet spoken in this debate; and all I can say is, that while we shall remember what has been said to-night, I presume that to-night's debate is not to be allowed to pass without some official speech. But we shall endeavour to confine ourselves within limits; and if it be my duty, as it may be, to take part in the debate when it closes, I shall not dismiss from my memory what has now been said. As to other official Members—Members who are not absolutely involved in the responsibility of either Front Bench—they must really defend themselves. They are generally men of very great ability, and none are more competent to defend themselves. As we are making these remarks in a good-humoured way, I must frankly own that I am not quite sure of the wisdom of the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down in drawing attention to this subject. Generally, a man is judged by reference to his friends, and Parties and combinations of men are supposed, in some degree, to base their title to occupy the time of the House upon the importance which is attached to them. Those who sit near the hon. and learned Gentleman will, I am afraid, be found in a predicament from which it will require all their ingenuity to extricate themselves, if a severely critical and numerical test is applied to this part of our proceedings—a test which sometimes brings to light awkward facts. I hope we shall endeavour to reduce our official speeches to a minimum. As far as the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) was concerned, my right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works assures me that he was present during the greater part of the speech; my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General was also here; and the hon. and learned Gentleman himself confesses to the presence of a Lord of the Treasury. With respect to the question of Friday, I have been asked no Question upon the subject at a time when I could have considered the matter. But I do not see why I should attempt to bind the discretion of the House. We have no intention at present of asking for a Morning Sitting on Friday; but I cannot tell what the desire of the House may be. The desire of the House is certainly to have a Division on this Bill not later than Monday next. I do not wish to bind the discretion of the House; but if it should happen that a necessity arose, and that a Morning Sitting was voted by the House on Friday, we should think it a matter of justice to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Longford (Mr. Justice M'Carthy), and those who support him, that we should take care to secure for him a House, so that he can bring forward the important subject of which he has given Notice.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he rose to complain of the serious and unprecedented outrage committed on Tuesday last, when the Government, having taken the day for a Morning Sitting, arranged that it should be counted out, when, at the resumption of the Sitting, he rose to call attention to the affairs of Madagascar. Forty of his Friends were good enough to come down to make a House for him, and there were altogether 44 Members present, but four of his Friends subsequently were obliged to leave. The Government Whips were active in preventing Members from coming into the House, and then, when an unsuccessful attempt had been made to count out the House, they, like the Serpent in the history of the Fall, instilled poison into the ears of several hon. Members, and induced them to leave the House in order that the second attempt to count out the House might succeed. That attempt was made, he was sorry to say, by the hon. Member the Colleague of the Home Secretary in the representation of Derby, and thus a question which the Government did not dare to face fell to the ground. This he could not but describe as an unprecedented outrage, and he appealed to the Prime Minister to secure him facilities for bringing forward his Motion, which he had put down again for to-night.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: As I was present—

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: No, Sir. You came in late.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I was present during the second "Count." I was not present at the first "Count." I was present during the hon. Member's speech.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: No.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes, during 15 minutes of the speech.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: No.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that if the House had been in the exact condition described by the hon. Member it could not have been counted. He said there were 44 Conservatives present.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I did not say so. I said 44 Members were present, and that four of them sat on the Ministerial side.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that in that case the hon. Member had 40 of his own Friends present. If even the hon. Member with his Friends only counted 40, he was at a loss to see how there could be a "Count out." He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was certainly present himself, there was Mr. Speaker in the Chair, and the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was on the Treasury Bench, so there must have been, according to the hon. Member's own showing, not less than 43 Members in the House. As far as his recollection was concerned, at the time when the House was counted out, there were only 30 Members on the Conservative Benches and four on the Liberal side of the House. He saw no action on the part of the Government Whips which would justify the charges which the hon. Member had made against them. He was very sorry that the hon. Member had brought this subject forward, because hitherto he had always looked upon the hon. Member as a public benefactor. The officials of the House were much overworked, and he thought the hon. Member had done good service in bringing forward Motions on Tuesday evenings, because he thus secured a "Count," and the officials and overtaxed Members were able to be released. This had happened on several occasions last Session as well as on that day week; but he was sorry the hon. Member now appeared to be ashamed of the holiday he had thus given the officials. It had always been considered that if, on Tuesdays, less than 40 Members were present in the House, it was prima facie evidence that the subject under discussion was not of sufficient importance or interest for keeping a House.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he desired to traverse the theory laid down by the President of the Local Government Board to the effect that when 40 Members did not assemble to hear a discussion it was of no interest or importance. There might be a very great number of Motions which if they once could be got before the House would interest not 40, but 400 Members, although before such Motions were brought forward they might not interest 10 Members. He thought that, in the circumstances of the present time, the Government were bound to keep a House on Tuesdays for the benefit of private Members.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the noble Marquess if he would afford him an opportunity for bringing on the Motion standing in his name in reference to the New Education Code? The Code lying on the Table would come into operation on Thursday. Therefore, that was the last occasion when it could be called in question. He was willing either to go to a vote without argument on his Motion at once, or else to withdraw his Motion on the understanding that the Vice President of the Council would withdraw the Code till after Easter; if neither of those courses were convenient to the Government, he must ask the Leader of the House to arrange for the adjournment of the Reform Bill debate in time for him to bring on his Motion that night.

MR. MUNDELLA said, with respect to the form of the hon. Member's Notice, he understood it was contrary to the Rules of the House that one or two clauses of the Resolution should be put. The hon. Member proposed an Address to the Crown to increase the expenditure of the annual grant for elementary education. The proposal of the hon. Member, if agreed to, would enormously increase the annual grant, so that that part of the Resolution could not be put. With respect to the first two propositions, the Department had already done all that the hon. Member required. These matters were provided for in the Code.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT observed, that inasmuch as the Deputy Speaker had been suffering very much, it would not be right to keep him in the Chair beyond a certain hour. He hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would allow the debate on the Franchise Bill to be adjourned at an early hour, so as to permit the very important Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) with regard to the Education Code to come on at a reasonable hour. He was surprised—but, really, nothing surprised him now—to hear from the Vice President's own lips that long as he (the Vice President) had been in the House he knew nothing with regard to the Rules of the House in respect of Public Business. That was shown from what the right hon. Gentleman had said in reference to the Orders of the Day at Tuesday Sittings.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he would remind the Vice President of the Council that, although the Education Code had been lying on the Table of the House for a long time, hitherto no opportunity had presented itself for discussing it. This was the last chance hon. Members had of proposing Amendments in it. As a matter of political fairness his hon. Friend should have an opportunity of bringing forward his Motion.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was afraid there was no alternative but to discuss the Motion of the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) after the adjournment of the debate on the Franchise Bill to-night. The suggestion that they should divide upon it now was impossible. The question before the House was the Motion of his right hon. Friend for the postponement of the Notices of Motion and the Orders of the Day, and it would be impossible to make an exception in favour of the Motion of the hon. Member to the prejudice of the Motions of other hon. Members. He understood that the New Code had been on the Table for a month, and it could hardly be said that there had been no opportunity of discussing it. Under the circumstances, there was no alternative but to discuss the matter to-night after the debate on the Franchise Bill had been adjourned, and it might be hoped that the discussion would not take very long.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked at what hour it was proposed to adjourn the debate upon the Franchise Bill?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: As soon after 12 o'clock as possible.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he understood that the Education Code would become law to-morrow; and if the consideration of the question was to come on after 12 o'clock, he should like to ask the noble Lord at what time to-morrow it became law?

MR. MUNDELLA said, that the Code would not become law until the 3rd of April.

MR. J. LOWTHER asked whether the Vice President of the Council would, in the circumstances, undertake to withdraw the Code, in order that it might come on again at a time when it could be properly discussed?

MR. MUNDELLA said, he had no power to withdraw the Code.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he must deny that absolutely. The right hon. Gentleman had perfect power to make a Motion to that effect.

MR. RITCHIE said, that, in his opinion, it would be an act of cruelty to the Deputy Speaker, in his present state of health, to keep the Franchise debate up until after 12 o'clock, because the question of his hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire would occupy at least an hour or two, in consequence of which the Deputy Speaker would be detained in the House until 2 o'clock in the morning, or perhaps later.

MR. HICKS rose to a point of Order. He desired to know whether an Amendment could be moved to the Motion of the Prime Minister to the effect that the Motions on the Paper should be postponed till after the Orders of the Day up to 11 o'clock?

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (Sir ARTHUR OTWAY): The hon. Member has put a Question to me on a point of Order. He asks me whether the Resolution can be so altered as to fix the adjournment of the debate at 11 o'clock? That would be putting a limit to the power of debate in this House, and consequently it would not be in Order.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish to know, Sir, whether, looking at all the circumstances of the case and the time that is occupied in discussing this matter, it would not be well to undertake to adjourn the debate about 11 o'clock in order to give the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stanley Leighton) an opportunity of bringing forward the great social question, with regard to which the Members of the House generally have feelings of strong interest.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Government wished to do what was most agreeable to the House in this matter; but he must point out that it was not altogether the fault of the Government, because the Code had been upon the Table of the House for many days, during any one of which the matter might have been discussed. He only rose, however, to say that if it was the wish of the House that the debate should be adjourned about 11 o'clock, the Government would offer no objection to such a course.

Question put, and agreed to.

LOCAL TAXATION (RESOLUTION OF 28TH MARCH).

NOTICE OF MOTION AND QUESTION.

MR. PELL gave Notice that on the earliest opportunity he would move—

"That this House regrets that Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to take immediate steps to carry into effect the Resolution on Local Taxation agreed to by this House on Friday, March 28th last."

He also gave further Notice that he would, on Thursday next, April 3rd, ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will afford facilities for the consideration of the Motion relating to the Resolution of this House of the 28th March on the subject of Local Taxation, of which Notice has been given.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—[BILL 119.]

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.] [FOURTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [24th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House declines to proceed further with a measure, having for its object the addition of two million voters to the electoral body of the United Kingdom, until it has before it the entire scheme contemplated by the Government for the amendment of the Representation of the People,"—(Lord John Manners),

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH : Sir, the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), in the course of the conversation which has taken place this evening, expressed his opinion that the country had given to this House a mandate to pass this Bill. If that be so, it is all the more remarkable that the interest which appears to be taken in the measure, both in the House and the country, should be so slight when compared with the importance of the proposal, which, at any rate, is the first step in what has been described by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as the most momentous change in our legislative system since 1689. I do not attempt to deny that meetings may have been held, and Petitions presented to this House, in favour of this Bill by some of those whom it is proposed to enfranchise; but I do venture to say that there is an absence of that spontaneous enthusiasm in favour of this measure on the part of the classes whom it principally affects which is very remarkable when we remember how enthusiastic these very classes can be in regard to measures of very much less permanent importance. I should like to know what is the reason of this. Perhaps the people are wiser than formerly, and no longer believe that the grant of the vote is an infallible remedy for all political and social evils. Or it may be that some of the most ardent supporters of this Bill are rather disappointed at finding that the owners of property are only to be swamped in the future, instead of being wholly disfranchised. But I believe the main reason for the languid interest in this measure to be, that there is in the country, and perhaps in this House, a very general suspicion that even Her Majesty's Government, who are its authors, have no real expectation that it will pass into law, and that, in fact, it is not a bond fide measure of Reform intended to settle the great question of the representation of the people. I think hon. Members opposite have hardly done justice to the view with which we have hitherto opposed it. I do not suppose that anyone ever considered the county franchise to be finally settled by the Reform Act of 1867. I do not suppose anyone ever imagined that the artisans outside towns and the great majority of the agricultural labourers would be permanently excluded from the possession of the vote. What I understand to be the desire of those who are promoting this measure is that persons who, if they resided within the limits of a borough, would be entitled under the present system to the Parliamentary franchise shall have it notwithstanding the fact that they reside in a county. I do not at all see that there is any difference in the circumstances of the artisans who live outside boroughs and the artisans who live inside boroughs that could make the former less qualified for the vote than the latter. Then I come to the agricultural population. Now, I am bound to say that I have a somewhat better opinion of the agricultural population than some of their professed advocates. I listened with surprise to the First Commissioner of Works last night when he told the House that the condition of the agricultural labourers in the South and the West of England had gone backwards, that the best of them had gone to the towns, and that what was left in the country was the refuse population.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I did not say so.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I took down the words. I know the right hon. Gentleman did not originate the word himself, but he quoted it from a writer whom he named.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I never used the word "refuse."

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I will not discuss whether the word was residuum or refuse, but it means the same thing. I claim that I know at least as much of the agricultural labourers in the South and West of England as the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works. I believe that their condition has very materially improved within the last 20 years. No doubt, many of the labourers have gone to the towns, and thus have enabled those who were left behind to obtain higher wages than they otherwise would have obtained. I am not prepared to say that the agricultural labour in England is not fitted for the vote; but I am surprised that, after the opinion which the right hon. Gentleman has expressed of that part of the population, he should be among the promoters of the measure now before the House. The point at issue seems to me to be this. There is a general desire that these persons should possess the franchise; but I do not see why it should be taken for granted that the only way of giving them the franchise is by making them county voters. I believe it would have been perfectly possible, if the Government had approached the question from that point of view, by a general extension of the boundaries of boroughs and by the creation of new boroughs to fill up the spaces between to confer the franchise as borough voters upon all the persons who would be enfranchised by the Bill, and yet to retain a separate county representation, although that representation would, of course, be less numerous than at present. I do not see why, in order to give the franchise conferred by this Bill, you are absolutely to destroy the system of county representation as it exists in England, or why you are completely to swamp the classes who now compose the county constituencies by the influx of hundreds of thousands of voters, who are of the same class as those who control the representation in the borough constituencies. It is not an argument to say that because the gift of the franchise to the labouring classes in the borough constituencies has done no harm, therefore a measure which alters the whole system of Parliamentary representation so as to base it upon numbers alone will do no harm to the country. There are many who have considered this question from this point of view. I am glad to be able to refer to two authorities of no slight importance in favour of this opinion. Lord Derby, who is now responsible for this Bill, in speaking on another Reform Bill, stated that it was the duty of this House to see that no class was excluded or preferred over the rest; but by the provisions of this Bill as it stands, without any scheme for the representation of minorities, either through proportional representation, or redistribution of seats, that will be the result. In 1870 - right hon. Gentleman who exercised authority in this House, the

“If these additional numbers were to be admitted into the Constitution, he trusted that such measures might be accompanied by safeguards, which would secure that other classes besides the most numerous might be represented in the House of Commons.”—(3 Hansard, [238] 237.)

I believe the right hon. Gentleman is now a supporter of the Bill. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman could confer a greater service on his country than by suggesting to Parliament a scheme to carry out the views expressed in the sentence I have just read. It is a well-known fact that there has been a considerable movement, not confined to hon. Gentlemen sitting on one side of the House, among persons who desire to see a scheme of proportional or minority representation introduced. What does that mean? It means that hon. Gentlemen feel that unless certain “safeguards” are provided the existing constituencies will be absolutely swamped by this Bill, and that something must be substituted for the existing system if you are to secure that the classes represented by that system shall have their voices heard in the House of Commons. It has been said that my noble Friend (Lord John Manners) is trying to defeat the Bill on a side issue, but the Amendment expresses the full difference between us and the Government in approaching this question. It is all very well to give votes to those who do not possess the franchise. But you have no right to forget the claims of those who possess the franchise now. You are bound to take some measures to secure that the classes who are best educated, the most cultivated, who pay the whole of the direct taxation, shall have some means of being heard in Parliament. No measure will be a fair and just settlement of the great question of Reform which does not take this matter into consideration. It may, no doubt, be said that wealth and education will always secure influence. But we have been for some time devoting ourselves to limiting the improper exercise of the influence of wealth and education upon elections, and if you do not provide means for its direct and legitimate exercise on Parliament through Representatives who can speak on behalf of the classes who possess it, there is great danger that we may have in this country corruption similar to that which has disgraced the Legislatures of other countries. If not, we may have instead the greatest tyranny we have ever experienced—namely, the government by a power against which there is no appeal. When political power was vested in the aristocracy, its abuse was restrained by the fact that the ultimate physical power rested with the mass of the people. But when political power is given to those with whom physical power rests, you have the absolute certainty that the minority will be placed in a position in which they can have no possible appeal against the decision of the majority. If there has been in years past any reason for the institution of some means by which the voice of the minority may be heard in this House, I am convinced that under the franchise which will be established by this Bill that necessity will be doubled or quadrupled in the future. I shall be told that the Prime Minister has said that minority representation and different modes of voting ought to receive the full and impartial consideration of Parliament. But the right hon. Gentleman also stated that he was not himself in favour of anything of the kind. How much impartial consideration would such safeguards receive from the President of the Board of Trade and those who agree with him? That right hon. Gentleman referred to the minority vote as absurd, ridiculous, and irritating, and as having stifled the voice of the constituency which he represents. I cannot understand how those who are in favour of minority representation can support this Bill without the least hope that any proposals of that kind will be acceded to. But something of that sort is absolutely essential to a just settlement; and, therefore, we ask the Government, in proposing this measure, to tell us at the same time how they propose in future to distribute political power, and how they propose that those who at present enjoy political power shall not in future be absolutely deprived of their rights. If some system of the representation of minorities is important here, it is doubly important in Ireland. I am quite sensible of the strong arguments in favour of giving to Ireland the same franchise which you are conferring upon Great Britain. There is great force in the contention that you ought not to leave rankling in the minds of the Irish people anything which they could legitimately consider to be a political grievance; and it is well that the representation of Ireland should be a reality. The President of the Board of Trade, in addressing his constituents, said that if it were not for the violence of the Ulster Orangemen, Ireland would be perfectly tranquil. If that statement was true, the Government ought to repeal the Peace Preservation Act. But I believe it to be a fact that the tranquillity of Ireland is mainly, if not entirely, due to the provisions of the Peace Preservation Act. It is not the case, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), that the question to be considered by the Government is merely the fact that a few individuals commit crime. The great difficulty in dealing with Ireland is the fact that the general sympathy is with those individuals who commit crime, because in committing crime they oppose themselves to the Law and Government of the country, and that general sympathy is due to the unfortunate circumstance that a considerable majority of the Irish people are disloyal to the connection between the two Kingdoms. The position is that you are offering political privileges to a people whom you can only govern by the most stringent powers which have ever been conferred on an Irish Government in our time. You are offering this popular franchise to a country where you have frequently to put down political meetings lest they should turn into something like civil war. It seems to me that nothing can be more serious than such a state of affairs. The President of the Board of Trade said that a Franchise Bill must be brought in this year, and that Ireland must be included in it; for if it were postponed to 1885 the question of Reform for Ireland would get mixed up with the renewal of the Peace Preservation Acts in that year; and the right hon. Gentleman was sensible of the palpable absurdity of offering a Franchise Bill with one hand and a renewal of the Peace Preservation Acts with the other. Surely the proposals of the Government are not less incongruous when they are compelled to maintain these Acts. Have the Government really pictured to themselves the position in which the passing of the Bill may place them in regard to the Irish representation? Addressing a meeting in the winter, the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War said there were many in this country, who were not confined to the Conservative Party, who would view with considerable dislike and apprehension any measure likely to increase the number or the power of [the Irreconcilable Party in Parliament. I listened with great attention to the speech of the noble Lord the other evening, and it occurred to me that the noble Lord was by no means satisfied in his own mind that this would not be the result of the measure before the House. All he said was that the measure, by increasing the size of Irish constituencies, might make them less amenable to the influence of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). If it be so, I am afraid it will only be because the new electors will be disposed to prefer someone more violent and more hostile to England than even that hon. Member, and that surely is not a result which can be looked upon with satisfaction by any Member of the Government. The noble Lord said that the real representation of the loyal minority in Ireland was to be found in the Members from England and Scotland. I am afraid the loyal minority in Ireland would hardly accept that view, and I do not know why they should. If there be any force in the argument of the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), that the number of Members for London need not be increased on account of the influence of its Press, there must be force in the argument we used to hear so much of, that indirect representation was the same as the gift of a vote; but that argument would strike at the root of this Bill, for it might be argued that the agricultural labourers and the artisans were indirectly represented already by the Members of this House. I was surprised at the assumption of the First Commissioner of Works last night that the loyal minority of Ireland would be represented, because the Protestants amounted to 60 per cent of the inhabitants of Ulster.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I said 60 per cent of the population of Ulster, minus the three counties in which the Catholic population are a large majority.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: And, therefore, he considered that this

loyal minority would be able to control the representation of the whole of Ulster except these three counties, and to secure as large a proportion of the total Irish representation as it would be fairly entitled to by its numbers. If the right hon. Gentleman had carried his statistical research a little further, he would have found that this Protestant population is by no means divided among these counties in the way he supposes. He would have found that by far the greater proportion of it is situated in Antrim and Down and in the large town of Belfast; and I venture to say that any hon. Member acquainted with Ireland who will openly speak his mind on this matter, whatever his political opinions may be, will be pretty certain to come to this conclusion—that if this Bill should become law without any further redistribution than appears to be contemplated by the speech of the Prime Minister, the result would be that the loyal minority of Ireland would be represented by no more than eight or nine Members, including the Members for the University of Dublin, whereas the Party the Secretary of State for War has called the Irreconcilable Party would practically sweep the rest of the Irish representation. Is that a state of affairs that the Government can contemplate with possible satisfaction? If that be so, they will find themselves face to face with a very large proportion of Irish Members, so large as almost to amount to the whole body of Irish Members, whose first demand will be either for a separation of Ireland from this country or for some measure of Home Rule which will be tantamount to it. I will not suggest that the Government could ever in their own minds think of agreeing to such a demand or of supporting designs which they have condemned in the strongest language in and out of the House. I would suppose rather that they would oppose to such a demand as resolute a front as they have hitherto opposed to it; but what would their position be? Their strength would lie simply in the force of Great Britain as against nearly the whole representation of Ireland. Is it a statesmanlike proposal to give to the people of Ireland this popular franchise, and then to turn round on them on the first demand they will probably make and say—"We refuse it by the strength of the Representatives whom Great Britain sends to the House of Commons?" I may be told that these anticipations are exaggerated; but I have made some inquiries from those who ought to know, and I do not believe that they are exaggerated at all. I believe that unless you make some provision for the representation of the loyal Irish minority, it will be swamped in the manner I have described. This is the strongest reason of all why we should demand, not merely on behalf of Great Britain, but mainly on behalf of Ireland, that the redistribution of seats which will be necessary should be considered by Parliament at the same time as the Franchise Bill, and before it comes into operation. Why cannot we have this scheme of redistribution? The President of the Board of Trade thought he had given a triumphant answer the other night when he said there was no sufficient scheme of redistribution attached to the Reform Act of 1867. But the scheme of redistribution attached to that Act was considered by Parliament sufficient at the time, and it was as much as Parliament would then pass or public opinion would sanction. The Government of the day laid it frankly before the House; and all we ask now is that, having in view the altered circumstances of the case and the necessity which will exist for a much larger scheme under the proposals now before the House, that you should do what the Government did in 1867, and place your proposals fairly before Parliament. Another objection to that course has been based on the alleged want of time. The Prime Minister has constantly spoken of the delays to which the discussion of the measure has been subjected already, and the impossibility of passing a whole measure of Reform in a single Session. I believe the second reading of the Reform Bill of 1866 was taken at a later date of the Session than the second reading of this Bill. If the Government make up their minds to deal with this great question of the reform of the representation of the people, surely they ought to go so far as to recognize that it must necessarily demand the whole attention of Parliament, and they ought to put aside all those other measures which they are attempting to push through Parliament at the same time.

If they will not do it, I think they are hardly showing much appreciation of the importance of their own proposals. But it seems to me that neither the question of time, nor any other reason of that sort, is the real reason why we are not favoured with any scheme of redistribution. The real reason is that Her Majesty's Government cannot agree among themselves as to what it is to be. Certain suggestions of a personal and rather evanescent character were made by the Prime Minister; but the principal of them, including the idea that Ireland should retain its present number of Representatives, were subsequently repudiated by Ministerial speakers, including such staunch supporters as the right hon. Members for Montrose and Bradford, and those suggestions practically disappeared with the speech of the Secretary for War. We have absolutely nothing now before us as to the redistribution which may follow this measure, except it be the most contradictory opinions on the part of the Members of the Government who have spoken. The Secretary for War said that if he believed any attempt was to be made to introduce a uniform system, such as equal electoral districts, he would not be prepared to support such a Bill. That, of course, is his opinion now; but I am afraid events may induce him to qualify it in the improbable event of Her Majesty's Government having to bring in a redistribution measure. I can remember the time when the noble Lord was an opponent of the Ballot, and how, when the Ballot was brought within the range of practical politics, he was converted to it through the agency of a Select Committee. I recollect how in the last Parliament he supported the continuance of flogging in the Army. When, however, the Leadership of the noble Lord was repudiated by the President of the Board of Trade, he changed his mind with reference to flogging in the Army. The noble Lord, I think, was two years in Opposition before he brought himself to support the proposal for the extension of household suffrage to the counties; and now he is responsible for the measure which is on the Table of the House. I am afraid that the noble Lord in this matter is too likely to be guided by others. The President of the Board of Trade is well known to be in favour of equal electoral districts, although he may be content to wait for the application of that principle. I think those who were the prime movers of the Leeds Conference, where this Bill really originated, will have something to say upon this subject before long to the noble Lord, not merely with power, but with some force of argument. The principle on which this Bill is based, I take it, is that the householder in the county is as good as the householder in towns. If that is so, why is he not entitled to so large a share of political power as you give to his neighbours in the towns? If you say that an equal value should be given to every vote, what does that mean but equal electoral districts? The First Commissioner of Works told us the other night that if we objected to such a public scandal as the holding of an Election under so chaotic and unjust an electoral system as would be afforded by the passing of this Bill into law before any redistribution of seats took place, all we have to do is to keep the Government in Office until they have passed a Redistribution Bill. In effect, that is to say that we are not to call the Government into account for any blunders or mistakes they may make in the administration of the country; that they are to be allowed to fix their own time for Dissolution, and the reward we are to have is such a Redistribution Bill as it would suit them to pass into law. Such a proposal as that seems to me to show that the Government are driven to the last shifts of argument in this matter. I believe they have no confidence in any fresh constituencies that might be created by any fair, equitable, and complete scheme for the representation of the people. But they think they may possibly have some chance in an appeal to constituencies which will be the creation of accident, and which nobody can possibly pretend should be permanent depositories of political power. The President of the Board of Trade challenged, I think, the House of Lords to throw out this Bill some little time before the Government made any formal announcement that it was their intention to introduce it. I believe no Member of the Conservative Party would for a moment shrink from the challenge which the right hon. Gentleman gave the other night; but I am sure of this, that when the issue is really decided between the two great political Parties of the country—and I hope that time will not be long delayed—it will be decided not merely on this visionary and incomplete scheme, but on all the blunders and all the failures and all the broken pledges which have characterized the official career of Her Majesty's present Government.

Mr. ALBERT GREY said, he thought that the speech of the right hon. Baronet who had just sat down, although it contained much invective of the Government, was not altogether without hope for Reformers. He hardly thought it worthy of the right hon. Baronet to say that a Government, which had been placed in power in order to deal with Reform, had been guilty of an "electioneering dodge" in introducing a Reform Bill. The right hon. Baronet had himself admitted that the Act of 1867 was not final, and that it was absolutely impossible that the exclusion of the county householders from the franchise should be long continued. Admitting so much, he was bound to say he could not understand the attitude of the right hon. Baronet, for, while he agreed that Reform was necessary, he was by his vote going to make it impossible that the House should even discuss Reform. Again, there was nothing in the speech of the right hon. Baronet to prove, if he and the Party who acted with him were successful in their endeavour to climb into Office, that they would not bring in the Government scheme of Reform themselves. It was true that the right hon. Baronet maintained that the extension of the franchise should be accompanied by a scheme for the redistribution of seats; but his arguments tended to show it was chiefly important that the same electorate which passed the Extension Bill should also pass the measure for redistribution. If this were his object, then he maintained that it was quite possible to insert in the Bill some provision which would give him the security he desired. As this could be done in Committee, there could be no reason why the right hon. Baronet should not give his support to the second reading of the Bill. He was glad that the right hon. Baronet had not endorsed the opinions of some of his Party, who held that the enfranchisement of the county householder was in itself an undesirable thing. In his opinion, extension was absolutely imperative, being demanded alike by political justice, by political expediency, and by political necessity. Some hon. Members opposite had attacked the Government because they had approached the subject from that standpoint which viewed Reform as a matter affecting the right of the individual. Well, he agreed with those hon. Members and with the President of the Board of Trade in regarding the franchise as a trust, and not as a right; but he would remind the House that it was possible to create conditions which would confer a right, where, if those conditions had not been created, no right would have existed. If they gave one man a vote because of his fitness, they could not withhold a similar privilege from another man who could show an equal fitness, without giving him a legitimate reason for complaint. Lord Cairns, in 1859, declared that all the eloquence of the Party to which he was opposed—

"Would not persuade the man living on the wrong side of the street that he was fairly dealt with in the distribution of the franchise."

Political justice required that the man should not be deprived of the privilege of a vote simply because he lived on the wrong side of the street. But even if political justice did not demand it, extension would be called for by political expediency. Our experience of the benefits that have resulted in the past from former extensions of the franchise justified the belief that the proposed enfranchisement of the county householder would bring advantage to the State. He agreed with the right hon. Baronet that the possession of a vote would not remove every political and social evil. The good which he anticipated as likely to accrue did not, in his mind, assume the shape of particular acts of State interference; for he agreed with those who held that we had more to fear than to hope for from paternal legislation in the interests of any particular class. The good which he anticipated from extension was the advantage which would be certain to result from the development of that spirit of enterprize, energy, and self-help which the bestowal of a vote was calculated to produce. There was an old maxim of the Greeks which said—

"The evils of popular government appear greater than they are; there is compensation for them in the spirit and energy it awakens."

If it was true, as some contended, that the result of extension would be to give us a more ignorant Government, there would be compensation in the fact that the spirit and energy created by the consciousness of participation in the governing power would tend to raise and enlarge the manhood of the nation. But if extension was demanded by political justice and political expediency, it was not less loudly called for by political necessity. There were some hon. Members opposite who honestly believed that they could throw out this Bill with impunity; that there was, as the right hon. Baronet had declared, no genuine spontaneous desire for the Bill. Such was not his belief. He would counsel those hon. Members who held this opinion to go to the North of England, and consult with the Leaders of their Party as to the chances of any candidate who would boldly declare that the county householder ought not to be enfranchised. Let them consult with the hon. Baronet, the recently-elected Member for York, or with the noble Lord who had succeeded his Father in the representation of Haddingtonshire, or with Mr. Bruce, who opposed, in the Tory interest, the candidature of his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle, and they would learn from them how impossible were the chances of any candidate who might deny that the enfranchisement of the county householder was necessary and just. He had listened with interest to the speech of the right hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) last night, whose return to the House had brought, as it seemed to him, a greater accession of debating power than of statesmanship. He, for one, could not sympathize with the policy of that right hon. Gentleman, which was summed up in the words—

“While the country is quiet, I will vote against Reform,
When the country is noisy, I will vote for Reform.”

That was the policy of the right hon. Gentleman. It was the policy also of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill). It was a policy of disorder, turbulence, and lawlessness, and one which was singularly unworthy of a Party which had constituted itself the special champion of law and order. In his opinion, it was statesmanship to anticipate a fierce demand. It was worse than a blunder to refuse to legislate on this question when we could do so in calmness, in order that we might wait until we were driven to legislate in a panic at a time when the pulse of the country was throbbing with the fever beat of a hot excitement. He was strongly opposed to any action which might seem to deny that extension was an urgent necessity. He should, therefore, give a cordial support to the second reading of the Bill, believing the course which the noble Lord invited the House to take was dangerous, unstatesmanlike, and unwise. He would now, with the permission of the House, make a few remarks on two different points, and in doing so he would endeavour to avoid following the example so abundantly set of making a redistribution speech at the wrong time, or of repeating arguments which were already painfully familiar to the House. He wished to make a few observations, first on the character of the Bill itself, and then on the method of procedure which the Government had advised the House to adopt in dealing with Reform. First, then, as to the character of the Bill; it struck him as a great defect in the Bill that it contained no definition as to what constituted a valid claim to vote as a householder. It would be in the recollection of all who heard or read the Prime Minister's opening speech, that he divided the subject of Reform into three separate parts; that he defined the object of the first part as the fixing of the franchise; that he pointed out that this was in itself an enormous task; and that this enormous task—namely, the fixing of the right of the individual who should be entitled to a vote, was the sole aim and object of the Bill which he had introduced. It would be further in the recollection of those present, that the Prime Minister begged the House to fasten its attention on the borough franchise as it existed in England, because that borough franchise was the hinge of the whole measure, on which the whole structure depended, not only as regarded England, but as regarded Scotland, and as regarded Ireland. This being the case, the nature of the borough franchise became a matter of vital importance, and he thought that it must have been a matter of surprise to many, when they found, on obtaining a copy of the Bill, that it contained no definition of the borough franchise, and that it was necessary for those who wished to understand what Parliament was doing in giving its consent to this measure in its present shape, to search through back Acts of Parliament and Law Reports in order to discover who was entitled to vote as a householder in an English borough. Well, he had made it his business, and many other hon. Members had probably done the same, to find out and discover what was the exact position of the law as to the borough franchise in England. Those who had done so, and who were aware how flimsy and unsatisfactory was the line of distinction between the householder and the lodger, would, he was sure, agree with him that that great Magna Charta which was to add 2,000,000 voters to the 3,000,000 already on the Registers, should contain something more than a reference to back Acts of Parliament and judicial decisions, and that it should be a measure self-contained and complete, clearly defining and explaining what was the nature and character of that franchise which was for the future to be the backbone of English liberties. Now this point was of great importance, for he would venture to assert that it was by no means certain that the effect of the Bill would not be to extend the franchise a great deal further than was contemplated by the House, and, by the conversion of every lodger who had the separate occupation of a single room into a householder, to establish over the United Kingdom a suffrage more closely resembling manhood suffrage than what was generally understood as household suffrage. The House would, he was sure, recognize the importance of this point, and would pardon him if he ventured to occupy a few moments of its time in referring to the exact position of the law as to the borough franchise. In order to explain the exact line of distinction between the lodger and the householder, it would be necessary for him to go back for a moment to the year 1867. As everyone was aware, up to 1867 there was no household franchise except at a value of £10, and no lodger franchise at all. The effect of the Act of 1867 was to establish, for the first time, in boroughs a simple household qualification irrespective of value

—the Prime Minister's "hinge"—and a £10 lodger franchise. But the Parliament of 1867, anxious to draw a careful distinction between the two different classes of householders and lodgers, set up three tests by which an occupier who was a householder might be distinguished from an occupier who was a lodger. Under the Act of 1867 no man could vote as a householder, who did not personally pay rates, who did not occupy what was known to the law as a dwelling house, and who did not occupy such dwelling house as a tenant and not as a lodger. These were the three tests and safeguards on which the Parliament relied, in order to distinguish the householder from the lodger. Now he would show, that in consequence of subsequent legislation, two out of the three tests and safeguards had been removed, and he would also show that the third test was a most difficult one to apply. The first of these three tests—namely, the personal payment of rates—was immediately found to be so inconvenient that the provisions enforcing it were repealed by the Poor Rate Assessment Act of 1869. That Act re-established the system of compounding, and enabled persons who had constructively paid their rates to vote. The effect of the Act was that every householder, whether he paid rates or not—assuming of course that somebody paid them—was entitled to vote. The first test which served to distinguish a lodger from a householder was thus swept away. The second mark of distinction between a lodger and a householder rested on the nature of the apartment occupied. To give a vote as a householder, the apartment must be what was known under the law as a dwelling house. The occupation of lodgings would not be sufficient. What, then, was the difference between a dwelling house as defined by the Act of 1867 and lodgings? Now, the question under what circumstances a part of a house was to be considered a house, so as to give the right of voting, had arisen under the Act of 1832, and, after numerous decisions more or less conflicting, it was laid down in 1861 by the Court of Common Pleas, that a part of a house, in the common understanding of the word, became a house in law when and only when there was actual structural severance. But the definition in the Act of 1867 gave rise to much difference of opinion. The Court of Common Pleas was three times equally divided upon the question whether particular premises were or were not a dwelling house; whether the Interpretation Clause of the Act of 1867 did or did not extend the meaning of the word dwelling house beyond that laid down by the Court of Common Pleas in 1861, and, if it did, how far it extended it. To decide this open question, and to remove the scandal naturally created by the absence of any uniformity in the decisions of the Revising Barristers, the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act was passed in 1878, which repealed the definition in the Act of 1867, and substituted a new one in its place. The effect of this Act was so far as the nature of the premises was concerned to convert every lodger into a householder. This alteration in the law was made by an Act passed by the late Parliament without any discussion. The Act which embodied it was referred to a Select Committee and accepted by the House without an Amendment and without discussion on the assurance of Mr. Marten, the late Member for Cambridge, and the President of the Local Government Board, that the Bill had been most carefully considered, and that no sweeping changes were introduced. Thus the second test followed the fate of the first, and was in its turn swept away. The question soon came before the Courts whether there remained any distinction at all between a lodger and a householder. And in November, 1881, in the case of "Bradley v. Baylis," the two able Judges, Denman and Bowen, decided that the effect of the Act of 1878 was that every man who separately occupied a single room for the requisite time was qualified to vote as a householder. These Judges were so confident that there was no question in the matter, that they declined at first to allow an appeal; but when it appeared that the construction put upon the definition of "dwelling house" in the Act of 1878, made householders of multitudes of persons who had no houses, and that its result would be, according to a leading article in The Times, to give the franchise not to a few hundred, but to a few hundred thousand persons who did not possess it before, when it was seen that the effect of this decision would be to create in boroughs

a suffrage hardly distinguishable from manhood suffrage, it was felt that the manifest importance of the point decided was a good ground for allowing an appeal. It was felt desirable that a wholesale addition to our Registers, owing to an unforeseen interpretation of the language of the Act of 1878, should be confirmed by the Court of Appeal before it was legalized. The Court of Appeal, however, reversed the decision of the Court below. They pointed out the existence of a third test which had been overlooked by Justices Denman and Bowen. They did not deny that the occupation of a single room was sufficient as far as the nature of the premises was concerned to give a vote; but they said you must look further and examine the nature of the occupation, and see whether the occupier of a single room occupied it as a tenant or as a lodger. Now, on the nature of the occupation rested the whole case as to whether a man was a lodger or householder; and he thought it would hardly be believed that although so much depended on the line of distinction between the occupation as a tenant and the occupation as a lodger, the Legislature had not attempted to distinguish the two kinds of occupation. Having found some difficulty in agreeing on the definition of the term "lodger," Parliament left it to the Courts to determine its meaning. How the Courts had succeeded appeared from the statement of the late Master of the Rolls, who declared—

"There is probably no question on which there has been a greater variety of judicial opinion than this."

Another Judge, Lindley, also declared—

"The distinction between those who are lodgers, and those who are not lodgers, must be discovered from other sources than the Statutes, and it is extremely difficult to draw the line between them."

He had now proved how exceedingly unsatisfactory was the line of distinction which separated the householder from the lodger, that two out of the three tests and safeguards set up by the Parliament of 1867 to distinguish the householder from the lodger had been swept away, and that the third remaining test was most difficult to apply. Now, he wished to know what the effect of this Bill would be? He had pointed out that this third test did not depend upon Statutes, but upon the opinion of the Courts.

[Fourth Night.]

Was this third test to be swept away by the Bill, and no distinction at all to be kept between the lodger and the householder? This was the point to which he wished to draw the attention of the House. He rather inferred from the Prime Minister's speech that his object was to remove this test, for the Prime Minister had distinctly declared, in referring to the service franchise, that—

"Our object is to provide a franchise for those inhabitants who are neither owners nor tenants."

Now, the effect of this would be to make every man who separately occupied a single room for the requisite time into a householder. He wished to know whether this was the intention of the Government? He would point out that if this was the case, a state of things would be brought about over the whole of the United Kingdom similar to that which, by the judgment of Denman and Bowen, was created in 1878 in English boroughs. Those who wished to know what a scare the judgment of Denman and Bowen caused would find abundant evidence in the newspapers of November, 1881. He wished to know whether this Bill would do for the whole Kingdom what the Act of 1878, in the opinion of Justices Denman and Bowen, did for the boroughs? He regretted to have wearied the House at such length on so dry and technical a subject. It was, however, a point which ought to engage the attention of the House, for whether this Bill was intended to alter this state of the law or not he thought it ought not to be left in its present state of technicality and uncertainty; and he hoped, before the Bill reached Committee stage, that the House might be treated to something more than a reference, and that this great Magna Charta might contain a definition clearly stating what was the exact line of distinction between a householder and a lodger. Then passing from this somewhat dry but none the less important point, he asked to be allowed to make a few remarks on the method of procedure which the Government had invited the House to adopt. The right hon. Baronet had pointed out that there was no security, under the Bill in its present shape, that the same electorate which passed extension should pass redistribution as well. He agreed with the right hon. Baronet in thinking this a grave defect, and if it was possible to introduce into the Bill some provision which would give this security, without in any way interfering with the desire of the House to extend the franchise, then there could be no reason for refusing to insert it. As he had already trespassed at considerable length on the indulgence of the House, he would not be justified if he were to attempt to give his reasons for that belief at any length; but he wished, with the permission of the House, to make a few remarks in support of his contention, that whether the franchise was regarded as a right or as a privilege, it was in any case of vital importance that the same electorate which dealt with the extension should deal with redistribution also. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford had last evening stated that the principal argument he had heard brought against the separation of redistribution from extension was the inconvenience that it would cause from the large size of the constituencies created. This he said, and rightly said, was a very inadequate reason, for what, he asked, was inconvenience when compared with justice? Well, his own attitude upon this question was based and founded upon justice. If justice required that a man should have a vote, justice also required that he should be able to make his vote effectual. If a man had a right to a vote, that implied that he had a right to participate in the governing power. This was the end to gain which the franchise was only a means. Participation in the conduct of public affairs being the end aimed at, it did not follow that this was secured by the mere bestowal of a vote. To have a vote was, of course, absolutely essential, but something more than this was required. The right to vote must be of value. If an elector was to participate in the conduct of public affairs, it was not only necessary that he should have a vote, but that he should be able by means of his vote to give effectual expression to his opinion. If this was admitted, and he could not see how it could be denied, then this also must be admitted, that the number of names on the electoral roll was not so important as the number of electors who by the effectual use they could make of their vote were conscious of a direct participation in the governing power. For instance, if the object of Reform was to foster and increase the spirit of citizenship, it must be obvious that that object would be far more effectually attained by a system of election which secured that the vote of every individual elector should count for as much as that of any other elector, than it would by a system which would give the whole of the representation to two-thirds of the electors, and no representation at all to one-third of the electors. If, then, it were possible to extend the suffrage in such a way as to secure equal representation to all the electors, it would be a political error of the gravest magnitude to extend it in such a way as to set up, on the one hand, a large privileged class endowed with a greater share of power than they were entitled by their numbers to receive, and, on the other hand, a large unrepresented class labelled electors, whose votes were absolutely useless, and who, instead of feeling any consciousness that they had any participation whatsoever in the governing power of the country, would be depressed by the most miserable consciousness that they were not only entirely unrepresented and virtually disfranchised, but they were to be henceforth deprived of all chance of participation in the conduct of public affairs. This, he maintained, was exactly what they were asked to do if they were invited to agree to the extension of the franchise without any security that the same electorate which passed it should settle the scheme of redistribution. Let him refer to Ireland as an illustration. Let them suppose that, according to generally accepted statements, the result of extension would be to give them an electorate of which two-thirds were Nationalists and one-third Loyalists. And let them further assume that the Loyalist population was so diffused that it could only win five seats, the remaining 100 going to the Nationalists. It would be evident to everyone that in a country where Parties were divided in the proportion of two to one, a system of election which would give the whole of the representation to that Party which could command a local majority, and no representation whatsoever to the minority, might give them a Legislature in which the one-third would be entirely unrepresented. He supposed, however, that the one-third had been able to win five seats out of

105, the remaining 100 seats going to the Nationalists' two-thirds. Now, what happened? If the Nationalists' two-thirds won 100 seats out of 105, and the Loyalists' one-third won only five seats, what was the respective value of the Nationalists' and Loyalists' vote? Why, if two-thirds got 100, one-third got 50, and thus they obtained this result—that one-third of the electorate who were Nationalists got 50 seats, and the one-third of the electors who were Loyalists got five seats. Thus, the vote of every Nationalist would count for 10 times as much as the vote of every Loyalist. Was this a possibility which those who aimed at justice could regard with complacency? The President of the Board of Trade had told them that the representative system in Ireland should be a reality, and not a mere imposition. And the hon. Member for the City of Cork had warned the House against allowing the Irish Representation to remain an utter sham. He would ask both the President of the Board of Trade and the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) what they considered to be a true representation and what an utter sham? Did they consider a system of election which made the vote of a Nationalist elector 10 times more powerful than the vote of a Loyalist elector a true representation, or would they agree with him in calling it an utter sham? Did they consider a system of election which would give nine-tenths of the representation to two-thirds of the electors a true representation, or an utter sham? And did they consider a system of election which would secure to one-third of the electors, although they were Loyalists, one-third of the representation, a mere imposition which the House should disallow? His hon. Friend the Member for Dundalk, in his eloquent speech last evening, said—"Who was there in this House who would dare to stand up and say I am in favour of a sham." He (Mr. Grey) asked who was there in this House who would dare to stand up and say with him, "I am against an utter sham." The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) admitted that the effect of extension unaccompanied by redistribution would be to swamp the loyal minority in Ireland; and did he regret it? On the contrary, he rejoiced at it, because, in his opinion—

"The action of that so-called Loyal Party had not been an aid, but a hindrance, to any solid union between England and Ireland."

If the House wanted further proof that the result of extension, unaccompanied by redistribution, would be to produce a perfect fraud in the representation and an utter sham, they would find it in the melancholy avowal of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, that the loyal minority for Ireland must look for their representation to the 550 Gentlemen who might be sent to Parliament by English and Scotch constituencies. So far, he had confined himself to an attempt to show that if the increase of citizenship was the only object of Reform, it was important that there should be a connection between extension and redistribution. He had shown that if we once separated redistribution from extension we should hand over to a numerical majority a monopoly of political power, which would enable them to prevent the minority from obtaining that fair share of participation in the conduct of public affairs to which they were entitled. But to add to the number of electors was not the only object of Reform. It certainly was not the only object of the Reformers of 1832; and, according to the evidence abundantly supplied by Hansard, it was not the only object of the Reformers of 1866 and 1867. The governing consideration both in 1832 and in 1867 was not the increase of citizenship, but the character of the Legislature. The object in both cases was to bring about a transfer of political power, and, while increasing the number of citizens entitled to partake in the governing power, to regulate that increase in such a way as to secure these two great results—(1.) That no class should be excluded from representation in the House of Commons. (2.) That no one class should by over-representation unduly overbear all the rest. These were the considerations which occupied the minds of statesmen during the previous periods of Reform, and which caused them to keep an inseparable connection between extension and redistribution. The Prime Minister had argued that because the number of electors depended upon the Redistribution Bill at a time when there was a different franchise in town and county, that was a good reason against the separation, but because the number of electors could not be affected by a Redistribution Bill when the franchise was uniform, the case against separation fell to the ground. But Lord Derby's unanswerable speech in 1866 was not so much directed against the inconvenience referred to by the Prime Minister, as against the dangerous course of leaving the power of deciding what should be the ultimate balance of power between the different classes of the community in the hands of a Parliament returned under a Provisional Constitution after extension and before redistribution, by a constituency which no one ever intended to be the depositary of political power. This was the real ground of the opposition to the separation in 1866; and he would ask the Prime Minister, if it was unsafe in 1866 to leave in the hands of a Parliament elected by a constituency which was never intended to be the depositary of political power the serious and vital question of determining what was to be the ultimate balance of power between the different classes of the community, was it a bit more safe now? If it was important to keep the two measures together in 1866, it was ten times more important now. For what was the difference between the situation of 1866 and that of 1884? In 1866 the Reform Bill maintained a marked diversity of franchise—a broad distinction between the town and county franchise was carefully maintained, in order that there might be an ample security for that variety in the representation which had always been considered as the very essence of our Constitution. But now, if we dissolved after extension and before redistribution, we should find ourselves in this position. We should have lost the old security and should have established no new one in its place. He was not arguing against extension. On the contrary, he maintained that extension was required by political justice, expediency; and necessity. He only wished to point out that at present we secured variety of representation by variety of franchise, and that one inevitable consequence of extension, which we were bound not to disregard, was that it would remove and destroy a particular form of security deliberately and carefully set up with the object of ensuring that variety in the representation which had always been regarded as absolutely essential. The question was—what security could we set up in its place? The representation of local majorities, which answered well enough so long as there was a different franchise in different localities, was useless when the franchise was uniform. If we had an uniform franchise, there was only one way of securing that variety in the representation which was of the very essence of our Constitution, and that was by the abandonment of the system of local majority representation, and by the wide application of the principle of personal or proportional representation. He could not now enter into the reasons for this belief; all he could say now was that, in his opinion, while a uniform franchise, coupled with the present system of majority representation, would be most dangerous, a uniform household franchise, coupled with a system of personal or proportional representation, would be most advantageous. Why, then, if such was his opinion, the hon. Member might ask who was about to follow him, did he not vote for the Amendment of the noble Lord? He had already stated the reason why. The effect of the Amendment of the noble Lord, if carried, would be to throw out the Bill, and to tell the country that this Parliament, which had been returned in order to deal with Reform, was not even willing to discuss Reform. Such a course he considered dangerous, unstatesmanlike, and unwise. He would, therefore, give his cordial support to the second reading. But while he was anxious that an Extension Bill should be passed, he was strongly opposed to passing it in such a way as to leave the character of the redistribution to be decided by a constituency which was never intended to be the depository of political power. He held that the same electorate which dealt with extension should deal with redistribution also. He, therefore, proposed to support a clause to be inserted in the Bill that extension should not take effect until a date to be mentioned in the Redistribution Bill which was to follow. He was aware—painfully aware—of the objections that could be urged against such a course. He had weighed them and carefully considered them; but he was unable to discover any other means which would give him the security he thought they had a right to ask for obtaining that variety in the representation which was essential to good government. If, however, the Government could point out any other security less open to objection, he would be very glad; but if they could not provide any other security, he would support such a clause as that to which he had just referred, for, objectionable as it might be, it was still less objectionable than the course of handing over the settlement of redistribution to a constituency which was never intended to be the depository of political power.

Mr. GUY DAWNAY said, he would not follow the hon. Member who had just sat down into all the details of his able and interesting speech. He did not profess himself as a rule to be an especially obedient follower of the Prime Minister; but he intended on this occasion to follow the remarkable advice with which the right hon. Gentleman had concluded the speech in which he introduced this measure to the House. The Prime Minister had offered this measure to the House in much the same way that a physician might offer to a somewhat distrustful patient a somewhat dubious and experimental medicine. It had been taken, he argued, in small doses on previous occasions, and had had a tonic effect on the Constitution. Therefore, an enormously increased dose must now be the logical sequence, and must have a treble stimulating effect. That sequence being once granted as a point beyond dispute, it only remained for them to shut their eyes, to recognize that the longer they looked the more they would dislike it, and to swallow it with as good a grace as might be, and with a determination to avoid over-carping criticism as to unpleasant details either in its composition or manner of exhibition. That was not a very inaccurate description of the arguments or the recommendations of the right hon. Gentleman; and he would only say that as far as the arguments went they had not been very materially strengthened by any remarks on the other side of the House, and as far as the recommendations went they had not elicited any servile obedience on that side. For himself, he would not go into any detail, still less recommend any fancy franchise—he would not “wander into the morasses and quagmires of doubt;” but he would give a plain and straightforward opinion—an opinion which was shared by many more in the House than would be likely to avow such views—an opinion that this downward extension of the franchise, which was so euphemistically imposed on them under the fair sounding but false title of “Representation of the People Bill,” was a measure which, in its present truncated condition, was not worth having—which was untimely in its introduction, which was not justified by any genuine or general desire on the part of the people, which was absolutely dangerous and unconstitutional in the power it would give to one class, and that the least intelligent and least educated class of the people. It was to this last aspect of the question he wished as much as possible to confine his remarks. There were other points of objection to this measure, but so obvious that they required but few words of proof. Few words, for instance, were necessary to prove the charge of untimeliness in the introduction of an enfranchising measure which made that introduction coincident with one of the saddest pages of Irish history, and the consequent continued existence of a Crimes Prevention Act. Whether the Bill were from other points of view a good Bill or a bad Bill, every shred of argument that had been so painfully scraped together by Members opposite to justify the inclusion of Ireland had been a most complete and crushing condemnation of the policy which, for the sake of the meanest, most pitiable Party purposes, had insisted on introducing this unnecessary measure at this most untimely moment, and had forced the country, either by the exclusion of Ireland, to fan to fresh fury the flickering flame of discontent, or else, by the inclusion of Ireland, to disfranchise their loyal fellow-countrymen, and to recruit the ranks of those whose thought by day and dream by night was enmity to England and hatred to her rule, and whose avowed and boasted objects were Separation and Repeal. The Prime Minister said—“The people were to be trusted, and that the voters under the Constitution were the strength of the Constitution;” but would he venture to say that the Irish people were to be trusted for their loyalty to the Constitution, or would he repeat, with all the records of late elections in Ireland to confront and to confute him, that the voters under the present Constitution even were the strength of the Constitution? He had hoped that he might have left to other right hon. and noble Occupants of the Treasury Bench to answer that question, by repeating in the House their well-known and else where publicly expressed sentiments on this at present disheartening subject. It appeared, however, that what seemed madness in the bracing air of the Provinces seemed to be simple necessity in the enervating atmosphere of the Cabinet Council. Even the noble Lord, however, told them that it would be too sanguine to expect that the extension of the franchise would be followed in Ireland by an increase of loyalty and contentment. It would, indeed, be too sanguine; and he would only add that, if the Prime Minister could still with sincerity avow his belief in the loyalty of the great bulk of the Irish people, that he again possessed in solitude that same unique power of rose-coloured vision with regard to the state of Ireland with which a notorious paragraph in his Mid Lothian orations had made them but too unhappily familiar. It was on other grounds, however, that he wished to question the charge of untimeliness against the present measure. However much theorists in the House, or claptrap orators in the country, might exclaim at such an opinion, he was convinced, and had no hesitation in expressing his conviction, that, as a class, the agricultural labourers were not yet sufficiently educated to justify the House in permitting them to bring their votes in competition on such unequal terms as regards numbers with those which represented education, and the interest inherent in the possession of property. He was not likely to wish to under-rate the qualifications of any class of Yorkshiremen; and having the honour to represent a constituency which comprised 1-24th of the whole area of England and 1-30th part of the whole agricultural population, he might at least be supposed to speak as one considerably interested in this question of their enfranchisement. It was only in a secondary degree that he objected to their enfranchisement on the score of their unfitness. That objection each year of our present education system would help to diminish and remove, and even now it held less in the North perhaps than elsewhere. He was sure that at least all hon. Members who represented constituencies North of the Humber would allow that the highest average of natural intellectual development was, like promotion in the text, in that it came "neither from the East, nor from the West, nor yet from the South." The chief point of his objection, and one which time would never efface, was the manner in which the Government intended to concede to the agricultural labourer that trust. As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes) pointed out the other day, since the Act of 1867 there had been two distinct qualifications for the suffrage—the property qualification in the counties, and the franchise on the basis of population in the towns—and what he objected to in this unconstitutional and unstatesmanlike measure was that, for the sake of that narrow-minded species of Reform which aimed at the removal of anomalies because they were anomalies, and not because they were abuses; it proposed to disfranchise altogether the representation of property. That was a point which the Government had never fairly met. As to the fitness or unfitness of the agricultural labourer to have a vote, he would first say that what he said on the subject in the House he would be prepared to repeat before his constituents; and the very individuals best fitted to possess the suffrage would be the first to understand and to appreciate and accept his reasons. He was perfectly willing to admit that there were many hundreds and thousands, if they liked, in his own constituency, of agricultural labourers who were as well fitted as himself to have a vote—many perhaps better fitted—but they were still in a minute minority, and their votes would be swamped and neutralized by the overwhelming majority of the voters who were not capable of properly exercising the franchise. The enormous majority of the new class of voters, as hon. Gentlemen opposite must confess, would for a long time be swayed by petty interests and by small crotchets. They would be at the mercy of agitators of a superior class—individuals, no doubt, well educated, but influenced by unworthy considerations. Such individuals were now counting on this same mallable ignorance as valuable Party capital, and were eagerly expecting the consignment to their agitation manufacturing of the new law-voting material, relying on their skill and power to direct and guide, and, at no distant date, win the mob-moved machinery of manhood suffrage. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade told the House the other day that it was always opportune to do good things. That was a beautiful copybook principle, which he should like the right hon. Gentleman to remember and act upon by withdrawing those grossly unjust charges which he made in connection with his Merchant Shipping Bill. He believed the right hon. Gentleman had stated that manhood suffrage was also a just thing; and he would like to know how it was that he reconciled its exception from the category of those good things which it was never inopportune to do, and whether, like the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War, he kept one set of principles for his theories in the Provinces, and another and different set of principles for his practice in the Metropolis? The bulk of the hon. Gentlemen opposite had not yet been educated up to the higher standard of manhood suffrage, but they could still understand their great feeling for a considerable extension of the franchise. The recent elections in York, West Somersetshire, and Cambridge-shire had done very little to lessen their anxiety to efface the present electorate, whose growing political knowledge was showing itself so exceedingly inconvenient. As to the desire for the franchise among the lower classes, he said deliberately that there was no such feeling in favour of it among the classes for whom it was pretended that the measure was introduced. He did not mean to refer to outrages and other violent demonstrations, nor did he wish to add to the retorts that had been bandied from side to side in the House with regard to the significance of the Leeds Conference. He did not care to discuss whether that Conference meant anything more than that a concourse of delegates showed a natural pleasure in spending a week in a beautiful Yorkshire town, and in listening to a speech from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, when his oratory had it all its own way, when his eloquence was not hampered or somewhat distracted by an attempt to answer the unanswerable speech of the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John

Manners). What he wanted to ask was, had they found a desire for an extension of the franchise in the rural districts? For his own part, he would say that there was a perfect apathy in the rural districts in respect of it. The only feeling evinced on this question was in the big towns, and there, absurdly enough, it was redistribution that was wanted, and not county enfranchisement in itself at all. A proper scheme of redistribution with a considerable extension of the borough boundaries would have fulfilled all their present requirements, and would have met with hearty co-operation and support on the Conservative side of the House. When former Reform measures were introduced there was a distinct requirement for the franchise, an intelligent demand that would have brooked no continual denial—a demand that had its foundation in its justice and its root in the reasonableness and rectitude of its claim. There was no such demand for the franchise at the present moment, and for this reason, that the class proposed to be enfranchised was already amply represented. He would not say that every individual of those classes was represented, but the classes themselves were represented, and as far as individuals went he would say that it was fortunate indeed that they had not been able to bring to bear, in all their overwhelming weight of numbers, their crude intelligence and all their changeful impulses of capricious ignorance. Would hon. Members opposite venture to compare the capability of the class now to be enfranchised with the average capabilities of those who already exercised it? Did they think them equal to that class in political knowledge, in honest conviction, in independence of thought; or did they deny that by this untimely experiment they were further lowering and pulling down that average, that they were increasing the influence of the least capable stratum of political life, and letting loose on the field of politics a flood of ignorance and selfish and unreasoning prejudice? The Government in their foreign policy had got one motto, and a most fatal one—"Too Late." In domestic legislation they had got another and a very different, but as fatal a one—"Too Early." In some 10 or 15 years' time some such measure as this might have been introduced with general advantage to the nation

at large. At this moment it would be done without advantage, and it would not be done without risk. Hon. Members opposite might possibly have had their attention called to an anecdote that appeared in the papers some time ago in a letter from a tutor of some College at Oxford, in which he related how he was travelling in the North with some miners. He mentioned in the course of his conversation with them the subject of the franchise, and he asked one of them what he would do with the franchise. The man said—"I don't know. If they are giving away these votes I would as soon have them as anybody else. But I'll tell you what my mates say they will do. They will vote for a general smash." He thought that the ignorance which made that feeling at all possible did undoubtedly exist among the class for whom Henry George was lecturing, and amongst whom his economic absurdities found an appreciative audience, and he thought that ought to be taken into consideration before in so light-hearted a manner they proceeded to abolish their old system of class representation by the addition of 66 per cent to the electorate—of 2,000,000 fresh voters chosen from among the less educated and intelligent class of the people. It was absolutely pitiable to see the Members of the Government standing at the Table last week one after another arguing in favour of the severance of the schemes for redistribution and extension, and then during the same week to see a Cabinet Minister counterfeiting surprise and indignation at the very idea of being asked to do such an unheard-of thing as separating a measure for the relief of local taxation from an embryo, vague, shadowy, elementary scheme of county government. If he might briefly illustrate this point, he would use another medical simile. There was a class of medicines which consisted of two powders dissolved in water, and which, when intended for remedial use, were mixed together, and when thus mixed formed a valuable and beneficial remedy of an effervescing nature. Separate, however, these two powders, and administer first one and then the other, and the result was of an extremely distressing and, indeed, alarming character. He offered that illustration as the briefest and most commonplace example he could think of, of the manner in which what as a whole might be valuable and beneficial, might become actually detrimental and deleterious in its separated and disconnected parts. It was useless, however, to bring forward arguments which Members opposite refused to meet. Their real arguments took the practical form of Irish bribes. Their real reasons were reliance in their majority. Their logic was the logic of the Lobbies and the strength of the Divisions. In conclusion, he would make an appeal to Members representing county constituencies. They had been elected by a class which not only in after dinner oratory in their country districts were termed by conventional flatterers the backbone of the nation, but which was very generally recognized to be one of the most important component parts of the British nation; and he would ask hon. Members who had been elected by that class, on the condition that they would maintain its interests and represent its views, not now to allow those interests to be impaired and those views to be obscured by that vast upheaval from beneath which was to mark the new geologic period in the political history of the land. He would appeal to them alike as a point of duty and a point of honour to unite in resisting to the uttermost of their power the present preposterous piece of premature and patchwork legislation.

MR. WOODALL said, he was indebted to the hon. Member who had just spoken for having summarized tersely the policy of the Opposition. He had stated that the policy of Her Majesty's Government must either be too late or too early in its action, and that it would be extremely difficult to please the Opposition by any course which the Government might have taken on this particular question. Having carefully followed the speeches that had been delivered in support of the Amendment of the noble Lord, it appeared to him that, in the main, they very fully confirmed the wisdom of the course which the Government had adopted on this matter. There had been a certain affectation of support to the general phraseology of the Amendment. In the main, however, there had been a good deal of make-believe about the support, and there had been an always ill-concealed aversion to enfranchisement in any form whatever. While the Opposition had thus refrained from directly opposing the enfranchisement of those at present outside the bounds of the Constitution, they had not hesitated to give arguments which would seem logically to justify that course. The right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Robert Peel) on the previous evening said that the class to be enfranchised was the most ignorant and certainly the most inexperienced class in the country. In saying that he only further accentuated the argument of the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), who said that the class about to be enfranchised contrasted unfavourably with those persons who were entitled to receive the suffrage under the Act of 1867. He emphasized the contrast by stating that those who were within the borough suffrage were men, generally speaking, trained by experience of a practical kind under municipal institutions—that they were men who had a familiarity with the conduct of benefit societies and trade unions, and who were therefore fitted by their experience for the exercise of the functions devolving upon them. It seemed to him an extraordinary thing that hon. Members with the large experience of the hon. Gentlemen opposite should overlook the fact that there were at the present moment outside the Parliamentary boroughs of this country a very large and important body of persons, possessing the municipal franchise, who were intimately connected with local boards of health, and who had a large experience in urban and rural sanitary affairs—persons, in fact, having qualifications and experience very difficult for him to distinguish from those possessed by the electors in the Parliamentary boroughs. The hon. Gentleman opposite spoke with some pride of the county with which he was connected. He seemed to be unaware of the great industrial districts in his county and the neighbouring one of Lancashire. He would mention, as instances, the important towns of Keighley, Accrington, and Crewe. In the last-named town there was, perhaps, the most intelligent class of trained artisans to be found in any part of the country, and they were at present entirely without the franchise. Then, again, the House was familiar with the example of this great and ever-extending Metropolis, with its suburban towns, like Croydon, Stratford, and others, and to which the same remark applied with greater force. The right hon. Baronet opposite complained that no reason had been given to the House to justify the necessity for the introduction of this measure. He and many other speakers who opposed the Bill seemed to hold the opinion that there was some reason for complaint that there had been no outside clamour to force the question on the attention of Parliament—that there had been no loud knocking at the door such as they had been familiar with on former occasions. That appeared to him to be one of the strongest reasons that could be urged in support of the Bill, in that Parliament was able to address itself to a serious Constitutional question in conditions of tranquillity which ought to lead to a wise and satisfactory settlement of it. The present state of the public mind was a testimony to the growth of a legitimate confidence by the great masses of the people, in the adoption of an orderly and Constitutional remedy for the grievances which they sought to have remedied, and the claims which they had a right to urge. It had been said that the occasion for bringing forward the Bill was not opportune; but that objection was mainly urged by a Party in the House who held that no occasion could be opportune for a measure of the kind. He hoped a Dissolution would not happen before the whole question was settled; but, even if that should happen, he saw no reason why the newly-enfranchised electors should not have a voice in the question of redistribution of political power, or why hon. Members opposite should object to an appeal which might result in their being called upon themselves to define a scheme of redistribution for the constituencies which they claimed to have so largely under their care. The fundamental principle of the Bill, as it was described by the Prime Minister, was to give a vote to every householder; but there was no provision that the franchise should be given to such householders if they happened to be women. They had heard a good deal in the course of the debate of a certain "Old Woman of Warwickshire," and he thought there was something to be said on behalf of that old woman. By an excellent and ingenious device in this measure, a vote would be given, not merely to the poorest householder and ratepayer, but even to the herd and other servants whose rent was included in the weekly wage. It did seem to him rather hard lines that the "Old Woman of Warwickshire" should have to contemplate the enfranchisement of her farm labourer, of her herd, of her meanest servant, while she herself—one of 20,000 similarly situated—should be unenfranchised. The case of the woman landowner was even harder, for, according to a Parliamentary Return, one in every seven landowners was a woman. At present, women having the qualification for the vote exercised every form of local voting. They gave votes for Town Councils, for Local Boards, and for Boards of Guardians, and could not only vote for but actually sit on School Boards. They were, nevertheless, debarred from exercising the Parliamentary suffrage. Why this should be so he entirely failed to see. No argument that could be held to justify the exercise of these local franchises could fail also to make good their claim to the Parliamentary franchise. They eminently satisfied one of the fundamental conditions of this Bill. They were "capable citizens." It was idle in these days to talk of finality, but this measure did appear to him to have in it the elements of completeness to a much larger extent than any previous measure; and he proposed in Committee to submit an Amendment to the House, which, if adopted, would realize the declared intention of the Prime Minister. He would not anticipate the arguments he would then have to address to the House; but he hoped they would be commended to the House in a reasonable spirit, and would be received in that spirit on both sides. He knew the Prime Minister had deprecated the proposal he (Mr. Woodall) intended to make, and as one of the most devoted and loyal of his followers he felt a difficulty in pressing anything that might, in the smallest degree, be contrary to the express wish of the right hon. Gentleman. All he asked was that, seeing this question was one upon which a decided majority of the Liberal Party had already declared themselves, and seeing that it had attracted a large amount of sympathy from other parts of the House, the right hon. Gentleman would so far meet the wishes of the House as, at any rate, rate to leave it an open question. If the measure were passed in the form he would suggest, he felt certain that it would, for a long time, be accepted by the country as a settlement of this important issue, upon a logical and reasonable and sound basis. If his Amendment were omitted, it must be obvious that the House would have to deal again with a still unsettled franchise.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: After what has passed earlier in the evening, I must begin by explaining that, though I speak from the Table, I was driven to take refuge on the Front Bench by stress of misfortune four years since, when I found that to keep my old familiar place below the Gangway I should have to contend not with one, but two whole Parties. The only place under the Crown I have ever enjoyed was one of which the profits were nothing—Steward of the Manor of Northstead. I can assure the House that I have listened with great interest to the speech of my hon. Friend who has just spoken; but, before I proceed to the main question, I may assure him that I am prepared to stand—metaphorically, of course—before the cannon's mouth, to prevent the "Old Woman of Warwickshire" from obtaining the franchise. But to come to the Bill itself, I occupy a somewhat unusual position towards the question of Reform, for I voted impartially against both the Reform Bill of 1866 and that of 1867, and I see nothing in what has since occurred to make me regret my action. I shall be told that it was no great risk for a Member to do this who sat for a constituency which, with such fine taste, the hon. Member for Aylesbury described as one of country clergymen and non-resident M.A.'s. But, at the time, I had no prospect of a University seat, and I voted against the Reform Bills, as representing that very constituency which the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken now adorns. As Member for Stoke I was willing to imperil my Parliamentary future for what I believed to be political truth, for I was satisfied neither with the Bill of the present Prime Minister nor with that of Lord Beaconsfield. I remember how, in 1866, our tables groaned with pamphlets, especially with those by the late Mr. Dudley Baxter, a gentleman of great industry and some ability, demonstrating how fatally the additional voters introduced by that measure would dislocate the balance of property and voting power; and how again, in 1867, our tables groaned with fresh pamphlets by Mr. Dudley Baxter, demonstrating that the far more wholesale lowering of that year, the more prodigious separation of property and voting, would restore the equilibrium to the franchise. Mr. Baxter's arguments had told on me in 1866, but I did not think the sequel of 1867 equally cogent nor absolutely consistent. The 17 years which have since elapsed do not find me convinced that I was mistaken. In 1874, indeed, many Members on this side began exclaiming that, after all, 1867 had been a very fine time. I thought on and kept silent; and I observe that since 1880 my Friends have also been silent. What do we find by experience to have been the action on political progress of the borough franchise created in 1867? I will only criticize it in one respect, but that is a point on which there cannot be a sincere difference of opinion. Under that enlarged franchise, supplemented as it has been by secret voting, the oscillations of public opinion are more sudden, more unexpected, more violent, more uncontrolled than in former times; 1874 and 1880 equally prove this. It may be urged on the other side that this difference proves that the present electorate has a finer and a readier touch than the former one, and that this characteristic would be intensified by the present Bill. I cannot, however, believe that unexpectedness can conduce to wise or moderate government. It must be unhealthy that such surprises should be possible, and the evil will be intensified when 2,000,000 of voters have with a light heart been shot upon the country—like coals down a cellar. I will assume that the chances may be even that the present Bill should produce a strong Tory or a strong Liberal Parliament; but under either alternative I cannot trust its results, or look on it with any pleasure. I object to the present scheme because it affects to do a most delicate job in a most unworkmanlike manner. Here I am brought face to face with the favourite argument on the other side, the argument which appeals ad invidiam, and which, for want of a better name, I may call the "mad-dog argument," for it is merely used to give opponents a bad name. If I mention it, it is to repudiate the imputation that those who oppose the measure do so because they dislike and mistrust their poorer neighbours. That assertion, for it is no argument, is the language of tyranny masquerading in the form of liberty, and the spirit which dictates it is reactionary and retrograde. I venture to say for myself that, in the two parts of England where I have a foothold, I have devoted much time, much trouble, much outlay to the moral, the social, the intellectual, and the material advancement of those members of the labouring classes for whom I have a responsibility. It is as their friend, and as knowing something of the state of our country districts, that I contest the benefit of bestowing the franchise on these labourers. What is their present condition?—for with that present condition the present debate need only concern itself. I praise them for self-denial, family affections, industry, and love of their country. I grant them every virtue in the world, except the virtues of political forethought and grasp of the relations of public questions. Their condition of living is antipathetic to these faculties. The world to them is bounded by the horizon on which they gaze every day; the village in which they live is the chief place on the globe. The politics which interest them are petty disputes about wages, the events of haymaking and harvesting, and the election of the officers of the village club. Perhaps hon. Members will say that such experiences are a school of political learning, and that the goose club is the pathway to the larger arena of the House of Commons. I protest against the crude recklessness of introducing these 2,000,000 of inexperienced voters into the electorate, for by mere mechanical force of numbers they must swamp and overwhelm all other interests in the country. If all the old women in the country who held the same position as the "Old Woman of Warwickshire" were admitted to the franchise, and every conceivable fancy franchise added, they would muster as an insignificant troop beside the legions of enfranchised agricultural labourers. By way of political education these new voters are to be fed on feverish stimulants like the speech of the President of the Board of Trade, as to which I shall only say that never from the Treasury Bench, under any provocation, have I heard language more incendiary, clothing statements more misleading. The allegation that the poor man had found his commons robbed because he had had no vote, wilfully distorted facts; but what are we to say to the charge heaped upon this, that his endowments had also been robbed? No one knows better than the right hon. Gentleman himself that if there is a colourable pretext for, or a shred of distorted truth in, the charge, it is to be found in that which everyone has looked upon as a crowning administrative exploit of the Party to which he (the President of the Board of Trade) belongs—the Endowed Schools Act of 1869, passed by the right hon. Member for Bradford, under which many small endowments, bread doles, clothing gifts, and so forth, have been diverted to higher uses and made serviceable for education. The diversion may in some cases have been a harsh proceeding, but in others it has undoubtedly been beneficial. But to raise the cry of robbery over it, to prop up a democratic revolution, required the audacity of the President of the Board of Trade. Some advocates of this measure try to stop our mouths with the assertion that the enfranchisement of the labourer is a matter of right and justice about which there could no longer be any controversy. That word "right" is an ambiguous and misleading term. I cannot understand how anyone who does not accept universal suffrage as a principle can speak of the concession of any power to the agricultural or any other class as a right. The least limit put to it evacuates the idea of right. Either the principle of universal suffrage must be recognized, and then the present Bill itself is a halting half measure, or practical men must acknowledge that the suffrage is a means to an end, a trust confided to the voter by the superior power, the State, and liable to be dealt with by that power for the benefit of that which is superior to any number of voters—namely, the entire commonwealth itself. Until universal suffrage is recognized as a good in itself this argument of right must, I say, break down. Having regard to the want of education among our rustics, I declare this Bill to be a most rash and ill-considered measure; but I am prepared to answer the question whether I consider that the agricultural labourers ought to have any share in the government of the country. They certainly ought to have a proportionate one, and they have it, inasmuch as in large numbers they are voters in the agricultural boroughs with large areas, such as East Retford, Eye, New Shoreham, Horsham, Wilton, Aylesbury, Rye, Much Wenlock, Cricklade, and the curtilages of other boroughs. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for War had the courage the other night to declare that the loyal population of Ireland would be represented by Members for English and Scotch constituencies. This was indirect representation with a vengeance in all its nakedness, and it would ill become the noble Lord, at all events, to deny that the agricultural labourers of England were represented in a far more direct, real, and complete way by the agricultural boroughs. This indiscriminate enfranchisement, in view of a dark Bill for redistribution which may be passed in this Parliament or in the next Parliament by the Liberals, by the Tories, or by the Mahdi, is playing fast and loose with politics. It is not forethought, it is not patriotism, and I vote against it as a gambling and scrambling attempt of the Government to clutch at the power which is slipping out of their grasp.

MR. STANSFELD said, he belonged to the class of ex-Cabinet Ministers proscribed by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel); but, having regard to the infrequency of his speeches, he hoped the House would pardon him for engaging its attention. He would not on this occasion occupy the time of the House on the subject which had been referred to by his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke (Mr. Woodall); but when his hon. Friend moved his Amendment in favour of including women householders, he knew of no consideration which would induce him to falter in supporting it. It had been said on one side of the House that this debate was unreal and languid. On the other the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had said that the country was apathetic, and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Huntingdon had asked for some indication of excitement. Opposition speakers had referred to the insincerity of the Government. That charge might be true or not; but it was the character of the measure, not the character of the Government, that they had to consider at present. The right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire had said that the action of the Government on this subject was more like the device of an election agent than the policy of a political Party. Well, they on the Ministerial side of the House said that the position taken up by the Conservative Party was a half-hearted position. Many brave and big words were uttered; but the Conservative Party did not traverse the justice or wisdom of this measure, and did not traverse its opportuneness. The assertion made amounted to this—"Because we do not trust the Government we will not consider this Bill until we know the whole mind of the Government on another question—that of redistribution." Therefore it was that the debate had assumed an air of unreality. As to the charge of insincerity brought against the Government, he had yet to learn that it was any discredit to a Government to desire to redeem its pledges—not hasty pledges as had been said, but the deliberate and frequently repeated pledges made at the last General Election. He ventured to say that if the Government had not brought in this Bill this Session, which was the last available one in the present Parliament for the purpose, they would have found a spirit of distrust and rebellion on the Radical Benches which would have been more serious and certainly more painful than any opposition they were likely to encounter from the other side of the House. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Huntingdon objected to this Bill because it would admit 2,000,000 of what he styled the most ignorant and most inexperienced of the population to an absolute control over the machinery of government. Among those 2,000,000 it would be difficult to find one single man so ignorant as to endorse the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman; and he would appeal to hon. Members on the Benches opposite who passed the Reform Act of 1867, and ask them whether experience had not shown as a fact that a generous extension of the franchise to a large mass of the population did not swamp and extinguish the votes of those who previously possessed it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) was in favour of some extension, if not of the extension proposed in the Bill; but whatever extension he sanctioned he refused to grant it in equal measure to the Sister Isle. He could not imagine—among all the impotent and foolish schemes of Reform that had been proposed he confessed he could not imagine—any scheme so devoid of all political foresight as a scheme of partial advance coupled with a refusal to give Ireland the benefit of that advance. The right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) made no precise objection to the extension of the principle of household suffrage from the boroughs to the counties; but he argued in favour of some principle of proportional representation for the protection of minorities, and he was especially strong upon the necessity of extending some such provision to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman entirely failed to show the House why that was less possible under the present proceeding than under the Amendment of the noble Lord. If they passed the Franchise Bill, simply extending the principle of household suffrage from the towns to the counties, he could not see why the postponement of the question of redistribution should be considered an evil. Upon the Amendment hon. Members opposite were committed to nothing at all. It had been stated that the country was apathetic on this question—and certainly it was not in a condition of excitement—but he could explain the reason, and it was this—that the extension of household suffrage was an absolutely foregone conclusion. It was simply a question of time from the day when the Reform Act of 1867 passed, when the Conservative Party established the principle in the boroughs of the country; and now that the other great Party in the State had taken up that principle, and applied it to the country at large, and had nailed its colours to the mast and declared that it would stand or fall by it, it was useless to take up a position of hostility towards a movement which, within a limited time, must gain its object. He did not blame the Conservative Party for their opposition. The fact was, no political Party could afford to leave such a measure and the manipulation of redistribution in the hands of its opponents. That was the plain English of it. The Conservative Party must oppose it, and he would be ungrateful as a Party man if he wished otherwise. Their opposition did nothing but good to the cause of Reform, to the extension of the franchise, and to the enactment of a large redistribution scheme. If that opposition increased, the apathy of the country would be turned into enthusiasm in its favour. It was said that whatever might occur in that House the Lords would throw it out. If he cared only for the Bill, for the Government, or for his Party, he should not wish it any other fate. The Franchise Bill was safe, and nothing would so certainly help the Liberal Party towards a large redistribution scheme as the determination of the House of Lords to throw out the Bill. As far as the Government were concerned, they had determined to sever the questions of enfranchisement and redistribution for two reasons. In the first place, they desired to prevent defeat by simple discussion and delay. If Her Majesty's Government had united a scheme of redistribution to the present one, not only would other measures have been fatally impeded, but that very complex measure would have found its death in the delays of debate and discussion. Surely, whether hon. Members liked it or not, the Government had a right so to arrange their measures as to give themselves a chance of passing them within the Session. But, besides this, the Government had a right to secure to themselves the advantage that a clear issue should be put before the House and the country. That could not have been done in the case of a complex measure; but now, when the Amendment was defeated, the second reading would have to be voted on, and it would be seen whether the Conservatives voted against the second reading or not. But it was argued that the House parted with a portion of its power of controlling the redistribution question by passing the franchise portion. That was a very favourite argument, and he thought there was a good deal in it; but as the increased knowledge the House would obtain would enable them to deal in a more thorough fashion with the redistribution scheme, what, he would ask, was the power referred to which they might lose? Not the power to enlarge, but the power to minimize and to maim. He must correct

a statement he had just made. He said the House parted with a portion of its power; but he should have said the Opposition. It was a perfectly sound argument among the Opposition, but it could have no effect upon those Members who sat on the Ministerial side. Undoubtedly in the case of a great and complicated measure the Government must make some sacrifice in order to pass it, and the Government would have had to make sacrifices with regard to the Redistribution Clauses. If they had had the two parts in one, they would have had an inefficient, and therefore not a lasting redistribution scheme. Many entertained a strong objection to this measure on account of its inclusion of Ireland. That inclusion had been defended by, among others, his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), who pointed out that we had only three courses in dealing with Ireland—equality, subjection, or separation. There were two unanswerable arguments for including Ireland in the Bill. The first was the reason or argument of necessity. He fearlessly asserted that neither the present Government nor any Administration which proposed a measure for the extension of the franchise would venture with any prospect of success to make any difference between the case of Ireland and that of Great Britain itself. Again, could we give anything less than justice to Ireland? It was conceivable that the Government might have proposed a simply Irish measure bringing up the suffrage in Ireland to the present condition of the suffrage in England. That, indeed, would be justice; but he had only to mention such a scheme in order to show its absurdity. Justice must precede reconciliation. The old policy of dealing with Ireland was absolutely condemned. It was dead or dying, and could not be revived. Therefore the new policy was simply inevitable. He saw no inconsistency in extending the franchise in a country where the ordinary Constitutional rights of citizens were limited by exceptional Acts of Parliament. Those Acts limited rights which had been abused, whereas the right of the franchise was incapable of abuse if it were freely exercised. If nine-tenths, or even 99-100ths of the population of Ireland were Parnellite, practical statesmen, knowing the strength of the representative principle, ought not merely to consent, but even to desire, that they should be represented in that House. He firmly believed that the policy of equality between Ireland and England constituted our only chance in the future of harmonizing the two countries. It was impossible to exaggerate the seriousness of the Irish question. Even if they had not wanted such a Reform Bill for English purposes, they ought to have invented it for the sake of extending it to Ireland, for he contended that the extension of household suffrage to Ireland was a positive and absolute good. We had no right to attempt to limit Constitutional agitation in that country, for it was the right of every citizen to speak, to petition, and to agitate for whatever object an Act of Parliament could secure. There were two causes of Irish discontent. The old cause had sprung from race, social, religious, and economic differences, and the oppression of centuries. First we conquered, then we starved, then we oppressed, and then we ignored the Irish population. They multiplied in their poverty as the poor alone multiplied. They emigrated in their need, and then came the new cause of difficulty and danger, the Nemesis. They founded a new Ireland across the Atlantic, larger, richer, more powerful than themselves. From that Ireland had come back to the mother Ireland the sinews and some of the most dangerous, though not only the most dangerous, counsels of war. There was, nevertheless, to his mind, one rift in the clouds—one streak of light, and he hoped it might prove the harbinger of a brighter day. It was this. Emigrated Ireland had learned one lesson in the United States. She had learned to understand and to respect the rights of majorities to govern, and the power of a Government based upon the popular vote. He said—"Present to her these conditions. Adopt the policy of the Government which is to do so. Present to her the popular vote in local and Imperial concerns." By such measures, and such only, this country would do more than by any other measures to disarm violence and to appease the old rancours. By bringing Ireland upon the floor of that House, and by compelling almost the action of Irish Parties to become less violent and more Constitutional than it had been in the past, they would eventually be able to dispense with Coercion Acts, and all the mischievous consequences which followed from their enactment. The two populations would agree in a broader patriotism in place of that narrow and antagonistic patriotism which we ourselves forced into the minds of the Irish population; and the result would be a real Act of Union which would unite the two peoples, respecting each other's individualities and each other's rights, into one Imperial bond for our common safety and our common interest.

MR. MARRIOTT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Marriott.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the understanding was that the debate should adjourn at an early hour of the evening, but that the hour had not yet been reached.

MR. HICKS said, that the understanding was that the debate should be adjourned at 11 o'clock, to allow other Business to come on. It was then 10 minutes to 11 o'clock, and the hon. Member for Brighton had moved the adjournment. Did the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary think—did any hon. Member on either side of the House think—that the hon. Member for Brighton could finish in 10 minutes? If not, it would be a breach of the contract to allow him to commence his speech, well knowing he could not finish by the time agreed upon. He should vote for the adjournment.

MR. THOMAS COLLINS said, that the right hon. Member who had just sat down had spoken for 40 minutes, and there was no reason to suppose that the hon. Member for Brighton would speak for a shorter time. It would be a violation of the understanding to which the Government had been a party if the debate were not now adjourned.

Question put, and negatived.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. MARRIOTT rose to continue the debate amid cries of "Order!" and "Spoke!"

MR. HOPWOOD: I rise to Order. I would submit to your ruling, Sir, whether the hon. Member has not already exhausted his right to speak? The hon. Member moved the adjournment of the debate, which has been carried against him; therefore he has spoken, and has no right to speak again.

MR. RAIKES: Upon the point of Order, I wish to ask you, Sir, whether it has ever been ruled, when an hon. Member has moved the adjournment of the debate, and that Motion has been negatived without a Division, that he has lost his right to speak? I know that it was ruled on a former occasion, by Mr. Speaker Denison, that a Member who had moved the adjournment of the debate and had been defeated on a Division was precluded from afterwards addressing the House upon the main subject of the debate. But I wish to ask you, Sir, if there is any precedent for excluding a Member from addressing the House because he has moved the adjournment and then acquiesced in that Motion being negatived?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I should like to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, who, I presume, was present in the House at an earlier portion of the evening—[Cries of "Order!"]

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (SIR ARTHUR OTWAY): Do I understand that the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) wishes to put a question to me upon a point of Order? If he does he is in possession of the House.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I was endeavouring to bring to your mind, by means of a question to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary—[Cries of "Order!"—]if I might be allowed to do so without the disorderly interruptions of hon. Members opposite, who are anxious, I presume, to prove their Radicalism—I was endeavouring, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as you did not seem ready at that particular moment to answer the question of Order put to you by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), to bring to the mind of the Home Secretary that the question of Order had arisen in consequence of the pledge given by the Government in an earlier part of the evening, which pledge has been violated.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (SIR ARTHUR OTWAY): That is not a question of Order. With regard to the questions put to me by the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), I have to say that I do not think the question of a Division having taken place is of any material importance with regard to the decision on the point of Order. I do not think that the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott) has precluded himself from speaking. I call upon Mr. Marriott.

MR. ONSLOW: I rise to a point of Order. I wish to ask you, Sir, whether, in your place as Chairman of Ways and Means, or as Deputy Speaker, you have ever known an instance when the Government has given a pledge—[Cries of "Order!"]

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (Sir ARTHUR OTWAY): The hon. Member is not raising a question of Order, and I call upon Mr. Marriott.

MR. MARRIOTT said, he was very sorry that the right hon. and learned Gentleman who represented Her Majesty's Government on the present occasion had not allowed the adjournment at the hour desired by the great majority of the House. [Several hon. MEMBERS: Promised!] [MR. WARTON: It is only spite!] Even if he made a speech of less than the ordinary length, the time would be exceeded. There were a number of Members present who wished to share the education debate. He could only apologize to them; but it would be seen that it was not his fault that they were kept waiting, but the fault of the Government, which they unfortunately trusted. He was afraid that this was only part and parcel of a good deal of the conduct of the Government. The Government were now asking the confidence of the House with regard to that Bill and to redistribution. But they had always found that when they had put confidence in the Government that confidence was misplaced. It was misplaced on the present occasion, and would be misplaced again. It might be that it was his stupidity—[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

—well, he knew that hon. Gentlemen opposite had a high opinion of themselves and of their own ability; but he was going to remark that it was difficult to say whether the last speaker was replying to arguments from his own side, or to arguments from the Opposition side of the House. The right hon. Gentleman tried to combat the opinion that the debate was unreal; but the opinion that it was unreal was expressed by the President of the Board of Trade. If there were any unreality in the Opposition, it arose in the unreality of the advance by the Government. The whole of the debate was more like a sham than a real fight, and no practical results were to be expected from it. He did not mean any disrespect to the Home Secretary when he said that the Government had fired off their biggest guns—the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for War, and the President of the Board of Trade. There had been speeches, and speeches from two ex-Ministers—the late Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright), and the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster). The late Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was a man who had obtained a position on the Reform Question throughout the whole country and the world, and it was his (Mr. Marriott's) good fortune to listen to him with attention, when others appeared to listen to him spellbound under his power, so that you could have heard the dropping of a pin; but that was when he had a real interest and felt strongly on the question of Reform. The recent speech of the right hon. Gentleman fell rapidly, in spite of the right hon. Gentleman's proverbial eloquence, and it was evident the true reason was that the heart of the right hon. Gentleman was not in the cause he was advocating. One did not expect much earnestness from the right hon. Gentleman the junior Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain); but there was a touch of nature and of real feeling in his reference to what he called the "absurd, ridiculous, and irritating minority vote," after which he naturally fell foul of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill). Then the right hon. Gentleman—who was seldom present when he was attacked—left the House, called away by urgent business, or probably to enjoy a cigar in the Smoking Room. However, the noble Lord was not going to stand for Birmingham in the hope of being returned by the minority vote. [Cries of "Question!"] He believed that he was strictly confining himself to the Question. He was referring to what the right hon. Gentleman said about the minority vote, and it was not the minority vote the noble Lord looked to. He expected to be returned for Birmingham by the vote of the majority. He (Mr. Marriott) was not a prophet, and he was not going to speak with certainty of the result of the next election contest at Birmingham; but he might say that the odds in favour of the noble Lord being returned by that constituency had risen very considerably since the speech of the President of the Board of Trade. [Cries of "Question!"] Why did not hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial Benches cry "Question!" when the speech which he was answering was made? The President of the Board of Trade did not allude to the Amendment before the House, but assumed that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House were opposed to the county franchise. That was a convenient assumption to make. The question was not whether the household franchise was a good or bad thing, and ought to be extended to the counties. The household franchise was conferred upon towns by the Conservative Party; and, therefore, objections to that principle were not likely to come from the Opposition side of the House. The whole point depended upon redistribution; and what the House and the country wanted to know was, how redistribution was going to be manipulated—for manipulated it would be by the present Government—not for the benefit of the country, but for the benefit of those who now happened to be in Office. Hon. Members who had spoken from the Ministerial Benches had urged the House to pass the Bill because the Government were pledged to it. He contended that neither the Prime Minister nor the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War had pledged themselves in their last election addresses upon the subject of the county franchise. The Government had not selected this particular time for bringing in the Bill because of any pledges which they were supposed to have made at the General Election; but they had introduced the measure simply to cover their retreat, and to hide from the country the enormous and ghastly mistakes which they had made in other matters—their mistakes with regard to Ireland, with regard to South Africa, and especially with regard to Egypt. The Members of the Government would be more than human if they did not try to hide from the country the gross mistakes which they had made with regard to their Egyptian policy. So great were those mistakes that, up to the present time, they had never afforded an opportunity to the House to debate the question upon its real merits. Every debate upon it had been on a side issue, upon a Motion for Adjournment. [Cries of "Question!"] He knew that it was a disagreeable question—a question which had brought shame upon the Government, and upon the nation which they misgoverned; and because they had made such mistakes they brought forward one part of this shameless Bill, hiding from the country the most important part. The Government, during the course of their existence, had undoubtedly carried one point—namely, the Clôture, which was never used; and now, when any remarks were made which they did not like, they shouted "Question!" He could sympathize with the Government in their desire to go to the country upon any other issue than that of Egypt. The Prime Minister well knew that the Government tried to shirk the Bradlaugh difficulty, and by shirking it wasted hours and days. They were now trying to shirk the question of redistribution, and they themselves had acknowledged that redistribution was the real difficulty with which they had to deal. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were very fond of listening to words which came from that side of the House; but he would read a quotation from the speech of a right hon. Gentleman who sat on the other side of the House with regard to redistribution, which explained what was thought of redistribution some years ago. They were the words of the Prime Minister himself, who, in dealing with the question of the franchise in 1867, said—[Interruption.] Perhaps the House would listen to the words of the Prime Minister. If the right hon. Gentleman was on that side of the House he had no doubt they would not. The words of the Prime Minister in 1867 were true words, and might have had almost a prophetic reference to what was taking place now. The right hon. Gentleman said that—"In the battle of the franchise there is hovering on the flank an awful phantom. It is yeleft 'the redistribution of seats.' This hobgoblin decided the battle and slew the Ministry in 1866. It may decide more battles, and it may slay more Ministries."

These were the words used by the Prime Minister in 1867; and he could well understand how, with this hobgoblin before his eyes, and knowing how, in times past, it had decided battles and slain Ministries, he had now adopted that prudence which was the better part of valour, and had decided to bring before the House, not the question of redistribution, but to fight the battle of the franchise alone. He (Mr. Marriott) did not think that the country would be taken in by any such transparent device. He was happy to say that the country, through the labours of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), whose scheme for education had now had play for 14 years, notwithstanding that that scheme was opposed by the Radical Party, were now able to decide a question of this nature for themselves. The voters read the newspapers, and knew what was going on. He, therefore, thought they would thoroughly understand this transparent device of Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had expressed a hope that the Opposition would not fear the people, but would rather trust them. It was not that side of the House that feared the people. They did not object to an appeal to the people at once. He was speaking of what he felt certain was the opinion of every hon. and right hon. Gentleman who sat on that side of the House, when he said the sooner an appeal was made to the people the more satisfied they would be. It was hon. Members opposite who feared the people, and when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, with a real feeling of sympathy for those who sat on his right, suggested that if the Bill were thrown out by the House of Lords that would be no reason for a Dissolution, the suggestion was received with a hearty cheer by hon. Gentlemen who began to see that they might, perhaps, have a few months' longer possession of their seats, and that they were not about to be banished to obscurity all at once, but that they might still have a little time before them yet. He could assure hon. and right hon. Gentlemen that it was not that side of the House that feared an appeal to the people. As to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, he was always posing as the friend of the people. That was the particular character he liked to display before the public. According to himself, he was the Joseph Arch of the agricultural labourer, the Plimsoll of the merchant seaman, and the Bradlaugh of the anti-pensioner. In fact, he was the admirable Crichton of all the revolutionary classes. He meant no disrespect to the right hon. Gentleman; but the right hon. Gentleman reminded him of a certain class of mad doctors who did not trust their patients when they went to visit them, but always took care that they wore strait waistcoats. So the right hon. Gentleman never faced the people boldly; he only went to see them when they had been thoroughly drilled and properly fitted with a strait waistcoat prepared for them at Birmingham. He was not aware that the right hon. Gentleman had ever faced a real public meeting. Every meeting he went to was arranged by his friend Mr. Schnadhorst, and the persons he generally had in his pay. When the Constitutionalists held meetings, they were genuine public meetings, at which they were brought face to face with the people, and they did not care to put in force all the complicated machinery resorted to by their opponents before the people were brought into their presence. As he had said, he did not think it was that side of the House that had anything to fear from an appeal to the people. It was those who were perpetually flattering the people, who made them fair promises which they could never fulfil, and who were trying to excite the masses against other classes above them. Those were the men who had cause to fear a Dissolution. He could only say—and he said it with all seriousness—that a more reprehensible charge was never made in that House, or anywhere else, by a Cabinet Minister than that by which the President of the Board of Trade attempted to excite the people of the country when he applied the term "robbers" to the landowners. He thought the right hon. Gentleman was very injudicious in making a comparison between the manufacturers and the landowners of the country. Hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House were not fond of bringing charges against particular classes. To his mind, there was nothing more cowardly than to bring serious charges against a whole class of individuals, whether landowners, shipowners, or Members of the House of Lords. When a charge was brought against an individual, that individual could meet it; but when a charge was brought against a class, it was very difficult to meet it, because no particular instance was referred to. The right hon. Gentleman did not make a charge against an individual, but against a class; and if he meant what he said, the charge he preferred against a body of men was a most serious charge indeed. There were many landowners on the other side of the House sitting by the side of the right hon. Gentleman when he made the charge; and he (Mr. Marriott) would like to know in their inmost hearts what they, his own Colleagues sitting with him in the Cabinet, thought of the charge he made against them. He (Mr. Marriott) was of opinion that it was a great mistake to contrast the comparative merits of the manufacturers with those of the landowners. There might be landowners who had inclosed commons—landowners who had taken land sometimes which did not belong to them; and there might have been manufacturers who had equally robbed the people they employed. There had been going about the country of late a gentleman called Mr. Henry George, who was connected with an Association in this country termed the Democratic Federation. In the view of Mr. George, and of that Association, every manufacturer and every capitalist was a robber, and every monopolist was a robber, and the manufacturers of Birmingham were pointed to as the chief robbers of all. If manufacturers brought a charge of robbery against the landowners they would find that the charge would recoil against themselves with increased force and vigour. As a matter of fact, the landowners made no charge against the manufacturers, nor against any other class; but they were quite prepared to say that they did, as a rule, provide better cottages for their labourers, and attended more to the comfort of the men they employed, than the manufacturers. The reason was a simple one; it was because they knew the people better. They lived in villages in which the landowners had possessed property for generations, and the latter had taken great interest in them; whereas in the manufacturing towns the labourer went to a mill and went away again without anything being known of him. Therefore, if a comparison were made between the two sets of employers, it would be found that the landowners paid far more attention to the condition of the labourers than the manufacturers did to the condition and well-being of the men they employed. Such an attack as that which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman upon the landowners was unworthy of a great debate like this, and ought never to have been preferred by a Cabinet Minister. He was perfectly certain that he was not only speaking the sentiments of hon. Members on that side of the House, but also the sentiments of a great many Members on the other side of the House, if they only dared to say so, when he said that they strongly reprehended the language which had been used from the Front Treasury Bench with regard to a large number of persons who were represented on both sides of the House. Before the speech of the right hon. Gentleman on Thursday, he did not think the House had any great cause for trusting Her Majesty's Government in connection with the Redistribution Bill; but since that speech had been delivered they had still less cause, because they knew that if such a speech was listened to with silent acquiescence by those who sat beside the right hon. Gentleman they would be prepared to acquiesce in his views still further, until he became, as he was now, practically the Leader of the Ministerial Party; and the Redistribution Bill would be framed upon the lines which he laid down, and then the Radical Party, who wished to rule the country despotically, would obtain the power they desired to have.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Broadhurst),—put, and agreed to.

Debate further adjourned till Thursday.

MOTIONS.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAY (PARK RAILWAY AND PARLIAMENT STREET IMPROVEMENT) BILL.

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made and Question proposed,

"That Sir James M'Garel-Hogg be a Member of the Select Committee on the Metropolitan Railway (Park Railway and Parliament Street Improvement) Bill."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

MR. SHEIL said, he rose to a point of Order.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (Sir ARTHUR OTWAY): Does the hon. Member object to the Motion?

MR. SHEIL: Yes; on the ground that it is not proposed to appoint a single Irish Member upon the Committee.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (Sir ARTHUR OTWAY): The hon. Member must object to the names as they are called.

MR. SHEIL said, he proposed to move the adjournment of the debate. He presumed that the first Motion made would be a Motion for the nomination of the Committee.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (Sir ARTHUR OTWAY): The hon. Member would not be in Order at present in moving the adjournment of the debate. No question of debate has yet arisen in the House.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he wished to ask what was the exact Question before the House?

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (Sir ARTHUR OTWAY): The Question is, "That Sir James M'Garel-Hogg be a Member of the Select Committee on the Metropolitan Railway (Park Railway and Parliament Street Improvement) Bill."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he had not heard the Question put that a Select Committee be nominated.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (Sir ARTHUR OTWAY): Does the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Sheil) propose some other name?

MR. SHEIL: No; I propose to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. SEXTON wished to point out, on the question of Order, that this was the first occasion of nominating this Committee. He wanted to know whether, when a Question of nominating a Committee was put to the House, it was not open for his hon. Friend to move the adjournment of the debate?

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (Sir ARTHUR OTWAY): The hon. Member is under a misapprehension as to the facts of the case. The Motion has already been made for the appointment of the Committee, and I have now proceeded to call the names. The Motion has already been agreed to that a certain number of Members be named upon the Committee by the House, and a certain number by the Committee of Selection. The only Question now to consider is the names of the Members to be nominated by the House. The name I have called is that of Sir James M'Garel-Hogg.

MR. SHEIL said, he thought he was entitled upon that name to move the adjournment of the debate. The Committee was a very important one, and could not be nominated at that hour after the promise which had been made that all other Business after 11 o'clock should be postponed in order to enable the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) to bring forward his Motion. He might briefly say that he should object to the name of Sir James M'Garel-Hogg, not on any personal grounds, but because he wished to raise the question of the desirability of appointing some Irish Member upon the Committee. One reason why he did this was that the right hon. Gentleman who had undertaken to move the appointment of the Committee was not in his place.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the hon. Member was mistaken.

MR. SHEIL remarked, that, at any rate, the right hon. Gentleman had assigned no reason at all for moving these particular names; and on that ground he (Mr. Sheil) would move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. HEALY seconded the Motion, and asked the First Commissioner of Works to withdraw the nomination of this Committee for the present, in order that the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) might bring forward the important Motion of which he had given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Sheil.)

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE expressed the hope that the House would allow the Committee to be nominated. He would have no objection to alter the constitution of the Committee, so as to include some Irish Members.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he wished to point out to the First Commissioner of Works that he did not appear to be acquainted with what had already taken place in respect to this matter. The right hon. Gentleman said that after the Committee was nominated he would be willing to alter its constitution; but the right hon. Gentleman had no power to alter the constitution of a Committee. The House had already agreed that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, five of the Members of which were to be nominated by the House, and four by the Committee of Selection. The First Commissioner of Works said that if the House would kindly agree to the five names now proposed he would undertake to alter the constitution of the Committee. But the right hon. Gentleman was evidently ignorant of the Forms of the House, which would not allow the constitution of a Committee to be altered after the names had been agreed to. The right hon. Gentleman was, therefore, altogether misleading the House. Under these circumstances, seeing the total ignorance of the First Commissioner of Works, who was the responsible Minister in charge of this Private Bill, and upon whom the Bill depended, and whose connection with it was very much to be deprecated, he thought the adjournment of the debate was an eminently proper course for the House to adopt. The question to be put before the Committee raised questions of immense engineering importance; and, with the exception of the name of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James M'Garel-Hogg), there was not another hon. Member proposed by the Committee who could claim in any way to be an authority on the various scientific questions which must be raised before the Committee. He thought the Committee was about as bad a Committee as the noble Lord the Member for Flintshire (Lord Richard Grosvenor) could have selected. Under these circumstances, and considering the extremely inaccurate and ignorant statement which had been made to the House by the First Commissioner of Works, and considering the composition of the Committee, he hoped the House would not allow this most important Bill to be dealt with in this extremely slipshod way.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the noble Lord had lectured his right hon. Friend on his ignorance of the Forms of the House; but he must say that, in the statement made by the noble

Lord, he (Lord Randolph Churchill) had exhibited an extraordinary want of acquaintance with the usual and common practice of the House. It had happened over and over again that exception was taken to the names proposed upon a Committee, and especially to the omission of names which it was thought desirable to add. That was a most common practice, and the noble Lord, who had been more than a year or two in the House, ought to be fully aware of it. Only the other day objection was taken to the fact that there was no Scotch Member appointed upon a certain Committee. What took place upon that occasion? He asked hon. Gentlemen from Scotland to agree to the names on the Paper, with the understanding that if they chose subsequently to move to add the names of Scotch Members he would consent to the proposal. Everybody knew that the common practice in that case was to move to increase the number of the Committee, and then to add other names. That was exactly the proposal which his right hon. Friend had made in this instance. Hon. Members from Ireland desired to have a Member on the Committee. If they would allow the Motion, as it stood, to be passed, as was done the other night, there would be no objection, at a subsequent period, to add an Irish Member to the Committee. Instead of being in ignorance of the practice of the House, his right hon. Friend had acted entirely in accordance with that practice. [LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: No!] He begged leave to differ from the noble Lord. It was precisely the same course as that which was taken the other night in reference to the addition of Scotch Members. His right hon. Friend, however, would do whatever the Irish Members desired; he would either adjourn the debate, or follow the course taken the other night in reference to adding the name of a Scotch Member. He thought it would be more in accordance with the practice of the House to pass the names as they now stood, with the understanding that a Member for Ireland should subsequently be added.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he did not see how the course suggested by the Home Secretary would save the time of the House. If it was decided that there should be an alteration proposed in the constitution of the Committee with the view of meeting the wishes of Members from Ireland, surely it would be better to adjourn the debate now, and hereafter bring forward a proposition of a more complete character.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he was quite ready to take that course.

MR. RAIKES said, he thought the Home Secretary had fallen into the same error as the First Commissioner of Works. He (Mr. Raikes) had not been able very clearly to grasp the precise point to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman's remarks were addressed, because it appeared to him that there was a confusion between two propositions. First of all, the right hon. Gentleman took it that the First Commissioner proposed that the thing should be done at once by a stroke of the pen, and then the right hon. Gentleman changed his note and spoke of its being done on a future occasion. He (Mr. Raikes) wished the House clearly to understand that the proposal which had been made by the First Commissioner of Works was one that could only be carried into effect by varying the original Resolution by the introduction of a subsequent alteration. Therefore, if hon. Members were desirous that the debate should be adjourned in order that they might see whether it was desirable to vary the original Resolution of the House, it appeared to him that they were perfectly within their right in asking and pressing that demand upon the House. If they were to add the name of any Gentleman from Ireland who might have won the good graces of Her Majesty's Government it could only be done at that moment by omitting one of the names now upon the Paper. He, therefore, trusted that if the question was to receive the attention which this matter deserved, they would be allowed to adjourn the debate now in order that it might come up for more discussion when the House met to discuss it.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, that all hon. Members should agree to the Resolution.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

THE EDUCATION CODE.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON, who had given Notice of his intention to move the following Resolution:—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, in respect to the Education Code now lying on the Table of this House, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to direct that regulations shall be made so as to secure the following objects, that is to say:—
1. That scholars under seven years of age shall not be presented for examination individually, but by class; 2. That greater liberty than at present shall be given to managers and teachers to classify children according to their acquirements and abilities; 3. That a larger share of the Government Grant shall depend upon attendance, and a smaller upon individual examination; 4. That the Government Grant shall not be affected by the withdrawal of ten per centum of the scholars from examination at the discretion of the managers," said, that he intended to move the Resolution with some consideration for the state of health of Mr. Deputy Speaker; therefore, he should not enter into any technical arguments, and he should compress within narrowest limits what he had to say. He did not intend to move No. 4 of the Resolutions he had placed upon the Paper. He understood it might be ruled out of Order; and, though he did not agree that it was out of Order, he did not intend to argue the point. The basis of his Motion was that over-pressure existed, and ought no longer to exist, in the elementary schools in England. That was the substance of the matter upon which hon. Members would be asked to vote that night—namely, whether over-pressure should continue, or whether it should be abolished once and for ever. The Resolution was intended to contain, and did contain, no censure whatever upon the Government, or upon the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council. In fact, he believed, if the Vice President were to tell them his honest opinion, the right hon. Gentleman would say that he would be very much pleased if the Resolution were carried, that it would strengthen his hands, and that it would enable him to mend the path he was beginning to pursue with firmer steps and without looking back. He (Mr. Stanley Leighton) brought, if this were the time or the proper opportunity, overwhelming evidence to prove the existence of over-pressure; but he did not intend to trouble the House with that evidence, and he asked them to accept from him the fact, which he said with the conscious conviction of the responsibility it entailed, that over-pressure existed in our schools, and would continue to exist under the Code now lying on the Table of the House, which was actually killing the children and killing the teachers. He could prove this from documents in the possession of the right hon. Gentleman himself and his Office, which the right hon. Gentleman was afraid to produce, and declared to be confidential. If hon. Members supposed that what he said was merely his own opinion, his answer was this—and he would put it against anything the right hon. Gentleman might say—that 15,000 teachers at a meeting, presided over by Lord Shaftesbury, had declared unanimously that over-pressure existed; that the present Code would not remove over-pressure; and that the only way to remove over-pressure was to accept the very Resolutions which he had embodied in his Motion. He defied the right hon. Gentleman, or any manager, or any member of a School Board in that House, to place his authority against that of 15,000 teachers, who, much better than they did, knew what the effect of the present Code was. He besought the Government not to treat the question as a Party question; he besought them not to make a Party question of it by insisting that the Government Tellers should tell against him on that occasion. He asked them to accept the three first Resolutions, and to allow them to be passed nemine contradicente. If the right hon. Gentleman would not do that, then, of course, he must go to a Division, which would show who were in favour of over-pressure and who were against it. Of this he was sure—that the constituents of every Member in that House would show their gratitude to those who, while over-pressed themselves, were nevertheless determined that they would, as far as they could, prevent the oppression of others. With this simple, general statement of what was contained in the Resolutions, he begged to move the three first as they stood upon the Paper, omitting the fourth. The first provided that scholars under seven years of age should be presented for examination by class, and not individually; the second, that greater liberty should be given for the classification of children; and the third, that the Government grant should depend more largely upon attendance than upon individual examination. He withdrew the fourth, which proposed to provide that the Government grant should not be affected by the withdrawal of 10 per cent of the scholars at the discretion of the managers.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, in respect to the Education Code now lying on the Table of this House, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to direct that regulations shall be made so as to secure the following objects, that is to say:—

- (1.) That scholars under seven years of age shall not be presented for examination individually, but by class;
- (2.) That greater liberty than at present shall be given to managers and teachers to classify children according to their acquirements and abilities;
- (3.) That a larger share of the Government Grant shall depend upon attendance, and a smaller upon individual examination."

—(Mr. Stanley Leighton.)

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR said, he was sure the House would recognize both the motives and the manner in which the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) had brought the question before them. Practically, the hon. Member's Motion was only Resolution No. 3; and he thought the hon. Gentleman had acted with great discretion in omitting the 4th Resolution, which would probably have received very little support from the House. The first two Resolutions were quite unnecessary, for it would be very easy to show that the securities desired by the hon. Member already existed. The substance of those Resolutions formed part of the present Code. He (Sir Lyon Playfair) asked the House to inquire what it was they were about to do? They were asked to pass a series of Resolutions, which might have a very simple and pure meaning in the mind of the hon. Member for North Shropshire; but which, if adopted, he thought he should be able to show the House might have considerable consequences which were not in the mind of the hon. Member. It should be borne in mind that the Code was a Code which had been brought into working order by an experience of 21 years. It had been brought into its present state by consultation among all the Inspectors and persons most interested in education, and every part of it adhered together. It was undesirable, therefore, by a general Resolution, to give a meaning different from that intended by the framers of the Code, for they might dislocate the whole Code and produce consequences which they had not the least intention of producing. Let them see what the 1st Resolution was. The first of these Resolutions stated that scholars under seven years of age should not be presented for examination individually, but by class. But that was what was in the Code now. Children under seven years of age were not examined individually; but the grants were given by a general assessment of the merits of the teaching of juvenile children. An Inspector might say—"I have no evidence, and I do not understand what the merits of the teaching are, unless I take one or two children from the class and hear them read or write. Unless I do that, I shall not know how to judge or form a general opinion of the merits of the class." But there was no individual examination of each of the pupils of the class, as there was in regard to larger children who were above seven years of age. Therefore, the intention of the hon. Member for North Shropshire was entirely secured by the existing Code. It was by a general assessment of merits, and not by the individual examination of the children, that the grant was given. He would ask the House to see what, if the hon. Member's 1st Resolution were adopted, its literal interpretation would be? Its literal interpretation would be, that no Inspector could go to the class, and pick out any child in order to consider him a type of the class, and ascertain whether he could read or write, because the Resolution said there was to be no individual examination; and, consequently, the discretion of the Inspector would be very much hampered. He would be prevented from making a true assessment of the merits of the class. Now, what was the 2nd Resolution? It was that greater liberty than at present should be given to managers and teachers to classify children according to their acquirements and abilities. He wished to point out that managers had the greatest liberty at present to arrange and classify scholars. The First Standard ought to be passed by a child of eight years of age; but any manager might detain a child who was backward in education, having been kept away from school, or having had no means of acquiring education, until he was nine, 10, or 11 years of age. He had power to put such a child in Standard I., and classify him in the lowest Standard. Therefore, the manager had the power at present, and the Code could not prevent him from exercising it. The manager had a perfect right to use that power, and to place the child in Standard I. There was only one thing which prevented mischievous action; and if any hon. Member said that it was not right, then he would be justified in voting for the 2nd Resolution. There was a provision that a boy or girl, having passed in one Standard, should not again be presented in the same Standard, but must be presented in a higher one. It would be absurd to allow a manager who had a child passed in Standard I. to present the same child again next year in the same Standard; and that was the whole interference with the power of the managers in regard to classifying children—namely, that when a child had passed in a lower Standard, on the next examination he must be passed in a higher one. Therefore, those two rules, as they were sketched out in the mind of the hon. Member for North Shropshire, were already in the Code, and it did not require new regulations to enforce them. New regulations might interfere with the work now going on. Then there was the 3rd Resolution moved by the hon. Gentleman, and upon that he (Sir Lyon Playfair) took issue. He contended that the 3rd Resolution was essentially a bad one, and might produce great mischief to education. Indeed, he thought he could convince the hon. Member himself that it would do so; and he hoped to be able to convince the House that it would, if passed, do more to alter the conditions of the labour of young children than anything that could be done if it were not passed. Now, what was that Resolution? It virtually said—"Let us pay more for mere attendance and less for the results of individual examination." Now, who was it that made this demand? The hon. Gentleman said that 15,000 teachers had made the demand. He (Sir Lyon Playfair) doubted whether good teachers made the demand at all. He wished to obtain some information upon the point. He had read all the speeches delivered at the deputations that waited on the Privy Council upon the subject of education; and he had not seen one case in which an educational society, whether denominational or undenominational, a school board, or a body of school managers, had gone to the Privy Council and made this demand. The demand came from the teachers; but he thought he could show that it would not be for the benefit of the teachers to concede it, and it would certainly be to the detriment of the scholars. In the present state of the question, it was the crudest possible way of disposing of the matter to put it upon the teachers. He had the greatest respect for the teachers, and this was simply a crude method of saying—"Give us more of the public money on easier conditions." That was what was asked for in the Resolution, and he invited the House to see how it would operate. The average schools throughout the country received 16*s.* 8*d.* per scholar. How much of that 16*s.* 8*d.* was obtained by individual examinations? It might be supposed that a great proportion of it was obtained in that way; but, on the average, a school only got 6*s.* 8*d.* for individual examination. The rest of the payment was for attendance, and for class subjects such as English and geography, which were not taken by individual examination at all, and the final portion of it was secured by the general merit of the school. Therefore, all the 3rd Resolution would effect would be the sum of 6*s.* 8*d.* given for individual examination, and applicable to the mere elements of education—reading, writing, and arithmetic. The object of the Resolution was to take away, say, 2*s.* from that sum, and to add it to the 4*s.* 6*d.* now given for attendance. In fact, by giving attention to this Resolution the House would take away the great impulse of the teacher, not in regard to larger subjects, such as English and geography, but in reference to the elementary education of young children—the very essentials of education which a child must have—namely, reading, writing, and arithmetic. Was that what the hon. Member intended to do; and if it was, what would be the result? It would,

as he had said, take away a great deal of the impulse from the teacher in teaching the mere elements of education—reading, writing, and arithmetic. Class subjects did not come by individual examination; and the effect would, therefore, be to diminish what they desired to have in the school—namely, good reading, writing, and arithmetic. The consequence of that would be very serious in the eyes of hon. Members opposite, who often complained in that House, and probably with great justice, that the labour tests, as now applied, did not enable children to obtain employment while sufficiently young. This Resolution would largely postpone the time for passing the tests now imposed. At present they were not allowed to employ children who had not passed Standard IV., and in some cases Standard V. was enforced by bye-laws and some Acts; but if they took away the impulse to make the children pass the Standard when young, they might not be able to pass them until they were 12 or 13 years of age. While, therefore, it was desired to liberate the children in order that they might add to the earnings of their families, the House, by passing the Resolution, which they were asked to do, would do that which they did not wish to do—namely, diminish the efficiency of the elementary teaching, and make the poor children lag a long time behind before they would be able to pass the labour test. There might be, though he did not believe it, some interest to the teachers in the proposed change; but it was certainly hostile to the interests of the children. The State, which had imposed the labour test on children, was bound to see that it should press upon families as lightly as possible. He had tried to convince the House that, with the best intentions in the world, the hon. Member was not justified in proposing these Resolutions. The first two were in the Code already, and, therefore, the insertion of them in a different form of words would only injure the Code and produce difficulties. The 3rd Resolution would not do what the hon. Member intended in regard to over-pressure, because, if there was over-pressure at all, it was in the higher subjects, and not upon the mere elementary education—reading, writing, and arithmetic. He thought the hon. Member was wise in not having attempted to raise a debate upon over-pressure. He (Sir Lyon Playfair) could only say, from his own experience, that he had seen the Code and watched its operation during the 21 years it had existed. There had been continued attempts to modify and remove the evils of over-pressure, and no Code had been so satisfactory in that respect as the present one. The Code very largely removed the danger by giving to the schoolmaster an excuse in almost every direction he might desire. He could make an allowance with regard to the children on account of illness, on account of inevitable absence, and for mental or bodily defects. The schoolmaster was entitled to make an allowance on all those matters, in order that a boy should come up for examination without detriment to the grant to the school; and, as a matter of fact, there never was a Code which could be less the subject of attack on account of over-pressure than the Code now under consideration. He would not, however, discuss that question, as he had no doubt there would be full discussion upon it hereafter. He was quite satisfied that the hon. Member, when he considered the effect of his Resolutions, would see that they would not carry out the object he had in view. He was quite sure it would not be of benefit to good teachers, and he was equally certain that it was not for the benefit of the State that any indifferent teachers should be withdrawn from that control which the House of Commons and the Education Department had hitherto exercised over the £3,000,000 of public money which was now annually voted for education.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, that the regard he had for the health of Mr. Deputy Speaker would prevent him from entering into anything like a prolonged debate; and he felt bound to express his regret that the question had not been reached at an earlier period of the evening. The House was now in this position—that instead of commencing the debate at 11 they had not commenced it until after 12 o'clock; and they were, consequently, much hampered in discussing it. In his opinion—and he knew he spoke the feeling of the entire House—they were extremely unwilling to do anything that would subject the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair, on any account, to personal inconvenience.

He felt himself called upon to take exception to the speech which had just been addressed to the House by the right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair). These Resolutions were asked for not only by the 15,000 teachers to whom reference had been made, but by the great majority of the managers of the elementary schools throughout the country. In point of fact, there was a general consensus of opinion among the teachers and managers who were thoroughly and practically acquainted with all the details of the matter, and assuredly there was much to be said for that which they demanded. He would very shortly deal with the three points raised by the Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House told them there was nothing in the first point, as to undue pressure on scholars under seven years of age, because the Inspectors had met and consulted together, and because it was the intention of the Education Code that the children should not be so presented for separate examination. That might be the intention of the Code; but that intention was certainly not expressed in it. [SIR LYON PLAYFAIR: Yes; in Article 116.] The right hon. Gentleman said the intention was expressed in Article 116. That was one of the difficulties hon. Members were met with at that moment. The Code had only been recently laid on the Table; it was full of minute and intricate detail; but, on reference to it, he certainly failed to see anything in Article 116 which affected the question, or in any way justified the contention of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman said that the First Standard ought to be passed by every child of eight years. The whole system of the present Education Code was to regard all the children of the nation as so many feet pounds of engineering science. But the intellectual abilities of children could not be so defined. There were differences between the town and rural children. For instance, with regard to the possibility of attending school their positions were very different. In the case of thickly-populated districts, the school was generally within a few hundred yards or so of the place where the children lived, and everyone of them, therefore, could easily attend; but in rural districts the child had to go miles to school, in all seasons of the year, and sometimes under circumstances attended with the greatest difficulty. The right hon. Gentleman said that all that the Education Code laid down was that the managers had no right to put a child into a lower Standard who had once passed a higher Standard. Now, that was the great ground of complaint. Children, by over-pressure, were forced to present themselves for examinations, which possibly by good luck they might scrape through, and were then put into a Standard for which they were unfitted, and for which their mental capacities might be unequal. But having scraped through a certain Standard in one school, and subsequently being transferred to another school, the manager of the latter, instead of placing the child in his proper position, was unable to do so, because the child had been forced into a higher Standard than he was fitted for in another school. If he believed for a moment that the 3rd clause of the Resolution of his hon. Friend would have the effect of removing the impulse to teachers of getting their children through the elementary stages of reading, writing, and arithmetic, he would not for one moment think of voting for the Resolution; but he believed there was no ground whatever for the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman that this impulse would be destroyed. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that the teachers and manager had no interest in developing the intellects of the children under their charge, and seeing that they were taught in the best possible way during the limited number of years they were to remain in the elementary schools? Surely the right hon. Gentleman could not mean that, and therefore he (Mr. R. H. Paget) said he had no right to make an assertion of the kind unsupported either by facts or argument. The right hon. Gentleman assumed that it was a matter of the greatest ease—that all the children who had passed through the early Standards in reading, writing, and arithmetic, had done so without any difficulty whatever. But he (Mr. R. H. Paget) knew, by the admission of those who had had opportunities of forming an intelligent opinion on the subject, that the Arithmetical Standards were so high that they were clearly above the average intelligence of the children as a whole who attended the elementary schools. He was told that if they took the average of those who passed through the schools it would be found that the Arithmetical Standard, as at present fixed, was too high to be demanded as a necessity of the whole class of children who passed through the schools. In conclusion, he said that his hon. Friend who had brought forward this Motion deserved the thanks of the House. The question of over-pressure was one which was gradually ripening in the opinion of the public, and it was to that question that the Resolutions which had been brought forward were chiefly directed. The proposal of his hon. Friend for dealing with the over-pressure of which intelligent teachers universally complained appeared to him perfectly reasonable, and he trusted it would be acceded to. He believed that the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education was himself ready to lend a willing ear to the suggestions made to him in the interests of education; he believed he was the last man to do anything unreasonable; but the Department over which he presided had rules and precedents, and his hope was, nevertheless, that the right hon. Gentleman would have the hardihood to tear himself away from the rigid rules of the Department, and accede to the very reasonable proposals which had been put forward.

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I may state at once that I entirely agree with the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) on one point—namely, that the question of education is one which, above all others, ought not to be made a political question, but dealt with as one affecting the intellectual and physical welfare of the children of the nation. It is a question in which every Member of this House ought to be interested; and we ought, therefore, one and all of us, to be ready to do anything which shall tend to the improvement and preservation of the health of the children from whatever side of the House the proposal may come. Now, the hon. Gentleman, in moving his Resolution, has given an example of a rather inconvenient practice—namely, of moving a Resolution without advancing any reasons in support of it; whereas it is incumbent upon me in my reply to find some reasons for differing with him. In the first place, I must point out that both the hon. Members who have spoken in favour of this Resolution have in their minds not the present Code, which we have to consider, but the Code of the last 10 years. The hon. Member who has just spoken can, I think, hardly have read the present Code, because he spoke of cast-iron rules, and of the children being expected to pass all the Standards at one time. Sir, there is not one word in the Code which justifies that statement. On the contrary, we have swept away—we have entirely abolished—the age clauses of the former Code: age is scarcely mentioned in the Code, and even where it is mentioned, there is the greatest amount of elasticity associated with it. It does seem to me, therefore, that hon. Members who have put forward and supported this Resolution are placing on this Code the sins of its predecessors. Now, I have no hesitation in declaring that the first two objects set forth in the terms of the Resolution are perfectly reasonable, and that I quite agree with them. But, Sir, it was expressly to accomplish those objects that we revised the Code. The former Code required children to be classified according to age, and also to be individually examined; whereas we have abolished the age clause, and determined that children under seven should not be examined individually. The instructions to Inspectors have been laid upon the Table; and I think the House will perceive from them that an Inspector who should examine the children individually would be acting contrary to those instructions. I will not say that this has never been the case, but it is contrary to the instructions; and if managers will make us acquainted with cases of the kind they will find the Department ready at once to deal with them, although, as hon. Members will be aware, it is no easy thing to bring into conformity with a revised practice the practice of those who, for 20 years, have been a law unto themselves. The House will see, under Article 106 of the Code, that the grant for infant schools would be computed on the average attendance—

“And not, as heretofore, on the number of children presented at the examination. . . . The children above six, however, should be individually examined.”

That was the position last year; and the directions to the Inspectors were now, that a sufficient number of children above six should be examined to satisfy them that the necessary conditions have been fulfilled. Does the hon. Member mean to say that the Inspector is to judge of a child without asking it to open its mouth; is not the child to point out letters on a card; or, in short, to be examined at all? What would be the use of Inspectors under such circumstances?

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I complain that three-fourths of the children presented at examinations are to be examined individually.

MR. MUNDELLA: Where does it say so?

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: It is in the instructions to the Inspectors on page 4.

MR. MUNDELLA: Exactly. But that only applies to upper schools. We began last year by saying that only children above six years of age should be examined individually. We have put a Code on the Table much more elastic; and we are resolved this year to give exact expression to the wishes of the hon. Member. As stated in his first Resolution—namely, that children up to seven years shall not be presented for individual examination, but shall be examined by class. What can be more reasonable than that concession? And it is a concession on our part, because it was in our minds before these Resolutions were brought forward. In the interest alike of public economy and of the children themselves, the Department wants to get rid of this system of individual examination of children under seven years of age. Having reduced individual examination last year, I pledge myself to this House that not only shall there be instructions given that the individual examination of children under seven years of age should cease, but I will insist on these instructions being carried out; and will repress, as far as possible, any attempts which may be made to break through them. Then let me say something upon the second part of this question. I quite agree that children who enter the schools should be classified according to their abilities. But, Sir, is not that already the case? I have visited a hundred schools within the last six months, and I can affirm that if the children of any particular Standard are asked to stand out, that Standard will be represented by children of various ages; there will be a certain number of 10, 11, 12, and 13 years of age. How, then, can hon. Members come down to the House and say that there is a cast-iron rule by which children are bound down to one Standard? We have provided an abundance of excuses, in order to enable teachers to withhold from examination, or not to put in the higher Standards, scholars who are obviously, intellectually and physically, deficient; and, again, if a scholar has failed in two subjects, or twice in one subject, he may be re-presented in the same Standard. Surely hon. Gentlemen do not want more than that; they cannot desire that children should be presented over and over again. I want to know what the parents would say if that were done? I have promised the House I will not detain it long. I hope there will be other and better opportunities than this for hon. Gentlemen to bring forward not only the present question, but also the question of over-pressure. I should like to have the last-named subject discussed, as the Education Department have taken precautions to guard against the evils which are dreaded—precautions which have never been taken before, and which may fall more seriously on the Treasury than hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House may be disposed to allow. I come now to the third provision in the Motion—

The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stanley Leighton) proposes to change the incidence of the grant. Now, is it really reasonable, considering how large is the proportion of the grant now given for average attendance, to demand that a still larger proportion shall be given for merely having the children driven into the schools? We must remember that we are no longer under the voluntary system, under which children are very often brought to the schools by something like missionary effort on the part of the school managers. The compulsory system has taken the place of the voluntary, and children are now forced to enter the schools under a penalty for disobedience. It is necessary to give every inducement we can to teachers to instruct the children well. The hon. Gentleman has quoted the grant to infant schools. It is only fair to say to hon. Members who are interested in small schools that, in the change made this year, I have done everything I could to take care of those establishments. The large schools I have always felt can now take care of themselves; it is the small ones in the rural districts that form the difficulty, and I have increased the grant to them, giving them now 9s. a-head, in order to encourage them. This increase, however, is not given for individual examinations. The 9s. per head is to be paid on average attendance only, and 5s. 6d. is to be awarded for the general merit and efficiency of the school. Not one farthing is to be given for individual examination, and no more than that 14s. 6d. is given in the case of any infant schools in the country. My right hon. Friend (Sir Lyon Playfair) has said that 16s. 2d. is the grant for higher schools. That is the calculation which the right hon. Gentleman has made; but I am afraid the grant will come out this year more like 16s. 6d., 4s. 6d. being given for attendance, 3s. for singing and class subjects, 2s. for merit dependent on efficiency, not on passing at all, and 7s., out of the total, for individual examinations in reading, writing, and arithmetic. If we are to reverse that order of things, and give 7s. for attendance, instead of 4s. 6d., and 4s. 6d. for individual examinations in reading, writing, and arithmetic, we shall be doing everything we possibly can to discourage the children in that standard of work which is the first essential to them in enabling them to pass from half to full time labour. I think I have given the House all the information I can on this subject. I should be very glad if the hon. Gentleman, on the Education Estimates or on some other occasion, would take an opportunity of bringing before the House the question of over-pressure. With regard to the fourth recommendation—

if the hon. Member means to move it, I shall be glad to discuss it; but I will say this—that not one of the 15,000 school teachers who have been quoted, not a single school board out of the 3,000 in the country, and none of the Educational Societies—such as the National and the British and Foreign—have asked the Education Department for the change.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I presented a Petition from some of those the right hon. Gentleman has named only yesterday.

MR. MUNDELLA: I am not aware of that fact. Was it addressed to the Education Department?

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Yes.

MR. MUNDELLA: At any rate, so far as I am aware, from not one of the Educational Societies of the country, and from not one of the school managers, have we had any Petition or Memorial in favour of such changes as the hon. Member advocates. I trust the House will not, in a matter of this grave importance, endeavour, for the first time for 20 years, to disarrange the Education Code, which hangs together in all its branches, and to settle not only the amount of the grant, but the incidence of it by an act of the House. Before sitting down, I should like to make just one more remark, and it is this. I am sure, if there had been anything in the proposals of the hon. Gentleman, they would have found the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) in his place to support them. It is very significant that the noble Lord is not present. The noble Lord has had experience at the Education Department, and has always discussed these matters in a fair and straightforward manner in the House; and there can be no doubt that we should have seen him in his place had it not been for the fact that he knew the Resolutions, the third particularly, to be fraught with danger, and therefore to be such as he could not support.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he owed an apology to the House, and a special apology to the Deputy Speaker, with whom the House must feel great sympathy in the trying circumstances under which he was presiding over the House, for intruding any remarks of his at this time. The fault that he rose at this late hour, however, was not his; and he would remind the House that it had been understood that the debate was to begin, as nearly as possible, at 11 o'clock. It was owing to circumstances, over which they on the Opposition side of the House had no control, that the debate did not begin until 12 o'clock; however, he would not waste further time by following that point up. The intentions of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mundella) in the matter of the Education Code were, no doubt, excellent; but it was a pity his action was not so excellent as his intention. The right hon. Gentleman told them he was going to do what the hon. Member for North Shropshire asked the House to ask him to do; and, that being the case, the House might as well adopt the Motion.

MR. MUNDELLA: I said it would be done in the Code by instructions to the Inspectors.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he trusted the instructions to the Inspectors would be observed this year better than they were last; because, if the House would bear with him for a few minutes, he would be able to show that these officials had acted in a manner directly contrary to the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman said they ought to have acted. One of the Inspectors in June last, at a large meeting of school teachers and managers, said—"With regard to infants"—and the House would remember they were talking about infants—

"Every child in the six-year old class would be examined individually, and would be expected to write all the letters, large and small, to read two easy primers, to add numbers from one to 20 mentally, and to subtract numbers from one to 10 mentally. They ought also to have regular lessons in form, colour, and on familiar objects—vegetable, animal, and mineral. Below this age the work should be preparatory, and for those under four"— remember, he was reading the words of an Inspector—

"he thought they should be taught to speak English."

He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman had a child of his own under four; but if he had, all he (Mr. J. G. Talbot) could say was, the right hon. Gentleman must have forgotten the circumstances when he read these remarks, if it had not caused him to change his opinion.

MR. MUNDELLA: What is the name of that Inspector?

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he was referring to what had fallen from Mr. Rooper, Inspector of one of the Yorkshire districts. The Inspector had used those words in his private capacity—that was to say, when not, at the moment, acting under instructions. The instructions given last summer were in Circular 212 (Instructions to Her Majesty's Inspectors). In them it was stated—

“The children apparently above six should, however, be individually examined, and a sufficient number of the others to satisfy you that the elements of reading, writing, and arithmetic are properly taught.”

[“Hear, hear!”] He was sorry to hear Liberal Members cheer such a sentiment as that. He hoped the cheer would be confined to the Liberals, however—that no Conservatives wished children under the age of six to be separately and individually examined. All he could say was, that if hon. Gentlemen would go into the crowded districts of this great city and examine the sort of children under the age of six who were brought into the Board and other schools, or go to Manchester and Liverpool and see the children under the age of six who were subjected to individual examination—[Laughter.]

Mr. MUNDELLA: Nothing of the kind.

Mr. J. G. TALBOT said, that if hon. Members could only see the children who were examined in this way they would find nothing in it to laugh at. The instructions issued to the Inspectors last year were that a sufficient number of children under the age of six should be examined to show the Inspectors that the elements of reading, writing, and arithmetic were properly taught. [Mr. MUNDELLA: No.] And the instructions also said—

“When not less than three-fourths pass the individual examination well, the mark ‘good’ should be awarded.”

Although there was nothing in the Code, or in the Instructions, with reference to the classification of children by age, it was well-known that many Inspectors had a distinct syllabus for children above three, above four, above five, and above six respectively. Liberal Members were ready that these poor, unfortunate children of three, four, and five years should be individually examined. [“No, no!”] Yes, that was so; in order that Her Majesty's Inspectors might be satisfied that the elements of reading, writing, and arithmetic were properly taught to them. [A laugh.] Hon. Gentlemen laughed—he said, again, that that laughter came from only one side of the House. The mark “good” was to depend on whether three-fourths of the children in infant schools passed the individual examination. He did not want to labour this matter further. If the House were not satisfied with what he had read, nothing, he was sure, that he could say would satisfy them. The right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair), who was not now in his place, had, in defending the conduct of the Education Department, said that the unfortunate children were not examined individually. How could the right hon. Gentleman know that the children were not examined individually? All he (Mr. J. G. Talbot) knew was that last summer these instructions were issued to Inspectors. It might be that it was the intention of the Vice President that children under six years of age should not be subjected to individual examination in the time to come; but what he (Mr. J. G. Talbot) wished to say that night was that hon. Members were so dissatisfied with the way the matter had been managed hitherto that the House of Commons should say that there should not be a repetition of the old state of things. They feared the right hon. Gentleman would not be able to have his good intentions carried out. As to the request made in the second section of the Motion, the right hon. Gentleman told them that that was practically done at the present moment. Well, no doubt the right hon. Gentleman wished it might be done; but, as a matter of fact, it was not done. The children were forced up from Standard to Standard, independent of their attainments and fitness for promotion. He appealed to Gentlemen who had children themselves how they would like those children to be pushed up from form to form in the public schools to which they were sent, whether they were fit for it or not? The teachers, it might be said, would take care that no harm came to the children in this matter; but he asked the House of Commons to do for the poor children of the country what well-to-do parents did for their own children. The third part of the Motion asked—

“That a larger share of the Government grant shall depend upon attendance, and a smaller upon individual examinations.”

They knew that 4s. 6d. was the only fixed grant that depended upon attendance, and they asked that that should be increased. Why did they ask it? Because up to this time it was found that the extra pressure put on children had largely resulted from the teachers having been running a race, as it were, one against the other to obtain high results of teaching. What hon. Members wanted was that the main object, the main reward, which was given by the State to the schools should be given for the hum-drum which did not make a bright show in the public eye, but which was the real, sound substratum on which education should be based. He and his Friends had felt that in discussing this matter at this hour, and under these conditions, they were under the greatest possible disadvantage, because it was impossible for them to urge all the arguments they might wish to urge. If the right hon. Gentleman meant what he said, that he was going to meet hon. Members by due instructions to the Inspectors, and by carrying out those excellent intentions he had expressed in his speech—which he had put into words, but which had not been hitherto put into action—

MR. MUNDELLA: They are in the Code.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he wanted to see them somewhere else, because Inspectors hitherto had not acted on the instructions contained in the Code. The hon. Member for Cornwall (Mr. Acland), he saw, had the Code in his hand, and no doubt he was satisfied that Her Majesty's Inspectors would act on it. He (Mr. J. G. Talbot), however, could not have the same confidence in the matter as his hon. Friend. He wished to see in black and white that the Inspectors, in the future, should not act on their own whim and fancy; but should be bound by a Resolution of the House of Commons, expressed in the very moderate terms of the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Shropshire.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am not going to detain the House more than one or two minutes. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down says it makes very little difference whether this is in the Code or not. I understood the real reason why we have the debate under difficult circumstances so late at night, and without the possibility of the subject being thoroughly examined into, to be because it was thought desirable that the House should express an opinion which would alter the Code. It appears clear that individual examination of children under seven is no longer to be made. Notwithstanding what the hon. Gentleman has said about his desire that no Members on this side should express approval of individual examination of children under seven, I must say this—that I think any Inspector would fail in his duty if he went into an infant school and was to give an opinion of that school without finding from the examination of any of the children how they were taught. That is a very different thing to the individual examination of each child; and I should like to ask, from persons with any experience whatever in education, how the Inspector is to give any notion whether or not any education is given—whether elementary teaching of children under seven is or is not carried on—if he is not to examine any of the children? What is objected to, and I think quite rightly, is the actual examination of each child. If this Motion is accepted, a much more important decision must be made than anything affecting the first of the Resolutions, and that is as regards the third. The third is of immense importance, and it is that a larger share of the Government grant shall depend upon attendance, and that will involve a great change in the expenditure of public money, and, I believe, also a great change in the results, and we ought not to agree to any Resolution of this House without far more reasons than the hon. Member has felt himself able to give to-night. I have never been so much in favour of making the payments of grants depend upon results as some other persons of great experience have been; but the whole tendency for the last few years has been to make the grants depend less on results. We may very well go too far in that direction, and may get back to the state of things existing before the Code was passed. My opinion was that Lord Sherbrooke went too far; but if we do not take care that there is a good deal of individual examination in reading, writing, and arithmetic, we shall get back to a state of things in which the masters must look merely to the clever children, and the great body of the children will not be taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, which is what we most care for. It would be a most serious thing for the House in this hasty manner to assent to this great change. We ought to give the question a great deal more consideration; and hon. Members opposite, quite unintentionally, would find that they were doing great injustice to children, and causing a great waste of public money.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, he should be very glad to make one or two remarks if the House would allow him to proceed. He wished to point out that a larger share was given under the new system for attendance than was given under the old system. When it was remembered that the Code of last year was regarded on all sides as a great concession to the teachers, he was surprised at what was now said, when the Code had been made more indulgent. Reading, writing, and arithmetic were the only three subjects which were paid for on individual examination. It might be possible to give a larger share on the class grant, or on the merit grant; but that would tend to increase, not diminish, the amount of instruction, and so the hon. Member who brought forward this Motion might apprehend an increase of over-pressure. If the Code were altered so as to pay more, independent of examination, the Department would have to take other securities for efficiency in return for public money by increasing the staff and otherwise.

MR. THOMAS COLLINS said, it seemed to him that Resolutions 1 and 2 were perfectly legitimate, because they pledged the House to do nothing whatever except what the right hon. Gentleman said he wished to do. But he had great doubt as to the propriety of the 3rd Resolution.

VISCOUNT EMLYN said, he would appeal to the hon. Member not to press this matter to a Division, for if a Division were taken he should be obliged to vote against the Resolution. So far as this debate had gone, he thought the charges made against their educational system had entirely broken down. No answer had been given to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair), which seemed absolutely to destroy the argument of these Resolutions, especially the third, which was the one the House would have to vote upon. The House was asked to upset the Code on the case presented to the House by the hon. Member; but he would ask those who had listened to the debate whether a case of any sort had been made out for so grave a step as that? It might be that there was over-pressure; but he was not satisfied that the charges had been proved. They might be capable of proof; but they should be clearly proved before the House voted upon them, and upon the showing of the hon. Member himself he had not, on this occasion, had an opportunity of fully stating his case to the House. He wished to press it upon his hon. Friend that no good purpose would be served by voting upon this subject now; and he must, at any rate, vote against the Motion.

MR. THOMAS COLLINS wished to know whether these three Resolutions ought not to be put to the House separately? He could support the 1st and 2nd; but not the 3rd and 4th.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER (Sir ARTHUR OTWAY): The articles of the Resolutions are embodied in the Address to Her Majesty; and, therefore, they need not be put separately.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. STEVENSON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said: I am sure I am expressing the satisfaction of the House at seeing the Speaker sufficiently recovered to be able to preside over our deliberations this day. Considering the limited time allowed for discussion on Wednesdays, I desire to state my case as briefly as possible, consistently with respect to the House and the importance of the subject. The subject is one of growing and deepening interest in the country, and the friends of temperance, and especially many ardent supporters of the Government, will be deeply disappointed if this Parliament comes to an end without legislation on this subject. The time has gone by when it might be urged that this matter is not within the competency of Parliament, which has passed Acts for Scotland, Ireland, and Wales. But even if there had been no such precedents, I should still have submitted this Bill. I have read in the newspaper a letter from a Mr. Ekin, comparing the convictions for drunkenness on Sundays last year in Scotland and in England; and finding that, judged by this test of sobriety, England is now rather more sober than Scotland, the writer draws the astounding inference that if there had been no Sunday Closing Act in Scotland, the Scotch convictions would have been 12½ per cent fewer than they have been. That is a specimen of the absurd logic that is applied to police statistics. I would rather argue that it is the Sunday Closing Act that has brought Scotland up to nearly the level of England, and that a similar Act for England may be expected to raise in like manner the sobriety of England. What has been the improvement in Scotland after 30 years of Sunday closing? I will trouble the House with a comparison drawn from the records of the City of Edinburgh Police of the number of persons who were charged with being drunk and incapable in the streets of Edinburgh on the average of two years—1852 and 1853—before the passing of the Act, and the number in the year 1883. The total yearly cases, including all days of the week, have been reduced from 6,279 to 2,738; the cases on Sundays alone have fallen from 702 to 218; on Mondays alone from 772 to 337; on Saturdays alone from 1,351 to 847; but the effect of the Act on Sunday drinking will be best shown by the cases found between 8 A.M. on Sundays and 8 A.M. on Mondays, which have fallen from 383 to 40. These results, though other causes may have operated, I claim as mainly due to the Sunday Closing Act for Scotland. As to the Irish Act, it is enough to say that it has been followed by a reduced consumption of intoxicating drink of £5,000,000 in five years, and the Government have introduced a Bill to perpetuate the Act, and apply it over the whole country. After only a year's trial it is said that the Act for Wales has failed. I believe it has proved satisfactory in diminishing drunkenness; but it is under the disadvantage of not being accompanied by an Act for England, for the temptation is too strong for some habitual drunkards to cross the Border to obtain the drink that we have by our legislation trained them to become accustomed to. That is all the more a reason for passing the Bill and cutting off the supply of habitual drunkards, by permitting the young henceforward to be trained up without these temptations. It is no wonder that the Sunday school teachers have petitioned in such numbers in favour of the Bill, when they see that the greatest obstacle and hindrance to their self-denying labours is the open public-house on Sunday afternoons. Police statistics only show a small part of the evils of intemperance; they are limited to the cases of disorder in the streets. But for one such case there are 20 cases of drunkenness of which the police have no knowledge, and 100 cases in which the money is wasted in drink which should have gone to the comfort of the home and the clothing, maintenance, and education of the family. Public opinion is ripening rapidly in favour of the Bill. No question so commands the attention and interest of public meetings, and except when these are disturbed by the emissaries of the public-house the opinion is always in favour of the measure. Last year 6,700 Petitions, with 1,800,000 signatures, were presented in favour of Sunday closing, including those in favour of the county Bills; and I maintain that the moral value of such signatures, obtained by the voluntary and self-denying efforts of philanthropic persons, is far greater than the same number obtained in the interests of a trade and appended to Petitions lying on public-house counters. Many hon. Friends of mine have been grumbling at the trouble these Petitions gave them. I have had more than my own share of these Petitions; but the only remedy I can suggest is that this Bill should be passed, for we may depend upon it that this wave of popular demand must go on in volume and force till Sunday closing becomes the law of the land. I am glad to see the Home Secretary in his place; and I can assure him that the best friends of the Government in the country are anxiously looking to see what sympathy and support he will give to the Bill. I hope, at any rate, that individual Members of the Government will be left free to vote to give effect to the views of their constituents on this question. I believe that the three Members for Manchester and the three Members for Liverpool will be found supporting the Bill, and they know what these great communities want. I know that London is the great bugbear; but I will remind the House that Sunday closing began in the Metropolis. By the Act of 1841, public-houses were closed in London from midnight on Saturday till 1 o'clock on Sunday afternoon; and that was found to work so well, that its beneficial effects were recited in the Preamble of an Act passed by Sir George Grey in 1848, to extend the same rule to the whole Kingdom. Therefore, I do not regard it as a very bold proposal to apply Sunday closing to London now. In reference to the Amendment put on the Paper by the hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Talbot), I am at a loss to understand the position he has taken. I presume he is a friend of progressive temperance legislation, and I am quite sure he is not here as an advocate of the interests of "the trade." I would, therefore, appeal to him whether he is right in proposing, as an Amendment, a Motion which, if carried, would practically be fatal to the Bill? Why does he not vote for the second reading, and if the Bill goes too far, let him try to amend it in Committee. As it is, the hon. Member submits only an abstract Resolution. This is not needed. The House, four years ago, adopted, on my motion, a Resolution for Sunday closing, after it had been modified, however, more in the direction of the views of the hon. Member than I approved. On that occasion there were 153 in favour of the Resolution, and 117 against it, and opinion has ripened in the meantime; so that many Members will now vote in favour of the Bill who would not have done so then. Why does the hon. Member not bring in a Bill himself? If a Bill on the lines of this Resolution had been before the House now, instead of my own, I would have voted for the second reading, and have sought to make it stronger in Committee. The hon. Member's Resolution, if embodied in a Bill, would not satisfy public opinion; it would not give complete Sunday closing in one single country parish in England. It would not satisfy "the trade;" but only irritate them with fresh interference and more complicated regulations. At their great meeting in St. James's Hall the other day I understand that the trade made three demands: Let the Irish Act drop; repeal the Welsh Act; and let England alone. Such a Bill would not liberate the hundreds of thousands of barmen and barmaids who now lose their day of rest with their families. There is a great demand for total closing; there is no demand for partial closing. This is what Members offer their constituents, not what the constituents ask from their Members. The canvasses of householders show as large a majority against partial opening as in favour of total closing. I appeal, therefore, to the hon. Gentleman not to vote against the second reading of the Bill. This question is not confined to this country, for there is a similar movement in Sweden, where a Petition to the Swedish Parliament for a similar object has been signed by 12,000 working men in Stockholm. It is a monstrous anomaly that on the sacred day of rest the only shops open are the liquor shops, carrying on a trade which causes loss of work, waste of money and industrial resources, and produces crime, pauperism, ignorance, and other evils. I will not detain the House longer, being most anxious that it should come to a decision on the question; and I ask you, by reading this Bill a second time, to put into operation that "great power" which the Prime Minister lately said "was possessed by the Legislature to remove sources of temptation from the way of the people."

MR. BURT: I have been asked rather unexpectedly by my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Mr. Stevenson) to second the Motion which he has just made. Well, Sir, I do so most cordially; but I think that in seconding the Motion in favour of the Bill the House will, perhaps, allow me to explain my position with regard to it. I, myself, am a total abstainer from intoxicating drinks, and, personally, I am prepared to go much further than the present Bill. I look upon Sunday closing as a part of a much larger subject; and I am well aware that the Bill generally is supported by a very considerable body of persons who regard the Sunday as being different from any other day. I can quite understand and appreciate that feeling, and I have very much sympathy with it. It has always seemed to me to be an anomaly that while you have every place of ordinary business—the baker's shop, the butcher's shop, and the draper's shop—closed on Sunday, the only houses that are open on that day should be the gin palace and the public-house. The chief reason why I have hesitated to associate myself with the Sunday closing movement has been a doubt with regard to public opinion. I am ready to go as far in the direction of limiting the facilities for obtaining intoxicating drink as public opinion will sustain me. To go further would simply be to defeat the object that the temperance advocates have in view. I would certainly go as far as possible; and, having watched as an outsider for a considerable time the movement on behalf of the closing of public-houses, I have become convinced in my own mind that there is a vast body of public opinion, amounting to that of the large majority of the people of this country, which is now in favour of the closing of public-houses on Sunday. My hon. Friend the Member for South Shields, in the excellent speech he has delivered to the House, has brought forward arguments to show that the closing of public-houses in Scotland and Ireland has materially diminished intemperance in those countries. I have no doubt that other hon. Members, like myself, received Circulars this morning bearing upon that point. These Circulars are of a very conflicting nature. I have only had an opportunity of glancing at them; but I find that among them a Licensed Victuallers' Circular has been sent which contests this point, and which, so far as Ireland is concerned, declares that there has actually been a greater diminution of intemperance in those towns and cities which are exempted from the operations of the Sunday Closing Act than in those where the Act is in operation. There are no detailed figures nor any authoritative statistics accompanying the Circular to bear out that contention; and it seems to me that it is not only contrary to experience, but to all common sense, to assume that the more you lessen the facilities for obtaining drink the greater will be the amount of drunkenness. I think that hon. Members will hesitate to accept the conclusion of the Licensed Victuallers without much more substantial figures and facts than those which have been presented are forthcoming.

With regard to Ireland, I hold in my hand a paper which has been given to me by Mr. T. W. Russell, a gentleman who has devoted a very great amount of time and attention to this subject. Mr. Russell enters into detailed figures, and gives his authority for the statements he makes and the conclusions he draws. His conclusions I think are fully borne out by the figures. I have carefully read the paper as far as time would allow, and Mr. Russell tells us that he has reached these conclusions—

“First, a decrease of Sunday arrests in the Sunday closing area equal to 53 per cent; second, a decrease on a smaller scale in Sunday arrests in the five cities on the short time system; third, a reduction in the drink bill amounting to £5,500,000, comparing the quinquennial period before Sunday closing with a similar period following it; fourth, a very great decrease in the arrests for general drunkenness.”

In another part of the paper Mr. Russell calls attention to what I think is a very important point, and one well worthy of the consideration of the Members of this House and of the Licensed Victuallers also, because I think that no one can contest the position which Mr. Russell takes; and, if so, the case in favour of Sunday closing in Ireland is absolutely conclusive. Mr. Russell says—

“Another most significant fact which ought of itself to settle the entire controversy lies on the surface of all these figures. In the year 1883 the gross arrests for drunkenness in Ireland numbered 89,526. Of this total, Sunday, and including the arrests in the five towns, contributed but 4,195. In other words, the six days of the week, which enjoy 15 hours' sale of drink, gave 14,000 arrests each. Whereas Sunday—the idle day—the day when money is more or less available, and a day not kept in the Sabbatarian sense, but which is, nevertheless, protected in a special manner from the traffic of the publican—gave 4,000! Had every day of the week been as well protected from the liquor traffic, the drunken arrests in 1883 should have numbered less than 30,000, instead of 90,000.”

These figures seem to me conclusive upon the point. One of the arguments used by Members of this House in opposition to the Bill is, that it would be unfair to the working classes—that the Clubs are open for the rich man, and give him facilities for obtaining drink, and that it would be unfair that the working man should not have the same opportunity. I appreciate the force of that argument, and I wish that hon. Members, who are so very anxious to protect the working man's liberty to get beer would show equal zeal in protecting him in other ways, and in preserving liberties and benefits of less doubtful advantage. Although I never arrogate to myself the claim to speak on behalf of the working men, a number of Members of this House have credited me with knowing something of the views of the working classes throughout the country; and in regard to that matter, I may say that I represent, as is well-known, a very large working-class constituency. During one half of the year I mix very freely with workmen in my district. I go to their homes, and talk with them at their own fire-sides; I meet them at public gatherings; and I confess that I have been amazed to find the extent to which the working men generally are in favour of the Sunday Closing Bill. I notice that the hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. J. G. Talbot) is opposed to the second reading of the Bill. It has been my unfortunate lot to differ frequently from the hon. Member, although there is no Member in this House for whom I entertain a greater respect. Especially I differ from him on the Sunday question; and I cannot help thinking that the two positions occupied by the hon. Member in regard to that question are inconsistent. For instance, I remember a few years ago, when I was advocating further facilities for the opening of Museums and Picture Galleries for a few hours on Sunday, I had the hon. Member as a strong opponent. His chief objection was, and I believe still is, against the increase of Sunday labour which the opening of these Museums would, in his opinion, necessitate. The hon. Member on that occasion referred to the Sunday as a Divine institution handed down to us from the past, and he implored the House to maintain it in all its sanctity unimpaired. Well, Sir, has the hon. Member ever reflected on the fact that, according to the Report of the Committee of the House of Lords on Intemperance, there are no fewer than 300,000 persons employed in public-houses on a Sunday? Has he no sympathy with these people? Is he not at all desirous of giving them a holiday on a Sunday? It seems to me that, assuming it to be a great desecration to throw open the British Museum and National Gallery for a few hours on a Sunday, it is a far greater desecration to have these pauper-making and crime-manufacturing establishments thrown open on a Sunday. I hear a rumour that the Bill now before the House is intended to be talked out. I sincerely hope not. I trust the House will have an opportunity of giving a vote for or against the measure. The talking out of a Bill is generally the resort of a disheartened and defeated Party. It will indicate that those who are opposed to the Bill are afraid to test the opinion of the House; and the opinion of this House upon questions of this kind is generally far behind public opinion outside. Hon. Members may depend upon this—that although they may, by pursuing obstructive tactics, prevent the House from coming to a decision to-day, the time is not far distant when this Bill will be carried to a successful issue by a triumphant majority.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Stevenson.)

MR. J. G. TALBOT, in rising to move, as an Amendment—

"That this House, whilst unable to concur in a proposal to close houses of refreshment during the whole of Sunday, is of opinion that the hours during which such houses are open on that day might be materially curtailed," said, he was entirely in accord with the sentiments and principles of the two hon. Members who had advocated the change in the law which the Bill proposed; but he did not think that those principles would be best carried into effect by the Motion they had respectively made and seconded. He did not suppose that he should convince the hon. Members by anything he might say; but in taking the course he was about to take, he might fearlessly say he was not actuated by any selfish or class motives. He intended merely to express his views, which he believed were in the interests of the public, without any pressure from outside. Whether he took the line indicated by the Amendment or not, it mattered nothing to him in a political sense. The hon. Member for South Shields, in dealing with this subject, recognized the sacred character of the Sunday, advocated his Motion in the cause of temperance, desired to promote, as far as possible, the rest of the working classes on Sunday, and urged the House to pass the Bill in the cause of good order. On all those principles he entirely sympathized with the hon. Member; but he would ask whether it was possible, looking at the matter practically and not theoretically, for the hon. Gentleman to carry out his views. It was said that great interest was felt by the public in this Bill; but, if so, it was strange that this was only the second time it had been brought forward in this Parliament. On the 25th of June, 1880, the hon. Member for South Shields made a Motion similar in terms to the Bill which he now advocated. His Motion was carried by 153 against 117; but so strong was the opinion of the House in favour of proceeding cautiously in the matter, that the hon. Member wisely accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Durham (Sir Joseph Pease). The Motion, as amended, differed very much from the Bill now before the House. It stood on the records of the House in this form—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the Law which limits the hours of sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday in England and Wales should be amended so as to apply as early as possible to the whole of that day, making such provision only for the sale during limited hours of beer, ale, porter, cider, or perry, for consumption off the premises in the country; and, for the requirements of the inhabitants of the Metropolitan district, as may be found needful to secure public co-operation in any alteration of the Law."

That was the decision of the House of Commons in 1880, and that was the decision which he asked the House of Commons to confirm to-day. The hon. Member for South Durham on that occasion quoted from Mr. John Tremayne, and said—

"Mr. John Tremayne, who represented Cornwall in the late Parliament, and who took great interest in this question, had estimated as the result of his investigations that in London there were thousands of people who had no other place for their Sunday dinners but the restaurants and public-houses—a class consisting of those who lived in lodgings, and who were accustomed, during their business hours in London, daily to get their principal meal at a restaurant."—(3 Hansard [253] 903.)

Again, he said—

"This was not a householders' question. It concerned rather that part of the population which was not composed of householders, but lived in lodgings. . . . Those only who were least interested had been canvassed."—(Ibid. 905.)

Again—

"Everyone who knew Glasgow and the working of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act was aware that the bond fide traveller could always obtain liquor on Sunday, and that every inn that had four bed-rooms was a house of call for the bond fide traveller, and that there were many of them."—(Ibid.)

He ventured to say that the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who seconded the Motion (Mr. Burt) with regard to the working classes did not touch the question. There was a large class outside the working men who were not even provided for in the Representation of the People Bill—those who took casual employment, and who were on Sundays especially in an unprotected position. They had no homes worthy the name, and if the houses of refreshment were closed, where were they to go? And that question applied especially to London. But he would go further, and ask the hon. Member if he had taken into account what was to become of the large mass of foreigners who inhabited this city? London was not only a large Metropolis, but also a Nation. It had been said there were in London more Germans than were in Berlin, and more Swiss than were in Geneva. It, in fact, represented all the nations of the earth. Complaints were made by foreigners of the condition of London on Sunday. He was very far from sympathizing with them in their criticisms, because he believed that the English Sunday was enjoyed by the people of this country. They must not, however, make it impossible for foreigners to get their ordinary dinner on Sunday. He would ask the Home Secretary to listen to the following words of his Predecessor (Sir R. Assheton Cross):—

"I said when I was in Office that if Sunday closing was carried I would not be responsible for the peace of London. I say the same now that I am out of Office; and I am certain if the Home Secretary looks into the matter he will come to the same conclusion."—(3 Hansard [253] 912.)

He should like to know if the Home Secretary had considered that point? He had heard with pleasure the hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt) say that he was ready to go as far as public opinion would justify him. That was exactly his (Mr. Talbot's) position. He had been charged with being opposed to any measure dealing with the hours during which the public-houses were open; but that was not the fact. On the contrary, he was prepared to curtail the existing hours to a considerable extent. There was another document to which he would ask the attention of the House. The Report of the Committee of the House of Lords on Intemperance was universally admitted to be one of the most instructive upon this question of intemperance. That Committee, in their Report, which was constantly quoted, made the following recommendation:—

"That on Sundays licensed houses should in the Metropolis be open from 1 to 3 p.m. for consumption off the premises only, and for consumption on the premises from 7 to 11 p.m. That in other places in England they should be open from 12.30 to 2.30 p.m. for consumption off the premises only, and for consumption on the premises from 7 to 10 p.m. in populous places, and from 7 to 9 p.m. in other places."

Now, he was prepared to go further than these recommendations of the Lords' Committee. There was another measure on the Paper for second reading to-day, introduced by the hon. Member for South Durham (Sir Joseph Pease), which went further than these recommendations, and he was prepared to support it. It proposed to reduce the hours on Sunday for London from 1 to 3 for consumption off the premises, and from 7 to 10 for consumption on the premises; and in places beyond the Metropolitan district, but in the Metropolitan police district, or in a town or populous place, from 12.30 to 2.30, and from 7 to 9; but with this important restriction—that no spirits were to be sold during those hours, but only beer, ale, porter, &c., and these only for consumption off the premises. This Bill also proposed to close public-houses in the rural districts for the whole of Sunday. This was a matter which did not affect the upper or even the middle classes; but it did affect the lower classes. He had tried to show that though a great number of the working classes who were householders did not desire that the public-houses should be open during any part of Sunday, yet that there was a large floating residuum who could not obtain refreshment on that day if they were closed. Suppose this Bill were passed, and suppose it were felt to be intolerable in London and other large centres of population, what would this House have to do? It would have to do what it did before, and what he could not but think an ignominious thing—namely, to rescind its previous legislation. But the hon. Member would not by this Bill be able to carry his benevolent designs into effect, because it continued the exemption of the bond fide traveller. Now, if the law as to the bond fide traveller remained in its present state the evil would be multiplied a hundredfold, and there would be a perpetual series of conflicts with magistrates, Courts of Law, and police-officers as to who was and who was not a bond fide traveller. One of the witnesses before the Lords' Committee said that the bond fide traveller gave more trouble in Liverpool than any other portion of the community. There was a place three miles from Liverpool where the working classes went on Sunday, where one house was called "The Lamb" and the other was a coffee-house. From 300 to 500 persons would be assembled there on a Sunday afternoon, all of whom had slept the previous night three miles off; in fact, so crowded was the house that the police could not get in to notice who were there. The police said the bond fide traveller was the greatest nuisance they had to deal with. In London they went as far as Willesden by hundreds, and were immediately served. Was the hon. Member prepared to deal with the bond fide traveller? If he was not, then he had not solved the question, and his Bill would only lead to much greater difficulties than at present. So far from enrolling on the side of temperance a large class of the people, it would have a very injurious effect upon that cause. The hon. Member had appealed to him not to oppose the second reading because the Bill might be amended in Committee. He thought, however, it was an objectionable proceeding if one did not approve the principle of the Bill to consent to its second reading. He could not agree to the principle of the total closing of public-houses on Sunday, and, therefore, he could not vote for the second reading of the Bill. If, however, the Bill should, unfortunately, obtain a second reading, he should be prepared to move Amendments in Committee reducing it to the principle contained in the Bill of the hon. Member for South Durham, to which he had referred. He did not desire to resort to any obstructive tactics. His wish was that the House, after hearing the arguments on both sides, should say "Aye" or "No" to the Bill. He begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

LORD ALGERNON PERCY, in seconding the Amendment, said, he would not yield to any person in the interest which he took in the cause of temperance; but, in relation to this Bill, what they had to consider was whether it would not cause fresh evils to arise—evils just as serious as those which it was intended to amend, while it would greatly inconvenience a vast amount of people, and operate harshly upon a large class of the population. There was a distinction to be drawn between the country at large and the Metropolis, and it was to the Bill as it affected the Metropolis that he would confine his remarks. Householders would not be affected by the Bill, because rich ones had their servants and their Clubs, while poorer ones could cook and eat their dinners at home; but what were clerks and others to do who occupied only a single room, and had to depend on refreshment-houses for their meals? It would be hard measure that a large number of respectable men should be debarred from the simple gratification of their tastes because others drank to excess. It should be remembered that it was proposed to prohibit in those houses the sale, not only of intoxicating liquors, but of any article whatever. Another evil to which the Bill would lead would be the formation of a large number of spurious Clubs, of which at present there were already many in London, formed merely for the purpose of obtaining spirituous liquors within the prohibited hours. In those Clubs drinking went on of a very bad description, because there was no supervision of any kind, and many evils arose which were not to be found in public-houses. There were now as many as 100 Working Men's Clubs in the London Postal District. He was in favour of these Clubs; but he thought under the Bill the number would increase, and that the members would not be of the same respectable class as at present. It should be recollected that they might not stop the liquor traffic as the hon. Member wished to do, but force it into new channels. Another evil result would be the increase of illicit selling, the establishment of a system of "shebeening," such as had become very common in Edinburgh and Glasgow, where scenes occurred which were awful to read of. It was said that it was easy in those places for a person wishing for spirituous liquors on Sunday to obtain them on the premises on which he lived, and the consequence was that whole families were plunged in intoxication from Saturday night to Monday morning. The traffic in intoxicating liquor could not be stopped; and it was better that it should be carried on openly, under a certain amount of police supervision, than that it should be secret. It was by no means certain that the measures adopted in Scotland had had very beneficial results, for the Police Returns showed that 1,886 cases of drunkenness in 1879 had risen in 1882 to 2,530. The Police Returns, showing the number of persons taken up as drunk and incapable in the streets, did not necessarily prove that the amount of intoxication was diminishing; they rather proved that the vice was being driven under. If the police could go into private houses they would find that the number of drunk and incapable persons whom they contained was very large indeed. If the Bill were passed, Sunday drinking in London would only be changed for drinking on Saturday night. It would be an easy thing for the House to pass the measure, for it would not affect a single Member. But they ought to endeavour to have one law for the rich and poor; and if this measure were agreed to there would be one law for the rich and one for the poor. He hoped that the House, if it should adopt the Bill, would be consistent, and would shut up all the Clubs on Sundays. He could not see why the many should suffer for the misconduct of the few. The Returns about drunkenness for England showed 17,000 cases of intemperance; and because there existed that number of persons who could not resist temptation, it was proposed to put a population of 24,000,000 to very serious inconvenience. The existing provisions with regard to bond fide travellers were very mischievous, and the cause of much evasion of the law; but the present Bill would hold out a further inducement to such evasion. Believing that the cause of temperance would be better served by a further limitation of the hours during which public-houses could remain open on Sunday, and by the abolition of the bond fide travellers—if that were possible —than by the means proposed in the measure before the House, he should vote for the Amendment which had been moved.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the word<sup>s</sup> "this House, whilst unable to concur in a proposal to close houses of refreshment during the whole of Sunday, is of opinion that the hours during which such houses are open on that day might be materially curtailed,"—(Mr. John Talbot.)

—instead thereof.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I rise to support the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Mr. Stevenson); but I am willing to admit that some of the arguments used by the hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Talbot) are not without weight. I am willing to grant that some exception must be made to the general principle of Sunday closing, especially as regards the Metropolis. I think most hon. Members on our side are willing to admit that this exception must be made, and are willing to leave this to the discretion of Parliament after this Bill has passed into Committee. [Mr. WARTON: "No!" and cries of "Hear, hear!"] But we do hold that public opinion out of doors is much more ripe for Sunday closing, broadly and generally speaking, than, perhaps, this House is willing to admit. I may speak myself, as representing perhaps the largest constituency in Great Britain, and a borough in which the question has been most thoroughly discussed for many years past, where the temperance question has been, if I may use the expression, thrashed out more thoroughly than in any other part of the United Kingdom. In that borough we have now approached to something like unanimity on the question of Sunday closing. We have taken a poll of all householders in Liverpool, and we find six-sevenths are in favour of Sunday closing, and, indeed, in favour of many other restrictions upon the sale of intoxicating liquors. The great wave of temperance feeling that has swept over the country during the past few years has very much altered the opinion of people as to the facilities given for the sale of strong drink. The whole country of late has become alive to the horrible social degradation in which a large portion of our population lives. I am sure those Gentlemen who have been able during the past few weeks to read the harrowing accounts that have been brought before us of the condition of the poor in London and other populous parts of the country must be deeply impressed with the conviction that the time has now come when Parliament should address itself with great earnestness and give its entire heart to the amelioration of the condition of these people. No one will dispute that the main cause of the degradation of masses of our countrymen is the enormous consumption of intoxicating drink which goes on. I am almost tempted to read a few remarks, although I think I must abstain, from that remarkable description of the poor of London, written by Mr. G. R. Sims, entitled Horrible London, in which he attributed the great mass of the terrible degradation, misery, and starvation he witnessed to the excessive consumption of intoxicating drink. We admit that Sunday closing is only a branch of this question; but it is a very important branch, and we advocate it because we believe it is a reform upon which the nation has set its heart—a reform which lies nearest to our hand, a reform on which we can get the greatest amount of unanimity, and the reform which, above all others, is the most urgent and pressing at the present moment. We do not expect that the millennium will follow Sunday closing; but we expect to stop a large portion of this wasteful consumption of the resources of the poorest people on intoxicating drink. We believe we can save to the poor people of this country from £20,000,000 to £30,000,000 annually. If Sunday closing was established, as it ought to be, and earlier hours for Saturday closing followed—and I consider the one to be quite as important as the other—I believe we should bring about a wonderful change in the social habits, comfort, and well-being of millions of the population. Demands would be occasioned on our small tradesmen to an extent to which they are altogether unaccustomed at the present time. A great—a much larger—demand would be made for our own manufactured articles. We should open up a new market equivalent to that of India. The whole trade of the country is suffering from stagnation at the present moment; and I could not conceive of anything more calculated to benefit our trade than the turning into fruitful channels of this enormous expenditure on intoxicating drink. It is a large question, and unless looked at in a broad and general point of view we shall be likely to come to a wrong conclusion. I am quite aware that many small objections can be raised against the Bill; but we should deal with the matter in a comprehensive way; and unless the House does something to show its interest in the cause of temperance, it will find itself very much out of harmony with the intelligence and good feeling of the country. Those who are closely watching the tide of public opinion in our large towns must be aware that there is steadily rising up an antagonism—a feeling of opposition—to the wealthy and upper classes of the country. Men in the guise of social reformers, but who are in reality Socialists and Communists at heart, are gaining increased weight and influence amongst large masses of the poorer portions of the population; and I say that unless the House will address itself earnestly to urgent questions of social reform, there is great danger that a large section of our population will look to other sources for an amelioration of their lot which this House has denied them. There is grave danger that a tide of Socialism and Communism will pass over this country unless Parliament will pay greater attention than it has hitherto done to those urgent social questions. It is on that account that I give my support to the Bill before the House.

Mr. ONSLOW said, the arguments of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down went to show that the Metropolis was far worse than any other place in the United Kingdom in respect to its drinking habits. He had told the House that Mr. Sims had stated that the poor of London were more addicted to drink than those in any other part of the country; therefore, he (Mr. Onslow) failed to see why the Metropolis should be exempted from the provisions of this Bill. The hon. Gentleman who moved the second reading said where one case of Sunday drinking came to the notice of the police, there were 20 of which they knew nothing; but that was a mere assertion, and was not supported by statistics. In his (Mr. Onslow's) opinion if this Bill became law there would be a large amount of drinking in private houses, which no policeman could enter; and, for the sake of temperance, he would rather see working men enter a public-house on Sunday to have their glass of beer than that they should indulge in private drinking at home. This had been the consequence of the repressive measures in operation in Ireland and Scotland, and the state of things would be far worse in England if this Bill should become law. The working man would have to take home on the Saturday night the liquor for his Sunday consumption. He had no place where to keep it away from his wife and children, and the consequence would be that there would be an inducement to every member of his family to consume the liquor before the Sunday commenced. What, then, would happen? This man would say—"I did not take enough home last Saturday; I must take home more next time." This was no fancy picture. Would it promote temperance? This had not been the case elsewhere, and he believed the practice would be far more common in England than in any other part of the country. But it was said the Bill would prevent the waste of the earnings of the working man. He was not sure if a working man went into a public-house and had a glass of beer that it was a waste of money. There would be, unfortunately, more waste by drinking in private houses. They had had statistics before them now for many years. They had heard about Wales. Although statistics were not always reliable, there was this consolation—that there was a decided diminution in the number of arrests for drunkenness throughout the country. There was only one person out of 1,430 arrested for drunkenness on Sunday; and he said it was most hard to prevent the 1,429 from enjoying a glass of beer in a public-house because one unfortunate being chose to get drunk. The hon. Gentleman had spoken of the number of Petitions in favour of this Bill; but Petitions were mainly a matter of money, and many of them were utterly fictitious, being signed by women, who knew nothing about the matter, and by children at school. It was impossible that London should be included in this Bill; but if they were to have such a Bill at all, why not try it in the Metropolis? There they would soon see how utterly futile the Bill would be. A few years ago, when he took an interest in the Irish Bill, he stood opposite a respectable public-house in London on a Sunday from half-past 1 o'clock for half-an-hour; and he watched 40 young people enter the house with jugs, to fetch beer for the Sunday dinner. Did the hon. Gentleman wish to prevent that? Was there any harm in people wishing to have their beer fresh? It appeared to him that it would be simply tyrannical to put a stop to it. The wealthy people had no call to do this. They had their own cellars, from which they could draw on the Sabbath as on other days. But poor people had no place in which to keep their liquor. He was afraid this was practically a Sabbatarian question. But was there greater harm for a man to get a glass of beer on a Sunday than for holiday-makers to go on a Sunday for a row on the river, or drive in the country? Did the hon. Gentleman know that Sunday was now the great day for lawn tennis parties? Did he object to that? There was a Member of Her Majesty's Government who frequently played lawn tennis on Sunday; was it more wicked to buy a glass of beer than to do that? The Lord's Day was formerly regarded with great strictness in Scotland; but now carriages could be hired, and people could go for a drive on that day. The hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt) said the more they lessened temptation the greater good would be done; but they would not lessen temptation by closing public-houses, but would present a greater temptation to private drinking. In the South of England he (Mr. Onslow) had rarely met a working man who wished to have the public-houses closed on Sunday. It was very rare to see a drunken man on a Sunday south of the Thames. Working men had more self-respect than they used to have, and 99 out of 100 now considered it a disgrace to get drunk on any day. The hon. Gentleman had argued that the opening of public-houses on Sunday kept people in those houses to accommodate their customers; but the hon. Gentleman was a strong supporter of opening Museums and all places of amusement on Sundays, in which case surely there would be more persons engaged in Sunday labour than were now engaged in all the public-houses in the country. He should like to know why the hon. Member for South Shields wished to confine the operation of the Bill to Sunday? There was far less drinking on a Sunday than on any other day. Was there greater cause for intemperance on Sunday than on Monday, or any ordinary day? He believed that the hon. Member for South Shields, in his heart, wished to shut the public-houses on every day. There was an inherent liking for alcohol in some shape or other in almost every man. It was not confined to one generation; it had always been so. They must recognize that, and they could not repress it by legislation. It was absurd to think that they could prevent by this Bill people who wished it having liquor. They knew that a great deal of pressure had been brought to bear upon Members on both sides on this matter. They were threatened of the consequences if they opposed it. The temperance people were about the most tyrannical persons in this country. As for himself, he never cared about their threats. He had been told that they were going against him to a man: Well, he had heard that before, and his reply was, "Let them go." He was not one who would sacrifice his honest conviction to the threats of a clique. This Bill, if passed, would create a mass of people who would call themselves bond fide travellers, for it must be recollected that the people would get their glass of beer or their glass of whisky in some way or other. Then statistics had been produced to show that since the Sunday Closing Acts in Ireland and Wales there had been a great increase of drinking in certain localities which came within the purview of those Acts, and a decrease in drinking in towns which were not affected by them. With that experience before them, how could hon. Gentlemen support a Bill of this nature? He was glad nothing had been said in the debate against the magistrates, who, in his opinion, had done their duty, especially within the last 15 or 20 years, in a remarkable manner. Throughout the length and breadth of the country they had done all they could by setting themselves against excessive drinking. It, therefore, appeared to him that without this legislation, and with the good example of the magistrates, and the increased prosperity of the working classes, in a very few years the drunkenness of the country would diminish to a remarkable extent. It would be better that private enterprise and education should be left to do the work rather than that the House should be called upon year after year to pass some 15 repressive measures. There had been for many centuries past an enormous amount of restrictive legislation on the subject of drinking in this country, and it had had no real effect whatever. The same thing would follow if this Bill were passed. The language used by the fanatics on this subject was remarkable. Not long since, when lecturing in the West of England, Canon Wilberforce said in his opinion a man's salvation depended on his taking or not taking a glass of beer. No wonder the Canon was found to be off his head, and had to be sent to the Continent. He (Mr. Onslow) had had sent to him a pamphlet, entitled Britain and Bacchus, in which the author said—

"Banish from power men who have defiled their hands and their consciences by entering into a compact with the immoral traffic."

Those were the sort of exaggerations made use of by the supporters of this Bill, and that was the kind of strong language which had a great effect upon what was called the weaker sex, and which caused them to sign the Petitions in favour of such legislation as this—Petitions upon which such stress had been laid. The Lords' Committee on Intemperance decided unanimously that it would be wrong to close public-houses altogether on a Sunday. This was essentially a working man's question; and the opinion of the householders who signed the Petitions was not of so much consequence. He did not believe that there prevailed among the working classes that almost unanimous feeling which the hon. Member for Morpeth attributed to them. The great danger in the contemplated change was, as it appeared to him, that they would increase in the long run that which they were endeavouring to prevent. He thought the proceedings of the violent teetotalers were very reprehensible. In the villages near where he lived, not long ago, two working men, the one styling himself "The Converted Clown," and the other "The Saved Miner," went about singing songs with such titles as We Have Left the Barrel! and Hurrah for the Pump! The effect of their vocal efforts was rather to fill the public-houses than to prevent people going into them, because as the bystanders joined somewhat lustily in the chorus they became very dry after the performance. He hoped, whether they went to a Division or not, that hon. Gentlemen would not be led away by enthusiasm for the temperance cause, but would take a common-sense view of the question, and would agree with him in the conclusion he had arrived at, after much consideration, that by preventing Sunday drinking in legalized houses they would create a worse form of drunkenness than existed before.

MR. T. FRY: The arguments in favour of this measure for the closing of public-houses on Sunday have been so clearly and so fully put by the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Stevenson) that I do not intend to repeat them, and shall only ask the attention of the House for a few moments. So far as the county of Durham is concerned, the principle embodied in this Bill was affirmed last year, and that Bill is again on the Paper for to-day. I desire, as far as I am able to do so, to dispel the idea which exists in the minds of many hon. Members that there is some slight antagonism or rivalry between the county measures and that which is now under discussion as applicable to the whole of England. Those who promote the County Bills are English Bill men first and County Bill men afterwards. It seems to me that the whole, or at any rate the greater part, of the opposition that has been brought to bear against the measure now before the House has been because of the inclusion of the Metropolis; but I may inform the House that I have the authority of my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields for saying that he is prepared, when the Bill gets into Committee, should it reach that stage, to adopt the recommendation made by the Committee of the House of Lords in reference to the opening of public-houses on Sunday in London. The hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. J. G. Talbot) appeared to reason as though there had been no Division taken in the House of Commons on this subject during the present Parliament; and although he was right in alluding to the fact that a Resolution only was passed in the year 1880, it should be stated that last year we did have a Division on this question when the second reading of the Bill promoted for dealing with the matter in the county of Durham was carried by the large majority of 153 against 57. It cannot be supposed that those who voted in favour of the passage of that measure were actuated by the desire merely to secure the benefits it would confer upon the county of Durham, although we were enabled to present such an enormous preponderance of public opinion showing that we were quite ready for the application of such a law to that particular part of the country. But I may say that, in addition to Durham, the counties of Yorkshire and Northumberland have shown themselves equally desirous of such a measure. Those three counties contain a population amounting to something like 4,000,000, or about one-sixth part of the entire population of England, so that the measure which is now brought forward by the hon. Member for South Shields does not involve any proposition or principle which has not been thoroughly considered and debated in many parts of the country. The fact is that the county measures have only been introduced into this House with a view of impressing upon Her Majesty's Government and the House at large how very large a consensus of public opinion there is in favour of some such measure as this throughout the various parts of the country, and the need which exists for dealing with this question with as little delay as possible. The real question appears to me to be whether the Acts of Parliament which have already been passed for different portions of the country have been successful or unsuccessful; and it would seem that hon. Members who, like the hon. Gentleman who last addressed the House, are of opinion that these Acts have failed to do that with which they are credited by those who are in favour of such measures, and that they really do encourage drunkenness, but who, at the same time, desire that drunkenness should be diminished, ought, as the only logical result of these views, to have the courage of their convictions, and themselves bring in a Bill for the purpose of repealing all the Sunday Closing Acts which are now in operation in various parts of the country. But, Sir, it would be impossible, and hon. Members are aware of this, to succeed in any such attempt. Her Majesty's Government are already so convinced of the great benefit that has been derived from the application of the Act now in force in Ireland that they are prepared to extend it to the five great cities which have hitherto been excluded from its operation, and have proposed a measure intended to carry out this object. The only other point seems to be whether the people really wish for this measure. The hon. Member for South Shields has surely offered sufficient evidence to show that such is their undoubted desire. It has, however, been stated on the other side that the working men, as a class, are opposed to this kind of legislation. This assertion I distinctly deny. I may say that I have mixed with working men all my life, and that I have at least been in contact with them quite as much as the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow). I have attended a vast number of working men's meetings in different parts of the country, and recently I have been present at some that have been held in this Metropolis on the subject now under discussion; and wherever we have had such meetings, not a single hand has been held up against Sunday closing, or even in favour of the limited hours suggested by the Amendment of the hon. Member for the University of Oxford. I have lately attended two large meetings, one in Bow and one in Lambeth, where the audiences were composed almost exclusively of working men, and I am able to say that the desire expressed at both for the passage of this Bill was unanimous. At these meetings I have been requested to say that the working men of the Metropolis are ready to see this measure passed in its entirety. Nevertheless, I am fully aware that there are some working men in London who are not convinced of the necessity of such a measure; and if the Amendment to which my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields is willing to agree were introduced in Committee, it appears to me that it would, to a large extent, meet all the difficulties with regard to the Metropolis that have been put forward by hon. Members who have addressed the House on the present occasion. I trust, Sir, that Her Majesty's Government will see their way to supporting this measure. It has already been stated that they have among the temperance reformers many of their best and most earnest friends; and if the present Session should be allowed to pass, and the existing Parliament to run its course, without the passage of any measure for largely limiting the hours of drink, very great disappointment will be experienced by a considerable section of those who are the habitual supporters of Her Majesty's Government. I do not propose to occupy the time of the House by going at length into the details connected with this question, as I do not wish to do anything that may prevent a Division being taken on the second reading of the Bill. If hon. Members feel that their constituents will support them in voting against the measure, let them not be afraid to take that course, so that the advocates of the Bill may be enabled to see who are in favour and who are against the principle it embodies. I will only say, in conclusion, that in my opinion this measure, if it be carried into effect, will do more to lessen the misery, the sorrow, and the crime that exist in this country, and more to promote the general welfare and happiness of the great mass of the people, than any other measure that either is or has been before the House during the whole of the present Parliament. I have only further to thank the House for the kind attention with which it has listened to these few remarks.

MR. O. P. PHIPPS observed, that they were told that public opinion was rapidly ripening for the change which was proposed in that matter. If that were so, he thought the process of ripening was a very slow one, because they had seen far less excitement about that question that year than they had seen last year or the year before. It was a simple thing to get up public meetings to attack; and people who attacked were also far keener than those who defended, probably because the latter thought their position so strong that they need not be so particular to attend meetings. The reason why public feeling was less excited on that subject than it had been was, perhaps, because people were somewhat doubtful about the benefits to be derived from compulsion; while those who had taken up the question very strongly were, perhaps, those among the masses who were far too ready to believe anything that was told them by the leaders of an agitation, provided only those leaders were sufficiently self-asserting and loud in their talk. They were told that this Bill should not be opposed because it was demanded by the working men. He would like to consider what it was they were told the working classes really wanted. According to the various speakers in favour of this Bill, the working man was made to say that he was a creature of impulse and without control, and that so long as public-houses were not absolutely closed against him on Sunday, he could not resist the temptation of entering them and spending far more money than he ought. They made him say—"Save us from ourselves; do not consider the publicans; do not consider the temperate; consider only us who are drunkards." It appeared to him that this was a very extraordinary statement for the working man to make; and that because he was afraid to submit himself to the temptation of a public-house being opened on Sunday he was willing for the drink he required on Sunday being brought into his house on the Saturday. Would not the fact of his doing this inflict a greater evil? Had it not occurred to him that an enormous amount of mischief would be done supposing that on the Saturday night he brought into his house the Sunday's supply, and had it staring him in the face from his cupboard or from his table? Surely if the working man could not resist the temptation on Sunday, he was not very likely to resist it on Saturday night. But, supposing all that he had said about the working class was simply theory, and that he had stated nothing practicable, he did not think that any hon. Member would rise in his place and tell the House that the experiment tried in Wales had been attended with unmitigated success. They heard some extraordinary stories upon this matter from Wales, from all parts of the territory, and he would advise hon. Members having any doubts on this point just to consider the evidence that was placed before the magistrates at Wrexham Petty Sessions on Monday the 17th ultimo. On that occasion the Court was occupied for no less than eight hours in trying cases of Sunday drinking; and the horrible scenes of debauchery and iniquity which then came to light were sufficient to startle anyone who gave sufficient thought to the subject. He heard only the other day of another extraordinary story. When he was canvassing in 1880 one of his constituents took up a very strong line against him on the question of Sunday closing, and was one of his strongest opponents. Since then he was told that that constituent—a strong temperance man—had gone to Cardiff; and what he had seen there of the result of closing the public-houses on Sunday had made him entirely change his mind on the subject. In the course of the debate they had simply considered the case of the householder, or the man who rented the whole of the house in which he lived. But there was a very numerous class who did not rent a house, and occupied but one, two, or it might be three rooms. This class had naturally not got very much space to spare under such circumstances. He thought that they should consider this class; because they heard from people who supported this measure that the brewers were prepared to place beer in small barrels for the benefit of the householder deprived of their Sunday beer. The country labourer and the householder had plenty of room to store these barrels; but, still, he could conceive nothing more detrimental to the interests of the working man, supposing he had a weakness for drink, than that he should have this small barrel of beer constantly exposed, not only to himself, but also to his wife and children. He mentioned the wife, for he was afraid that the statistics went to show a lamentable increase in female intemperance, and he could not think that they were likely to decrease that intemperance if they were to introduce the beer in that way into the house. It was all very well for people to say that statistics proved that there was less drunkenness. They might make statistics prove pretty nearly anything. They showed, however, absolutely nothing with regard to secret drinking—the drinking which went on in a man's own house. The gentleman who first caused him to think deeply upon this question was a man who was at one time a Member of that House, and a man who had probably more intimate knowledge of the working man than anyone present—he meant the late Mr. Knowles—and he said—

"If you close public-houses on Sunday entirely you will work an enormous amount of evil—an amount of evil which can never probably be properly gauged until the seed it would be the means of sowing ripened. The consequences would be most terrible."

He was willing, however, to see an alteration in the hours during which public-houses might be opened, and he was disposed that there should be such an alteration as would admit of people getting their dinner and supper beer; but he was not willing to compel people who might be accustomed to drink their beer, or whatever else they liked, every day in the week to be teetotalers on Sunday. He did not believe in compulsion. Compulsion had not done any good, and would not in this case. If they were to believe everything they heard, they should believe that England was a nation of drunkards. He did not believe it was a nation of drunkards. In his opinion the majority of the English people were sober in their habits. Why, therefore, should the House calmly consent to punish the majority for the sins of the minority? He sincerely hoped that the Bill would not be read a second time.

MR. HOULDSWORTH: The hon. Member who has just sat down has expressed considerable doubt as to the opinion of the working classes on this subject. I support the second reading of this Bill chiefly because I believe it is in harmony with the wishes of the great majority of the working classes of the country. It has often been said that this movement for the closing of public-houses on Sunday has been originated and is forced on by persons who will be little affected by it. I believe the very reverse is the case; and that the strength of this movement is to be found in the support of the working classes in our centres of industry, who, if not unanimous, are certainly in a very large majority in favour of this measure. It is they who feel the evil effects of the present system most painfully in their families; and it is they, I believe, who are most anxious to see an alteration of the present law. This is not a new question; it is not a question of theory; it is a question upon which we have had many opportunities, especially those of us who are engaged in the manufacturing districts, of testing and of obtaining the opinion of the working classes; and I think that no one who knows those districts can have any but one opinion, which is that there has been a steady advance during the last few years of public opinion among the working classes in favour of this proposal, and even amongst the publicans themselves and others who are engaged in the trade. It has always appeared to me that it is not so much incumbent upon those who advocate this measure to give reasons why public-houses should be closed on Sunday, as it is the duty of those who oppose the measure to bring overwhelming proof of a necessity for their being open. It is not a new law that we are proposing to introduce—it is the abolition of a special exception in the law affecting trading on Sunday. As the House is perfectly aware, a law is in operation to prevent trading on Sundays, and it is backed up by custom and is supported by the hearty co-operation of all classes of the community; and, therefore, when we approach this question it is not to introduce a special Act of legislation in reference to this trade. It is rather, as I have said, to remove a special exception which is found, I believe, to work prejudicially to the interests of the community; and it is simply to place this particular trade on the same level with regard to Sunday opening and Sunday closing as the other trades of the country. Therefore, the question before the House is, whether this exception from the general law affecting trading on Sundays is necessary or desirable? I do not wish to detain the House at any great length; but it seems to me sufficient to say that that necessity is absolutely disproved by the example of Scotland, by the example of Ireland—as far as the measure has been carried out there—and by the example of many of our Colonies. In all those places there is absolute closing of public-houses on Sunday, and the necessity for a revision of the law affecting them is not pressed upon this House. Scotland has now had an experience of Sunday closing extending over 30 years; and I am of opinion that every one of the Scotch Members of this House would testify that if a proposition were made for repealing the Forbes-Mackenzie Act in Scotland, it would be absolutely opposed by very nearly the whole population of that country. I come to the question whether it is desirable; and in considering that question we have to look at the facts and the present state of the law in England in regard to this matter, and compare it with the results which obtain in countries where that law has been altered. I will not trouble the House with many statistics, as I know there is a great suspicion in regard to statistics in this matter. But I will give the following. They are taken from the Report of the Chief Constable of Manchester, and I compare them with the Report which has been presented to the House from Glasgow. The simple figures I would put before the House with regard to Manchester are that the number of arrests for drunkenness on Saturday, on Sunday, and on Monday are 64 per cent of the whole number of arrests. Now, I am quite aware that the Saturday figures are the greatest number; but I think when you look at those Reports, and notice how the large figures are still maintained on Monday and on Tuesday, you cannot fail to see what a link that Sunday opportunity is, and what an immense change would be wrought if that large number of arrests on Sunday, owing to the large amount of drinking on that day, were diminished. Compare this state of Manchester with the state of Scotland. As you are aware, the population of Scotland is ten times greater than that of Manchester; and there you find that the arrests on the Sunday—taking the same hours in the Return laid before this House—the arrests in Manchester for drunkenness are one-half the number of those in the whole of Scotland. But it is said that there is in this Bill some injustice. The points, I understand, on which the opponents of this Bill feel strongly are—first, a feeling that we should be legislating in a different way for the rich from what we were for the poor; and then there is the position of Clubs. Clubs are used by the upper classes, and Clubs are being used more extensively every year by the working population; and the question arises of the position that they would occupy against the publicans, whose trade you are going to interfere with. Now, as to the question of the rich and the poor in legislating on this subject, I think the whole question depends upon what are the real wishes of the working classes. I am quite prepared to say that I would not stand up in this House and support this measure if I did not feel there was a large support of the working classes behind me; and in speaking to-day I am speaking in their interest. I am not supporting this measure in any way in order to promote my own interests. I certainly do not wish to say a word which would seem to cast the slightest stigma upon those teetotal and temperance societies who, in my opinion, and in the opinion of everybody, are doing such good and immense work in dealing with and ameliorating the great national evil which we all deplore, and against which I am glad to think they are making considerable headway; but the proposed legislation seems to me to be not to force teetotalism on the unwilling masses, but to do that which is in accordance with the wishes and desires of the working classes themselves. When I come to the question of the position of Clubs, I have no doubt, taking the experience of Scotland, there would be a considerable amount of secret drinking in the first two years after the passing of this Bill. You do not change the manners and customs of a people by Act of Parliament, and where the habits of the people are being invaded there will be a tendency to resume those habits. I know something of Scotland; and I believe the experience of Scotland is that although at first, after the passing of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act, there was a considerable amount of private drinking, that stage has almost completely passed away, and there is a general improvement in the drinking habits of the Scotch. I do not myself think that Clubs will take the place of public-houses. The reason I give for that opinion is that at the present moment we have in Manchester a considerable number of Clubs of various kinds. We have a considerable number of Political Clubs and of Working Men's Clubs, and in the Political Clubs it is an absolute rule that they are closed upon the Sundays—closed, simply because the committees of those Clubs desire that they should be closed. I have myself a very large experience of two Working Men's Clubs where members were perfectly free to open those Clubs on Sunday; where drinks were sold regularly during the week. In both cases influence was brought to bear upon them, because it was thought desirable that they should be open; but in both those cases, after deliberate discussion, the members of those Clubs decided that they would not open on the Sunday; and those two very representative Clubs of working men were absolutely closed by the act of the members themselves. Well, Sir, now I will just say one word to the Amendment that has been proposed. I am glad to find that the Amendment goes a very long way towards the end proposed by the hon. Member opposite, and recognizes a certain curtailment in the hours of opening. But it continues the idea of special legislation and special restriction for the liquor trade, which I think is a mistake. I think the proper view to be taken in dealing with this question is to affirm the general rule to be that these houses should be closed on Sundays as other places of business are. I am quite prepared to admit, and I believe it would be desirable to give, every reasonable consideration to any class of exemption that may be brought before the House. I understand that some arrangement has been come to with regard to the Metropolis, and probably in some way the Metropolis may be exempted from the action of the Bill. I am very glad of that; because I think that in the Metropolis there are very special considerations—the habits and customs of the people are different from what they are in other parts of the country—and I think in affirming the principle of the Bill to-day, that there is to be Sunday closing, we ought to take a reasonable view of any claim which is made on the grounds of necessity or emergency for exemption from the general principle which we have affirmed. Of course, there is an exemption with regard to the bond fide traveller; and although I am not prepared to say that the bond fide traveller is not a very suspicious person, and a person who perhaps only travels in order to get drink, still I do not think that even the abuse of that exemption which is said to exist in Scotland outweighs in any way what are the immense benefits of that Act which for the last seven years has been in force. I think it is very desirable—and here I only express my own opinion—that there should be some provision in England which is not necessary in Scotland with regard to the sale of beer for a short time twice a-day, at a time when people want it for their meals. I think this is of very great importance. I do support that exception, and I lay great stress upon it, because I think that the working classes should learn to do what the upper classes do—take their stimulants when they take their meals. I think it would be important in our legislation on this Sunday question if we did something for the encouragement of that habit. I hope the question will not be talked out; but I trust that some decision will be come to on the subject. I do say that there are great masses of the people, in my opinion, in the Metropolis and also throughout the country, who are in favour of this measure; and I think the people of the country will be disappointed if the House does not come to some decision on the subject, so that they may feel the matter has been carefully brought before Parliament, and has been decided upon its merits by their Representatives.

MR. EUGENE COLLINS said, he had not intended to have interfered in this debate but for the remarks of the hon. Member who had just spoken. Notwithstanding the various speeches which he had heard, not only upon this occasion, but upon the other occasions when this matter was before the House, he had not seen any reason for altering the deliberate opinion at which he had arrived as to the injustice and inexpediency of closing public-houses altogether on Sunday. He freely admitted—and did so cheerfully and willingly—that all credit was due to the large section of the community who endeavoured, as far as they could, to promote measures having for their object the restriction of intemperance; and more particularly upon this subject, which in itself was so attractive, and which appealed so forcibly to all their feelings and religious professions, one might very well hesitate to refuse to listen to the advocacy of gentlemen who were earnest in their desire to limit and restrict intemperance; but, at the same time, in the independent opinion which he had formed on this subject, he could not help but think that a considerable amount of mischief was often done by attempts to carry out professions of temperance to such an extent as to cause interference by legislative action. He was an advocate for temperance, and would certainly do all he could to promote the consumption of drink in moderation. For 28 years of his life he had tasted nothing stronger than water, and it might, therefore, be supposed that he took considerable interest in the temperance movement; but he was convinced, from experience, that they did a larger amount of wrong by over-restriction than if they allowed the people to use and employ drink according to their wants and requirements. They had 180,000 Licensed Victuallers in the United Kingdom, and the great bulk of them were men whose great interest it was to carry on their business in the most legitimate and the most orderly way possible. They were men who had employed in their trade something like £120,000,000, and, being under State control, the very object and interest of these men was to conduct their business properly. Considering, then, the respectability of the men licensed by the State, and the magnitude of the trade, they ought to hesitate before adopting any measure which would seriously interfere with their position or their trade. Besides, if they were to abolish these men, they would find another class of persons ready to take their places without licences, without any interest in maintaining peace or moderation in their houses, and the result would be that their attempt to regulate and control the Licensed Victuallers would lead to greater evils. The great bulk of the community were utterly opposed to these restrictions. The hon. Members who had just spoken had instanced the case of Wales and Ireland, and had he anticipated speaking he could have furnished a large amount of evidence upon their examples. But Ireland was held out for imitation in this matter. What did he find? In the years between 1877—the year the Sunday Closing Bill was passed—and 1883 there was in the cities exempted from the operations of the Act a decrease of 38 per cent in the cases of intemperance. In the rest of the country, where the Exemption Clauses did not apply, the decrease had only been 7 per cent. The periods between 1873 and 1883, however, showed that whilst there had been a decrease of 40 per cent in the cases of intemperance in the exempted cities, there had been an increase in the rest of the country of 20 per cent. That was his reply to the arguments of the hon. Member who had appealed to the condition of things in Ireland; and if the other parts of his argument were as fallacious and difficult to support as this one he need not trouble the House with attempting to refute them. Reference had been made to the deference which should be paid to the views of the working class. He accepted that view thoroughly and heartily; but was it possible that the working classes—the population they were going to admit to the franchise—that they had so low an opinion of them that they believed them so incapable of protecting their own interests, of preserving their morals, and of restraining themselves from undue indulgence and intemperance. Such a reproach should not have been put forward without finding many Members of that House ready to condemn such an imputation. There was one other point to which he would advert. He saw that the number of convictions of persons arrested for drunkenness on Sundays was, between 1876 and 1879, 46,315. That number dwindled down in the period between 1879 to 1882 to 42,000. But those figures showed that in the first-mentioned periods the convictions were as one to every 72,436 of the population, and between 1880 and 1882 one in every 91,104 of the population. It came, then, to this—that because one person in every 91,004 persons gave way to intemperate indulgences, as they would always find a certain class of men willing to do, they were to control or limit the free action of the other 91,003 who did not give way to over-indulgence. He contended that the decrease in the number of cases of drunkenness was likely to decrease, and would decrease, every day; and in advocating the position he had taken up, he was firmly convinced that a measure of repression and of legislative restriction such as that proposed would have an effect totally opposite to that which all of them were endeavouring to promote—a result which they would all deplore and repent.

EARL PERCY yielded to no one in his desire that this Bill should not be talked out. He represented, and belonged to a district which took a very great interest in this subject, and he held a sort of middle position between the two extremes—the rabid teetotaler on the one side, and the rabid Licensed Victualler on the other. He at once dismissed an argument that had been touched on very little—namely, the interference with the liberty of the subject in closing public-houses on Sunday—as that argument went very much too far; because, if the public or the Licensed Victualler were entitled to the liberty of sale and purchase on Sunday, they were entitled to that liberty at all hours on that day, and at any hour during the rest of the week. But the main question at issue was the convenience of the public. How did that matter stand? It was useless to go too minutely into statistics; but they did show that a large number of the population of this country, especially in the North of England, were in favour of some further measure for closing public-houses on Sunday; and when the hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. J. G. Talbot) complained that the householders were the only persons who had been canvassed on this subject he was rather surprised, because, in his own district, he discovered the number of votes largely exceeded the number of householders in that district, and he was told that the canvass had been made among all the adults of the district. As he had said, the convenience of the public was the main question; but he admitted there was one other element to be considered, that was the moral effect the Bill would have, and the effect upon the crime of the country. It was a singular fact that the clergy of all denominations were largely in favour of some further measure of this kind, and he thought the House could not close its eyes to that fact. If they were wrong in their judgment, on their heads be the blame. Then, coming to the question of crime, it was found that the magistracy, though not universally in favour of the measure, had certainly supported it to some extent; and where they had been unwilling to sign Petitions in its favour, they had been actuated rather by the hesitation of a class not affected by the measure, than from any definite feeling that the measure was not right in principle. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down spoke of the large number of Licensed Victuallers who would be affected by this measure; but, as he understood the matter, a very large portion of the Licensed Victuallers were in favour of the measure. He knew a town in the North of England, with a population of 6,000 inhabitants or thereabouts, where there were 49 public-houses; and when a canvass was made by the clergy, in order to find out how many publicans would take out six-day licences, provided the whole of the local trade agreed to do the same thing, there were only three out of the 49 who refused to take out those six-day licences. Of course, however, those three prevented the rest from doing it, because they were afraid that custom would leave them. In the face of these facts, and others which might be quoted of a similar kind, it was useless to say that the Licensed Victuallers were in any large numbers against the measure now before the House, or some measure in the same direction. Looking at the effect of this measure on other countries, he maintained that it could not be denied that it did diminish the consumption of liquor. That had been proved, at any rate, in Scotland. It also diminished the amount of crime; but he was not so convinced that it diminished the amount of drunkenness. It was perfectly possible that a more moderate amount of drunkenness might be extended through a larger population, and the amount of drink consumed diminish; and he was very much afraid that if this Bill were passed there would be more drinking in the homes of the poor, more drinking in the quasi-Club, more drinking in the shebeens, and more illicit sale of liquor in that way. Then there was the bond fide traveller. He was sorry he heard no hon. Member point out how the evil of the bond fide traveller might be met; but he well remembered that when a deputation waited upon the Home Secretary last year, the Bishop of Newcastle said he hoped a Bill would not be passed for Durham without one for Northumberland, because the population of Gateshead would come across and drink at Newcastle. With regard to the relation between the closing of public-houses on Sunday and the opening of Museums on that day, he wished to point out that in one case they would be diminishing a convenience already enjoyed by the public, and that in the other they would be interfering with the rest at present enjoyed by the employés of Museums. He himself had no strong feeling one way or the other on this Bill; he would be guided chiefly by the manifest convenience of the population of this country. In the North of England the feeling was strong; but he could not say so much for the rest of England. He feared that the promoters of the measure were thwarting the attainment of their objects by the extreme position which they assumed. They had always asked for too much in legislation, and they had consequently done nothing. The hon. Member who had charge of the present Bill asked them to pass a measure for total Sunday closing; and he (Earl Percy) did not think he was likely to get it this year any more than in the past. The same might be said of the County Bills; they defeated their object, and put off the legislation that many desired to see. But he wished to put it to the hon. Gentleman whether he would not attain a good many of his objects if he were to adopt some such provisions as those of the Bill of the hon. Member for South Durham (Sir Joseph Pease)? He (Earl Percy) was as anxious as anybody to see some measure passed which should restrict the opening of public-houses on Sunday; but he very much doubted whether a Bill for total closing would have much chance this year, or next, or the year after. Meanwhile, the excess of wretchedness and crime that prevailed would rise up against the advocates of the extreme measure, who would do better if they would, for the present, accept a compromise. He should vote against the Amendment of the hon. Member for the University of Oxford, and for the Bill now before the House; but he should do so in the hope that some Amendments would be admitted in Committee which would make the measure a feasible and practical one. Unless this were done, he was afraid it would not become law for many years to come.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, it was because he was unable to do what the noble Earl (Earl Percy) proposed to do—namely, to support the second reading of the Bill, that he must ask the House for their kind indulgence for a minute or two. But, although he could not go so far as the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Stevenson) in voting for the total abolition of the opening of public-houses on Sunday, he had always advocated a great restriction upon the present hours; and, indeed, he would go farther, and say that he thought the House might fairly be asked to pass a measure for restricting the sale on Sundays to consumption off the premises. In that way they might practically do away with many of the evils which the hon. Member for South Shields sought to abate, and, at the same time, they would be keeping the door open to meet the objections as to the wants of the community which had always prevailed against his action hitherto. Some of the arguments they had heard on the present occasion seemed to him to be, to a certain extent, misapplied. They had heard a good deal about this being the only trade which was allowed practical freedom on the Lord's Day. But was this the case? So far as he knew, most trades—certainly in the Metropolis—for the sale of anything that was eatable were carried on on the Lord's Day. Parliament had always regarded the requirements of the public as the measure of its restrictions; and he much doubted whether these requirements called for consumption on the premises on the Sunday. A great number of publicans wished to be restricted to such hours as would not oblige them to keep their servants in the house the whole day. There would be throughout England a large consensus of opinion in favour of the further restriction if the hours of the law were made universal and obligatory upon all. The reason why closing was not voluntarily adopted in many places was that one or two publicans held out, and so compelled all the rest to keep open. The Bill passed in 1874 made some attempt to meet that question by introducing a six days' licence; but he was afraid that that had been a practical failure. He thought it would be long before a measure for wholly prohibiting the sale of liquors on Sunday would be passed into law. In conclusion, he said he should not like to vote against the Bill now under consideration, without explaining the reasons why he could not support it.

MR. CHESTER-MASTER said, he would merely detain the House for a moment, in order to ask the hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill why it was that none of the Amendments promised in the past were worked into the measure, so as to allow those who were in favour of partial Sunday closing to give their votes on its side? This Bill had for many years been introduced in the form in which they now saw it, and towards the end of the debate the introducer had always expressed his willingness to accept Amendments, though these were never found in subsequent years to have been introduced. The hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), who seconded the Bill, had represented, he believed, that public-houses constituted almost the only trade carried on on Sundays. This, however, was hardly correct. The bake-houses—and this might be abundantly demonstrated in London—carried on a very large business for a class of the public who had not the means of cooking their own Sunday dinners. While he was ready to support a proposal to further limit the hours during which liquors might be sold on Sunday, he could not vote in favour of the present Bill.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have risen thus early because I think there is a general feeling on the part of the House that, whether hon. Gentlemen are in favour of this Bill or whether they are against it, a decision of the House ought to be taken upon it to-day. The country would have the advantage of knowing what is the feeling of Parliament upon the question, and how far in that respect it represents the opinions of the country. We have had a very interesting debate unquestionably upon this subject. We have had statements, shortly and clearly expressed, from Gentlemen representing constituencies who are locally and in every way entitled to express their views upon the matter. Well, Sir, as regards the general question of Sunday closing, I have no hesitation myself in saying that I am entirely in favour of Sunday closing. I believe that it is no longer a theoretical, but that it is a practical question. We have had experience now for many years in different parts of the United Kingdom. We began with Scotland, and nobody, I believe, will be bold enough to assert that the experiment that was tried in Scotland has failed, or that there are any number of persons in Scotland who desire to reverse that legislation. We proceeded to Ireland, and what has been the experience there? Is the feeling a demand for reversing that legislation? Not at all. It is a demand for completing and going further in the direction in which we have already advanced. Well, with reference to Wales, our experience has not been so long. I know there is considerable dispute on the subject of the opinion of persons in Wales upon that subject; I dare say there may be room for difference of opinion; but, as far as I know, it is not the case that the experiment has failed in Wales. I had a letter only the other day from a gentleman who is the Chairman of the Petty Sessional Division of the counties of Brecon and Glamorgan, which encloses to me the opinion of the stipendiary magistrate at Swansea, one of the most important and populous parts of Wales. He says—

"I send you the opinion of the stipendiary magistrate for the important district of Swansea with respect to the working of the Sunday Closing Act there, stated by him on the Bench on Tuesday. I may also add that the Act has been a great blessing to Wales."

The opinion is this—

"The learned stipendiary characterized the offence"—which was a breach of the Sunday Closing Act—"as a very bold one, and said it was the duty of the Bench to inflict a substantial punishment. He added that his experience had been for many months past that the Sunday Closing Act was working very beneficially, because on Monday morning there was scarcely ever a case before him."

Therefore, it is not the case to say that the last experiment in Wales has failed. Both my hon. Friend who moved, and my hon. Friend who seconded, this Motion stated, I think, the case extremely accurately. My hon. Friend who moved the Bill said that opinion was ripening on this question. Can anyone who views the attitude of the country on this matter, aye, and who views the attitude of this House, doubt that? How changed is the language that we hear with respect to the other side. How much support do Motions of this character receive, not only from this side of the House, but from that also, as we have seen by the speech of the Representative of Manchester (Mr. Houldsworth) and the noble Earl the Member for North Northumberland (Earl Percy)? Among the speeches we have just heard, my hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), who speaks with some authority on the part of those of the working classes who think with him, made a very wise and a very true remark—that it would be extremely inexpedient to go beyond the public opinion which has been expressed on this subject, and which, as he says, he has watched. To do so, he said, would be to defeat the objects we have in view. Now, I think the action on this matter has followed public opinion. It followed public opinion in Scotland many years ago; it has followed public opinion in Ireland, and it has followed it in Wales. Some of my hon. Friends here were desirous that it should follow public opinion in other parts of the country; and I supported, on behalf of the Government, the proposal to adopt the Sunday closing in Cornwall and in Durham. Why did I do so? Because I am satisfied—as the hon. Member for Morpeth has said he was—with reference to that part of the country specially, that public opinion was ripe and existed in an overwhelming force and majority in favour of the measure. The evidence that it was so in Cornwall was beyond dispute. People of every religious or political opinion were practically unanimous on the subject. The evidence, I think, was almost equally strong in reference to Durham. Well, what has been the course of legislation in this matter? The course of legislation has been to enact Sunday closing with reference to those communities in which the great majority of opinion was in favour of adopting it. That is what you have done, and I think you did wisely in that respect. Now, if opinion in this country were as pronounced and as clearly defined in respect to all parts of it as it unquestionably is in respect to a great part of it, I think there would be no doubt whatsoever as to what we ought to do. It is a remarkable fact that most of the speeches we have heard to-day have been from the Northern parts of England. We have had speeches from Lancashire, Northumberland, and Durham; and if I may use a general geographical expression, unquestionably there is North of the Trent an overwhelming opinion in support of the principles of this Bill. I cannot say I am satisfied when you come to the Southern parts of England that there is an equal opinion on this subject. I am not now speaking of Cornwall, which has rather an exceptional position on the map. The case of the Metropolis has been referred to, and I have in my official capacity, no doubt, a particular responsibility with reference to that; but I have not heard anything like that expression of opinion from the Metropolitan Members that I have heard from the Members from Cornwall or Durham on the subject of general Sunday closing. Now, if you are to follow what has been the safe and successful method of dealing with this question, and dealing with it in a manner which shall avoid those dangers of reaction, and of defeating that which you wish to accomplish, it seems to me that you will proceed upon the same principle and in the same manner. In supporting those measures for the Sunday closing in Durham, Cornwall, and other places, I was acting upon a principle which I also, on behalf of the Government, supported when we voted for the Resolutions of my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). We declared then our disposition to support the principle of Local Option, and to that principle I adhere. I believe these are questions which are best determined by—I was almost going to say, which can only safely be determined by—those who are conversant with the feelings and the interests of the particular community, and that, as I understand it, is the principle of Local Option. A difficulty that I feel about this Bill is in its present shape. It is not a Bill upon the principles of Local Option; but, on the contrary, it is a Bill adverse to the principle of Local Option. Because in so far as it is a Bill that gives Sunday closing to those who wish it, I am in favour of it; but in so far as it is a Bill which imposes Sunday closing upon communities adverse to it, it is a Bill contrary to the principle of Local Option. I believe you will only do mischief in these matters by endeavouring to force measures of this character upon communities where the majority would not support them. You hear it sometimes said—"Oh! this should be treated as an Imperial question;" but I think that is generally advanced by people who do not wish it to be done. They feel the difficulty of applying it everywhere, and therefore they say it must not be applied except it be made of universal application. When objection is made in these debates to "piecemeal" legislation, I maintain that all the legislation that has hitherto taken place on this subject has been piecemeal; and "piecemeal legislation," though it may be regarded as rather a dissylogistic expression, is really a sensible phrase to adopt in regard to the principle of Local

Option. On behalf of the Government, last year, I stated very clearly what we understood by that term, and what was the principle on which we thought these measures ought to be dealt with. We thought the right ought to be given to all the organized communities in the country, whether in the boroughs or counties, to determine these matters, which are so closely connected with their moral and material welfare. To that I entirely adhere. I believe that those communities like Manchester—which, by the voice of its Representatives, desire Sunday closing—should have Sunday closing; and that those communities like London—which does not ask for it—should not have Sunday closing, and that that would be far better than to pass a law which proposed to give it where it was not required. It seems to me that the principle of adaptation to the wants of each separate community, as expressed by those who understand and represent its interests, is the sound principle of dealing with these matters. My view is that each community ought to have the power of determining the whole of this question for itself—whether it should have these licensed houses at all; how many, if it had them; for what hours and during what days they should be open; and, in point of fact, that the attempt to lay down a general Procrustean Law with reference to the days or numbers of hours for each part of the country, in which the interest and the desires vary according to the localities, is not a sound principle of legislation at all. If we mean anything by local self-government, we mean that separate communities should have a right to deal with questions of this character according to their several interests and wants. I believe my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle would approve of those opinions. [SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Hear, hear!] I have said it was a question of areas, and I repeat it, and a question of areas is totally inconsistent with a universal law. But my hon. Friend, much as he might commend my opinions on this subject, might ask—“Why have you done nothing upon it?” Well, that is a very reasonable and justifiable demand; but if there be people outside this House who do not know why we have done nothing on this subject, there is no man in this House who does not perfectly well know why we have not, and why we cannot legislate upon questions so deeply interesting to the community. [Laughter, and an hon. MEMBER: The Franchise Bill.] Yes; the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition laughs. He smiles, I suppose, at his own success. But I would remind the House and the country—for it is to the country we have to look for relieving this—[Ironical Opposition cheers.—yes; I am not speaking in the interest of one Party or another, or of one Administration or another, because you may depend upon it that those who have to succeed us will have to feel this matter quite as strongly as we do—that habits of this kind, when once created, are difficult to cure. I speak in the interest and in the credit of the House of Commons, and I ask what power there is in this House to accomplish any legislation upon very important subjects? We have now passed eight weeks of the Session of the present year—about one-third part of the Parliamentary time—and I think it will be nine weeks that will have expired before the Government will have been able to obtain the opinion of the House of Commons upon their first and principal legislative measure. Well, Sir, is it necessary, under these circumstances, to explain why it is that the Government have not been able, and are not able, to legislate upon matters of great importance—matters of such great importance as those which are raised by the Bill now before us? I should have been extremely glad—indeed, I am extremely anxious—that upon the responsibility of the Government a measure should be introduced upon the general subject—a subject which includes not merely Sunday closing, but the Liquor Question altogether. I think it ought to be dealt with upon the principles upon which I have spoken—that is to say, the principle of giving to each locality power of disposing of these matters according to their own interest and their own wishes; and it is our desire, as soon as it may be possible for us, in the difficulties with which we have to deal in legislative measures in this House, to propose such a measure for the acceptance of Parliament.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that the question was one which, apart from all Party feeling, was sure to raise strong difference of opinion and excited feeling.

The House had listened with great interest to the speech of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. As to his closing remarks, it must be remembered that the House spent six dreary weeks in November and December, 1882, in considering the Rules of Procedure, and it accepted nearly all the proposals of Her Majesty's Government which in their wisdom they intended and deemed sufficient to promote the successful conduct of Government Business in Parliament. At that time they had been told that the majority would reign, that the co-operation of an Opposition was not required; and they were assured that a good time was coming, when, if these Rules were accepted by the House, they would restore to the House its ancient reputation for the discharge of public duties. The Opposition, at least, washed its hands of any responsibility for the failure of this anticipation on the part of Her Majesty's Government. He took it that the practical question before them was how they could best promote good order and morality, and effect improvement in social manners in all those matters which tended to give strength to the country. The Secretary of State for the Home Department had asserted, in reference to this subject, that a very remarkable symptom—he was going to say of that agitation, but he would prefer to say movement—was a gradual progress of public opinion. He had referred to a great unanimity of opinion in favour of the Bill on the North side of the Trent, and a great unanimity against it South of the Trent; and he said he could not express the same accordance in the views of the supporters of the measure as they had heard from the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Houldsworth). Speaking for an important Metropolitan constituency, he (Mr. W. H. Smith) would say he believed that all his Colleagues were as anxious to do what they could to help forward the object which the hon. Member for South Shields had in view as the hon. Member himself was. They desired to reduce the amount of intemperance; to reduce the consumption of intoxicating liquor; to promote the orderly observance of Sunday; and to encourage all the habits which were necessary to the welfare of society at large. But would the measure before them

attain in the Metropolis the end they had in view? He owned, that from all the information he could possess himself of, it would utterly fail to secure that object in the Metropolis itself. They were dealing in the Metropolis with what might be described as a province of houses, and with a population closely approaching 5,000,000. They were dealing, then, with a condition of things which, in his view, was such that if they passed the Bill under consideration they could not stop there. There were in the Metropolis many Clubs and other Associations whose members had the undoubted right of consuming liquor independently of all supervision or control, and people had the equally undoubted right of visiting at each other's houses, and of consuming liquor; and that right might be exercised to an extent not realized by hon. Members who were not intimately acquainted with the Metropolis, and to a less extent it would be open to the members of Associations such as those he referred to and the Clubs to obtain any amount of liquor they desired during the whole of Sunday. He could not help saying that if the Bill before the House were passed into law, those rights remaining untouched, it would be absolutely impossible for Parliament to stop there. They would have at once to deal with the matters to which he had adverted, and first of all with the question of Clubs. Then there was another question they would have to deal with—that of the bond fide traveller. At present his constituents could go to Greenwich, or Hampstead, or Turnham Green, and could require to be served at any time on Sunday. London was, as he had said, a great province—a province of houses—and it was absurd to say that an Act could be useful that would open the door for any amount of evasion, and that would immensely increase the temptation to evade the law. He was told on authority, on which he could place reliance, that the bond fide traveller was a great nuisance to the respectable publican. He must examine a man who came to him representing that he had come from a distance and demanding to be served. He had to get the assistance of persons who were most likely to be able to detect the misrepresentations of the bond fide traveller, and the duty was one which there was often a great deal of difficulty in discharging. To suppose, therefore, that they could deal with the Licensing Law in the simple way the hon. Member for South Shields imagined he could was altogether a mistake. If they resolved to deal with the subject they must deal with it in a comprehensive manner, which would shut the door against evasion of the law, and support the honest and respectable publican, who endeavoured to carry on his business in a proper and respectable manner. But there was another thing. At the present moment the police had a right—and it was their duty—to see that the law was obeyed, so far as they were concerned; but they could not go into a Club and interfere with what they might see there. Any such interference at a Working Man's Club would be as strongly resented there as it would be at one of the Clubs in Pall Mall. They had now a decision given in the highest Court of Law, according to which a member of a Club was entitled to supply himself at the Club with a bottle of beer or spirits, or anything else, and having paid for it, to carry it away, even during prohibited hours. That was the law at the present time, and it was a condition of things that opened the door to any amount of evasions for those who wished to drink, and which those must meet who wished to prevent them doing so; and it was obviously a matter of great importance to the community at large. There was yet another condition in connection with the Licensing Laws that required to be considered. Under the present law the lodger was permitted to have any amount of drink he pleased. Now, they knew very well that at the East End of London, and he was sorry to say at the West End also, there were licensed houses not of the highest class, with lodgers not of the highest character, and they would have this peculiarity—under the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields—that the lodger of bad character, in a house of inferior reputation, might obtain any amount of drink he pleased, and that lodger might then sell forth and make himself the terror of the vicinity on a Sunday, while a respectable lodger in another and respectable house was not to be allowed to obtain the food or drink which, according to his habits, might be necessary for his proper sustenance. That was a condition which involved a man's liberty, and which must not be ignored. He believed the Metropolitan Members desired to go as far as they could with safety, without tempting to evasion or to illicit trading, or leading men to do that in the dark which they would be prohibited doing in the light, in discouraging the habit of drinking, and lessening the number of hours during which drinking houses should be open; but they wished to approach step by step, rather than by one leap, to the end which the Bill had in view. Let them go on slowly and surely, and he was certain the success would be more real, and lasting, and beneficial to the community at large.

Mr. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he thought the Bill enunciated a very large principle. It had been stated by many of its supporters that they would not insist on including the Metropolis in its operation; but the Metropolis was included in it. He did not suppose that those who brought it forward supposed it was at all likely to pass, or even desired that it should. He gave them credit for a wish to promote temperance; but he protested against its being imputed to those who were opposed to the Bill that they were in favour of intemperance. The Home Secretary said he could not see his way to including the Metropolis in the list of towns that should be closed on Sunday. He could well believe that; and he did not wish to see the right hon. and learned Gentleman charged with the responsibility of maintaining order in the Metropolis in the event of the Bill becoming law. He was not at all surprised at his saying, therefore, that he was not in favour of the Bill. But the Metropolis protested against being legislated for by the Northern portion of the country. The Gentlemen whose names appeared on the back of the Bill were all of them thoroughly amiable and respectable, and he had no doubt their intentions in promoting it were perfectly estimable; but if their Bill should pass, he told them they would find it impossible to put it in operation in London. The population of the Metropolis at present amounted to 3,000,000. In 10 years' time its population would be vastly larger even than that. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) referred the other day to the number of splendid institutions that existed in London, which were centres of knowledge, and exercised a most beneficial influence, and he also said that the people of London were the most law-abiding people in the whole Kingdom. That was a very remarkable fact, because the state of things to which the right hon. Gentleman referred existed under the present law for opening and closing public-houses. It was not for him to say what might be most beneficial for the Northern towns; but from his knowledge of the Metropolis he could say that if the Bill became law it would bring down upon the Government an immense responsibility. The measure would not carry out the objects which its promoters had in view; but it would cause a great deal of irritation, and would induce men to drink in secret more than they would be disposed to do in public, and to consume the vilest compounds. He protested against a majority ruling a minority in this matter. A large number of Petitions had, no doubt, been presented in favour of the Bill; but those Petitions were signed by people who did not use public-houses, and who wished to prevent other people having an opportunity of using them. He was most anxious, in every possible manner, to promote temperance; but he certainly did not think that the closing of public-houses on Sunday would have that result. They should be very careful how they restricted the liberty of the people; and he hoped the House would give a vote upon the Bill that afternoon which would settle the question for some time to come.

Mr. MARRIOTT: The hon. Member who has just sat down (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) represents a Metropolitan constituency, and though I have not the honour to represent a Metropolitan constituency, I have the honour to represent one that is very close to London, and in the South of England. If the Bill is passed in its present despotic form, utterly irrespective of those principles of Local Option which have been so frequently advocated in this House on both sides—if this Bill were passed in its present form, the pleasures of thousands of people who now seek the sea breeze at Brighton would be immensely curtailed, if not utterly destroyed. A good deal of reference has been made to the feeling of the Northern towns upon this question. I have great respect for the Northern towns; but if the Northern workmen have not sufficient control over themselves to take only a sufficient amount of alcoholic liquors, is that any reason why they should stop, or attempt to stop, workmen and other people in the South of England from taking them? I have heard that in some of the large towns, famed for their practical intelligence, there is an immense amount of drunkenness; but if their drunkenness thus goes hand-in-hand with their intelligence, are those who have less intelligence to be punished for those who have more, and are yet unable to keep sober? The subject that is brought before the House by this Bill is a very important one. With the object of the Bill there is no doubt that every person must cordially and heartily sympathize. Everybody wants to see temperance promoted and intemperance checked. The real question is, will not this Bill produce greater evils than exist under the present laws? I do not know what other hon. Members of this House may think; but I must say that I watch with very great anxiety the principle that is now finding great favour—that is, of State interference with the private affairs of life. The Liberalism which prevails at the present day is not, I regret to say, of the robust type of the Liberalism of 50 years ago, which had such exponents as Bentham, John Stuart Mill, Sir William Molesworth, Sir George Cornewall Lewis, Richard Cobden, and the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright). The principle of that Liberalism was that the less the State interfered with individual liberty, and the more it left individuals to control themselves, the better it was for individuals, and the better also for the State. This Bill proposes to take away the liberty of the country at a stroke, and interferes directly with the convenience of the entire working class of the country. That seems to me a very grave step for this House to take. Now, Sir, we know that before this restrictive legislation has been put in force that the habits of drunkenness and of intemperance have decreased enormously during the last few years in this country. What are the causes of drunkenness? Drunkenness, 50 or 60 years ago, was not con-

lined to the lower classes as it is now. The higher classes were contaminated with the vice, and the youth of the country at our Universities were contaminated with it. The reason why it has since disappeared from them is, not that restrictive measures have exercised a beneficial coercion, but because young men have been able to cultivate better and more healthy tastes, through the agency of Associations for promoting sports and amusements, and innocent recreation. What applies to the gentry applies equally well to the working classes; and if we are asked what really are the remedies for drunkenness, I should say that the best remedy is to promote education, to promote recreation, and to open Parks and open spaces, where the poorer classes can have their cricket and other games and amusements of all kinds. We know that 25 years ago there was not a single Working Man's Club in the whole of the United Kingdom. At the present time I believe there are over 1,000, the great majority of which are non-political. The working classes meet there, and amuse themselves at billiards, or in other ways. At a number of them intoxicating liquors are sold. Drunkenness is never heard of at these Clubs, for the rules are against it, and the members enjoy the same privileges as the richer classes have at their Clubs. These are the instruments which we ought to rely upon for decreasing the evil of drunkenness. I am aware that to spend money on educating the people is a more tedious thing than bringing Bills into Parliament which will have a compulsory effect; but it is a much more certain and a much more sure way of dealing with the question. There is no doubt that statistics show that in the last 50 years the condition of the working classes has improved in every way, and in a much greater ratio than the position of the upper classes. For these reasons, I think that we ought not to have regard to any of these compulsory measures. They are sure to fail, and there is one way in which they may fail and work an enormous evil. I have spoken of Working Men's Clubs, and there is no better thing than a legitimate Working Man's Club, but this measure is calculated to produce what I may call a bogus Working Man's Club, or a public house without a licence, and nothing could be worse than this.

All these, I think, are reasons why hon. Members should vote against the Bill. The hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), who is much interested in this subject, had recourse to a Resolution in favour of Local Option, which I supported; but I know that Resolution was differently interpreted by hon. Members. I consider that the Local Authority should have power over the licensing of public-houses. In 1815 the power of licensing public-houses was given to Town Councils by the Municipal Corporation Bill; but that portion of the Bill was struck out by the Peers. In my opinion, it is a pity it was so struck out. I should like to see the control in this matter in the hands of the town authorities. I do not know that it would diminish public-houses; it may possibly increase them. As regards what was said by the Home Secretary when he asked what power has the House to deal with such legislation, I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman had recourse to that same retort, which, I am sorry to say, the Government have recourse to when they have not done that which they ought to have done. He cast his glances over to the Opposition side of the House, and intimated that those who sit there are responsible for what he calls want of legislation. I distinctly repudiate that. If there is any blame to attach to anybody it is solely and entirely to Her Majesty's Government. Instead of bringing in measures which would interest the whole people, they choose to bring in measures which are political engines for increasing political power, and which cannot tend to the amelioration of the condition of the people. There was one measure promised by the Government when it was returned to power, that was County Government; and if that Bill were brought in, the whole subject of licensing might have been dealt with. That course would have been far more acceptable to Members generally than to compel them to vote for measures dealing with only particular counties. If the Government had brought in a good Bill dealing with the Licensing Question it would have been supported by the majority of the House; but by the course they have pursued we are now compelled to wait for an indefinite period.

Mr. STUART-WORTLEY said, that, as it was not yet 6 o'clock, he could speak without incurring the suspicion

ing was strong; but he could not say so much for the rest of England. He feared that the promoters of the measure were thwarting the attainment of their objects by the extreme position which they assumed. They had always asked for too much in legislation, and they had consequently done nothing. The hon. Member who had charge of the present Bill asked them to pass a measure for total Sunday closing; and he (Earl Percy) did not think he was likely to get it this year any more than in the past. The same might be said of the County Bills; they defeated their object, and put off the legislation that many desired to see. But he wished to put it to the hon. Gentleman whether he would not attain a good many of his objects if he were to adopt some such provisions as those of the Bill of the hon. Member for South Durham (Sir Joseph Pease)? He (Earl Percy) was as anxious as anybody to see some measure passed which should restrict the opening of public-houses on Sunday; but he very much doubted whether a Bill for total closing would have much chance this year, or next, or the year after. Meanwhile, the excess of wretchedness and crime that prevailed would rise up against the advocates of the extreme measure, who would do better if they would, for the present, accept a compromise. He should vote against the Amendment of the hon. Member for the University of Oxford, and for the Bill now before the House; but he should do so in the hope that some Amendments would be admitted in Committee which would make the measure a feasible and practical one. Unless this were done, he was afraid it would not become law for many years to come.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, it was because he was unable to do what the noble Earl (Earl Percy) proposed to do—namely, to support the second reading of the Bill, that he must ask the House for their kind indulgence for a minute or two. But, although he could not go so far as the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Stevenson) in voting for the total abolition of the opening of public-houses on Sunday, he had always advocated a great restriction upon the present hours; and, indeed, he would go farther, and say that he thought the House might fairly be asked to pass a measure for restricting the sale on Sundays to consumption off the premises. In that way they might practically do away with many of the evils which the hon. Member for South Shields sought to abate, and, at the same time, they would be keeping the door open to meet the objections as to the wants of the community which had always prevailed against his action hitherto. Some of the arguments they had heard on the present occasion seemed to him to be, to a certain extent, misapplied. They had heard a good deal about this being the only trade which was allowed practical freedom on the Lord's Day. But was this the case? So far as he knew, most trades—certainly in the Metropolis—for the sale of anything that was eatable were carried on on the Lord's Day. Parliament had always regarded the requirements of the public as the measure of its restrictions; and he much doubted whether these requirements called for consumption on the premises on the Sunday. A great number of publicans wished to be restricted to such hours as would not oblige them to keep their servants in the house the whole day. There would be throughout England a large consensus of opinion in favour of the further restriction if the hours of the law were made universal and obligatory upon all. The reason why closing was not voluntarily adopted in many places was that one or two publicans held out, and so compelled all the rest to keep open. The Bill passed in 1874 made some attempt to meet that question by introducing a six days' licence; but he was afraid that that had been a practical failure. He thought it would be long before a measure for wholly prohibiting the sale of liquors on Sunday would be passed into law. In conclusion, he said he should not like to vote against the Bill now under consideration, without explaining the reasons why he could not support it.

MR. CHESTER-MASTER said, he would merely detain the House for a moment, in order to ask the hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill why it was that none of the Amendments promised in the past were worked into the measure, so as to allow those who were in favour of partial Sunday closing to give their votes on its side? This Bill had for many years been introduced in the form in which they now saw it, and towards the end of the debate the introducer had always expressed his willingness to accept Amendments, though these were never found in subsequent years to have been introduced. The hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), who seconded the Bill, had represented, he believed, that public-houses constituted almost the only trade carried on on Sundays. This, however, was hardly correct. The bake-houses—and this might be abundantly demonstrated in London—carried on a very large business for a class of the public who had not the means of cooking their own Sunday dinners. While he was ready to support a proposal to further limit the hours during which liquors might be sold on Sunday, he could not vote in favour of the present Bill.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have risen thus early because I think there is a general feeling on the part of the House that, whether hon. Gentlemen are in favour of this Bill or whether they are against it, a decision of the House ought to be taken upon it to-day. The country would have the advantage of knowing what is the feeling of Parliament upon the question, and how far in that respect it represents the opinions of the country. We have had a very interesting debate unquestionably upon this subject. We have had statements, shortly and clearly expressed, from Gentlemen representing constituencies who are locally and in every way entitled to express their views upon the matter. Well, Sir, as regards the general question of Sunday closing, I have no hesitation myself in saying that I am entirely in favour of Sunday closing. I believe that it is no longer a theoretical, but that it is a practical question. We have had experience now for many years in different parts of the United Kingdom. We began with Scotland, and nobody, I believe, will be bold enough to assert that the experiment that was tried in Scotland has failed, or that there are any number of persons in Scotland who desire to reverse that legislation. We proceeded to Ireland, and what has been the experience there? Is the feeling a demand for reverting that legislation? Not at all. It is a demand for completing and going further in the direction in which we have already advanced. Well, with reference to Wales, our experience has not been so long. I know there is considerable dispute on the subject of the opinion of persons in Wales upon that subject; I dare say there may be room for difference of opinion; but, as far as I know, it is not the case that the experiment has failed in Wales. I had a letter only the other day from a gentleman who is the Chairman of the Petty Sessional Division of the counties of Brecon and Glamorgan, which encloses to me the opinion of the stipendiary magistrate at Swansea, one of the most important and populous parts of Wales. He says—

"I send you the opinion of the stipendiary magistrate for the important district of Swansea with respect to the working of the Sunday Closing Act there, stated by him on the Bench on Tuesday. I may also add that the Act has been a great blessing to Wales."

Therefore, it is not the case to say that the last experiment in Wales has failed. Both my hon. Friend who moved, and my hon. Friend who seconded, this Motion stated, I think, the case extremely accurately. My hon. Friend who moved the Bill said that opinion was ripening on this question. Can anyone who views the attitude of the country on this matter, aye, and who views the attitude of this House, doubt that? How changed is the language that we hear with respect to the other side. How much support do Motions of this character receive, not only from this side of the House, but from that also, as we have seen by the speech of the Representative of Manchester (Mr. Houldsworth) and the noble Earl the Member for North Northumberland (Earl Percy)? Among the speeches we have just heard, my hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), who speaks with some authority on the part of those of the working classes who think with him, made a very wise and a very true remark—that it would be extremely inexpedient to go beyond the public opinion which has been expressed on this subject, and which, as he says, he has watched. To do so, he said, would be to defeat the objects we have in view. Now, I think the action on this matter has followed public opinion. It followed public opinion in Scotland many years ago; it has followed public opinion in Ireland, and it has followed it in Wales. Some of my hon. Friends here were desirous that it should follow public opinion in other parts of the country; and I supported, on behalf of the Government, the proposal to adopt the Sunday closing in Cornwall and in Durham. Why did I do so? Because I am satisfied—as the hon. Member for Morpeth has said he was—with reference to that part of the country specially, that public opinion was ripe and existed in an overwhelming force and majority in favour of the measure. The evidence that it was so in Cornwall was beyond dispute. People of every religious or political opinion were practically unanimous on the subject. The evidence, I think, was almost equally strong in reference to Durham. Well, what has been the course of legislation in this matter? The course of legislation has been to enact Sunday closing with reference to those communities in which the great majority of opinion was in favour of adopting it. That is what you have done, and I think you did wisely in that respect. Now, if opinion in this country were as pronounced and as clearly defined in respect to all parts of it as it unquestionably is in respect to a great part of it, I think there would be no doubt whatsoever as to what we ought to do. It is a remarkable fact that most of the speeches we have heard to-day have been from the Northern parts of England. We have had speeches from Lancashire, Northumberland, and Durham; and if I may use a general geographical expression, unquestionably there is North of the Trent an overwhelming opinion in support of the principles of this Bill. I cannot say I am satisfied when you come to the Southern parts of England that there is an equal opinion on this subject. I am not now speaking of Cornwall, which has rather an exceptional position on the map. The case of the Metropolis has been referred to, and I have in my official capacity, no doubt, a particular responsibility with reference to that; but I have not heard anything like that expression of opinion from the Metropolitan Members that I have heard from the Members from Cornwall or Durham on the subject of general Sunday closing. Now, if you are to follow what has been the safe and successful method of dealing with this question, and dealing with it in a manner which shall avoid those dangers of reaction, and of defeating that which you wish to accomplish, it seems to me that you will proceed upon the same principle and in the same manner. In supporting those measures for the Sunday closing in Durham, Cornwall, and other places, I was acting upon a principle which I also, on behalf of the Government, supported when we voted for the Resolutions of my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). We declared then our disposition to support the principle of Local Option, and to that principle I adhere. I believe these are questions which are best determined by—I was almost going to say, which can only safely be determined by—those who are conversant with the feelings and the interests of the particular community, and that, as I understand it, is the principle of Local Option. A difficulty that I feel about this Bill is in its present shape. It is not a Bill upon the principles of Local Option; but, on the contrary, it is a Bill adverse to the principle of Local Option. Because in so far as it is a Bill that gives Sunday closing to those who wish it, I am in favour of it; but in so far as it is a Bill which imposes Sunday closing upon communities adverse to it, it is a Bill contrary to the principle of Local Option. I believe you will only do mischief in these matters by endeavouring to force measures of this character upon communities where the majority would not support them. You hear it sometimes said—"Oh! this should be treated as an Imperial question;" but I think that is generally advanced by people who do not wish it to be done. They feel the difficulty of applying it everywhere, and therefore they say it must not be applied except it be made of universal application. When objection is made in these debates to "piecemeal" legislation, I maintain that all the legislation that has hitherto taken place on this subject has been piecemeal; and "piecemeal legislation," though it may be regarded as rather a dissylogistic expression, is really a sensible phrase to adopt in regard to the principle of Local

Option. On behalf of the Government, last year, I stated very clearly what we understood by that term, and what was the principle on which we thought these measures ought to be dealt with. We thought the right ought to be given to all the organized communities in the country, whether in the boroughs or counties, to determine these matters, which are so closely connected with their moral and material welfare. To that I entirely adhere. I believe that those communities like Manchester—which, by the voice of its Representatives, desire Sunday closing—should have Sunday closing; and that those communities like London—which does not ask for it—should not have Sunday closing, and that that would be far better than to pass a law which proposed to give it where it was not required. It seems to me that the principle of adaptation to the wants of each separate community, as expressed by those who understand and represent its interests, is the sound principle of dealing with these matters. My view is that each community ought to have the power of determining the whole of this question for itself—whether it should have these licensed houses at all; how many, if it had them; for what hours and during what days they should be open; and, in point of fact, that the attempt to lay down a general Procrustean Law with reference to the days or numbers of hours for each part of the country, in which the interest and the desires vary according to the localities, is not a sound principle of legislation at all. If we mean anything by local self-government, we mean that separate communities should have a right to deal with questions of this class for a country to their several interests and wants. I believe, my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle would approve of these opinions. Sir WILLIAM LAYTON: Hear, hear! I have said it was a question of areas, and I repeat it, and a question of areas is totally inconsistent with a universal law. But my hon. Friend, much as he might commend my opinion on this subject, ought to ask—"Why have you done nothing upon it?" Well, that is a very reasonable and justifiable demand; but if there be people outside this House who do not know why we have done nothing upon the subject there is no man in this House who could not perfectly well know why we have not, and why we cannot legislate upon questions so deeply interesting to the community. Laughter. and an hon. MEMBER: The Franchise Bill? Yes; the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition laughs. He smiles, I suppose, at his own success. But I would remind the House and the country—for it is to the country we have to look for relieving this—[froncal Opposition cheers];—yes; I am not speaking in the interest of one Party or another, or of one Administration or another, because you may depend upon it that those who have to succeed us will have to feel this matter quite as strongly as we do—that habits of this kind, when once created, are difficult to cure. I speak in the interest and in the credit of the House of Commons, and I ask what power there is in this House to accomplish any legislation upon very important subjects? We have now passed eight weeks of the Session of the present year—about one-third part of the Parliamentary time—and I think it will be nine weeks that will have expired before the Government will have been able to obtain the opinion of the House of Commons upon their first and principal legislative measure. Well, Sir, is it necessary, under these circumstances, to explain why it is that the Government have not been able, and are not able, to legislate upon matters of great importance—matters of such great importance as those which are raised by the Bill now before us? I should have been extremely glad—indeed, I am extremely anxious—that upon the responsibility of the Government a measure should be introduced upon the general subject—a subject which includes not merely Sunday closing but the liquor question altogether. I think it ought to be dealt with upon the principles upon which I have spoken—that is to say, the principle of giving to each locality power of disposing of these matters according to their own interest and their own wishes; and it is our desire as soon as it may be possible for us, in the difficulties with which we have to deal in legislative measures in this House, to propose such a measure for the acceptance of Parliament.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that the question was one which, apart from all Party feeling, was sure to raise strong differences of opinion and excited feeling.

The House had listened with great interest to the speech of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. As to his closing remarks, it must be remembered that the House spent six dreary weeks in November and December, 1882, in considering the Rules of Procedure, and it accepted nearly all the proposals of Her Majesty's Government which in their wisdom they intended and deemed sufficient to promote the successful conduct of Government Business in Parliament. At that time they had been told that the majority would reign, that the co-operation of an Opposition was not required; and they were assured that a good time was coming, when, if these Rules were accepted by the House, they would restore to the House its ancient reputation for the discharge of public duties. The Opposition, at least, washed its hands of any responsibility for the failure of this anticipation on the part of Her Majesty's Government. He took it that the practical question before them was how they could best promote good order and morality, and effect improvement in social manners in all those matters which tended to give strength to the country. The Secretary of State for the Home Department had asserted, in reference to this subject, that a very remarkable symptom—he was going to say of that agitation, but he would prefer to say movement—was a gradual progress of public opinion. He had referred to a great unanimity of opinion in favour of the Bill on the North side of the Trent, and a great unanimity against it South of the Trent; and he said he could not express the same accordance in the views of the supporters of the measure as they had heard from the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Houldsworth). Speaking for an important Metropolitan constituency, he (Mr. W. H. Smith) would say he believed that all his Colleagues were as anxious to do what they could to help forward the object which the hon. Member for South Shields had in view as the hon. Member himself was. They desired to reduce the amount of intemperance; to reduce the consumption of intoxicating liquor; to promote the orderly observance of Sunday; and to encourage all the habits which were necessary to the welfare of society at large. But would the measure before them attain in the Metropolis the end they had in view? He owned, that from all the information he could possess himself of, it would utterly fail to secure that object in the Metropolis itself. They were dealing in the Metropolis with what might be described as a province of houses, and with a population closely approaching 5,000,000. They were dealing, then, with a condition of things which, in his view, was such that if they passed the Bill under consideration they could not stop there. There were in the Metropolis many Clubs and other Associations whose members had the undoubted right of consuming liquor independently of all supervision or control, and people had the equally undoubted right of visiting at each other's houses, and of consuming liquor; and that right might be exercised to an extent not realized by hon. Members who were not intimately acquainted with the Metropolis, and to a less extent it would be open to the members of Associations such as those he referred to and the Clubs to obtain any amount of liquor they desired during the whole of Sunday. He could not help saying that if the Bill before the House were passed into law, those rights remaining untouched, it would be absolutely impossible for Parliament to stop there. They would have at once to deal with the matters to which he had adverted, and first of all with the question of Clubs. Then there was another question they would have to deal with—that of the bond fide traveller. At present his constituents could go to Greenwich, or Hampstead, or Turnham Green, and could require to be served at any time on Sunday. London was, as he had said, a great province—a province of houses—and it was absurd to say that an Act could be useful that would open the door for any amount of evasion, and that would immensely increase the temptation to evade the law. He was told on authority, on which he could place reliance, that the bond fide traveller was a great nuisance to the respectable publican. He must examine a man who came to him representing that he had come from a distance and demanding to be served. He had to get the assistance of persons who were most likely to be able to detect the misrepresentations of the bond fide traveller, and the duty was one which there was often

a great deal of difficulty in discharging. To suppose, therefore, that they could deal with the Licensing Law in the simple way the hon. Member for South Shields imagined he could was altogether a mistake. If they resolved to deal with the subject they must deal with it in a comprehensive manner, which would shut the door against evasion of the law, and support the honest and respectable publican, who endeavoured to carry on his business in a proper and respectable manner. But there was another thing. At the present moment the police had a right—and it was their duty—to see that the law was obeyed, so far as they were concerned; but they could not go into a Club and interfere with what they might see there. Any such interference at a Working Man's Club would be as strongly resented there as it would be at one of the Clubs in Pall Mall. They had now a decision given in the highest Court of Law, according to which a member of a Club was entitled to supply himself at the Club with a bottle of beer or spirits, or anything else, and having paid for it, to carry it away, even during prohibited hours. That was the law at the present time, and it was a condition of things that opened the door to any amount of evasions for those who wished to drink, and which those must meet who wished to prevent them doing so; and it was obviously a matter of great importance to the community at large. There was yet another condition in connection with the Licensing Laws that required to be considered. Under the present law the lodger was permitted to have any amount of drink he pleased. Now, they know very well that at the East End of London, and he was sorry to say at the West End also, there were licensed houses not of the highest class, with lodgers not of the highest character, and they would have this peculiarity—under the Bill of the hon. Member for South Shields—that the lodger of bad character, in a house of inferior reputation, might obtain any amount of drink he pleased, and that lodger might then sally forth and make himself the terror of the vicinity on a Sunday; while a respectable lodger in another and respectable house was not to be allowed to obtain the food or drink which, according to his habits, might be necessary for his proper sustenance. That was a condition which involved a man's liberty, and which must not be ignored. He believed the Metropolitan Members desired to go as far as they could with safety, without tempting to evasion or to illicit trading, or leading men to do that in the dark which they would be prohibited doing in the light, in discouraging the habit of drinking, and lessening the number of hours during which drinking houses should be open; but they wished to approach step by step, rather than by one leap, to the end which the Bill had in view. Let them go on slowly and surely, and he was certain the success would be more real, and lasting, and beneficial to the community at large.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he thought the Bill enunciated a very large principle. It had been stated by many of its supporters that they would not insist on including the Metropolis in its operation; but the Metropolis was included in it. He did not suppose that those who brought it forward supposed it was at all likely to pass, or even desired that it should. He gave them credit for a wish to promote temperance; but he protested against its being imputed to those who were opposed to this Bill that they were in favour of intemperance. The Home Secretary said he could not see his way to including the Metropolis in the list of towns that should be closed on Sunday. He could well believe that; and he did not wish to see the right hon. and learned Gentleman charged with the responsibility of maintaining order in the Metropolis in the event of the Bill becoming law. He was not at all surprised at his saying, therefore, that he was not in favour of the Bill. But the Metropolis protested against being legislated for by the Northern portion of the country. The Gentlemen whose names appeared on the back of the Bill were all of them thoroughly amiable and respectable, and he had no doubt their intentions in promoting it were perfectly estimable; but if their Bill should pass, he told them they would find it impossible to put it in operation in London. The population of the Metropolis at present amounted to 5,000,000. In 10 years' time its population would be vastly larger even than that. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) referred the other day to the number of splendid institutions that existed in London, which were centres of knowledge, and exercised a most beneficial influence, and he also said that the people of London were the most law-abiding people in the whole Kingdom. That was a very remarkable fact, because the state of things to which the right hon. Gentleman referred existed under the present law for opening and closing public-houses. It was not for him to say what might be most beneficial for the Northern towns; but from his knowledge of the Metropolis he could say that if the Bill became law it would bring down upon the Government an immense responsibility. The measure would not carry out the objects which its promoters had in view; but it would cause a great deal of irritation, and would induce men to drink in secret more than they would be disposed to do in public, and to consume the vilest compounds. He protested against a majority ruling a minority in this matter. A large number of Petitions had, no doubt, been presented in favour of the Bill; but those Petitions were signed by people who did not use public-houses, and who wished to prevent other people having an opportunity of using them. He was most anxious, in every possible manner, to promote temperance; but he certainly did not think that the closing of public-houses on Sunday would have that result. They should be very careful how they restricted the liberty of the people; and he hoped the House would give a vote upon the Bill that afternoon which would settle the question for some time to come.

MR. MARRIOTT: The hon. Member who has just sat down (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) represents a Metropolitan constituency, and though I have not the honour to represent a Metropolitan constituency, I have the honour to represent one that is very close to London, and in the South of England. If the Bill is passed in its present despotic form, utterly irrespective of those principles of Local Option which have been so frequently advocated in this House on both sides—if this Bill were passed in its present form, the pleasures of thousands of people who now seek the sea breeze at Brighton would be immensely curtailed, if not utterly destroyed. A good deal of reference has been made to the feeling of the Northern towns upon this question. I have great respect for the Northern towns; but if the Northern workmen have not sufficient control over themselves to take only a sufficient amount of alcoholic liquors, is that any reason why they should stop, or attempt to stop, workmen and other people in the South of England from taking them? I have heard that in some of the large towns, famed for their practical intelligence, there is an immense amount of drunkenness; but if their drunkenness thus goes hand-in-hand with their intelligence, are those who have less intelligence to be punished for those who have more, and are yet unable to keep sober? The subject that is brought before the House by this Bill is a very important one. With the object of the Bill there is no doubt that every person must cordially and heartily sympathize. Everybody wants to see temperance promoted and intemperance checked. The real question is, will not this Bill produce greater evils than exist under the present laws? I do not know what other hon. Members of this House may think; but I must say that I watch with very great anxiety the principle that is now finding great favour—that is, of State interference with the private affairs of life. The Liberalism which prevails at the present day is not, I regret to say, of the robust type of the Liberalism of 50 years ago, which had such exponents as Bentham, John Stuart Mill, Sir William Molesworth, Sir George Cornewall Lewis, Richard Cobden, and the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright). The principle of that Liberalism was that the less the State interfered with individual liberty, and the more it left individuals to control themselves, the better it was for individuals, and the better also for the State. This Bill proposes to take away the liberty of the country at a stroke, and interferes directly with the convenience of the entire working class of the country. That seems to me a very grave step for this House to take. Now, Sir, we know that before this restrictive legislation has been put in force that the habits of drunkenness and of intemperance have decreased enormously during the last few years in this country. What are the causes of drunkenness? Drunkenness, 50 or 60 years ago, was not con-

finned to the lower classes as it is now. The higher classes were contaminated with the vice, and the youth of the country at our Universities were contaminated with it. The reason why it has since disappeared from them is, not that restrictive measures have exercised a beneficial coercion, but because young men have been able to cultivate better and more healthy tastes, through the agency of Associations for promoting sports and amusements, and innocent recreation. What applies to the gentry applies equally well to the working classes; and if we are asked what really are the remedies for drunkenness, I should say that the best remedy is to promote education, to promote recreation, and to open Parks and open spaces, where the poorer classes can have their cricket and other games and amusements of all kinds. We know that 25 years ago there was not a single Working Man's Club in the whole of the United Kingdom. At the present time I believe there are over 1,000, the great majority of which are non-political. The working classes meet there, and amuse themselves at billiards, or in other ways. At a number of them intoxicating liquors are sold. Drunkenness is never heard of at these Clubs, for the rules are against it, and the members enjoy the same privileges as the richer classes have at their Clubs. These are the instruments which we ought to rely upon for decreasing the evil of drunkenness. I am aware that to spend money on educating the people is a more tedious thing than bringing Bills into Parliament which will have a compulsory effect; but it is a much more certain and a much more sure way of dealing with the question. There is no doubt that statistics show that in the last 50 years the condition of the working classes has improved in every way, and in a much greater ratio than the position of the upper classes. For these reasons, I think that we ought not to have regard to any of these compulsory measures. They are sure to fail, and there is one way in which they may fail and work an enormous evil. I have spoken of Working Men's Clubs, and there is no better thing than a legitimate Working Man's Club; but this measure is calculated to produce what I may call a bogus Working Man's Club, or a public-house without a licence, and nothing could be worse than this.

All these, I think, are reasons why hon. Members should vote against the Bill. The hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), who is much interested in this subject, had recourse to a Resolution in favour of Local Option, which I supported; but I know that Resolution was differently interpreted by hon. Members. I consider that the Local Authority should have power over the licensing of public-houses. In 1835 the power of licensing public-houses was given to Town Councils by the Municipal Corporation Bill; but that portion of the Bill was struck out by the Peers. In my opinion, it is a pity it was so struck out. I should like to see the control in this matter in the hands of the town authorities. I do not know that it would diminish public-houses; it may possibly increase them. As regards what was said by the Home Secretary when he asked what power has the House to deal with such legislation, I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman had recourse to that same retort, which, I am sorry to say, the Government have recourse to when they have not done that which they ought to have done. He cast his glances over to the Opposition side of the House, and intimated that those who sit there are responsible for what he calls want of legislation. I distinctly repudiate that. If there is any blame to attach to anybody it is solely and entirely to Her Majesty's Government. Instead of bringing in measures which would interest the whole people, they choose to bring in measures which are political engines for increasing political power, and which cannot tend to the amelioration of the condition of the people. There was one measure promised by the Government when it was returned to power, that was County Government; and if that Bill were brought in, the whole subject of licensing might have been dealt with. That course would have been far more acceptable to Members generally than to compel them to vote for measures dealing with only particular counties. If the Government had brought in a good Bill dealing with the Licensing Question it would have been supported by the majority of the House; but by the course they have pursued we are now compelled to wait for an indefinite period.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY said, that, as it was not yet 5 o'clock, he could speak without incurring the suspicion of desiring to talk the Bill out. On behalf of the constituency which he represented (Sheffield), he would vote against the Bill now before the House. He believed that the majority of his constituents were opposed to the Bill. [An hon. MEMBER: No, no!] An hon. Member opposite said "No, no!" but he wished it to be distinctly understood that he had been returned to Parliament in spite of his having refused to give any pledge to support this Bill. He believed the feeling of the borough which he represented had increased against a measure of this character since his election. There existed in that borough a temperance party, which was not behind any other temperance party in any other borough in the extreme character of its action. Not only that, but he would remark, seeing some extremely large Petitions in front of him, that he had himself, two years ago, presented a Petition against the Bill which was a quarter of a mile in length, and which was signed by householders who gave their names, addresses, and occupations. Under these circumstances, he was opposed to the restriction which it was sought to impose on the liberty of the subject by the hon. Member for South Shields. He was aware that it was argued that there was a great public desire in favour of the Bill. That might be; but popular desire should not be allowed to control private liberty. It was only when private liberty was opposed to the public welfare that such restriction would be justified. It was only when the breach of self-regarding duties was carried to excess that the State had a right to interfere. To interfere with the right of private individuals to obtain refreshments was one of those instances in which the right of the State would be pushed to excess. With those views he should vote for the Amendment. It was rather in the direction of restrictions that the House should endeavour to move. If the measure was good for Sunday it was equally good for every day in the week. Such legislation would, he thought, be better directed to the Saturday evenings, when the working man had his wages burning in his pocket. The Bill, too, if good for any time, was good for any place, and, therefore, was just as applicable to London as to any other part of the country. But the hon. Member found such a weight of public opinion against him on that point that he would not dare to keep London in the Bill.

MR. THOMAS COLLINS said, he was opposed to the new custom of reading a Bill a second time on the understanding that a totally different measure should come out from Committee; and, as had been pointed out by his hon. Friend (Mr. Stuart-Wortley), the promoters of the Bill were prepared to excise from its scope something like 5,000,000 people within the Metropolitan area. He looked upon the Bill as an electioneering measure. He was an advocate for getting rid of the drinking habits of the people on Sunday, and allowing the publicans to have their Sundays to themselves; but, in his opinion, such an object should be attained by degrees—by gradually diminishing the hours during which intoxicating liquors might be sold. It was not merely on Sundays, but on week-days as well, that additional restrictions should be imposed upon the liquor traffic. He had always looked with disfavour on the alteration which had been made in Lord Aberdare's Bill. It was much more reasonable to close public-houses at half-past 11 than at half-past 12; and, therefore, the last Parliament committed an error of judgment in extending the hours of drinking on week days in the Metropolis. The whole Metropolis, which was seven miles by nine miles in extent, ought not to be made to conform to the tastes of the Strand, and three or four other streets with an inconsiderable population. They should be very cautious in what they did, because instead of bringing about what they all desired—namely, a gradual shortening of the hours during which drink might be sold, they might produce a revulsion of feeling which would throw the matter back for years. Beer was the only good healthy beverage an Englishman could drink. An hon. Member (Mr. E. Collins) had said he drank nothing but water for the first 28 years of his life. He must be a remarkable exception to the general body of mankind, for milk was, he thought, the universal diet in early years. He admitted that there was a strong opinion in the North of England in favour of the Bill, irrespective of politics. But it was to be remembered that a few years ago a too stringent

Liquor Bill had been passed, which Parliament was soon after obliged to repeal. He regretted that this Bill had been pressed forward instead of the measure for curtailing the hours during which public-houses should be open on Sundays, and which would have met with cordial support in all parts of the House. The Home Secretary had complained that the Government had not had an opportunity of dealing with many social questions, owing to the persistent Obstruction that they constantly met with. He regretted the absence of the Prime Minister; but could not refrain from saying that he was certainly the greatest Obstructionist in the House. Only a few days ago he occupied not less than 17 minutes in answering a simple Question. The right hon. Gentleman ought to take a lesson from the Home Secretary and abridge his remarks, thus affording the Government an opportunity of carrying out domestic and social legislation.

MR. CLARE READ: In the course of this debate a great many hon. Members have expressed their opinions as to what would or what would not happen in the event of this Sunday Closing Bill being accepted by the House and passed into law. I think it would, perhaps, be well, and might prove useful to the House, if those who have had some little experience in other countries as to what really does happen when similar measures have been adopted and put into force were to state to the House the nature of that experience. Now, Sir, it happened that in the year 1879 my hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) and myself spent some six months in America; and I remember that on one occasion, when we were at a place called Dallas, in Texas, we went one Sunday evening to the Cathedral, and there heard a very eloquent discourse from the Bishop, who, however, like a good many other eloquent men, detained us for a very long time while he preached his most excellent sermon. The result was that when we returned to the inn where we were staying we found that the room in which the refreshments were usually served had been shut up and that we could not get any tea. On my suggesting to the waiter that instead of a cup of tea it would be possible that a bottle of lager beer or stout might be obtained at the bar, he informed us that the bar had been shut up all day; and, consequently, we were obliged to go thirsty and supperless to bed. Upon my mentioning to a friend at the breakfast-table on the following morning what had occurred over night, he said to me—"Are you not aware that there are always two doors to the bar?" I replied that I was not aware of that fact; and he rejoined—"On the next occasion when you are told that the bar is shut up, ask to be shown where the back-door is." Well, Sir, it happened that on the very next Sunday my hon. Friend and I were staying at an hotel in a large town in the central portion of America, and we thought we would try the experiment which had been thus suggested by our friend at Dallas. Accordingly, towards the evening of that day, being in want of some refreshment, we asked where the back-door of the bar was, and, to our great astonishment, when we had been shown to the bar by that entrance, we found rather more persons regaling themselves in that portion of the hotel than were to be found there on other evenings during the week. On our happening to observe the singular fact that, although it was then still daylight, the window-blinds were all carefully drawn down and the gas lighted, I ventured to ask the reason for this, and was informed by the proprietor of the place that he had received a gentle hint from the police to the effect that if the officers happened to see that the bar was not closed it would be their duty to issue a summons, and in consequence of this the manager had considerably put down the blinds, so that the police might not be induced to take such a course. That, Sir, is what occurs in America; and I greatly fear that something of the same sort is not unlikely to prevail in this country should the House of Commons be induced to pass such a measure as this. In my opinion, it is the very worst mode of legislation to pass Acts of Parliament which may be thus evaded—laws that are merely called into existence for the purpose of satisfying the tender consciences of a few good men, but which are more or less repugnant to the feelings of the great majority of the people of this country. I may also inform the House—and I think my hon. Friend (Mr. Pell) will confirm what I am about to state—that in the town of Dallas, to which I have already referred, where such business is supposed to be put a stop to on a Sunday, we saw more drunken men than in any other town we visited while in America. I recollect that it was a very hot day when we were there, and early in the morning we saw a number of men on a common—or what we in England would call a common—just outside the city, regaling themselves with whisky, which they had, of course, secured overnight. Now, Sir, I am one of those who think that the hours during which the public-houses are open on a Sunday might be very usefully and properly curtailed; but I do object—especially in a country like England, where beer is the principal beverage of the people, and where it is impossible to get that beer on a Saturday night and keep it good and fresh until the Sunday morning—to the entire closing of the public-houses, which I think would be a very great hardship to the working classes. I shall, therefore, vote against the second reading of this Bill, and give my cordial support to the Amendment of the hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. J. G. Talbot).

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he had not heard a single argument in favour of the Bill which would not equally apply to every day in the week. He had been lately asked by a member of a religious body to vote against the Bill because drinking on Sunday was contrary to Divine law. If it was contrary to Divine law on Sunday, it must be so on every other day in the week. Some hon. Members might think it contrary to Divine law to eat hot meat on Sunday; others thought it contrary to Divine law to eat meat on Friday. He thought they might let alone the religious aspect of the question. Then, in regard to the question of drunkenness, it had been proved, beyond the possibility of doubt, that there were far fewer cases of drunkenness on Sunday than on any other day in the week. How was it possible, then, to deduce from that the necessity of passing this unjust law? The hon. Member hoped to carry the second reading by the votes of Members on his own side, many of whom believed there was a strong political force at the back of the measure; and he (Mr. Bentinck) was satisfied that if they only had vote by Ballot in the House they would not get 50 Members to vote for it. The hon. Member for

Guildford (Mr. Onslow) had obtained a Return which was very useful reading. He found that in Cumberland, where he believed there was no desire for this Bill, in a population of 115,000 the number of persons arrested for drunkenness in the year was only 116; but in the city of Carlisle, where the influence of the hon. Baronet (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) was paramount, out of a population of 36,000 there were 108 arrests, or nearly as many as in the whole county, with a population of 115,000. He also found that a vast proportion of those arrested on Sunday for drunkenness really got the drink on Saturday night, so that the drunkenness on Sunday was really very much less. There really was hardly time to get drunk on Sunday. The houses closed at 11, and were not open again until half-past 12; then they were closed again at half-past 2, and open again at 6. It was impossible that any large number could get drunk within those times. Drunkenness had decreased among the middle classes, and would in time decrease among the lower. When he was at the University, cases of drunkenness were of every day occurrence; but now it was not so. He remembered being asked to join a Club, one of whose rules was that five toasts should be drunk, and a bottle of port consumed in drinking them; he did not feel that he could carry so much liquor, so he declined to join the Club. Matters were completely changed now, and he should like to ask the hon. Members for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) and Drogheda (Mr. Whitworth) whether it was really intended that persons should not be allowed to obtain refreshment on Sunday? He could hardly believe that they would maintain that proposition; but if they closed the public-houses on Sunday he should like to know where men were to get even a morsel of bread—they might be starving and unable to supply their wants. Only last Sunday a man asked him for a penny to buy a bit of cheese, and he asked him where he was going to get it. He replied at the public-house. They were always crying about cheap bread, and were they really going to deny bread to the people on Sunday? If that were not so, he should like them to tell him where it was to be got after the Licensed Victuallers' houses were closed? But the most important point in the Bill was the injustice which it involved. Why did they deal with the Licensed Victualler only? Why did they not attack Clubs and private houses also? If they deprived the poor man of his enjoyment on Sunday, why did they not also attack the Sovereign in her Palace, or the great Duke in his Palace? Why were they to be treated differently from poor persons? He would put it to the hon. Member whether he did not know perfectly well that in London there were a great many proprietary Clubs; and he asked him if it was proposed by this Bill to close these houses? ["Divide!"] He did not wonder at Members desiring to divide. He was strongly of opinion that in this matter, as in others, force was no remedy. He was as much in favour of temperance as any man in the world, but the present Bill was not consistent; it was only a piecemeal Bill, and for the reasons he had given he should oppose it.

Mr. STORER said, he wished to give in a very few words the reasons why he could not vote for this Bill. In the first place, it involved the tyranny of a minority over the majority of the country. Further, he felt that the measure which had been brought forward was only preliminary to a far wider measure—the prohibition of the sale of alcoholic liquors not only on Sunday, but on every day in the week. If there had been an increase in drunkenness there might be some ground for the measure; but there was nothing of the kind. He was in the habit of going about a good deal in the country on Sunday, and he saw nothing but perfect order on that day; a case of drunkenness very rarely came under his notice. As to Petitions, they knew how they were got up, and the power that was behind the agitation. Sunday closing, where it had been introduced, had not produced any diminution in drunkenness. The Report of the Inland Revenue showed that in England, where Sunday closing was not in force, there had been a decrease in the quantity of spirits consumed of 1·73. In Scotland, where Sunday closing was in force, the decrease was only 0·7 per cent; and in Ireland, where it was also in force, there had been an actual increase. If the Returns proved anything, it was that in places where Sunday closing prevailed there was an increase in the consumption of alcoholic liquors. There could be no doubt that the influence of temperance was causing a diminution in the drinking habits of the country. Why, then, was it necessary to interfere in the manner proposed by the Bill? He protested against the proposal to treat the working man as a child, by assuming that he could not pass a public-house without getting drunk.

Mr. TOMLINSON said, he had been waiting in his place all the afternoon to catch the Speaker's eye, but had not succeeded. He desired to contradict the statement, which had been made by several hon. Members representing the Southern constituencies, that the reason why the feeling in favour of the Bill was strong in the North of England was that the people there were more given to drinking habits than others. That notion was quite unfounded. The working classes of Lancashire would compare well with the working classes in any other part of the country. With regard to his own constituency, he had been pressed by both sides; but he must bear testimony to their sobriety, for he had lately passed an evening with a large number of the working classes where there was opportunity to drink to excess, and the conduct, on the whole, would have done credit to an assembly of any social class. The intention of the Bill, as expressed in the Memorandum, was to make the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sundays illegal. But the Bill itself, instead of this, proposed that licensed houses should be closed on Sunday. He thought that in making that proposal they were going on a wrong principle. It would be better to seek to encourage the sale of non-intoxicating drinks by confining the prohibition during certain hours to the sale of alcoholic liquors. It must be admitted by hon. Members who supported the Bill that they were rather shy of referring to the experiment in Wales. The Home Secretary had obtained a somewhat favourable expression of opinion; but it certainly did not agree with the information which had reached him, which was of the kind to which other Members had access, and he believed that most of them had arrived at the conclusion that the experiment had been by no means successful.

Mr. GILES said, his breakfast-table had been covered every morning with pamphlets on both sides of the question, and if he had read everything it would have taken the whole day. The conclusion to which he was driven was that anything could be proved by figures. There were, however, many enthusiasts in the good cause who thought no one ought to drink a glass of beer. He had himself heard it said in Exeter Hall that a moderate drinker was worse than a drunkard; and when he heard such a statement, he could not help thinking that the speaker had lost his own common sense by drinking too much water. The claim of the advocates of Sunday closing to place to their credit the diminished amount of drinking which took place was not well-founded. Other causes were at work, and especially the general tendency to sobriety which existed. The lower classes followed the lead of the upper. In former times drunkenness was considered no disgrace; but if a man in society now exceeded the bounds of moderation, he soon found that he had made a serious mistake. If the House passed that Bill they would lay themselves open to the charge of making one law for the rich and another for the poor. The poor man, having no Club to go to, should not be deprived of his reasonable privilege. Let them punish the drunkard, and punish him heavily; but let them leave the sober man in possession of his privileges, so that he might be an example to his weaker brethren.

Mr. WARTON said, he hoped the Bill would not pass, because they were all in a false position with regard to it. The Mover, because he had brought in a Bill without any reflection whatever, which was clear from his willingness to exclude the Metropolis from its provisions. The Government were in a false position, because under an engagement to bring forward the question of Local Government, in which was to be included the question of Local Option; and the House was in a false position, because they had two propositions before them in regard to neither of which were they agreed. With reference to the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, he must say, without having time to go through them in detail, that his observations in the case of Wales were very slight indeed. He only quoted one opinion—that of the stipendiary at Swansea. He (Mr. Warton) could quote many cases to show that the Act had not worked successfully there; but he would content himself with the case of Cardiff. In April, 1883, seven months after the Act had come into operation, the Chief Constable of Cardiff reported to the Watch Committee that the convictions for drunkenness on Sunday had increased 60 per cent. The Home Secretary did not say a word about Cardiff. During those seven months there were established 12 additional Clubs, and the Chief Constable stated his belief that no fewer than 48 persons were engaged in carrying on an illicit trade. In October a still further increase was reported.

It being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF ALBANY.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (THE EARL SYDNEY) reported the Queen's Answer to the Address of Monday last as follows:—

"I return you My sincere thanks for your loyal and dutiful Address, and for your sympathy with Me in the great trial and loss which I have sustained in the death of My beloved Son.

"I am deeply sensible of your loyalty and devotion, and I have received with satisfaction the assurance of the interest you take in all that concerns the happiness of Myself and My Family."

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

(NO. 45.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, called attention to the fact that it was a much milder measure than the Bill which passed through their Lordships' House last year; many provisions of that Bill were omitted, and many additional safeguards introduced. It differed also in form. The present Bill was divided into three parts—the first relating to the suppression of prostitution, the second to the suppression of brothels, while the third contained definitions and other miscellaneous matter. With regard to the first part, some of the clauses were in the same form as last year; others had been modified. The Government, in framing the measure, had endeavoured not to go beyond public opinion, and many persons, on that account, might consider the Bill inadequate; but it had been their object to keep their efforts within such limits as would be approved by public opinion as represented by 12 jurymen. Their Lordships would judge how far the efforts of the Government had been successful; at the same time, they would admit that the necessity for some measure was beyond all doubt—a fact which was affirmed last year in that House by reading the Bill a second time without a Division. In other countries female chastity was protected up to the age of 21; in this country it was not, and it was admitted that juvenile prostitution was largely on the increase, especially in London. There was a good deal of evidence to show that the Contagious Diseases Acts had worked beneficially in some respects. Since the beginning of the year 22 Memorials and Resolutions had been presented bearing testimony to the beneficial working of those Acts in reducing disease and juvenile prostitution. Those Memorials appeared to be spontaneous, and fairly to represent the state of opinion in the districts from which they came; and the second portion of the Bill was founded, in some degree, on the Report of a Select Committee of the House of Commons, which expressed the opinion that the Contagious Diseases Acts had diminished prostitution and suppressed juvenile prostitution in the subjected districts, and which recommended that additional and more absolute powers should be given to the police. Of course, these recommendations were not sufficient to justify a Bill of this kind if it was wrong; but a recommendation of a Select Committee of that kind raised some presumption in its favour. In their Lordships' Committee evidence had been given that juvenile prostitution had been carried on chiefly in low-class brothels, and that it was impossible to deal with the question unless additional powers were given for dealing with these brothels. The powers given to householders by the Act of George II. upon the subject were very seldom used, because of the opprobrium which their exercise brought on those who made use of them. This Bill created no new offence whatever. Under the law as it now stood, keeping a brothel was an offence punishable by fine and imprisonment; it was now proposed to make it an offence liable to summary proceedings. The 12th clause provided for the determination of tenancies by the landlord in the case of the premises being used as a brothel. In the 13th clause of the Bill there was an error in the wording; the words "there is reasonable cause to suspect" should be left out. Those words had been cut out last year as being too drastic. In dealing with this question, Her Majesty's Government knew that it was impossible to deal with vice of any kind by legislation in the present state of society and of human nature, and this Bill was not intended to be a measure for the suppression of vice. All they could do was to compel brothel-keepers to carry on their business so that, on the one hand, they should not be an annoyance to their respectable neighbours, nor, on the other, hold out any open temptation to either sex. For this reason the Government proposed, by the 13th clause, to make the keeping of such a house an offence which should be dealt with summarily. It was not intended that the police should attempt to put down all brothels forthwith. The clause empowered a Justice of the Peace to issue a search warrant on the information by oath of any Superintendent or Inspector of Police. In attempting to deal with these houses in such a manner, they had not been without the results of experience in the matter. Acts of Parliament had been passed dealing with the subject, more especially for the towns of Leamington and Glasgow. Those Acts had worked satisfactorily; and with regard to the proposal of the noble Earl (the Earl of Milltown) to refer the measure to a Select Committee, he trusted that their Lordships would not agree to it. He did not pretend that the Bill as it stood was a perfect measure; in fact, one part of it the Government intended to amend. The whole subject was a very difficult one; and it was not so much a question of principle as of degree. He would ask their Lordships not to refer the Bill to a Select Committee on three grounds. In the first place, the Bill did not deal with any new question at all, but with one which had been before their Lordships last year, and had been discussed at very great length. Secondly, the subject-matter with which it dealt had been already investigated by two Select Committees, and he did not think that any fresh evidence would be brought out. If the Bill did require any amendment, he did not see why that should not be done in its passage through their Lordships' House. A third reason was the delay which would thus be caused; a similar measure had been lost last year in the House of Commons through the lateness of the time at which it was introduced into that House. The Bill was one in which a large number of persons were deeply interested; and he hoped that it would not be delayed by being sent to a Select Committee.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>."
—(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, that, although the measure before them was not so severe as that of last year, it was so extremely faulty in construction that it was absolutely impossible to amend it in Committee of the Whole House. Nothing could be more unjustifiable than to pass a Bill of that character, simply because the noble Earl appeared to think that any Bill was better than no Bill at all. The first two clauses of the Act were much the same as passed last year; but in the 3rd clause there was a considerable enlargement, because, while the present law applied to women under age, this clause applied to women of any age. The 4th clause was simply the law as at present existing. It was identical with the 3rd section of 38 & 39 Vict., c. 94. He thought that if that enactment should be repealed, it would be most desirable to provide adequate punishment for the attempt to commit the felony. While making an outrage on a child under 12 years of age a felony, it left the attempt still only a misdemeanour entailing a really inadequate punishment. This was all the more extraordinary, since in the next clause they had met the attempt and the actual crime with the same punishment. Although the crime so dealt with was only a misdemeanour, there would be nothing novel in making it a felony to attempt to commit a felony, as this had been done in several instances. Clause 7 extended the protection at present given in the case of girls under

16 abducted for any purpose to girls of 18 abducted for an immoral purpose. He could not see why, supposing that extension was adhered to, an unmarried girl of that age should be the only one who was protected. Why should not a married servant girl, for instance, be as much protected as an unmarried one? Clause 8 extended the power of the Metropolitan Police by enabling them to arrest any woman who importuned persons in the street, whether she annoyed the passengers or not. No doubt something should be done to rescue the streets from their present shameful condition; but that Bill would put an enormous power in the hands of the police. He wished to speak of that force with every possible respect. It was an admirable body, which, as a whole, did its duty efficiently, humanely, and well. But at the same time it was a large army of more than 10,000, and in such a host there must be some men of indifferent character; and their Lordships should be careful not to place in their hands an engine of extortion upon those unhappy girls. The Bill said that the Court, in the case of any girl under 16 so offending, might, if she was under no guardianship, send her to a certified home. Surely any girl under 16 who was found to have so acted should be sent to a certified home—if there was such a thing—whether she was under the power of any guardian or not. Then he came to the question of the homes to which they were to be sent. There were no such places in existence; but in Clause 9 of the Bill there was a provision for constituting them. One of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State might, subject to certain conditions, grant to any person, or to two or more persons jointly, a certificate authorizing them to keep a home, he supposed, for the reception of those outcasts; but there was no provision made for any inspection of those homes, or with regard to their management. What the girls were to do when incarcerated was not stated. Above all, the Bill gave what the people of this country strongly objected to—namely, power to private persons to become gaolers. Every one of those girls would be reluctant prisoners. Moreover, there was no provision for making the parents of those children contribute to their support, thus holding out a premium to such parents to send their children into the streets. If, again, the police did their duty under that section, the number of those waifs and strays whom they would have to arrest would be counted by the thousand; for it was estimated that at present in the Metropolis there were over 80,000 of those wretched females, a large proportion of them being children. He now came to the part of the Bill relating to brothels. After their Lordships had decided last year, upon full consideration, by a majority of 28, that it was inexpedient to overload the Bill with provisions respecting such houses, he was surprised to find those provisions—or provisions very nearly to the same effect—again introduced into the present Bill. The noble Earl said that the object of Clause 11 was to give summary jurisdiction to magistrates over persons who kept brothels, instead of dealing with them by indictment, and to inflict imprisonment without the option of a fine; but on conviction any such person was made liable for the first offence to any penalty not exceeding £20, or, in the discretion of the Court, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labour. Was there any public demand for fresh legislation on that subject? Under the present state of the law, to keep a disorderly house of that character was a misdemeanour at Common Law, because it was a nuisance; and there existed no difficulty whatever in putting a stop to those nuisances and getting those houses suppressed whenever the inhabitants of the neighbourhood desired it. Therefore that attempt to do more in the matter seemed to him Quixotic. Section 13, giving power to a constable to obtain a search warrant over any householder's premises seemed to him a very extraordinary provision. To keep a disorderly house was, as he had said, a misdemeanour at Common Law, because it was a nuisance; and yet it was supposed that to discover that nuisance it was necessary to examine and pry all over the house. There was no necessity for anything of the kind; nothing was more easy than to get the evidence of the neighbours, or to place a constable near the door to notice those who came and went. Nothing more objectionable than to grant a search warrant to enter everybody's house and try to discover what was going on there could well be conceived. Nor was the remedy of an action, as suggested by the noble Earl, in the event of a house when searched turning out not to be of the character that had been supposed, a very certain or satisfactory one. He very much doubted whether any such action would lie, unless express malice could be proved. These were among the chief reasons why he thought the Bill could not be properly amended in Committee of the Whole House. He yielded to no Member of their Lordships House, or to anyone out of it, in his anxiety to remedy, and, if possible, to suppress the terrible evils which the evidence before their Lordships' Committee had disclosed; and, so far as this Bill proceeded in that direction, it had his humble and most hearty support. It was with the object of rendering the Bill more efficient for that purpose, to make it a reality and not a sham, and also to get rid of provisions which now overloaded it, and which might lead to its shipwreck "elsewhere," that he ventured to ask their Lordships to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. He felt bound to add, however, that in his judgment it was not by penal legislation of this kind, however severe, or however drastic, that their Lordships would remedy those terrible evils which had been found to exist. It was rather by such measures as those which had been so nobly inaugurated by the noble Marquess who sat below him (the Marquess of Salisbury), in rendering decent the homes of the inhabitants of our great cities, and whose present condition was a dark blot on our boasted civilization, and anything but a credit to our wealthy Established Church. In thousands of thousands of those miserable homes—to use the word in such a connection seemed but a mockery—decency was impossible, morality was unknown, and the name of the Most High was never used, except for the purposes of blasphemy or obscenity. It was from such polluted sources that those horrid streams of vice which offended the eyes of their Lordships and the public flowed; and while these terrible sources of evil were left uncared for, to increase and multiply day by day and hour by hour, all such legislation as that now before the House would, he believed, prove but another delusion, mockery, and snare.

The Earl of Milltown

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN begged to move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

Moved, "That the Bill be referred to a Select Committee."—(The Earl of Milltown.)

EARL CAIRNS said, with regard to the subject-matter of the Bill, a criticism of the wording of it would be more usefully conducted in the proposed Committee than in a Committee of the Whole House; but he did not see any reason why there should be any delay in disposing of criticism of this kind. In any event, he hoped that the Bill would not be delayed by the reconsideration of the whole matter.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was glad to hear what had been said by the noble and learned Earl who had just spoken, because it was not possible for him to foresee what the decision of the House might be upon the Motion of the noble Earl (the Earl of Milltown). It would certainly be matter for regret if the House should think fit to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, and allow the whole subject and the evidence to be re-opened. Whatever objections there might be to the course suggested by the noble Earl, it would occupy very much less time and delay than if the whole grounds of the Bill were investigated by the Select Committee. While recognizing the excellent spirit of the speech made by the noble Earl who proposed this Motion, yet he must remark that the noble Earl had, in his opinion, furnished good arguments against his own Motion. He had gone through the clauses of the Bill, and his criticisms of the measure had been as able as they usually were. These criticisms, however, had not suggested any questions which it would be difficult for the House in full Committee to discuss. That course was followed last year with a larger and more difficult measure. The House had plenty of time to dispose of at present, and he could not help thinking it unnecessary to follow the course suggested by the noble Earl.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, with reference to the question of time, their Lordships were not oppressed by Business, and there was no danger of Obstruction arising at a later period which would prevent the Bill going forward until it reached "another place." The delays in "another place" were such that it was not likely that the measure could be considered there for many months. He, therefore, thought there was some hollowness in the plea of time. With reference to referring the Bill to a Select Committee, he confessed that he should prefer that course. The noble Earl last year expressed an opinion in that sense, which he was not, however, in a position to grant. His feeling was, that it was a matter of very great difficulty to discuss this question in the Whole House and with the reporters present. He earnestly hoped, with a view to the probability of this Bill passing and securing the assent of the House, the objections made by the noble Earl who had moved this Motion would be tested in a Select Committee. They seemed to be, as far as he could judge, sound and full of force. They must not conceal from themselves that in parts of this Bill they were entering into new legislative territory, in respect to which considerable antagonism might be aroused. Formerly they had always dealt with the question of brothels as nuisances, and claimed the right to repress them; but the ground they were now taking was that of attacking these houses from a moral point of view, and dealing with them as an evil in themselves. There was, undoubtedly, a very wide logical chasm between the law as it was sought to be passed and the law as it existed.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he thought there were certain difficulties in going into a Select Committee with a Bill of this kind. He thought the measure was much more likely to be favourably received in the House of Commons, and its progress through that House would be much more facilitated if the arguments in reference to the Bill were urged from both sides of their Lordships' House rather than that there should be any secret conclave without any person knowing what had been said.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Bill committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 29th instant.

MEDICAL ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Lord President.)

(NO. 34.) THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL), in moving that the Bill be now read a third time, said, he had received a Petition from the British Medical Association, which was a body of great importance, containing the names of 10,000 registered members of the Medical Profession, and comprising a large proportion of the physicians and surgeons in the hospitals, and the physicians and lecturers attached to the various medical schools throughout the Kingdom, praying that the Bill might be passed into law during the present Session.

—(The Lord President.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he wished, before the Bill left their Lordships' House, to make a few observations in regard to a topic which had been alluded to slightly in the House, and which, he thought, was very likely to meet with some discussion elsewhere. This Bill was undoubtedly a compromise between the opinions of those who held that all medical authorities ought to preserve full liberty to issue medical licences, and those who considered the licences ought to be given only after State examinations. He did not suppose the Lord President was so sanguine as to expect that under these circumstances the Government Bill would meet with the approbation of all the persons and authorities and interests concerned. At the same time, he thought there could be no doubt that the Bill met with a considerable amount of general approbation; and it was very much to be desired, both in the interest of the public and the medical authorities themselves, that the measure should be passed into law during the present Session. A point was raised by the noble Lord (Lord Balfour) the other night, with reference to Scottish Universities. He (the Earl of Camperdown) did not say anything, because he did not wish to say anything disagreeable to those Universities, and also because they discussed this question last year, and the arguments in support of the matter were exhausted. He was not without hope that the Universities made their statement through the noble Lord merely as a protest, and not with any intention of opposing the Bill in "another place." If there was any intention of that kind, he hoped they would not fail to realize the true meaning of their objection. That objection went to the very root of the whole Bill. If the Scottish Universities were to be allowed to retain the power of giving licences, was it to be expected for a moment that the English Universities or the University of Dublin would be contented to resign a privilege to which they attached so much value? No demand was being made upon the Scottish Universities which was not being made on the other Universities of the United Kingdom. It was only the other day that the Scottish Representatives were urging in "another place," with reference to the extension of the franchise, that it was absolutely necessary to treat the Three Kingdoms exactly in the same manner. If that argument held good, he hoped it would also be remembered in connection with the question of medical licences. He was certain that this contention of the Scottish Universities, if it were acceded to by the Government, would occasion the overthrow of the Bill; and, moreover, he thought the Scottish Universities were not well advised in taking the objection. He believed they suffered more than any other body from the present system of licensing. One of the reasons why medical students had preferred to go to the Medical Corporations for their licences had been owing to the excellence of the examination of the Scottish Universities; but now that there was to be an approximately equal standard of examination in all the Three Kingdoms, it was only reasonable to suppose that many students would go where they could get the best education. He thought the Lord President had treated the Scottish Medical Corporations with the fullest extent of conciliation. He had given them more representation in proportion to the Scottish Universities than he proposed to do in the Bill of last year. He had raised no objection, because he knew very well that in a Bill of this sort it was very desirable that the Privy Council should do everything it could to conciliate all the important existing interests, and they had a guarantee that in the future the examinations of the Scottish Corporations would be more satisfactory. Supposing that were not the case, there was a provision in the Bill to empower the Privy Council and the Medical Council together to make a change hereafter in the representation of the various authorities on the Medical Boards. Under all these circumstances, he was quite willing to agree to the change proposed to be made in the Bill; but, at the same time, he wished to say that the Scottish Medical Corporations would be very ill-advised indeed if they proposed to force the change further in "another place." The evidence before the Royal Commission, including testimony of the most incontrovertible character—that of the "crammers"—showed that hitherto the examinations of some of the Scottish Medical Corporations had been very inferior. The proposal put forward by the Irish Medical Corporation for compulsory affiliation he hoped would not be listened to for a moment. He cordially agreed with the decision as to the inexpediency of making any addition to the existing titles. This decision would indirectly support and enhance the value of those titles; but if the medical authorities proposed to push this matter further, and to insist that every medical student should belong to one of their Bodies, they would impose a considerable additional cost on them, and place a very strong argument in the hands of their opponents. Nearly all the Universities and Medical Corporations had been so good as to accede to the proposal of taking away the power of giving licences; and there was every reason to believe that the Bill in its present form would receive the approbation both of the Universities and the Medical Corporations. He hoped the Government would press the Bill forward as much as they possibly could in "another place." He did not believe the opposition to it would be of a strenuous character. The delay which had taken place in regard to medical legislation had been very damaging to the institutions connected with medical education and the Medical Profession generally; and he hoped the Government would do all in their power to push on the Bill, which, if passed, would, he thought, be found to be of great advantage to the Medical Profession.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, he was glad that the Bill had received the blessing of the noble Lord before it proceeded to encounter the dangers of "another place." He was also glad to have the weight of the noble Lord's authority and of the Royal Commission against certain changes which had been talked of in certain quarters, and which it seemed were likely to be attempted in that other place. One of the suggested Amendments—suggested by the noble Lord (Lord Balfour)—was really opposed to the essence of the Bill. The Royal Commission considered the views of the Scottish Universities, and for cogent reasons came to the conclusion that it was absolutely impossible that the Scottish Universities should be treated upon an exceptional footing and given exceptional privileges, not obtained by the Universities of England and Ireland. He felt convinced that the Bill ran no danger so far as public and professional opinion was concerned. Whatever danger there might be would proceed solely from the unfortunate jealousies and fancied interests of certain of the licensing bodies. He hoped that public and professional interests would prevail over such attempts, and that the Bill would in "another place" be treated in the same public spirit as that with which it had been received in their Lordships' House.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3<sup>d</sup> accordingly.

On Question, "That the Bill do pass?"

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) moved a series of Amendments, providing that the Representatives of the Royal University on the Irish Medical Board be four in number instead of three.

Amendments moved, in Clause 9, page 4, line 3, leave out ("Three"), and insert ("Four"); in lines 3 and 4, leave out ("voting as a separate elective body"); in line 5, leave out ("Three"), and insert ("Four"); in lines 5 and 6, leave out ("voting as a separate elective body"); and leave out lines 7 and 8.—(The Lord President.)

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, the Irish Medical Corporations did not object to the old University of Dublin being given four Representatives; but they did not think that the newly-established Royal University was entitled to so large a number.

EARL CAIRNS said, he should support the Amendment.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, he had been unfortunate in his attempts to gratify the Irish Medical Corporations. There was a very strong feeling on the part of the Irish College of Physicians to be put on a footing of equality with their sister Corporation, the College of Surgeons, and he had satisfied himself that would be better; but it was always assumed that the Irish Universities should be maintained in a majority. He had attempted to deal with the matter by giving a Member to the Universities, to be elected by them conjointly or alternately; but that plan was thoroughly distasteful to both of those Bodies, and he could only settle the matter by giving a Member to each. That change simply came this—that the majority was a majority of two instead of one.

Amendments agreed to.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK, in moving for a Return showing the number of applications to fix judicial rents filed in the Office of the Land Commission Court, said, he moved for it because it was impossible to get the information he required from the Returns at present supplied by the Land Commission, which ran from one month to another.

Moved, That there be laid before the House a Return of—

"(1.) The number of applications to fix judicial rents filed in the office of the Irish Land Commission Court (a) up to the last day of June 1883, and (b) during each of the nine months ending 31st March 1884;

"(2.) The number of judicial rents fixed by the sub-commissioners during each of the same months, giving the average percentage reduction of rent for each month;

"(3.) The number of applications remaining to be disposed of on the 31st March 1884."—(The Earl of Limerick.)

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, he was not going to oppose the Motion, as he understood the preparation of the Returns would not involve much labour, though he believed they would be perfectly useless. If the Returns were to cost any considerable amount of labour, he would feel compelled to protest against the proposal. Everything the noble Earl wanted was contained in the Returns presented monthly to Parliament, and the Returns sometimes presented annually. It would be impossible, at present, he believed, to make out Returns to the end of March; but they might be made out up to the end of February.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK said, he would prefer to have the Returns up to the end of March.

Motion agreed to.

Return ordered to be laid before the House.

QUESTIONS.

METROPOLIS—HYDE PARK CORNER—SITE FOR THE WELLINGTON STATUE.

MR. RYLANDS asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is still the intention of the Government to give effect to the decision which he announced to the House on the 9th of August last in the following terms:—

"Having carefully considered the Report of the Committee on the Wellington Statue, the Government have decided to invite a competition of sculptors for a new statue of the Great Duke, to be placed in front of Apsley House in lieu of the present statue?"

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he can now inform the House what decision has been come to with regard to Wyatt's equestrian statue of the late Duke of Wellington, and who is responsible for the decision; whether a new equestrian statue of the Duke is to be erected in the vicinity of Hyde Park Corner; whether the commission for this new statue is to be given to a Foreign artist, and whether there is no native British artist to whom this national work could be entrusted; whether it is intended to erect at the public expense a so-called "Quadriga" on the top of the triumphal arch on Constitution Hill, and by whom this "Quadriga" is to be designed and executed; and, whether the opinion of the "Institute of British Architects" has been taken as to the removal of Wyatt's statue from London, and as to whether the erection of the "Quadriga" would improve the artistic effect of the arch in its present position?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I think, Sir, it would be more convenient that I should first answer the Question of the right hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr.

Cavendish Bentinck). I stated some weeks ago that the Government had consented to a proposal of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales with respect to the decoration of the new place at Hyde Park Corner, the removal of the present statue of the Duke of Wellington to Aldershot, and the erection of a new statue in its place. Since then a full Report has been made by an important Committee, of which the Prince of Wales acted as Chairman, and has been published in the newspapers. I need not, I think, repeat it here; but substantially it carries out the proposal originally made. The Government, therefore, will submit a Vote to Parliament for an instalment of £2,000 on account of a sum of £6,000, which they have promised towards the new statue. Mr. Boehm has been selected by the Committee to which I have referred as the sculptor, and the Government have approved the choice. I must decline to canvass the relative merits of living sculptors. Mr. Boehm is a member of the Royal Academy, and has, therefore, been adopted by the Profession as an English artist. It is true that in August last I stated that the Government would invite a competition of sculptors for the new statue, which was intended to be limited to a certain number of the leading sculptors. After making this statement I received several letters from the present Duke of Wellington, protesting in the strongest manner against this course. It was also represented to me that it would be impossible to get a good work of art in that way, as some of the leading sculptors would not compete. The Government has, therefore, thought it best to act upon the suggestion of the Prince of Wales, and to leave the selection of the artist to the Committee, by whom Mr. Boehm was unanimously chosen. The Report of the Committee recommends, among other matters, the erection of a quadriga on the arch on Constitution Hill, in accordance with Mr. Decimus Burton's original design. Its erection will depend upon whether sufficient funds will be subscribed in answer to the appeal of the Prince of Wales; but it will not be undertaken at the cost of the Government. I have not thought it necessary to consult the Royal Institute of British Architects upon any part of this scheme.

MR. PULESTON asked whether the act of banishment of the present statue was irrevocable?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The Government has decided to carry out the recommendations of the Committee, and the removal of the present statue is part of that recommendation. The amount will be involved in the proposal I shall make to the House to vote the £2,000 I have referred to.

MR. RYLANDS said, that, in consequence of the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, he should ask him to be good enough to give the House an assurance that this Vote would be taken at a time of night when it could be fully discussed; because, as the right hon. Gentleman appeared to have departed from the terms of the original understanding, he should raise the question when the Vote came to be discussed in Committee of Supply.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that the right hon. Gentleman had not answered a very important part of his Question. He wished to know who was responsible for this decision? The right hon. Gentleman said that the Committee were responsible. He should like to know who were the Members of that Committee? If the right hon. Gentleman was not able to give the House the names of the Committee at once, perhaps he would lay them upon the Table.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The Government is responsible for the whole thing. I have no objection to lay the names of the Committee upon the Table. Among them are those of the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Wellington, Lord John Manners, Sir Thomas Brassey, Sir James M'Garel-Hogg, Lord Hardinge, Lord De L'Isle, Sir Frederick Leighton, Mr. Fergusson, Mr. Mitford, and others, which I do not for the moment recall.

MR. MONK asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would give an order for the removal of the present statue until the Vote had been passed by the House?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: No order will be given until after the money has been voted by Parliament. As to the removal of the present statue, no expense has yet been incurred.

MR. RYLANDS asked who appointed the Committee?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The Committee, as originally constituted, was appointed by myself; but several Members were subsequently added on the suggestion of the Prince of Wales.

MR. MAC IVER gave Notice of his intention to move the rejection of the Vote, on the ground that no sufficient answer had been given to the Questions that had been put to the Government on the subject, and that the historical interest attaching to the present statue far exceeded any artistic value of any new statue.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON asked whether it was true, that the name of Hyde Park Corner was to be changed?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I mentioned some time ago that the name of Hyde Park Corner is to be changed to Wellington Place.

ARMY (INDIA)—THE MEDICAL SERVICE.

MR. GIBSON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Is the number of surgeons of the Indian Medical Service under and up to five years' service, as shown by the recently issued Bengal Army List of December 1883, who are employed on "unemployed" pay, in Bengal alone, twenty-eight out of a total of fifty-nine surgeons; is it a fact that all these twenty-eight surgeons employed on "unemployed" pay are not only supernumerary to the actual number of appointments, but are even also supernumerary to those surgeons who are only "officiating" for officers who really hold these actual appointments, but are at present on leave; is it a fact that, considering only the cases of all surgeons under and up to five years' service, as shown by the Bengal Army List of December 1883, fifty-four surgeons, out of a total number of fifty-nine joined, would have to retire from the list in question before any candidates who compete for the "appointments" offered for competition in February can obtain any of the rates of pay now termed "substantive;" what is the nature and value of the five "appointments" advertised for competition for February 1884, and what is the nature and value of the five "appointments" that have been advertised for competition in August 1884; is there, in the whole Indian Staff Corps, one instance of an "unemployed Lieutenant" drawing the pay of 256 rupees per mensem, as alleged by him; and, is it a fact that when being "instructed," or doing duty, the officers of the Indian Medical Service actually receive less pay than their brethren of the same standing in the Army Medical Department?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Sir, I will answer the right hon. and learned Gentleman's six Questions as follows:—(1) Yes; of 53, not 59, surgeons of five years' service and under, shown in the latest Bengal Army List, 28 are on unemployed pay. (2) Yes; these 28 gentlemen, who form a portion of the Reserve needed for the Medical Service, are in excess of the officiating and substantive appointments. The ordinary reserve to meet furloughs and casualties is 20 per cent on the number of appointments; but the actual number of furlough absentees this year falls considerably short of that proportion. (3) I am not sure that I understand this Question, though I have spent two hours over it. It is obvious that substantive appointments must be vacated before new men can fill them; but the retirements will be at the top, and not at the bottom of the List. The average number of casualties for the last 10 years in the Indian Medical Service has been 31. Assuming this average to be continued, it will be the number of substantive appointments annually vacated. (4) This Question is asked under an evident misapprehension of the nature of the appointments to the Indian Medical Service. The Secretary of State advertised that an examination of candidates for five appointments in Her Majesty's Indian Medical Service would be held in February, 1884. These are simply appointments to the Indian Medical Service, and five candidates were selected from 21 who presented themselves, the whole 21 being duly qualified. (5) No, Sir; so far as I know, there is not one, nor have I ever made any allegation to that effect. There is no need for a Reserve for the Indian Staff Corps; but if there were any unemployed lieutenants, they would receive 256 rupees per mensem. (6) Yes; while merely doing duty with British or Native troops, officers of the Indian Medical Service draw less pay than officers of the Army Medical Department of the same standing in India; but for the remainder of their service their prospects are much better, and their average salaries much higher.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY— SUPERVISION IN BELFAST.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the only police supervision over Newtonards Road, in the borough of Belfast, a leading thoroughfare nearly a mile long, which, with the streets running into it, contains a population of about 10,000, is one constable; whether complaints have been made of the lawlessness of some of the frequenters of the locality; and, whether he will take measures to have the grievances remedied?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Police Supervisor on the road in question employed six men on patrol duty and two Superintendents, and two men do the duty at night and one in the day. The head constable and sergeant visit the place at various times. No general complaints of the character mentioned have been made. There was some stone-throwing on the 17th of March; but the police made the offender amenable, and he was fined by the magistrates. The Constabulary authorities of Belfast do not consider it necessary to strengthen the Police Force in this locality, which they describe as the quietest part of the town.

NATIONAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND)—THE SLIGO NATIONAL SCHOOL—PAY- MENT OF RESULT FEES.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the result fees arising out of an examination held on 28th November last, at Quay Street, Sligo, National School, have yet been paid; and, if not, what is the reason of the delay?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, that, owing to circumstances over which the education authorities had no control, the order did not reach the person in question until it had lapsed. A new order had been issued.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—REFUSAL OF MAGIS- TRATES TO SIGN PROXIES.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether on 21st March Dr. Babington, J.P., and Captain Thompson, J.P., both for county Oavan, refused to witness proxy papers for Poor Law election in favour of a person named Leddy, the reason given for these two magistrates to witness the documents being that Leddy was a Land Leaguer; and, whether such refusal was a breach of duty?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I am informed that Dr. Babington and Captain Thompson refused to witness the proxy papers for the Poor Law election in favour of a person named Leddy. Neither of the magistrates gave as a reason that Leddy was a Land Leaguer. Captain Thompson assigns as a reason the lateness of the hour he was asked, and Dr. Babington does not appear to assign any intelligible reason at all. I am informed that there is no statutable provision requiring a magistrate to attest by his signature such papers.

MR. HEALY: Well, what are magistrates for.

MR. TREVELYAN: I am sure I do not know.

POST OFFICE OFFICIALS—SURVEYORS CLERKS.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Postmaster General, Is it a fact that not fewer than fifteen on the second class of surveyors' clerks in the Post Office, or nearly one-half, are sons or relatives of surveyors or officers holding high positions in the Post Office; whether eight other officers, who are employed as surveyors' clerks, are also sons or relatives of surveyors or other high Post Office officials; whether, of the eight officers last referred to, two were appointed to these duties after a service in the Post Office of less than one year, and the other six after a service of from one to three years; whether two of them were under seventeen years of age when first employed; whether two of them are sons of the surveyors under whom they serve; whether, for the most part, the eight officers referred to entered the Post Office service at wages of about 12s. a-week, to qualify for which they were required to pass a non-competitive examination of an elementary character only; whether these officers are drawing allowances of 15s. per day, in addition to their pay and first-class railway fares; and, whether, seeing that the surveyors exercise control over Postmasters and others, and that these appointments carry with them a salary commencing at £150 a-year, and rising through two classes to £800 a-year, in addition to allowances of 15s. a-day and upwards, some means can be devised for throwing open these appointments practically, as well as nominally, to the whole Service?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, some time before the hon. Member placed his Question on the Paper I noticed the facts to which he now directs my attention, and which are, in the main, correct. I came to the conclusion that it would be desirable to adopt some plan which would give to the Service generally a freer access to employment, whether temporarily or permanently, on the Surveyor's staff. I have not yet decided the best plan to adopt to secure this object; but there shall be no unnecessary delay in arriving at a decision.

GUARDIANS FOR DUNFANAGHY UNION.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that at the recent elections of Poor Law Guardians for the Dunfanaghy Union, five of the National candidates who were sufficiently qualified in respect of valuation, and entitled to vote in the Union, at the time of nomination were disqualified by the Returning Officer's refusal to place their names upon the voting papers; whether landlords were permitted to vote by proxy without having lodged the necessary claims; whether Captain Hill, who is not in occupation of any portion of the Mienacladdy Division, and who is only entitled to vote there by proxy, nominated a candidate for that Division; whether the nominations for Ards Division was made by a landlord whose initials were misprinted on the voting papers; whether a person named Edward Lafferty has been declared by the returning officer to be elected, although his name does not appear on the voting papers for that Division; whether the vote of James Mitchell was rejected on the ground that his name was Anglicised, the Irish spelling of the name being Meidhghall; and, whether an inquiry will be granted into the truth of these and other charges of irregularity preferred against the returning officer in connection with these elections?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the persons referred to in the 1st paragraph were qualified to vote, and did vote, but were not qualified as Guardians, or else their nomination papers were invalid. Landlords were not permitted to vote by proxy without lodging the necessary claims. Captain Hill, who is described as not being in occupation of any land in the division referred to, is in occupation of 1,100 acres. The error as to the names of the persons was discovered and corrected by the Returning Officer before the voting papers were issued. A voting paper purporting to be signed by James Mitchell was rejected because there was no corresponding Irish name on the register. These circumstances do not afford any ground for inquiry.

MR. O'BRIEN: On the Motion for Adjournment I shall have something to say again on this subject.

NAVY—PAYMASTERS.

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether, in view of the facts that the present senior Assistant Paymaster has over fifteen years' seniority, and is thirty-six years of age, that no compulsory retirement of Paymasters will occur during the present year, and that it is inevitable that some of the first fifty Assistant Paymasters now on the list, the junior of whom has thirteen years' seniority, must reach twenty years' seniority before being promoted, the Admiralty will take some steps, either by increasing the Paymasters' list, or otherwise, to ameliorate the condition of these officers; if not, what seniority may Naval Assistant Paymasters look forward to reaching before expecting any improvement in their prospects?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Sir, I have within the last three weeks answered a number of Questions on this subject, and my answers cover all the particulars in the hon. Member's Question. I would especially beg to refer him to my answers to the hon. Members for the City of London and for Limerick on the 20th and 27th of March. In replying to previous Questions, I have stated that we do not contemplate taking any steps in view of the temporary nature of the present slackness of promotion.

ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND—
EXAMINING BOARDS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

Mr. O'Brien

Whether, at the examinations of the Royal University of Ireland, each examiner always takes up the same subject, or course of study, and whether this is the subject usually taught by him to students attending his class; whether students unable to attend such classes are expected to compete on equal terms with those who have the benefit of practical acquaintance with the examiner's special method of dealing with his subject; and, whether, at the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, London, and Dublin, a different custom is followed to guard against the undue advantages arising out of the circumstance of invariably appointing the same examiner in the same subject to make awards to his own pupils as well as to other students?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I forwarded the hon. Member's Question to the Secretaries of the Royal University, and I have received the following observations from them thereon:—

"The examinations of this University are conducted by Boards of Fellows and Examiners corresponding to the various departments of the courses of study. Some of these Boards consist of several persons. Every examination paper is required to be approved by at least two or more Examiners. The members of each Board apportion among themselves the branches of the subject in which candidates are to be examined, and we believe that it is the regular usage that the same person shall not examine at the successive examinations in the same branch or portion of the subject. All answers to honour papers are adjudicated upon by two or more Examiners, and in the course of the examination every candidate usually passes through the hands of all the Examiners in the department concerned. In this way every opportunity for possible unfairness or unevenness of examination is guarded against as far as practicable."

I may observe that at Oxford and Cambridge Examiners examine the young men who have attended their own lectures, as well as others; but the endowments being very much larger, and the number of Fellows very much greater, the variety of choice of Examiners is greatly increased. With regard to the University of London, the Examiners are paid specially.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Government are prepared to grant the Returns, of which Notices stand upon the Notice Paper, relating to the Queen's Colleges (Ireland) and the Royal University (Ireland)?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Government have come to the conclusion that it is desirable to hold an inquiry into certain matters connected with the Queen's Colleges, of a nature the result of which can be laid before Parliament. The inquiry will be by a small Commission appointed by the Lord Lieutenant. The exact terms of reference are under consideration; but I am of opinion that they will cover, as I think they ought to cover, all the points on which hon. Members have applied for information by Questions or Returns. Here I would observe that I do not think the inquiry will take in the special Questions relating to anatomy put by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy). With regard to the Returns and Questions put on the subject, it is the intention of the Commission to afford full information. With regard to this, I need not repeat what I said the other day—that the Queen's College, Cork, asks for an inquiry. I hope that, under those circumstances, the hon. Member will not consider it necessary to press for the Returns.

MR. HEALY: May I ask if any information is to be given with regard to the personnel of this Commission? There are strong grounds for thinking that this inquiry having been asked for by the Queen's College, it is proposed to make it a whitewashing inquiry.

MR. TREVELYAN: That is hardly a proper supposition to make until there are some grounds for it. I have always been very frank with the House, and I have stated that a thorough inquiry was wanted. There are serious matters to be cleared up, and these are the serious matters that hon. Members have been agitating about.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY: Are we to understand that there will be an inquiry into the whole system of the University and Colleges?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I do not know that I need trouble the House by going into particulars; but perhaps I may just state the three principal points to be inquired into. Points of pure discipline the visitors must deal with. There are three important points, however, about which complaints have been made. First, that notwithstanding the amount of these endowments, the students of the Colleges do badly at the Royal University. Second, that the number of students is kept up by educational tests being unduly lowered. Third, that the College prizes, especially in the Scholarships and Exhibitions, are not fairly distributed amongst the various branches of learning. Thorough inquiry into these matters will cover all matters referred to in the Question and Returns.

MR. O'BRIEN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether a Commission appointed by this House would not satisfy the public better than one appointed by the Lord Lieutenant?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Government would be unwilling to resort to that course unless compelled to by a Vote of the House.

MR. GRAY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he intends, in the Estimates for the current year, to ask that the same amount shall be granted for the maintenance of the same Scholarships and Exhibitions in the Colleges as heretofore?

MR. TREVELYAN: Yes, Sir.

MR. GRAY: Then, will the right hon. Gentleman insist on getting this Vote without giving the House the information asked for in these Returns, or does he expect that the Commission will report previous to the Vote being taken? Are we to understand that the right hon. Gentleman declines to afford the House the information contained in those Returns, which can be obtained at practically no expense beyond the cost of printing?

MR. TREVELYAN: I will hurry on the appointment and operations of the Commission, and when we come nearer the time when the Votes for the Queen's Colleges will be taken, I will be prepared to answer any Questions put to me by the hon. Member.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) — ATHLONE BOARD OF GUARDIANS—ELECTION OF CHAIRMAN.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, By whose authority, and at whose request, was the election of Chairman, at the Athlone Board of Guardians postponed from the 29th March to the 5th of April; and, is it the fact that this election takes place in the neighbouring unions on the 29th March, and was it for the purpose of enabling ex-officio guardians, who attended these other unions on the 29th March to vote for the Tory candidate, to attend at Athlone, on the 5th of April, to vote for Lord Castlemaigne, that this change was made?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the election of Chairman was not postponed. It could not legally be held on the 29th of March, three days not having elapsed since the return of the Guardians of the Union. There is no foundation for the suggestion in the 2nd paragraph of the Question.

MR. HEALY: At whose request was it postponed? That is the point of my Question.

MR. TREVELYAN: It was postponed in order to comply with the law.

MR. HEALY: My Question is—[Cries of "Order, order!"—] At whose request was this election postponed for several days? I am entitled to an answer. ["Order, order!"] The Question has been now on the Paper several days.

[No reply.]

MR. HEALY: I shall put the Question again to-morrow.

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed that neither Lord Castlemaigne nor anyone on his behalf made any suggestion about fixing the election for the 5th of April.

MR. HEALY: Did he make a request that it should not be held on the 29th of March? [Loud cries of "Order, order!"] I am perfectly in Order. The House did not object a while ago to 10 minutes' talk about the Duke of Wellington's Statue; and in spite of the interruptions of hon. Members opposite, or the sneers of the Home Secretary—[Loud cries of "Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member should put his Question, and not make these remarks.

MR. HEALY: I shall put the Question again to-morrow.

EXCISE—BONDED GOODS (IRELAND).

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he would explain why it is that the new system of warehousing Bonded Goods is not yet applied to the Irish ports except in Dublin and Belfast, and is it intended only to apply it to those ports, and are Cork, Waterford, Limerick, Londonderry, and Newry, to be abolished as warehousing ports?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the new system of warehousing bonded goods already exists in the Excise warehouses at Cork and Limerick, and will probably be introduced elsewhere in Ireland in two or three months, as soon as some questions of detail are arranged. There is no intention of abolishing the five ports named as warehousing ports.

SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT—WORKING MEN'S INSTITUTE, BELFAST.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that about £80 has been transmitted as result fees to Belfast in connection with the Science and Art Department, South Kensington; whether, of that sum, only about £21 has been paid to Messrs. White, Ross, and Cumming, three of the teachers, and remainder has been retained by Mr. Robert Barklie, teacher of chemistry, and who is also a trustee of the Belfast Working Men's Institute; if the facts are as stated, does he approve of the distribution; and, if not, will he try to have it rectified; and, is the Mr. Robert Barklie above referred to the same Mr. Robert Barklie who was suspended from his position as a science teacher in 1867, for an attempted fraud on the department?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I will answer the Question, as it is connected with the Science and Art Department. The facts of this case are as follows:—£437 5s. was paid to the Committee of the Working Men's Institute, Belfast, through Mr. T. H. Browne, their Secretary, on the results of the science examinations of the Institute, in May and June, 1883. Mr. Barklie is one of nine teachers on account of whose instruction this sum was paid; but the Science and Art Department does not know how much of this was paid to Mr. Barklie, or how much to each of the other eight teachers. The arrangements between local Committees and their teachers are a matter of private contract between the parties. The Department only looks to, and pays, the Committees. The Mr. Barklie referred to in the Question is the person who, when a young teacher, was suspended in 1867 for some irregularity; but he has subsequently proved himself an able and energetic teacher, and it seems cruel that an offence, for which he suffered 17 years ago, should now be raked up against him.

In further answer to Mr. BIGGAR,

MR. MUNDELLA said, that when instruction was given by several teachers the Department paid the Committee of the Institution, and not the individual teachers.

IRELAND—THE CORPORATION OF NAAS—ALIENATION OF THE CORPORATE PROPERTY.

MR. LEAHY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it is the fact that, prior to the passing of "The Municipal Corporation Act, 1840," the Corporation of Naas was possessed of property of considerable extent and value; whether, three weeks before the Act of 1836, restraining alienation, a deed purporting to be executed some months earlier was registered whereby the Corporation granted without consideration, except the nominal rent to which the property was subject, the entire of the Corporation property to trustees for the maintenance and education of Protestant orphans from the town and neighbourhood of Naas; whether the value of the property so alienated is between £300 and £400 a-year, and is likely to be soon largely augmented by the falling in of old leases; whether evidence upon this subject was taken before the Local Government Board Commission in February 1877 and the Municipal Boundaries Commission of 1878; whether it appears from that evidence given chiefly by Protestant gentlemen and the Petition unanimously adopted by the Town Commissioners, Protestant and Catholic, that it is the wish of all creeds and classes in the locality of Naas that the Corporation property should be restored; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will institute an inquiry with a view to giving effect to the prayers of the Petition already referred to?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Sir, I believe it to be the fact that some time prior to the passing of the Municipal Corporation Act, 1840, the Corporation of Naas was possessed of property of the value of about £350 per annum. A deed of fee farm grant appears to have been executed on 19th November, 1835, to nominees of Lord Mayo, of the then residue of the corporate property, producing over £322 per annum, at a rent of £12 per annum, in trust, as I believe, for the maintenance and education of Protestant orphans from the town and neighbourhood of Naas. Some evidence was given on this subject before the Commissioners mentioned in the Question; and I have no reason to doubt there is a regret, largely entertained, that the Corporation property was not preserved. The deed of 1835 is stated to have been executed in pursuance of a Resolution of 29th September, 1832. Prior to 1836 a Corporation was quite at liberty to convey away property owned by it as any private individual could. If the deed of 1835, carrying out the Resolution of 1832, was in the then state of the law a valid transfer, I do not think it is a case in which the Government could interfere. If it was not, the transaction may be still impeachable by the Corporation. I recommend to the perusal of the hon. Member the Report of the Municipal Commission of 1835, which contains, if correct, a strange and interesting history of the mode in which the Resolution of 1832 was drawn up, and afterwards carried.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE RIOTS AT LONDONDERRY—MR. FORREST REID.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Crown Solicitor, Mr. Forrest Reid, who attended on behalf of the Crown at the magisterial investigation in Derry, is also family solicitor to Mr. M'Corkell; and, whether Mr. Forrest Reid and Mr. D. B. M'Corkell attended and represented Mr. M'Corkell, senior, at a Board of Trade inquiry into the loss of the Nokomis?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, he was informed that Mr. Forrest Reid was the family solicitor of Mr. M'Corkell, and as such represented him at the Board of Trade inquiry referred to. Mr. Reid attended, on behalf of the Crown, the magisterial investigation at Derry; and he was informed by those who knew that gentleman that he was quite incapable of being influenced in the discharge of his duties by family ties.

MR. HEALY asked whether the Government could not have got anybody to represent them except the family solicitor of one of the accused?

MR. TREVELYAN: He is the Crown Solicitor.

NORTH SEA FISHERIES CONVENTION—THE INSTRUCTIONS.

MR. BIRKBECK asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether, in consequence of the ratification of the North Sea Fisheries Convention, which comes into force on 15th May next, British fishing vessels engaged in the herring and mackerel fisheries on grounds frequented by Belgian and French trawling vessels on the East Coast of England, will, for the future, be more adequately protected by cruisers than has hitherto been the case; and, whether a sufficient number of cruisers will be employed to enforce Articles 26 to 33 inclusive of the said Convention?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Sir, Instructions for carrying out the provisions of the North Sea Fisheries Convention have been drawn up by the Admiral Superintendent of Naval Reserves in communication with the Board of Trade, and the necessary cruisers have been ordered to be ready.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT— FLOGGING IN NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

MR. S. MORLEY asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, If his attention has been drawn to the treatment received by two boys named Haffenden, scholars in the National School at Speldhurst, near Tunbridge Wells, who were flogged, in the presence of the entire school, by the master for having, on the previous Sunday, the 2nd of March, attended a service in a dissenting chapel in the village; and, whether, as this is a school receiving Government aid, he will take such steps as he may deem necessary to prevent a repetition of such proceedings?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, the matter involved is so serious, that I have directed a local inquiry to be made into the facts of this case by an experienced officer of the Department, and I shall be prepared in a few days to communicate the result to the House.

POST OFFICE—INTERNATIONAL PARCEL POST.

MR. BLAKE asked the Postmaster General, If he can state when he will have the arrangements completed for connecting the English Parcels Post with that of the Continental?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, I regret that I am not yet in a position to fix the date when the International Parcel Post will be introduced. The arrangement of such a post involves many complicated details, which have been for some time engaging the careful consideration of the Department.

MR. WARTON: Is it not the case that the post referred to in the hon. Member's Question is the Parcel Post, and not the Parcels Post, just as we say letter carrier, and not letters carrier?

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)
ACT, 1878—CLAUSES 27 AND 32—
UNIFORMITY OF ACTION.

MR. GRAY asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether, under Clauses 27 and 32 of the "Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878," the Privy Council have power to make regulations with regard to animals "while in transit or in course of being moved by land or by water," which will secure uniformity, and prevent the prohibition of the sale in public markets of fat animals from healthy areas, by local authorities, for the purpose of enhancing the price of meat in their districts?

MR. DODSON, in reply, said, the Privy Council had made Orders for regulating the treatment of animals in transit under certain sections of the Contagious Diseases Act. These Orders secured uniform action. Local Authorities had no power to prohibit the sale of fat or store animals, except within five miles of an infected place.

LAW AND JUSTICE (ENGLAND AND WALES)—RE-ARRANGEMENT OF CIRCUITS.

VISCOUNT NEWPORT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, before any action is taken respecting the re-arrangement of Circuits, an opportunity will be given to the localities affected to state their views?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that no action with respect to the re-arrangement of Circuits could be made except by Statute or Order in Council, which would be laid on the Table of the House. In either case Parliament would have cognizance of the matter. He was authorized to say that the Lord Chancellor would be glad to receive any representation from localities which might suppose that they would be affected by any change made.

TRAMWAYS AND PUBLIC COMPANIES
(IRELAND) ACT, 1883—GUARANTEES.

MR. MAYNE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

If his attention has been drawn to the fact that the Grand Jury of the County Tipperary have refused a guarantee for the construction of a Railway from Gooldscross to Cashel; whether the guarantee was refused, on the plea that there was not unanimity on the part of the ratepayers, although both the proposals on the subject submitted to the grand jury were supported by an overwhelming majority of the ratepayers proposed to be taxed; whether the need for the line of Railway was admitted by the grand jury in granting the concession to make it; whether, in order to protect the public interests in a case of this kind, the Government will consider the advisability of establishing a right of appeal from the grand jury to the going judge of assize, or to the Board of Works; and, whether the doubt expressed by one Irish grand jury, as to the sufficiency of the protection afforded to the ratepayers by section ten of the Tramways Act of last year, is held to be valid by the Law Officers of the Crown in Ireland?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I have not yet received any Report of the proceedings before the Grand Jury; but, from such information as has been supplied to me, it appears that the Grand Jury considered and decided the case upon what they regarded as its merits. It would be premature as yet for Government to review the working of the Act, and propose amendments, should such be required. I do not quite understand the last paragraph of the hon. Member's Question. The Attorney General informs me that he is not aware what is the "doubt" to which the hon. Member refers, and therefore cannot express any opinion as to the validity of the point raised. If the hon. Member will confer with me, I will have inquiries made.

MR. GRAY inquired if the right hon. Gentleman had any objection to grant a Return setting forth the applications made under the Tramways Act, and how they had been treated by the Grand Juries?

MR. TREVELYAN: Perhaps the hon. Member will put a Question to me on the subject at the beginning of next week.

ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) ACT, 1882
—LIEUTENANT-COLONEL DIGBY.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

If his attention has been drawn to a case heard on Friday last, at Ballymore, county Westmeath, in which Lieut.-Col. W. B. Digby, J.P. appeared in answer to a charge of having made a false affidavit, with intent to substantiate a false claim, in order to obtain a sum of money, under the provisions of the Arrears Act, from the Irish Land Commission; whether, upon the evidence produced by the Crown for the prosecution, the resident magistrate, Mr. John T. Dillon, held that the case should be sent on for trial, but was overruled by the other two justices present, who refused the informations and dismissed the case, though it was not alleged on behalf of the accused that his affidavit was true; whether the Irish Law Officers agree with the resident magistrate that the question of the intention to defraud, is a question, not for the justices, but for a jury; whether any further steps will be taken towards bringing the case to trial; and, whether Lieut.-Col. Digby will continue to act in the Commission of the Peace?

MR. GIBSON: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that Question, I would like to ask him, if he is aware that Colonel Digby, immediately after discovering the mistake, himself countermanded the application for money, and waited on the Controller of the Arrears Department of the Land Commission, and fully explained the entire circumstances?

MR. SEXTON: Upon that Question of the right hon. and learned Gentleman I would ask, further, if Colonel Digby allowed five months to elapse before he took any steps to retire from the fraudulent position?

MR. HEALY: When he was found out.

MR. TREVELYAN: I am informed, Sir, that it is the case that Colonel Digby appeared to answer such a charge, and that the Resident Magistrate differed from the ruling of the other magistrates, by whom the case was dismissed. The Crown Solicitor is furnishing a Report to the Law Officers, who will consider the case.

MR. GIBSON: I would like the right hon. Gentleman to answer my Question.

MR. TREVELYAN: It is perfectly impossible for me to answer Questions put that way without Notice.

MR. GIBSON: Has the right hon. Gentleman read the Question which directed attention to the facts without making himself acquainted with the circumstances to which I refer?

MR. TREVELYAN: The right hon. and learned Gentleman may ask that Question, and think that it establishes a point against me; but he must know that a reference by the Chief Secretary to the Law Officers at their own requisition would preclude the Chief Secretary from asking any more questions until he had got that Report.

MR. SEXTON: Immediately on the re-assembling of the House after Easter I shall ask the effect of the Report of the Crown Solicitor, and what steps the Government intend to take to punish the fraud?

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND)— RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Her Majesty's Government will take steps this Session to give effect to the recommendations relating to Ireland of the Royal Commission on Industrial Schools?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I stated a few days ago, in replying to a Question asked by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), that I could not pledge the Government to legislate on the subject this year; but that as the inquiry was not confined to Ireland, but was for the United Kingdom, I thought that the Irish Government could not act independently of the English Government.

REGISTRY OF DEEDS (IRELAND).

MR. HEALY asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he can state approximately the value of property annually dealt with by the Registry of Deeds, Ireland; whether, as it would appear from the Report of the Royal Commission of Inquiry into Registration of Deeds, dated 30th October 1880, the landed property of Ireland is dependent on the Department for the security of its title, and that the nature of the duties necessitates the office being filled with a superior class of clerks; whether, by the Act 2 and 3 William 4, c. 87, sec. 28, every official in the Registry is made individually responsible at law for damages arising through negligence or default; if he will state the grounds on which the salaries of the Registry of Deeds Office are fixed on a lower scale than those of every other Irish Department of similar importance; and, if he will give any assurance that the Registry of Deeds shall, in point of salaries and annual increment, be placed on an equality with such Departments as the Constabulary Office, Education Office, Board of Works, Local Government Board, and Paymaster General's Office?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, I am afraid the amount of the property annually dealt with by the Deeds Registry cannot be given, as the amount of "consideration" is not necessarily stated when an instrument is registered. The Report of the Royal Commission contains a paragraph to the effect stated in the Question. The officers of the Registry are, by statute, liable for damages in respect of loss caused by their own negligence or misconduct; but it is a question whether this statutory obligation should not be removed. The salaries are fixed with reference to the nature of the work to be done, and the scale of this Office compares favourably with that of other Departments of Registration in Ireland and Scotland.

CRIMINAL LAW (SCOTLAND)—CASE OF LACHLAN M'LEOD.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Lord Advocate, with regard to the Skye prevarication case, If he could state whether Sheriff Substitute Speirs based his sentence on Lachlan M'Leod upon Statute Law or upon a fiction of Law; and, if upon the latter, whether he will at once introduce a measure defining the powers of the sheriffs and minor judges in dealing with and punishing those guilty of prevarication on oath or of contempt of court; and, is it a fact that Mr. Spiers does not know Gaelic, and Lachlan M'Leod does not know English?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR), in reply, said, he had not had time since the Question appeared on the Paper to ascertain fully all the particulars. He had no doubt that Sheriff Spiers must have given his judgment knowing well that that judgment was liable to revision by the Superior Courts. He did not see any cause to propose separate legislation on this matter defining the powers of the Sheriffs and minor Judges. He was not aware that Sheriff Spiers had acquired a knowledge of Gaelic.

CUSTOMS—EXTRA MESSENGERS.

MR. RITCHIE asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the case that a number of extra messengers permanently employed in the Customs, some having between twenty and forty years' service, have no annual or sick leave, and do not receive pay for the usual official holidays, although they are precluded from being employed on those days, and whether they are paid fortnightly instead of weekly; whether the messengers at the Admiralty, similarly placed, do have annual and sick leave, and are also paid for the usual official holidays, and are paid weekly; whether the Treasury has received, through the Board of Customs, a Petition from the Customs' extra messengers, dated 26th April 1883, asking to be paid weekly instead of fortnightly; and, what is the reason why the extra messengers in the Customs are treated so differently from similar servants in the Admiralty?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the Treasury have received no Petition from any men of the character described. I am informed, however, that they belong to the class of Customs extra men, who are employed by the Board only when required, and are paid for every day so employed. Some of them have been fortunate enough to continue on the list of extra men for many years, but are in no sense established. I do not know anything about the Admiralty employés referred to; but the system of extra men in the Customs' Service appears a good one, and there is no intention of altering it.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE RIOTS AT LONDONDERRY—TRIAL OF DOHERTY—EVIDENCE OF SUB-CONSTABLE DALY.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why the evidence of Sub-Constable Daly was withheld at the trial of Doherty, in Sligo; and, if it is the intention of the Crown to proceed against those who were identified by Sub-Constable Daly as taking part in the Derry Town Hall disturbances?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am advised that Constable Daly was not examined because he could give no evidence against Doherty. With regard to the second inquiry, the Attorney General does not consider he has sufficient evidence to support a prosecution.

COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—MEETINGS OF NATIONAL TEACHERS.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland have issued a circular prohibiting in future

"Meetings of National teachers, or the attendance of National teachers at meetings, unless for purely educational purposes," and declaring that the Commissioners have resolved further that—

"At any and every such meeting each teacher present shall be responsible for all things said or done by any of those present, unless he at once publicly disavows anything which may be said or done of an objectionable character, i.e. anything bordering upon political controversy or criticism of the administration of the Board, or the conduct of its officers, or the action or policy of the Government,"

"This public disavowal must be followed by an open withdrawal of the teacher from the meeting;"

whether it is intended to interfere with the customary congress and meetings of National teachers, or with the organization of the teachers' association now existing for many years under successive administrations, and which have been instrumental in obtaining some amelioration of the admitted grievances of the Irish National teachers; whether open public agitation for the improvement of their pay and position by the teachers will now be prohibited or permitted as heretofore; and, what proof will be required that "things of an objectionable character were said or done" at a meeting at which a teacher may have been present before he will be held to come within the penal terms of the circular?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is quite true, Sir, that the National Education Commissioners have issued a Circular in which they state that they have resolved—

"Not to sanction in future meetings of National teachers, or the attendance of National teachers at meetings, unless for purely educational purposes"— but then they go on to explain what they mean—

Mr. Trevelyan

"For freely, but temperately, discussing their own position, rights, privileges, and claims; the provisions which affect the school programme of instruction, the organization of schools, the methods of teaching, the selection of subjects of instruction suitable to the wants and tastes of their pupils; the employment and training of monitors; literary, moral, or scientific subjects; in short, all branches of the educational question which can be considered without political discussion."

If the hon. Member had dwelt upon this passage, in which the Commissioners extend their sanction to meetings of teachers "for freely, but temperately, discussing their own position, rights, privileges, and claims," he would have seen that the holding of a congress, or the establishment of a teachers' association, or any proper effort to improve their pay, would not be inconsistent with either the spirit or letter of the Circular. As to the proof that will be required that "things of an objectionable character were said or done" at a meeting, the Commissioners must be the judges of it, and must, of course, decide every case on its merits.

MR. GRAY: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the Circular does not go on to prohibit any discussion or criticism of the administration of the Board and the conduct of its officers? I would direct his attention more particularly to these words, "or the action or policy of the Government." Will the right hon. Gentleman explain how they may discuss "their whole position and claims," while they must avoid discussing the action of the Government, which may refuse to recognize their claims?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is not for me to speak for the Commissioners of National Education, or to explain their policy. We have no doubt that they can be perfectly trusted to distinguish between what is legitimate educational controversy and what is political action.

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—KINSALE PIER AND QUAY.

MR. DEASY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will order a Copy of the Report of Messieurs Brady and Johnston, Pier and Harbour Commissioners, on the Kinsale pier and quay, to be laid upon the Table of the House forthwith?

MR. COURTNEY: This Report is not in the knowledge of any Department with which I am connected; but I presume it rests with the Pier and Harbour Commission, over which the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake) presides. As the whole question is under consideration, I do not think it is at all expedient to take any action at the present stage.

LAW AND JUSTICE—SALE OF CLEMENT'S INN.

MR. FIRTH asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether he is aware that the right of the Principal, Ancients, and Commoners of Clement's Inn to dispose of the property of the Inn, has been submitted to the opinion of an eminent Counsel; whether he is aware that in the opinion of such Counsel the sale of such property and the division of the proceeds constitute a breach of trust for which an information may be brought; and, whether he proposes to bring such information?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, he had received from the Council of the Incorporated Law Society counsel's opinion on the proposed sale of Clement's Inn. He believed that opinion was to the effect that, on the whole, there were good grounds for an inquiry into the right of the Principal, Ancients, and Commoners to dispose of the property. The Incorporated Law Society thought the proper course was to communicate with the Charity Commissioners; and if they reported to him (the Attorney General) with respect to the endowment the matter would receive due consideration.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE POSTMASTER OF DUNGANNON.

MR. DEASY asked the Postmaster General, Whether, on 1st January last, Mr. Jacob Orr, the Postmaster of Dungannon, county Tyrone, allowed Thomas Hodgett, one of his subordinates in the office, to be absent from his duty all that day in order to take part in an Orange demonstration; whether Hodgett on that morning carried an Orange flag in front of a procession through the streets of Dungannon, and accompanied the Orange expedition to Dromore; whether Mr. Orr obliged the telegraph messenger, whose duty it was to remain constantly in the telegraph office, to discharge Hodgett's duty by carrying consignments by parcel post to and from the railway station; and, what notice will be taken by the Department of the conduct of the Postmaster in this matter?

MR. FAWCETT: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that Hodgett, the man employed by the Postmaster of Dungannon to deliver parcels, sought and obtained leave of absence for the 1st January. The Postmaster, however, was not only not aware for what purpose the leave was required, but afterwards, finding that Hodgett had been to Dromore, rebuked him for his indiscretion. Hodgett, I am assured, carried no flag and was not in the procession. He has since left the Service. On the 1st January the parcels were delivered by the Telegraph messenger.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE—CONVICT LABOUR.

MR. MAC IVER asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether Her Majesty's Government have considered the many influential Petitions which have been presented to the House praying that the whole of our able-bodied convicts, or any other National resource which may be necessary, shall be applied without delay to constructing or improving harbours of refuge or ports of shelter round the coasts of these Islands to save the lives of our sailors and fishermen; whether they are aware that the French Nation is expending the sum of five and a half million pounds sterling for a similar purpose over a district of only 250 miles; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have it in contemplation to expend any considerable sum of money in providing similarly improved harbour accommodation on dangerous coasts in Great Britain and Ireland?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, the House had already authorized the employment of convict labour on the harbour at Dover, and that absorbed all the labour of that kind that was at present available. There appeared to be a general impression that such labour could be employed in many parts of the country at the same time upon works of this kind; but this was not the case, for convict labour could only be employed when the size of the works and the length of time they would take to carry out justified the building of a large prison in the vicinity for the accommodation of the convicts.

PATENT MEDICINES—LEGISLATION.

MR. WARTON asked the Vice President of the Council, When the Government intends to introduce, in the House of Peers, their Bill relating to Patent Medicines?

MR. MUNDELLA, in reply, said, that the Government would introduce the Bill as soon as possible after Easter.

CUSTOMS CLERKS—OUT-DOOR DEPARTMENT.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Treasury has received a Memorial from certain ex-redundant clerks in the Customs pointing out that they were induced to accept appointments in the out-door department, involving an average additional daily attendance of over twenty-five per cent with only a trifling and temporary increase of salary, by the issue of a classification holding out improved prospects of promotion immediately before the appointments were offered to them; whether it is the fact that the Board of Customs have now decided to reduce the number of surveyors by compelling the First Class examining officers to do the work hitherto done by clerical surveyors, thereby withdrawing from the Memorialists their chief inducement to accept the obligation of increased daily attendance; and, whether, under these circumstances, reasonable compensation will be granted to them for the withdrawal of those prospects; and, if not, whether the Board of Customs will continue to exact the additional labour while withdrawing the inducement which led the Memorialists to accept it?

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, the matter was still under the consideration of the Treasury.

ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND—ARTS STUDENTS.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with regard to the Return of last Session relative to the Royal University of Ireland (180 H. 7. 6. 83), Whether there were in each of the three Queen's Colleges, at the date of the Return, two classes of Arts Students, ranking as

"Matriculated Students" of the Royal University, some who had become so by passing the Matriculation Examination of the University, others who had become so merely by the provisions of the University Act (42 and 43 Vic. c. 65), which conferred this status on those who were Matriculated Students of a Queen's College at the date of the dissolution of the Queen's University; whether the Return moved for explicitly set forth that what was to be stated was the number of Students of the former class, those who had "passed the Matriculation Examination of the Royal University;" whether the number of Students returned by the responsible official of Galway College, in answer to this query, was 3, the number who really had passed the University Examination; whether the number returned by the responsible official of the Belfast College was 77; whether this Return, in the case of Belfast, was accompanied by a footnote stating that the Return made did not really give the number of the class of Students ordered to be returned, but to a totally different class, those, namely, who had become University Students, not by passing the University Examination, but merely by the operation of the Act of Parliament; whether the Return in the case of Cork, supposing the same footnote to refer to it, was equally defective; whether the Government obtained at all, from those Colleges, the number of the class of Students to which the Order of the House of Commons applied; who was responsible for the failure to produce to the House the Returns really moved for; and, whether he can state the correct numbers which should have been given in the Return in the cases of Belfast and Cork?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the hon. Member is correct as to there having been two classes of Art students ranking as matriculated students of the Royal University. The accidental omission has been already stated at length to the House. From the information now before me, it appears that the number of Arts students who actually passed the matriculation examination of the Royal University in 1881 from the several Colleges were, from Belfast, six; from Cork, none; and from Galway, three. In reference to these very low numbers it is well to observe that the Royal University examination was deferred to December, and that the usual matriculation examinations had been held in the Colleges in the previous October.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)— EXCLUSION OF IRISH FAT CATTLE FROM MARKETS IN ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND.

MR. KENNY asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, If it is a fact that Irish fat cattle have been excluded from the Newcastle-on-Tyne market since February 1883, by the local authority of that city; if Irish cattle sold in the Salford cattle market are prevented by the local authorities of the county of Chester from being removed after slaughter to any part of said county, while animals from all other countries may be brought freely; if the local authorities in Glasgow and Greenock have excluded Irish animals from landing at their respective ports from 20th August to 3rd October 1883, and, in case of shipments from the port of Dublin, from 20th August to 17th December 1883; if in such instances the local authorities acted under instructions from the Privy Council; and, whether he will consider how far such instructions, if given, would be in accordance with the spirit of the assurances given by his Grace the Duke of Richmond during the hearing of evidence in the 1878 Commission?

MR. DODSON: Sir, I believe cattle from Ireland have been excluded from the Newcastle-on-Tyne market, though I cannot say since when. With reference to the alleged action of the local authorities at Chester, Glasgow, and Greenock, I cannot give the dates between which certain local regulations were in force. The local authorities do not in those matters act under instructions from the Privy Council. They have full power to prohibit or regulate the movement of animals into their district from the district of any other local authority in England, in Wales, in Scotland, or in Ireland,

MR. KENNY intimated that on Monday he would put a further Question on this subject to the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. GRAY: Have these local authorities power to exclude cattle from a different country? Ireland is treated not as a country, but a district, although it is sub-divided into several districts.

MR. DODSON: Each local authority has power, if it pleases, to exclude animals from all the rest of the United Kingdom.

(IRELAND)—DRAINAGE OF THE LOWER BANN.

MR. T. A. DICKSON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, When he expects to lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the Board of Works in connection with the Drainage of the Lower Bann?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, this Report, which is of a very elaborate character, only reached the Treasury yesterday. It will receive the immediate and careful consideration of the Government; but I cannot at present say what Papers on the subject it may be necessary or desirable to lay before the House.

DISTRIBUTION OF PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS—FREE PUBLIC LIBRARIES.

MR. MAC IVER asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he can arrange for the distribution, free of cost, to the Birkenhead Free Public Library, as well as to other similar institutions who may wish to have them, of a complete set, as issued, of Parliamentary Papers and Documents and other works which are printed at the expense of the public?

MR. COURTNEY: The Parliamentary Papers can be purchased through any bookseller at a price which represents only the cost of printing and paper. Having regard to this fact, and also to the very large public expenditure for printing, I see no reason for subsidizing free libraries in the manner proposed.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)— ALLEGED CASE OF FIRING AT THE PERSON—MR. JAMES WHITE.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. James White, of Sligo, lately swore an information before Mr. Mayne, R.M. against Mr. Griffith Henry Perrott, charging the latter with being one of a party who assaulted him when driving on a car near Ballaghaderreen, and with being the man who on that occasion presented a gun across his chest, and fired, and threatened to put the contents through him; whether Mr. White further swore that, when he went to the Police barracks, the policeman "said he would arrest him if he did not go away;" whether a summons was granted, and Mr. White bound over to prosecute; whether, on the adjourned hearing on 10th March, the Prosecutor did not appear, and Mr. Mayne discharged the informations; whether, on that occasion, the Magistrate produced a Document and telegram which he showed to the representative of Mr. Perrott, but did not produce in Court; whether Mr. Perrott did not assert his perfect innocence of the grave charge made against him; whether Mr. White's recognizance has been estreated; and, whether he can give any explanation of the affair, and will state what steps, if any, the Government will take in the matter?

MR. TREVELYAN: Mr. White swore an information, as stated, and the summons against Mr. Perrott was granted, and Mr. White was bound over to prosecute on the next Court day. On that day Mr. Perrott appeared, and on behalf of Mr. White an application was made for adjournment. The Resident Magistrate granted the adjournment on the distinct understanding that the case should be proceeded with on the next Court day, the 10th of March. On that day, however, a further application was made on behalf of Mr. White for adjournment by letter from himself and a telegram from his solicitor. These documents the Resident Magistrate showed in open Court to the only person who had a right to see them—namely, the representative of Mr. Perrott. This gentleman opposed a further adjournment. The Resident Magistrate thought his opposition reasonable, and refused the adjournment. Mr. White's recognizances would not be estreated.

MR. GRAY: Will the Government take any steps in the matter? I want to see whether perjury has been committed on one side, or an outrage of a very grave character on the other.

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, he understood from private information that a person who was with Mr. Perrott on the occasion of the alleged assault fired at a widgeon on the public road somewhere near where Mr. White was walking.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND)—THE CENTRE SUPERINTENDENTS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many Centre Superintendents were appointed by the Board of Irish Intermediate Education for the years 1881, 1882, and 1883; what was the proportion of Catholics to those of other denominations; and, how many teachers of Irish Intermediate Schools were appointed?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Reports of the Intermediate Education Commissioners for 1881 and 1882 are already before the House; and the hon. Member will find stated there the number of Centre Superintendents employed in each year—181 in 1881, and 175 in 1882. The number for 1883 has not yet been published; but the Assistant Commissioners inform me that it is 169. Of these about a fourth, one year with another, are ladies. The Commissioners have not afforded me any information as to the proportions of the religions, and I am not prepared to press them. I have not received any reply to the third paragraph of the Question; but I hope to hear further on the subject.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION—(SUB-COMMISSIONERS)—MR. EVANS.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether one of the Sub-Commissioners in the Land Court now sitting in Longford was formerly employed to value property in the county of Longford by a landlord in respect of whose rents several claims for reduction are listed for hearing in this Court; and, whether it is true that in all these cases the tenants have refused in consequence to proceed with their claims?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Land Commissioners inform me that Mr. Evans, a member of the Longford Sub-Commission, was formerly employed to value property in Longford by Lord Granard. from whose estate there are cases listed for the present sitting of the Sub-Commission. Mr. Evans has been directed to take no part, and will take no part, in the trial of these cases, either by hearing evidence in Court or by inspecting the farms, or by fixing rents. There can, therefore, be no reason of this kind why the tenants should not proceed with their claims.

INDIA—THE MADRAS CIVIL SERVICE —MR. MACIVER.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he can account for the publication last month, throughout the Indian press, of the confidential letter addressed, on the 4th November 1882, by Mr. MacIver, Madras Civil Service, to Mr. Master, the Chief Secretary to the Government of Madras; whether, as this letter charged the Madras High Court with "playing to the gallery," and taking the part of the Natives against the Government of Madras, Mr. MacIver was reprimanded, on receipt of the letter, by Government; and, if not, whether he will ask the Governor of Madras to give an explanation of the case?

MR. J. K. CROSS: No, Sir; I cannot account for the publication of the letter in question, nor do I know anything more about it than is contained in The Madras Times. Nor do I see any reason to ask the Government of Madras to give any explanation.

THE RAILWAY COMMISSION— LEGISLATION.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked the President of the Board of Trade, When he proposes to introduce the measure dealing with the Railway Commission?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, the measure was not yet finally drafted; but he hoped to introduce it very early after Easter.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY asked whether it was proposed to refer the Bill to a Grand Committee after it had been read a second time; and, if so, to which?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he should ask the House to refer the Bill to the Grand Committee on Trade.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—DEATH IN WATERFORD GAOL.

MR. LEAMY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that a man named James Commins was sentenced to fine or imprisonment, at Tramore Petty Sessions, on the 10th March, for allowing sheep to trespass on the public road; whether he asked for time to pay the fine and was refused, was imprisoned on the 11th, on the 12th was found attempting to climb the cell walls and talking to himself about his sheep which, in consequence of his imprisonment, were left on the road without any person to care for them; whether he was thereupon treated as a lunatic, and put into a strait jacket; whether having burst same on following day he was strapped and tied down, and was subjected to this treatment until the 24th instant; whether he was so bad on this day that warders were ordered to visit him every two hours; whether, on being visited at six o'clock on the following morning, he was found lying uncovered; whether, on being visited again at half-past seven, he was dead; whether, at the inquest, the prison doctor said deceased died of heart disease; whether two other doctors swore he died of congestion of the lungs; and, if, under these circumstances, the Government will order an independent inquiry on oath?

MR. TREVELYAN: James Commins was convicted on the 25th February for allowing cattle to wander on the public road. There were nine cases against him, and he was ordered to pay a fine of 5s., or in default to be imprisoned for 48 hours. It is not true that his application for time to pay the fine was refused. It was granted. Subsequently he refused to pay, and warrants were executed on the 7th March. Farmers of the locality had frequently complained to the police of the injuries to their crops, by this man's cattle being persistently allowed to wander on the public road. With regard to the more serious part of the hon. Member's Question, I cannot at present say anything, as an Inspector of the Local Government Board has been sent to hold a sworn inquiry into the whole circumstances.

MR. SEXTON asked whether the Government would order the body of this unfortunate man to be exhumed, in order that they might have an opinion as to whether he died from heart disease or from congestion of the lungs, brought on by exposure?

MR. TREVELYAN said, that if hon. Members would communicate to him all these particulars, he would send them to the Local Government Board.

MR. GRAY asked whether the inquiry would be public?

this House. It has been used from the Chair with the approval of the House, and the import of it is fully known to the hon. and learned Member for Bridport and to the House.

Mr. GLADSTONE: With respect to the three Questions put to me, I have one and the same answer to make. I conceive that they are really intended to indicate a feeling that is widely spread, and, I am sorry to say, is only too well-founded. That feeling relates to a matter which is of very considerable importance, affecting the efficiency of the House in the conduct of its Business; but it is not in my power properly to bring the matter under consideration, as it does not rest with me unless at the time when the Government called attention to the subject of Procedure.

Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE: May I ask the Prime Minister whether the Government would have any objection to the preparation of a Return in reference to the putting of Questions to Ministers? I venture to throw out this challenge, that these Questions are the direct outcome, and may be directly referred to the Rule of Procedure called the "gagging" Rule, which places it in the power of the majority to silence the minority.

Mr. GLADSTONE: If the right hon. Gentleman thinks that any useful information on the subject of Questions can be given in the form of a Return, probably he will be kind enough to put his suggestion in such a shape as to show its scope and purport.

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD: I beg to give Notice that I will, on the earliest opportunity I can obtain, move the Resolution of which I have given Notice to-day.

PORTUGAL—THE CONGO RIVER TREATY.

Sir HERBERT MAXWELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, in view of the fact that, on the 3rd of April last year, the honourable Member for Manchester was permitted by the House to withdraw his Motion relative to the Congo Treaty, on the distinct understanding that facilities would be given by the Government for its discussion, Whether he can now renew the assurance then given by him, in these words—

"The pledge he had given was well understood, and if they (the Government) availed themselves of the crowded state of business, for the purpose of escaping discussion, they would be guilty of violating that pledge?"

Mr. GLADSTONE: I am at a loss to know why this Question is put after the answer given the other day, which appears to me to completely cover it. I believe the words quoted in the Question are accurately quoted, and I have no doubt they were words used by me. On referring to a previous debate I see that what was engaged for was the allowing of adequate opportunity for discussion, and I said nothing with reference to giving facilities.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—LOCAL TAXATION.

Mr. PELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will afford facilities for the consideration of the Motion relating to the Resolution of this House of the 28th March on the subject of Local Taxation, of which Notice has been given?

Mr. GLADSTONE: I regret that I will not be in my power to afford the hon. Gentleman facilities by an appropriation of the Government's time for the discussion of the Motion he has put on the Paper.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—A FRIDAY'S SITTING.

Mr. McLAREN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, considering the large number of Members on this side of the House desiring to speak on the Second Reading of the Franchise Bill, there will be a Morning Sitting on Friday?

Mr. GLADSTONE: Sir, I have already said that Her Majesty's Government have no plan upon the subject. What I understand to be the full intention of the House is that before Recess—that means practically on Monday night—they will take the Bill on the second reading of the Franchise Bill. It is supposed that to-day, Monday will afford sufficient opportunity of closing the debate; but should it occur to interfere with that arrangement on the for this House to consider that Government Morning Sitting should be tomorrow, which we hope will be necessary. In the case of a Monday, the pledge I gave would hold. The Government would be at their best efforts to procure the Evening Sitting.

EGYPT—POLICY OF HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government have decided on the line of policy which they propose to pursue in Egypt, with reference more especially to the following points:—The government of the Eastern Soudan; the relations which are to be maintained with the Western Soudan; the Government of Khartoum; the relations between the Soudan generally and the Egyptian Government; and, the general relations, political, military, and financial, between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Egypt; whether he can give any information as to General Gordon's present position and views; and, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to afford him any material support?

MR. FRANCIS BUXTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether General Gordon has yet reported, either to Her Majesty's Government or to the Khedive of Egypt—

"On the best means of giving effect to the resolution of the Khedive to withdraw from the interior of the Soudan," for which purpose, according to Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech, he was allowed to proceed to Khartoum; and, whether such Report can be laid upon a Table, or whether, in the absence of such Report, the time has not now to recall him from Khartoum, and thereby prevent any further risk of his own life, and put an end to all doubts of the intentions of the Egyptian Government with regard to the Soudan?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether the Government regarded General Gordon as representing at Khartoum the Authority of Her Majesty's Government or that of the Khedive?

MR. GLADSTONE: The Question of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) is one which, I think, has been answered by the information authentically communicated to the House—namely, that General Gordon was sent from this country by Her Majesty's Government, and under the authority of Her Majesty's Government, to ascertain the best means of executing the evacuation of the Soudan. The House was also informed that, upon his arrival in Egypt, he likewise received from the Egyptian Government executive powers, and these powers he exercises in the name and by the right of the Egyptian Government, although they are powers with regard to which Her Majesty's Government feel both great interest and responsibility. Then I come to answer the Question of my hon. Friend behind me (Sir Alexander Gordon) by saying I do not believe there is any modification at all requisite in General Gordon's instructions. I apprehend his instructions would cover whatever powers of administration he might find it expedient to assume in the Soudan, as they do cover, in fact, at the moment his administration and his proceedings at Khartoum. Now, with respect to Question 63 of my hon. Friend (Mr. Francis Buxton), I would assure him that I entirely enter into the spirit of that Question. Her Majesty's Government are very sensible of their obligations with respect to General Gordon, and they have no disposition unreasonably to stint them. But it is not the case that we have yet received from General Gordon any full Report, nor do we believe that the Khedive of Egypt can have received any full Report from General Gordon as to the best means of giving effect to the resolution of the Khedive to withdraw from the interior of the Soudan. And, although I cannot be surprised at the anxiety of my hon. Friend for such a Report, yet I think, when it is considered what the Soudan is, how it is inhabited, what a range of country it covers, and what diversities of population not organically united together it contains, and that General Gordon has been but a bare two months in the Soudan, we cannot feel very great surprise that no conclu-

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence that passed between the Military authorities in Dublin and Belfast in March 1883, relative to an alleged misstatement, alleged to have been made by Major Johnston, Antrim Artillery, in his communication to the Adjutant General, Dublin, in March 1883?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I can only refer the hon. Member to my reply of the 5th March last year, and repeat that I see no possible good in reviving discussion on an incident which was of small moment 10 years ago, and has now almost passed from the memory of those concerned.

MR. BIGGAR said, that on the Vote for the Irish Militia he would call attention to the matter.

SCOTLAND — THE HIGHLAND CROFTERS — REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Lord Advocate, If he can explain the delay in issuing the Report of the Royal Commission upon the conduct of the Crofters, which was promised before the end of last month?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR), in reply, said, that the completion and printing of the Report and Appendix was a work of great labour; but he understood it would be signed to-day in Edinburgh and issued to-morrow.

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.

MR. E. STANHOPE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether there is any truth in the reported "arrangement" between the Board of Trade and certain shipowners with respect to the Merchant Shipping Bill; if so, whether its terms have been correctly stated in the newspapers, and what course he proposes to take with regard to the Bill?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, he had already answered the first part of this Question in the reply he gave the

AFGHANISTAN — CENTRAL ASIAN PAPERS.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Under Secretary of State for India, How soon Papers on Afghan Affairs, promised some weeks ago, will be laid upon the Table?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The Papers in Question are included in the "Central Asia" Correspondence which my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs laid on the Table on Tuesday last.

INDIA—SIBI AND QUETTA RAILWAY.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether Her Majesty's Government have yet definitely decided to construct the Railway from Sibi to Quetta; and, if so, how soon operations will be commenced?

MR. J. K. CROSS: No, Sir. It is a matter which, as I informed the hon. Gentleman on the 3rd March, requires communication with the Government of India; and I am not yet in a position to make any further announcement on the subject till we hear fully from that Government.

MR. GLADSTONE: With respect to the three Questions put to me, I have one and the same answer to make. I conceive that they are really intended to indicate a feeling that is widely spread, and, I am sorry to say, is only too well-founded. That feeling relates to a matter which is of very considerable importance, affecting the efficiency of the House in the conduct of its Business; but it is not in my power properly to bring the matter under consideration, as it does not rest with me unless at the time when the Government called attention to the subject of Procedure.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE: May I ask the Prime Minister whether the Government would have any objection to the preparation of a Return in reference to the putting of Questions to Ministers? I venture to throw out this challenge, that these Questions are the direct outcome, and may be directly referred to the Rule of Procedure called the "gagging" Rule, which places it in the power of the majority to silence the minority.

MR. GLADSTONE: If the right hon. Gentleman thinks that any useful information on the subject of Questions can be given in the form of a Return, probably he will be kind enough to put his suggestion in such a shape as to show its scope and purport.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD: I beg to give Notice that I will, on the earliest opportunity I can obtain, move the Resolution of which I have given Notice to-day.

PORTUGAL—THE CONGO RIVER TREATY.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, in view of the fact that, on the 3rd of April last year, the honourable Member for Manchester was permitted by the House to withdraw his Motion relative to the Congo Treaty, on the distinct understanding that facilities would be given by the Government for its discussion, Whether he can now renew the assurance then given by him, in these words—

MR. PELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will afford facilities for the consideration of the Motion relating to the Resolution of this House of the 28th March on the subject of Local Taxation, of which Notice has been given?

MR. GLADSTONE: I regret that it will not be in my power to afford the hon. Gentleman facilities by an appropriation of the Government's time for the discussion of the Motion he has put on the Paper.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—A FRIDAY'S SITTING.

MR. M'LAREN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, considering the large number of Members on this side of the House desiring to speak on the Second Reading of the Franchise Bill, there will be a Morning Sitting on Friday?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I have already said that Her Majesty's Government have no plan upon the subject. What I understand to be the full intention of the House is that before the Recess—that means practically on Monday night—they will take the Division on the second reading of the Franchise Bill. It is supposed that to-morrow Monday will afford sufficient time for closing the debate; but should it occur to interfere with that the for this House to consider the Motion. Morning Sitting should be from to-morrow, which we hope will be satisfactory. sive Report has come from him up to the present time on that subject. Of course, therefore, no such Report can be laid on the Table. So much for the first part of the Question of my hon. Friend. With regard to the second part—

“Whether, in the absence of such Report, the time has not come to recall General Gordon from Khartoum, and thereby prevent any further risk of his own life, and put an end to all doubts of the intentions of the Egyptian Government with regard to the Soudan?”

I hope that it is not necessary to take any step for the purpose of putting an end to doubts as to the intentions of the Egyptian Government. I believe there is no question whatever in regard to their intentions; and undoubtedly there is not the smallest change, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, with respect to the execution of our intentions. But I am bound to say that we do not think that the time has come for sending a peremptory order to General Gordon for the purpose of recalling him from the Soudan. The principle upon which we should act in all matters relating to him is never to interfere except in a case of clear necessity. Now, I believe the matter stands thus with regard to General Gordon, and, perhaps, this may be important intelligence to my hon. Friend—at any rate, it is a very material part of the case—General Gordon is under no constraint and under no orders to remain in the Soudan. As far as his instructions or orders are concerned, General Gordon is authorized to use his own discretion, and to withdraw from the Soudan if he thinks proper. I stated that General Gordon was under no orders requiring him to remain in the Soudan; neither, as far as we are aware, is he under any inability to leave the Soudan at this moment if he chooses. As far as our information goes, he may exercise a free judgment upon that matter. Further, we gather quite distinctly from such reports as have reached us that General Gordon believes himself to be safe in Khartoum, where he is at the present time; and he has held out to us no anticipation of danger. Therefore, what we presume is this—that General Gordon does not conceive that the time has come either when he considers that the purpose of his mission is accomplished, or when he ought to despair of carrying that purpose forward; and we should be very reluctant indeed to interfere with his judgment on that subject. I think I may say it might be warrantable, or it might even be a duty incumbent upon us, to order General Gordon to withdraw if his work were at an end, or if he was seen to be in probable danger. But, according to all the information before us, that case has not arisen, and consequently there is no occasion for our intervention; nor is General Gordon in any way hampered as to the prosecution of his work or as to desisting from it if he thought the time for desisting from it had arrived. With regard to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman, I have asked my noble Friend—in the first instance, at any rate—to answer it, because some part of what the Government has to state to the House will come best from him, as it relates to military particulars, and likewise because the threads of former transactions for the last two or three weeks have been in the hands of my noble Friend.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I hope, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman and the House will not think that I or the Government are guilty of the slightest disrespect to himself or to the House for the course which has been suggested by my right hon. Friend. I am conscious that, even under the circumstances of the temporary absence of my right hon. Friend from the House, the statement which I have to make would come far better from him. But as it has been my duty on more than one occasion to make a promise that on the first opportunity we should make to the House any statement it might be in our power to make, my right hon. Friend has thought it would be the most convenient course that I should endeavour to reply to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman. In doing so I am afraid I shall have to trespass on the attention of the House for a much longer time than is usual in answering a Question; but I shall try to condense what I have to say as much as possible. In the first place, I must observe that, although I have been asked to reply to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman, there is a great deal in that Question which appears to me and to the Government it would be utterly impossible for us to answer at the present time, and, further, a great deal which, in the opinion of the Government, ought not to be answered. There are, however, certain points upon which I have undertaken that we should, at as early a date as possible, endeavour to give the House some information; and although our information, even upon these points, is not as complete as could be desired, and although I am free to confess that, even as regards some subjects upon which I shall have to touch, it may possibly be premature to say anything as yet, still I will endeavour, as fully and completely as I can, to redeem the pledge which has been given. The first point upon which I wish to say a word is as to communications that took place between the Government and Sir Evelyn Baring and General Gordon on the subject of the appointment of Zebehr Pasha. On the 10th of March I informed the House that General Gordon had recommended the appointment of Zebehr Pasha as Governor of the Eastern Soudan. His recommendation was that Zebehr should be sent to Khartoum with the moral support of the British Government, but with nothing more; that certain engagements should be taken from him as to the extent of the country over which he was to exercise authority, and as to his proceedings at Khartoum and certain other matters. As I informed the House upon that occasion, the Government felt the strongest objections to the proposal which was first made—objections in the main founded upon reports received both formerly and recently from General Gordon himself with regard to the character and antecedents of Zebehr. I said on that occasion that we thought it due, both to General Gordon and Sir Evelyn Baring, to ascertain fully, before we came to a final decision on the subject, on what grounds that recommendation was made. Further information that we received tended to show that General Gordon's advice was founded mainly on the conviction that in order to secure quiet in Egypt and the pacification of the Soudan it was necessary that the Mahdi and the rebellion of which the Mahdi was the head should be completely subdued and crushed; and that Zebehr Pasha was, in his opinion, the only man possessed of sufficient authority and military talent to accomplish that object. It appeared to the Government that General Gordon had somewhat overrated the danger to be apprehended in Egypt from the Mahdi, and the insurrection of which he was the head. The Mahdi had not, in our opinion and so far as we had information, exhibited any pre-eminent military capacity, and although, of course, it could not be disputed that he had exercised considerable authority over the tribes in certain districts of the country, and had obtained several successes over the troops sent against him, he had not shown any great capacity in utilizing the fruits of his victories. We also thought that, while General Gordon appeared somewhat to overrate the danger to Egypt from the insurrection of the Mahdi, he had somewhat underrated the dangers which would be involved in installing Zebehr at Khartoum, altogether irrespective of the slavery and slave-hunting antecedents of Zebehr. I am referring to the danger which we thought existed in installing at Khartoum, in a position of authority, a man who, according to General Gordon's own account, was a man of great military character and boundless ambition, who had a grievance against the Egyptian Government, and who appeared, from all the information we could obtain, to be the one man under whom it was not improbable a great and aggressive slave-holding trade might be formed on the borders of Egypt. We thought also, from the tenour of General Gordon's communications, that he appeared to give undue weight to the assumed necessity for the immediate evacuation of Khartoum; and in informing him that we could not be parties to his recommendation as to the institution of Zebehr as his successor in Khartoum as Governor General, we asked him to remain there as long as he might think necessary, and as long as he should think it possible to carry out the original objects of his expedition, those objects being, as has been stated, to effect, peaceably if possible, the withdrawal of the Egyptian troops, and the reform of Egyptian affairs in the Soudan, and, in fulfilment of his original policy, to hand the country over to the representatives of those Rulers who existed at the time of the conquest of the country by Mehemet Ali. Since the sending of this despatch to General Gordon, through Sir Evelyn Baring, the communication with Khartoum, as the House is aware, has been greatly interrupted. As yet we do not know what General Gordon proposes under these circumstances to do, and we have no intimation as to how far his plan of proceeding is modified by the refusal of the Government to comply with the suggestion that Zebehr should be nominated as his successor.

What was the date of this communication?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON:
I have not the Papers before me, and I cannot tell the actual date on which the final decision of the Government was sent to General Gordon. We are not aware as yet whether the communication of Sir Evelyn Baring, containing the final decision of the Government, has reached General Gordon; at all events, we have not got his views on the subject, nor a statement of his policy as affected by the refusal of the Government with regard to Zebehr. Reference has been made to the suggestion which emanated from General Gordon that a small British force should be despatched to Berber, and a British, or Indian, or Egyptian force to Wady Halfa, on the Nile, for the purpose of effecting a diversion against the Mahdi. As far as we can ascertain, these suggestions have been made by General Gordon in connection with his proposal that Zebehr Pasha should be sent to Khartoum as his successor in the Government, and also in relation to the policy, which he appeared to consider at that time necessary, of subduing and crushing the revolt of the Mahdi. If he said that Zebehr should be sent at once on his suggestion, in our opinion that would not then have been in itself sufficient. It was the delay which, in General Gordon's opinion, caused the necessity for a military diversion. But General Gordon has never suggested, to my knowledge, the employment of troops for the relief of Khartoum. He left this country with a most distinct and clear understanding, repeated over and over again by himself, that the mission which he was going to undertake was one which he was prepared to undertake with such resources as he might find on the spot; and he distinctly understood that it was not a part of the policy of the Government in despatching that expedition to risk having to send a fresh expedition for the relief of Khartoum or any similar garrisons. I have said that General Gordon has never, to my knowledge, suggested the employment of British troops for the relief of Khartoum. We have no knowledge that he considers the employment of troops there necessary. We have no knowledge that he even desires that troops should be sent. Nevertheless, the possibility of taking advantage of General Graham's Force and sending it to Berber, and thus effecting a diversion that might be of advantage to General Gordon, has been carefully considered by the Government. After the victories of General Graham, it is probable that a small force, a force of Cavalry at all events, might be sent from Suakin to Berber without any great risk from a military point of view. But the information which we have received is that, although the military risk of such an operation might not be very great, the physical difficulty—the difficulty caused by want of water, the difficulty caused by the intense heat, the risk of the health of the troops, and other physical difficulties of that kind to be encountered—would be enormous. On the other hand, the advantage of sending a small force to Berber, even supposing that it should arrive there, appears to be extremely doubtful at this season, when the river communication between Berber and Khartoum is very difficult, if not impossible, and when there are surrounding Berber, and between that place and Khartoum, tribes in numbers which are entirely unknown to us, apparently in a more or less disturbed state. As to the position of General Gordon at Khartoum, I have already given the latest information which we have received from him. That information was to the effect that the tribes under his command at Khartoum had gained one success of some importance against the rebels threatening him, but that on a later occasion those tribes had suffered a considerable reverse, which appeared to be due to some extent to the conduct of certain officers in command of the force. General Gordon's latest report is that he thinks that Khartoum is now safe, and he states, though I do not know exactly what meaning is to be attached to the expression, that "as the Nile rises he will be able to account for the rebels." That is the news of the 23rd of March. He also reports that provisions are coming in freely from the White Nile. In fact, the tenour of the latest reports from him is satisfactory. Further, although, as I have said, the country between Berber and Khartoum is more or less disturbed, communications, although they are slow, are not altogether interrupted, and it is possible to send and receive messages from General Gordon at Khartoum or Berber. Under these circumstances, because the Government, after fully considering all the bearings of the case, have declined to send to Berber at the present season a small force at very great risk, and with no evident advantage either to General Gordon or to anyone else—because we have refused to do this at a time of year when it would be utterly impossible, in any circumstances, to send a large or adequate force, we are charged in some quarters with abandoning General Gordon. The Government have accepted—my right hon. Friend, both to-day and on previous occasions, accepted—the responsibility for General Gordon's actions so far as they have sanctioned them, and they feel also that they are greatly responsible for General Gordon's safety. But, at the present time, with the imperfect knowledge which we possess of General Gordon's policy in view of the decision not to send Zebehr Pasha as his successor to Khartoum, in ignorance as we are of his own wishes and desires, it is impossible for the Government to state what measures may ultimately have to be taken for discharging that responsibility which they feel for the safety of General Gordon. The Question which the right hon. Gentleman has placed upon the Paper assumes that the Government undertook to establish a system of government in the Eastern Soudan, and to regulate its relations with the Western Soudan on the one side and with Egypt on the other. Sir, the Government have never undertaken any such obligation. They adhere to their opinion, which has been stated over and over again in this House, that the re-establishment of Egyptian authority over the Soudan is neither possible nor desirable; but they have never undertaken to establish the authority of this country over the Soudan. General Gordon himself believed, when he undertook his mission, that with time and patience it would be possible for him, without any material assistance, either from the Egyptian Government or the British Government, to effect an arrangement for the withdrawal of the garrisons, and that it would be possible for him to establish some form of Native Government. He may fail or he may succeed in his undertaking; but certainly, in our judgment, the time has not yet come when it can be said that General Gordon has definitely failed in his mission; and certainly nothing, in our judgment, has occurred to induce the Government to think that it is necessary, either in the interests of Egypt or of this country, to engage in military operations for the establishment of any Government whatsoever in the Soudan. My right hon. Friend has already said, in reply to the hon. Member for Andover (Mr. F. Buxton), and to other hon. Members, that General Gordon has the fullest possible discretion, either to remain at Khartoum should he think that a more permanent government by himself would result in greater success, or to withdraw should he consider his mission to be incapable of success. But, as I have said, we are at present without any recent information as to General Gordon's own views, and as to the policy which he thinks ought to be followed after the refusal of the Government to support him in the measure which he thought would be the best measure for the ultimate settlement of the Soudan and for the protection of the Frontier of Egypt. With regard to General Gordon and his position in Khartoum, I have said all that I think is necessary; but I may be allowed to refer to one or two points, to which allusion has been made on one or two previous occasions, with reference to the retirement or to the return to Egypt of General Graham's Forces without securing the road from Suakin to Berber. I have never said, and my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has never said, as was suggested the other day, that General Graham's operations were in any degree directed to the securing of that road by an advance of British troops, or holding possession of the road by British forces. What we said was that when Osman Digna's force was dispersed an attempt would be made to open up communication between Suakin and Berber by means of negotiations with the tribes. Attempts in that direction are being made. As long as Osman Digna's forces were unbroken there was no possibility of that road being opened for peaceful purposes, or trade purposes, or for the passage of troops. But now that the destruction of the power of Osman Digna has been completed, the position is altogether changed. Major Chermside, who was sent specially to assist General Graham with this object, has been directed to enter into negotiations with the friendly tribes, and by arrangements which are perfectly understood in that country, and which are perfectly easy of accomplishment, to secure, as far as possible, their services for opening, protecting, and maintaining the security of the road for peaceful purposes. As a further step in the same direction, Major Kitchener, an officer in Sir Evelyn Wood's force, was sent some time ago, at the suggestion of General Gordon, to inquire into the state of the country and the condition of the troops at a point lower down the Nile than that at which Major Chermside was engaged. Major Kitchener's Report has been received, and it is to the effect that emissaries from the Mahdi have been at work among a powerful tribe which inhabits that part of the Nile Valley; but, as far as he was able to ascertain, they have not had any success, and the Chiefs of that tribe are perfectly ready to be employed for the purpose of assisting in operations such as I have described, with the eventual object of opening and securing the Berber road. We are in communication with Sir Evelyn Baring in order to ascertain whether the services of these tribes can or cannot be utilized; but it is an example of the inconvenience of making a full statement on a subject of the kind at the present time, that only since I have been in the House this evening I have received a telegram from Sir Evelyn Baring pointing out the extreme caution with which any negotiation of the kind with one tribe, and the risk of alienating other equally powerful tribes, should be conducted, and the danger of making too abrupt an announcement of the negotiations which are going forward. A Question has been asked by the noble Lord the Member for Essex (Lord Eustace Cecil) with regard to the future garrisoning of Suakin. Some time ago Sir Evelyn Baring reported that arrangements would shortly have to be made for such garrisoning; and he recommended that an Egyptian force from General Wood's troops should be sent to Suakin after the departure of the British Forces. He said at the time, in his opinion, the period had come when the idea ought to be abandoned that the Egyptian Government should have two forces—one for service in Egypt and the other for service in the Soudan; his view being that in the future the only positions which would require to be held in the Soudan would be the Red Sea ports, and he thought that General Wood's force might be properly and usefully employed in garrisoning the necessary positions.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: What is the date of the Report to which the noble Lord refers?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is impossible for me to state the date precisely; but our reply was that if Sir Evelyn Wood saw no objection to his troops being so employed, and the troops themselves were willing to engage in the service, the Government saw no reason to disapprove the suggestion. Preparations are, therefore, now being made to send a portion of Sir Evelyn Wood's Army to garrison Suakin on the departure of the British troops. Some questions have arisen as to the civil and military command at Suakin after the change of the garrison takes place; there are also questions as to some other matters which are still under consideration, and with regard to which final orders have not as yet been given. Until the arrangement to which I refer has been completed, a small British force will remain at Suakin; and the Admiralty have also made arrangements that for a time—perhaps for some considerable time—a force of Marines shall be detained at Suakin, partly on shore and partly in what I may describe as barracks afloat. They will be detained there for the purpose of giving support, if necessary, to the troops who will constitute the main force in garrison at Suakin. Finally, the right hon. Gentleman has asked further for a statement from the Government in regard to the relations which they hold—political, financial, and military—with Egypt. In the presence of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, I need hardly say that it is not my intention to undertake a reply to that part of the Question. If the right hon. Gentleman will be good enough to specify in somewhat more of detail, and in a more precise form than he has done, the nature of the information which he wishes to obtain, I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend will, as far as he can, reply to the Question. I will say, however, that in my view it is neither possible nor desirable to make any further statement of a general character such as is asked by the right hon. Gentleman. No such statement ought, in my view, to be made until, in the first place, the Government and the House have more definite knowledge of the course of events in the Soudan, and the result which those events will have upon the government and the administration of Egypt. Furthermore, I think that such a statement ought not to be made until additional progress has been made in the examination which is now being conducted by the Government as to the financial position of Egypt, and of the changes which may become necessary in view of that position. It has been already my duty, in the course of this statement, to repeat the disclaimer which has been made by the Government on former occasions of responsibility for establishing a Government in the Soudan. We have never made any such disclaimer with regard to Egypt, and we make no such disclaimer now. We have acknowledged our responsibility in this respect both to Europe and to the people of Egypt itself; but it would not, in our view, render the fulfilment of those pledges more easy—on the contrary, it would render that fulfilment more difficult—if we were to make declarations of policy from day to day whenever we were asked to do so. The affairs of Egypt are constantly changing and are constantly liable to change, and contingencies are almost always arising, the full effects and bearing of which it is impossible, in our opinion, at the present moment to foresee.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, with reference to the following statement, made in a Letter signed by his secretary, and addressed on his behalf to the Workmen's Peace Association, in reply to a Resolution condemning "the wholesale slaughter of thousands of brave men in the Soudan," "the covenants under which this Country has been acting in Egypt were not made by the present Government," Whether he will state what are the covenants under which Her Majesty's Government have sanctioned the Military expedition to the Eastern Soudan; and, whether Her Majesty's Government are precluded by such covenants from relieving General Gordon at Khartoum?

MR. GLADSTONE: The covenant to which the Question of the hon. Member refers was one made by the late Government earnestly to support the Government of the Khedive. There are no other covenants. If the hon. Member does not think that covers our operations in the Soudan, the hon. Member is at liberty to retain his own opinion.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked in what diplomatic document that covenant was contained?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have stated over and over again in the hearing of Members of Her Majesty's late Government what I have now said in answer to the hon. Member, and I can go no further.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked whether the covenant to which the right hon. Gentleman alluded was not undertaken by Her Majesty's Government in conjunction with the French Government, and how far Her Majesty's Government thought it necessary to adhere to that covenant after the French Government had withdrawn from it?

MR. GLADSTONE: I apprehend, Sir, that the title of the French Government, of the French Chambers, and of the French people to interpret for themselves their own obligations is absolute and indefeasible, and it would be an impertinence and a piece of presumption on our part if we gave an opinion as to the course which they have taken. Whatever they may have done has not absolved us from our duty to interpret our engagements according to the best of our lights, which is what we have endeavoured to do.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the right hon. Gentleman how he connected this matter of the covenant with that part of his Question which referred to the "wholesale slaughter of thousands of brave men in the Soudan," and whether he would state to the House what the covenant really was?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have already stated in distinct and express terms what the covenant was. The hon. Gentleman must see, and the whole House must see, that the Question which is now put is a matter of argument, and if he is of opinion that the covenant does not cover our proceedings in the Soudan, it is open to him to call the attention of the House to the matter.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: What covenant?

MR. GLADSTONE: The covenant earnestly to support the Government of the Khedive. If, as I have said, the hon. Member does not think that covenant covers our proceedings in the Soudan, he is perfectly at liberty to call the attention of the House to it.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I wish, Sir, to ask the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government have not themselves carried out the covenant to support the Government of the Khedive; and, if so, how it is that they throw the responsibility for the massacres in the Soudan upon some other Government? [Cries of "Notice!"]

EGYPT (MILITARY OPERATIONS IN THE SOUDAN)—VOTE OF THANKS TO GENERAL GRAHAM AND ADMIRAL HEWETT.

MR. ONSLOW asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he proposes to ask the House to agree to a Vote of Thanks to General Graham and Admiral Hewett for the recent operations in the Soudan; and, whether, according to the recent precedent of Lord Wolseley and Lord Alcester, he intends to advise the Crown to grant peerages on these two distinguished Officers, or to propose a grant to either of them in the shape of pension or "lump" sum?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is no part of my duty, and I have no authority, to limit the discretion of the hon. Member or of any other hon. Member in the House as to the Questions which they shall put to Ministers. But I really must appeal to the House whether in regard to Questions which are peculiarly matters of grace and favour on the part of the Crown the initiative is to be taken by Members of this House by putting Questions to the Executive Government. I do not suppose that it is the intention of the hon. Gentleman, but, in effect, his Question is a direct attempt to transfer the functions of grace and favour from the Crown to Members of this House. Upon all occasions of great military operations there are matters which the Executive Government has to consider when the proper time comes. I do not speak now of the particular services to which the hon. Member has referred in his Question, but I may say with regard to them that when the proper time comes Her Majesty's Government will take the course which seems to them fitting in the circumstances without waiting for Questions to be put to them in this House. We are deeply sensible of the obligations of this House and of the country to General Graham and Admiral Hewett, and also to their gallant companions in arms.

MR. ONSLOW wished, in justification of his Question, to remind the Prime Minister that a similar Question was put with regard to the services which General Roberts and General Stewart rendered to their country in the Afghan War. He should repeat the Question on Monday next.

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SOUDAN)—SUPPLIES TO GENERAL GORDON.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What supplies of money have been furnished to General Gordon; whether further measures are being adopted to meet his requirements; and, what sums he has demanded?

MR. GLADSTONE: With regard to supplies of money, that is a matter between the Egyptian Government and General Gordon himself, and I have no information on the subject.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether General Gordon has requested that Troops may be sent to his assistance; and, whether such request, if made, has been complied with or refused?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think this Question has been fully answered by my noble Friend near me. He has referred to what took place in respect of Berber, and subject to that explanation General Gordon has made no request for troops to be sent to his assistance.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the right hon. Gentleman to give a more specific reply to the Question whether the Government had asked General Gordon if he needed British troops?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that General Gordon had been asked as to his views generally with regard to the business in which he was engaged, but he did not think it necessary to answer more fully than he had already done any further Questions on the subject.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE — SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAYS BILL.

MR. CARBUTT asked, considering the great interest felt in the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sundays Bill, which was talked out yesterday, when the Government would give facilities for a Saturday Sitting for the consideration of the Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that after the answer which he had been reluctantly obliged to give to the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) in regard to his Motion on the subject of local taxation, he was afraid that, to say the least of it, a considerable amount of jealousy would be created if he, on behalf of the Government, gave any sort of a promise that a Saturday Sitting would be devoted to making further progress with the Sunday Closing Bill.

DEATH OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF ALBANY.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Lord KENSINGTON) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address [31st March], as followeth:—

I have received your Loyal and Dutiful Address.

I thank you sincerely for the expression of your deep concern and condolence with Me in the loss of My beloved Son, and for the assurance of your abiding interest in everything that affects the happiness of Myself and My Family.

BILL—DEBATE ON SECOND READING.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I ask the permission of the House to say one word with reference to a statement made by me on Monday last; and, as the matter is of some importance to me personally, I am sure the House will kindly allow me to do so. I have been asked to represent a constituency of many thousands of working men, and, therefore, the matter is one of personal importance to myself. My right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board stated yesterday that I said in the House with regard to this Reform Bill that it dealt with 2,000,000 of the most ignorant and, therefore, inexperienced people in this country, and he infers that I included the pick of the London artisans in that ignorant class. Now, it will be in the recollection of the House that I said that I had not only voted for the Bill of 1867—that not only was I ready to support any measure of legislation—but that I also said that I was prepared to give the electoral power to all those who by their industry, by their intelligence, and their character had a stake in the country. I am sure my right hon. Friend, who made some ungenerous remarks about me, cannot have meant to convey that I included the pick of the London artisans in the class to which I referred.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: As the right hon. Baronet has used the word “ungenerous” in reference to my remarks upon his speech, perhaps the House will permit me to explain that I had quoted the words of that speech from the best report of it I could find. The right hon. Baronet had certainly said that the Prime Minister proposed to enfranchise 2,000,000 of the most ignorant people in the country; and as the Prime Minister had stated that the 2,000,000 which the Bill proposed to enfranchise would include the pick of the artisans of London, I had drawn the natural inference from the right hon. baronet's words that he included the pick of the artisans of London in the 2,000,000 of the most ignorant people in the country whom it was proposed to enfranchise.

EGYPT—POLICY OF HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT.

NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE—AD-JOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE (RULE 2).

SIR STAFFORD NORTH COTE, Member for North Devon, rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, viz., the present policy of Her Majesty's Government in relation to the affairs of Egypt and the Soudan, and the position of General Gordon at Khartoum.

The pleasure of the House not having been signified—

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman asks for leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance—namely, the present policy of Her Majesty's Government in relation to the affairs of Egypt and the Soudan, and the position of General Gordon at Khartoum. Is it your pleasure that leave be given to the right hon. Gentleman to make the Motion? ["No, no!"] Is the right hon. Gentleman supported by 40 Members?

And not less than 40 Members having risen in their places—

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I shall make no apology for raising this question; and if I had had any doubt as to the propriety of my doing so, I must confess that that doubt would have been removed by the statements that we have just heard from the Prime Minister and from the Secretary of State for War. I need not say that the subject is one which receives and deserves the attention and that it commands the interest of this House and of the country. I do not question the right of the Government to exercise reticence upon any points in reference to which they think that it ought to be observed; but I beg to say that the statements which we have just heard from the Government are not only unsatisfactory with regard to what they do not feel themselves at liberty to do, but what I fear very much from them is that the present policy of Her Majesty's Government is tainted with exactly the same faults which has tainted their policy throughout, and which has been the cause of great trouble to us as a nation. It appears to me, from those statements, that there is the same desire to avoid responsibility, and to cast that responsibility upon others, and the same disposition to close their eyes to important matters which are passing and which must affect our position and our future relations in Egypt, which we have noticed in their previous policy with regard to that country. The Questions which have been put with regard to the general relations that exist between Her Majesty's Government and the Egyptian Government, and with regard to the political, military, and financial affairs of that country, are undoubtedly Questions of great interest and importance; but the question that most immediately presses itself upon our attention is that which relates to the position of General Gordon at Khartoum, and that is a question which connects itself very closely with other questions; but, at the same time, it is the one upon which the attention of the country is and ought to be fixed. The noble Lord has taunted us, or rather has made some observations upon the cry which he says he has heard in some quarters in this country, as to the abandonment of General Gordon. I do not make the statement as to the abandonment of General Gordon from anything I have heard in this country; but I make it from what is reported to have been said in Khartoum itself, and reported upon authority which it is very difficult indeed to dispute. The statement rests upon the authority of Mr. Power, our Consular Agent at Khartoum, one of the three Englishmen who alone are in that city, and who tells us that he is in constant communication with General Gordon; and if I may venture to refer to private matters, I may say that I learn that General Gordon has assured his friends in this country that anything that Mr. Power states concerning him may be taken as authentic. Mr. Power says—

"We are daily expecting British troops, and we cannot bring ourselves to believe that we are to be abandoned by England."

Whether that statement comes from General Gordon or from one of his few compatriots there, it is equally important. That which presented itself to the mind of Mr. Power is no doubt that which presents itself to the minds of every other Englishman at Khartoum. This distinguished man, General Gordon, has gone with the authority of Her Majesty's Government, and has placed himself in a position of great danger. Hon. Members are aware, from what has been stated in this House, that the expedition was undertaken by General Gordon, not on his own account, but at the request, and by the authority, of Her Majesty's Government. They are also perfectly aware that Her Majesty's Government, when their action in Egypt has been questioned, have, from time to time, sheltered themselves behind the authority of General Gordon; and we have been taught to rely upon him as the agent who was to get us out of all the terrible difficulties in which we were placed. We were told, with considerable confidence and with some little air of mystery, that General Gordon had plans which could not properly be disclosed, which always appeared to me to be rather vague and extravagant, but which the Government thought were plans that ought to have a trial, and plans that, in their opinion, promised success. As far as we are able to see, however, the attempts which General Gordon has made have not met with success. His attempts to conciliate the tribes in his neighbourhood, and to come to an arrangement with the Mahdi, seem to have led to results different from those which we had a right to expect. In the meantime, we see General Gordon with the honour of England engaged in his safety. ["No, no!"] Some hon. Gentlemen opposite, when I say that the honour of England is engaged in the safety of General Gordon, answer "No!" I cannot attempt to argue with Gentlemen who take that view; but I want to know whether that is the view of Her Majesty's Government? We have had ambiguous language used by the Prime Minister. We have had language used by the noble Lord which I think was not altogether clear nor altogether consistent with the language of the Prime Minister with regard to General Gordon's position. According to the Prime Minister, General Gordon is free to leave Khartoum to-morrow if he pleases, as I am free to leave London to-morrow; but, according to the noble Lord, he has been asked by Her Majesty's Government to remain there until he has accomplished some scheme. When I speak of General Gordon as being bound to Khartoum, I do not say that he is bound to it in such a manner that he would be subjected to any punishment if he left it; but, knowing what General Gordon is, and knowing also the nature of his relations with the Government, we cannot say that he is there entirely of his own free will, and that his being there has nothing to do with that which is expected and asked of him by Her Majesty's Government. Therefore, I maintain that he is there as our Agent; that he is the Representative of England; and that he occupies a position in regard to which the honour of England is pledged. I do not say that General Gordon—Heaven forbid!—is in actual danger there. I trust that he is not; but if language is used which seems to indicate that England is careless of his safety, you do put him in a position of considerable danger. What I want to know, however, is what is exactly the position of General Gordon? Whose officer is he? We are told by the Prime Minister that, to a certain extent, General Gordon is an officer of Her Majesty's Government, and that, to a certain extent, he is an officer of the Egyptian Government. In so far as he is an officer of Her Majesty's Government, he appears to have gone out simply for the purpose of drawing up a Report; but in so far as he is an officer of the Egyptian Government, he has much larger functions, and very important functions. He has the command of the administration of a very large province and a very important town. These are two positions which, I think, are not very easily reconcilable with each other. There is the old saying, that "No man can serve two masters;" and we want to know which master it is whom General Gordon is bound to serve? We know perfectly well that whichever it is nominally it must really be the English Government. We know perfectly well that by the action which the British Government have taken in regard to the affairs of the Soudan, they have overruled the Government of Egypt in most important matters, and we know that they are supreme, and, in the last resort, responsible. Therefore, it is a most dangerous thing, considering how deeply the honour of England is concerned, to leave matters on such a footing that by some action of the Egyptian Government which you do not choose to control you make it possible that events may take place which, if you had interfered earlier, you might have prevented. It is the old story of Hicks Pasha and declining responsibility. In that case you chose to say that you would not be responsible in the matter: you left things to take their course; they took a very wrong and a very unfortunate course; and then, at the last moment, you proceeded to action far beyond what you need have taken in the first instance—action which has been of a strong, a violent, and an overruling character. You will come to the same thing now, and will bring upon yourselves the very responsibility which you are endeavouring to avoid and to escape. I do not desire to go into details as to the course you are pursuing. It may, or it may not be, the right thing to send troops to Wady

Halfa, or to Berber, or to open up the road between Berber and Suakin. All these are matters of great importance, in regard to which, under ordinary circumstances, one would say—"Trust the Government, and let them carry on their operations." But I wish to know what is the line on which they are proceeding, and what is the general scope of their policy with regard to Egypt? The noble Lord seems to think that by putting the Questions which I addressed to him I was asking the Government to undertake the settlement of the Government of the Eastern Soudan, or the relations of the Western Soudan with Khartoum. I do not ask him to do these things; but I ask him what is the policy of the Government in regard to these matters? Is it their policy to let things drift entirely, or are they going to stir? If they are not going to interfere at all, what are they doing at Suakin or anywhere else? Either they are responsible, or they are not responsible, for laying down some line of policy which is to be pursued by the Egyptian Government under their authority with regard to these important matters. You cannot, in dealing with the affairs of Egypt, cut off the consideration of the state of the Soudan. You have tried to do that already, but you found it was impossible. You may try to do it again; but if you leave the Egyptian Government to deal with all these matters entirely by themselves, who is to say that you will not have fresh invasions and risings, and will not be obliged to take very strong measures? I venture to say that if that should take place you would have your responsibility very quickly indeed called forth, not only in connection with the honour of England, but with regard to the financial relations in which you stand towards Egypt. In regard to those relations I wished to have had some explanation. The only explanation we have had is that an important financial examination is going on. If so, we might have been told a little more about the circumstances which led to the examination, by whom it was conducted, and to what particular objects the examination is directed. From all we know at present the financial position of Egypt is extremely unsatisfactory, and it is possible that an examination, and even something more than an examination, into the financial affairs of Egypt has become necessary. We ought to have information on that subject as early as possible; but we believe that, with reference both to its foreign and its domestic affairs, the financial condition of Egypt depends largely on the administration of Egypt, and we want to know whether this sort of double Government is to be carried on; and, if so, on what terms it is to be carried on, and whether you can insure that it can be so carried on as to avert the danger we must apprehend of a double Government leading to large expenditure and great responsibility? That is the case in all that may be called Egypt in reference to the defence of the frontier, and all that may happen in regard to administration in Egypt Proper. We feel that we are left in an unsatisfactory position in regard to the information which the Government has given to us on this matter. What I wish particularly to obtain from the Government is some clearer explanation than we have yet received of the relations which this country now recognizes as existing between herself and the Government of Egypt. The right hon. Gentleman made reference to the policy of the Predecessors of the present Government, the inheritance and legacy which was left to them, and the rest of it. I have more than once answered the right hon. Gentleman on that point, and I should be ready to do so again if I did not think it would be a waste of time. I do not now ask what brought us here, but what are you going to do in the position in which we stand? Are we to go on doing nothing at all, or are we to go on keeping up a sort of double Government? I do not wish to detain the House any further. I have pointed out what appears to me to be the particularly unsatisfactory condition of our relations with Egypt, the uncertainty of General Gordon's position, the uncertainty of how far we are responsible for his actions; and we ask for some further information as to the gallant General's plans. The Government must have such information. They must be aware whether General Gordon is or is not of opinion that the plans he has been pursuing are such as he can hope to carry into effect with success. He must have informed them how far those plans have hitherto succeeded; and I think we have a right to ask for more information on that subject from the Government.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now adjourn."—
 (Sir Stafford Northcote.)

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman in his statement to the House has not raised many points on which it is my duty to make a reply. I am afraid that the substance of what I say will be a complaint of the course which has been taken by the right hon. Gentleman, and a pretty strong complaint too; and I propose to make clear the grounds upon which I found it. Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman says that he thinks that General Gordon must necessarily have informed us what are his views and plans, and the right hon. Gentleman makes that a main pillar of his statement, just after he has been informed by my noble Friend in his clear and masterly statement, from which I do not intend to deviate by the breadth of a hair, and to which, in substance, I have nothing to add—after he has been informed by my noble Friend that the Government have found it their duty to decline to accede to an important recommendation proposed by General Gordon for giving effect to his plans, and that we had not yet received the acknowledgment by General Gordon that he was aware of that decision of the Government and the effect that it had produced on his mind—it is in these circumstances, when there has not been what I may call a return of post from General Gordon acquainting the Government with his views about Zebehr Pasha, the right hon. Gentleman comes down to the House and says—"You must be perfectly aware of all the plans of General Gordon." The right hon. Gentleman says—"This is the old story of Hicks Pasha and declining responsibility." I thought the right hon. Gentleman had had enough of Hicks Pasha after the five nights we had on that subject. But this case, Sir, is exactly the reverse of Hicks Pasha and declining responsibility. The right hon. Gentleman is only able to draw upon his imagination by saying that our doctrine as to Egyptian government is that in the Soudan we have no responsibility. Sir, we have said no such thing. We have said, with regard to the proceedings of General Gordon, that, although in his executive capacity he is the officer of the Egyptian Government, yet we have not only a great interest with regard to his proceedings, but a great responsibility also. Then the right hon. Gentleman gets up, coolly overlooking and setting aside the clearest and plainest words we could use, and, forsooth, he complains of the ambiguity of our statements and of the lamentable want of information. Sir, I go further. This is the 17th night on which the House has been introduced to an Egyptian debate. I want to know whether that is a course which is beneficial to the country? As the Head of Her Majesty's Government, I enter my protest against that course. I say there is no precedent for it. There is not in all the annals of Parliament anything in the slightest degree resembling the conduct that has been pursued by the Opposition, and by the Leader of the Opposition, with respect to these Egyptian transactions. Now, Sir, I say plainly this—with regard to the bulk of the House on this side, or the bulk of the House on that side, I think they are perfectly entitled to exercise the most jealous scrutiny over all we do. I have never claimed indulgence at their hands. They know well the difficulties—though only part of the difficulties—under which we have to labour in this Egyptian Question. I admit that we have never claimed indulgence at their hands; but there is one set of men from whom we had a right to expect indulgence and co-operation, and that is the Members of the late Government. But these are the men who have not only exercised their faculty of criticism—as though they, forsooth, had nothing to do with this matter—but have set an example of which they may hereafter have to pay the price. They will have made a precedent of pushing a question of this kind in a manner and to a degree to which I declare, Sir, so far as my knowledge goes, there is nothing approaching a resemblance in the whole history of the House of Commons. You have had your discussion for 17 nights out of the two months which the House has, as yet, been able to give to the affairs of the Empire. Has it been for a beneficial purpose? Has the Government attempted to meet the reasonable wishes entertained by the nation? [Cheers and "No!"] Well, Sir, I believe the opinion of the majority of the House is the direct reverse of that negative, which proceeds from a few. Ire-

gard the speech of my noble Friend to-night as having indicated the most anxious desire to convey, as far as public duty would permit, to the minds of the House the clearest ideas of the position. He has told all we know ourselves with respect to the Soudan and with respect to Egypt. He has told you that it is impossible to enter upon any new statement of policy. The policy and position of the Government in Egypt are perfectly understood. ["Oh, oh!"] They have been explained—but I am not saying that they are perfectly understood by every Gentleman in this House. There are some Gentlemen in this House who never will understand it. I say this—they have been explained over and over again in the most solemn documents known to us—namely, the Speeches from the Throne; and the relations established in virtue of our military occupation, which were undoubtedly, I will not say modified, but, at any rate, interpreted in a more clear and developed sense, by the proceedings which took place about four months ago when the Egyptian Administration was changed, that position of the Government and that high responsibility which my noble Friend himself was the first to state to-night, had been laid before the House in language as clear as we could use. If we have any change to announce in that policy, we shall not wait for the Question of the right hon. Gentleman and for the repetition of the Motion for Adjournment, which, I confess, appears to be a clear and sheer abuse of the Privileges of Parliament. We shall ourselves make known to the House any change that our convictions of public duty may induce us to think it right that we should adopt. But, Sir, my noble Friend went further. He said we were busy with the questions of Egyptian finance. He said that an examination had been proceeding into the subject of Egyptian finance; and, so far as we are concerned, we hardly overstate the case if we say that that examination is virtually complete. But the right hon. Gentleman says—"We want to know what it is? You completed your examination yesterday, and to-day you should come down here and tell us all the particulars."

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I only asked to what point the examination was directed.

MR. GLADSTONE: To the balance of account between Receipt and Expenditure, which the right hon. Gentleman did not think very much of when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer of this country. ["Oh!"] I am quite ready to give my reason for what I say. Be so good as to look to "Fifteen Years' Statistical Abstract," and to the little minus mark against the years of deficiency in this country, and Gentlemen will find that what I say is no vague political rhetoric, but is a sorrowful reference to unquestionable facts. But the right hon. Gentleman knows better than we do, in this particular case, that Egyptian finance is not a matter to be settled between this country and Egypt alone. And then the right hon. Gentleman says—"Having made your examination, why do not you come down here and tell us all about it?" [Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: No.] Well, I may have misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman; but he said he wanted to know to what point the examination was directed. Well, I will only say that if there is reason and equity on all sides, there need be no fear as to the future of Egyptian finance; but the matter is one of great difficulty. Egyptian finance was in great difficulty eight or ten years ago, when the late Government afforded relief by the purchase of the Suez Canal Shares; it was in a state of difficulty two years ago before the Dual Control had come to an end; and it is in difficulty now, which renders it necessary for us to endeavour to consider what measures should be taken with a view to its thorough rectification. The right hon. Gentleman knows that there have been special causes which have operated unfavourably on Egyptian finance—the destruction of property in Alexandria and the enormous awards with respect to that destruction. But another main cause, I am sorry to say, has been the now sufficiently revealed costliness of that singular and extraordinary attempt which will hereafter be regarded as a political paradox—the attempt of Egypt to exercise political supremacy over the Soudan. I see no reason why, with fair intentions on all sides, this problem should not be solved. It is a problem in which other countries are concerned as well as ourselves. There are the rights of the Sultan and the rights of the Powers. You can hardly stir a step with regard to Egyptian finance without finding that you are absolutely blocked by the engagements which have been made in former times for the purpose, as was then supposed, of securing Egyptian credit. It is in these circumstances that we say it is absolutely impossible for us, with this question of finance in hand, with the immediate duty incumbent on us of considering what measures may be required, and the relation which Egyptian finance has to other Powers as well as ourselves—it is impossible for us, I say, to satisfy the demand of the right hon. Gentleman, that we should enter into a discussion of our policy in Egypt, which is quite inseparable from the question of Egyptian finance. I am quite sure that the right hon. Gentleman is the last man who would knowingly use a power of the kind he has used to-night for purposes of public mischief; but I say distinctly that, whatever his intentions may be, he does exercise it for public mischief. In these two months, this is the 17th discussion we have had on Egypt. Is it to be supposed that these incessant discussions and the excitement by which, on most occasions, they are characterized, do not greatly hamper the progress of the Government, surrounded as they are by difficulties, by rival interests, aye, and some of the most important interests working underground in regard to this question of Egyptian policy? I say they do distinctly; and I will give from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman an example of the mischief arising out of these debates. What has he said to-night? He, the Leader of the Opposition, has announced to the world the failure of the plan of General Gordon; is that beneficial? Is that the way in which those who claim to themselves a monopoly of the terms "loyal," "Constitutional," and "patriotic" justify their claims? Is that the way in which they sustain the honour and interests of England in Egypt, or in which they offer to show their estimate of the debt we owe to the gallant General Gordon? When General Gordon himself says he has failed, or when that fact is beyond doubt, we may not be able, and it may not be our duty, to disguise it; but the right hon. Gentleman, in his zeal to make out a case to justify the Motion for Adjournment, anticipates the fact, and feeling how slender are the materials at his command, he is obliged to feign a failure in order to bolster up the case he laid before the House. I will take my stand upon that single assertion; and I affirm that these discussions are mischievous as well as unprecedented. That they are unprecedented I believe to be beyond the possibility of denial; that they are mischievous I affirm; and in proof of what I say I refer to the announcement of the right hon. Gentleman to-night in regard to the failure of General Gordon. Sir, I deny it. It may come. In the face of difficulties almost hopeless and insurmountable, that gallant man offered to place himself in the breach, went to the post of danger, and he faced the difficulties before him; and I say that General Gordon's mission, even at this moment, has not been barren. After the defeat of Hicks Pasha, what were the apprehensions that were prevalent? They were, that the Mahdi, flushed with victory, and the tribes enchanted, and practically bewitched by his success, would become the invaders of Egypt, and would disturb the country along the whole course of the Nile. These expectations and apprehensions have not been realized; on the contrary, the charm of the Mahdi's success has been broken, and the counter attraction of General Gordon's great name did much to prevent anything like a dangerous combination. I should not, perhaps, say too much, though I venture to give it as an opinion at this moment that there is infinitely less to fear from the Mahdi and his friends than we had reason, and not without grounds, to apprehend during the months that followed the defeat of Hicks Pasha. I say this great advantage is already realized; but until we know something of General Gordon's plans, and what substitute he may have found for his proposal about Zebehr, or what measures he intends to pursue, I shall entirely decline to share the irresponsible declarations of the right hon. Gentleman. I almost venture to appeal to some of the Gentlemen who sit behind him when I say that this premature assertion by the Leader of the Opposition that the plans of General Gordon have failed is mischievous to the best interests of Egypt. I have said that one of the greatest difficulties in this case is the number of cross and conflicting interests you have to deal with. I think it was the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) who said that, after all, our actions simply meant promoting the interests of the bondholders. Ah, Sir, if our action were intended simply to have that result, we should stand better with a considerable portion of the Press of Europe than we do. You read extracts from some foreign newspapers that are astonished at our deadness, and that speak of the demand that public duty makes upon us. Sir, when I read these extracts I hail them as testimonies that we have not been taken in, and that we are not willing to be made the instruments of those who, for the sake of the millions sterling that have been invested in Egypt, are endeavouring, by every means they can employ, to bring the people of England blindfold into the assumption of immense responsibilities, which no man can measure, and with regard to which I will say this—we will not undertake to say whether the people of England are to assume them or not—this great nation will determine that question for itself; but this we will say—they shall not assume them without knowing what they are about—they shall not assume them blindfold. You may quote your foreign Press, with every wire that governs the action of that portion of it to which I refer, pulled by those who are connected with this great pecuniary interest; it is not wonderful that they should act in this sense, because what could be more comfortable or satisfactory to them than that, having already profited largely by the intervention of England, they should secure by it £15,000,000 or £20,000,000 more? What could be more satisfactory to them, there being no other consequence to be apprehended except the imposition of a terrific burden upon the people of England and the undertaking of responsibilities of which I am certainly inclined to take a very serious measure? I have very little more to say. I have contended that this course is wholly unprecedented, and that it is extremely mischievous to the public interests. I believe the 17 nights of debate—with whatever nights may be added to them—will be looked upon by the future student of Parliamentary history as a perfect curiosity in politics. Why in the world is this pressure exercised? Why, two or three times a week, have we these debates? One might suppose that Egypt lay in Yorkshire, and that the Soudan was in Caithness or Sutherlandshire. We are sometimes told that, having regard to Egyptian affairs, the Franchise Bill ought not to go forward. Why, Sir, when the great Reform Bill of 1831-2 was carried through Parliament there were other and much more serious questions nearer home, according to the political traditions of this country. There were questions raised by the Revolution of 1830, particularly by the Belgian Revolution and its relations to the new Monarchy in France—there were these questions, ten times more formidable for the people of England than the questions now raised in Egypt and the Soudan—embarrassing, I grant, to the last degree; but dangerous, critical, burning questions. ["No!"] I make a concession to the hon. Member for Carlisle. Were there a necessity or likelihood of further bloodshed under the flag of Her Majesty, that might be said to constitute a pressing and burning question in itself. Happily, we believe, so far as we know or can judge, risks of that kind have passed away. There is no violent crisis pending, then, in this country. When much more serious questions were open, and we were passing the Reform Act of 1831-2, the Opposition of that day—a powerful, active, and able Opposition—they never had—what shall I call it?—the boldness or daring—I might use a stronger word—to contend that these foreign questions ought to be used for the purpose of consuming the time of Parliament to the extent of 17 days out of two months of the Session. They never had the boldness to assume it; they never had that other quality, very different from boldness, which might have led them, without asserting and stating it, yet to make use of these foreign questions for that very purpose in order to weaken, by every means in their power, the resources of this great popular Legislative Assembly for the purpose of carrying on the great work of beneficial legislation. I cannot read the hearts of hon. Gentlemen opposite—no one can—but I can construe their acts. One word more. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the Report of Mr. Power, our Consular Agent. I have not a word to say against Mr. Power; I believe we are indebted to him for the services he has rendered; but what is Mr. Power in relation to us? He is resident in Khartoum; he is an independent merchant; he is the Correspondent of The Times. It became necessary to have someone, not to act as our representative, but to discharge certain duties at this particular time, and Mr. Power was appointed as temporary Consular Agent. A Consular Agent is not an officer responsible to this Government, even if permanently appointed; he only performs certain particular services, and his responsibility is within the limits of those services; as to anything else, he is perfectly free, and in the expression of his opinions he is as unchecked and unrestrained as are the hon. Gentlemen who sit opposite—and I cannot say more. And yet the right hon. Gentleman takes an opinion of Mr. Power transmitted to The Times as virtually equivalent to an official declaration probably conveying the mature conviction of General Gordon. Really, Sir, it is a farce to treat it in such a spirit. That is the kind of interpretation which, in the legitimate exercise of function as a Member of Parliament, I apply to the acts of these who are before me. I have pointed out that this mode of proceeding is totally without precedent, and that the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman himself is mischievous to the public interests, and calculated distinctly and undeniably to weaken the hands of the British Government, and likewise of every man acting for it in Egypt; and I cannot withhold the expression of this opinion—that the proceedings thus taken, and the debates thus constantly renewed, are out of all proportion to the pressure and urgency of the question, and have the effect of offering immense obstruction to important Public Business. These things, I say, are done, and they are done for some purpose which it is not necessary for me to define, and which has not, up to this time, been avowed.

MR. CHAPLIN said, the Prime Minister had appealed to hon. Members who sat behind the Leader of the Opposition to accept his assertion that in the action the right hon. Gentleman thought it right to take he had adopted a course mischievous to the interests of the country. He accepted the challenge of the Prime Minister, and utterly denied the truth of the statement. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition had made no disclosure with regard to the position of General Gordon which was not already patent to the whole world and to every human being in this country, except the Members of the Government, who, like ostriches, buried their heads in the sand and imagined that nobody could see them, or the result of any of their actions. The whole tenour of the speech of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War showed there was great doubt even in the minds of the Government as to General Gordon's position, although the noble Lord could not say "what measures it may be necessary for the Government ultimately to take for the safety of General Gordon." The noble Lord's declaration was an ample justification of the policy of the Leader of the Opposition, and fully warranted him in saying that General Gordon had probably failed altogether. The Prime Minister complained that they had been engaged 17 nights discussing the Egyptian Question. He sincerely trusted that they should continue to discuss it twice 17 nights if it were necessary, until they had succeeded in wringing from the Government, who never ceased when they were out of Office to complain of the policy of concealment pursued by their Predecessors, some definite statement of their policy and their views as to affairs in the Soudan. The Prime Minister said the policy of the Government was completely understood. By whom? Was it understood by the Government of Egypt, by the nations of Europe, by Parliament, or by the people of this country? He denied it altogether. He doubted very much whether it was understood even by Her Majesty's Government themselves, or if they had made up their minds with regard to what it was their duty to do. If, as the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War had distinctly said, the Government had no responsibility for affairs in the Soudan, in God's name why did they send General Gordon to Khartoum? They had placed that great General in a position which the whole country believed to be of the greatest danger to himself personally, and yet they had the assurance to come down to the House of Commons and say that, although they had taken this extreme had been in no sense abandoned, and, even if he had, it was because relief was impossible; and therefore, in his opinion, these cries were all bunkum. There were Motions for Adjournment and special Resolutions, and every turn of the Egyptian kaleidoscope was made the occasion for a fresh demonstration. There had been a whole series of Motions, from the Vote of Censure downwards, although the circumstances in Egypt and the Soudan had not changed materially since that time. These Motions were, as a rule, made at the instigation of a certain number of excited articles in the public Press; and he thought himself that the country would never be properly governed until a Cabinet was formed of the principal editors of the London Press. To them there might, perhaps, be added a number of old gentlemen to be found in the smoking-rooms of the principal Clubs, and then good government might be looked for. He did not wish to prolong the present proceedings. He only rose to protest against the charges of bloodshed and massacre made against the Government. If the Government were justified in defending Suakin, they were absolutely justified in dispersing, and were compelled to disperse, the force that threatened it.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down told the House that the circumstances in Egypt and the Soudan had not changed since the moving of the Vote of Censure; but when the Vote of Censure was being discussed, General Gordon's mission was pronounced by the Government to be essentially and exclusively a pacific mission. Since then, however, General Gordon has himself engaged in military operations, and we have been told to-night that General Gordon's object in requesting that Zebehr Pasha might be sent to co-operate with him was that he might by force crush the Mahdi. Although my right hon. Friend made his Motion to-night in one of his calmest, most moderate, most equitable, and even briefest of speeches, the Prime Minister responded to it in a state of animated fury such as I have never seen equalled. Why did the hon. Friend waste the time of length, and which were never introduced by my right hon. Friend, if the right hon. Gentleman was so anxious to proceed with what he would term the great legislative Business of the country and Parliament? Did my right hon. Friend say a word, either in praise or dispraise, of the editors or writers of the newspapers of Europe? What, then, had that attack of the Prime Minister's upon them to do with the question my right hon. Friend submitted to his consideration? Again, the Prime Minister turned round upon hon. Gentlemen behind him—who they might be I do not know—who he said were anxious to induce him to take up the cause of the Egyptian bondholders, and to plunge this country into some unknown and immeasurable obligation. But did my right hon. Friend introduce that question? It was reserved for the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, to introduce that fresh topic of discussion; and yet he accuses my right hon. Friend with wasting the time of the House, and attempting to stifle the great legislative objects now before it. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: Hear, hear!] I am convinced the speech of the Prime Minister and the corroborative cheer of the Home Secretary will have no effect on the country at large. The Prime Minister declared that he could construe our acts. I thought the speech of the right hon. Gentleman showed that he was only capable of misconstruing the acts of those from whom he differed. He spoke as though my right hon. Friend had some dreadful object in view in putting on the Paper these simple Questions, and enforcing them in a speech of singular moderation. Has the Prime Minister, in his speech, full of fiery irritation, disposed of them? Take the question of finance. The Prime Minister, having made a mistake, which he handsomely withdrew, proceeded to answer my right hon. Friend's appeal. If it had not been for the Question, we should not have had that clear statement in the Prime Minister's speech to the effect that an inquiry is now proceeding into the question of Egyptian finance; and, therefore, if I wanted a justification for my right hon. Friend's Motion, I should have it in part of the speech of the Prime Minister which dealt with Egyptian finance. If the Prime Minister chose to afterwards at a tangent about the

"We are daily expecting British troops. We cannot bring ourselves to believe that we are to be abandoned by the Government. Our existence depends upon England."

General Gordon asked that British troops should be sent to Berber, and a force to Wadi Halfa; yet absolutely nothing was done. General Gordon had said that it was no longer a question of days, but of hours; and in the face of such a message, received three weeks ago, the Government stated they had no information. They knew that General Gordon's Forces had sustained a severe reverse, and yet they refrained from doing anything. They not only refused to do anything, but they had the shabbiness to abstain from doing what any self-respecting body of men in the same position would do—namely, to ask General Gordon whether he was in need of assistance. It might be true that General Gordon had not asked for assistance; but it must be remembered that when General Gordon went away he thought he should be able to accomplish his mission without the aid of troops, and having said that he probably felt himself under a chivalrous obligation not to press the Government directly. But they knew, from the one or two Englishmen about him, that he did expect English troops. If General Gordon perished the Government would be condemned. According to their own statement that night, he had been abandoned, and the only force that could go to his relief was being recalled. The object of the Opposition in raising this question was to save General Gordon from the fate of General Hicks, of Baker Pasha's Army, and of the unhappy garrison of Sinkat, and its unfortunate and heroic Commander, Tewfik Bey. For weeks help had been refused. Let them take care that if at last they sent assistance it would not be too late. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for War had not been treated handsomely that night by the Prime Minister when he was put up to answer the right hon. Gentleman's questions. In fact, he had fallen into a trap. The Government had negatived the recommendation of General Gordon and Sir Evelyn Baring, and refused to allow Zebehr to be made Governor at Khartoum. And why had they refused? Because, according to them, General Gordon had overrated the power of the Mahdi. Would it be denied that many fresh tribes were in a state of ferment; that the insurrection was spreading northwards towards Berber and Egypt Proper; and that if the Mahdi advanced he would obtain their assistance? It was said by the noble Marquess that General Gordon was in no sort of peril; but if that chivalrous agent of the Government should fall a victim to their neglect they would be held responsible by the country. The Government were neither sending him any support, nor taking steps to ascertain whether he wished for any. Whenever the Government were in despair, and when they could not defend their policy by any other expedient, they raised the old cry of Obstruction against the Opposition; and the Prime Minister had that night found his case so weak that he had been obliged to resort to that cry. The country, however, would note that the Government had deliberately decided to abandon General Gordon, for whose safety and policy they were strictly and absolutely responsible, had deliberately decided to leave him to his fate, and to do nothing for his protection. They had also refused to send him that material support without which, in his own language, he was powerless to do anything; and, in knowing that, the country would admit that the Motion of the right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Opposition was fully justified.

MR. MACFARLANE said, he had listened, as he always did, with great interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), into which he had thrown himself with such energy; but he thought the hon. Member had on this occasion undertaken rather more than he could manage. A constituency, including Europe, Asia, and Africa, was, perhaps, rather more than one Member could conveniently deal with. Though he appreciated the efforts of the hon. Member, he considered the policy of Her Majesty's Government a sound policy. If the Government were now going from bad to worse, it would be the policy of the Opposition to let them arrive at the worst before they attacked them. He, however, believed that a possible solution of the Egyptian Question was appearing, and that the present was a crisis, when, unless the Opposition attacked the Government, they would not be able to do so at all. General Gordon had been in no sense abandoned, and, even if he had, it was because relief was impossible; and therefore, in his opinion, these cries were all bunkum. There were Motions for Adjournment and special Resolutions, and every turn of the Egyptian kaleidoscope was made the occasion for a fresh demonstration. which were never introduced by my right hon. Friend, if the right hon. Gentleman was so anxious to proceed with what he would term the great legislative Business of the country and Parliament? Did my right hon. Friend say a word, either in praise or dispraise, of the editors or writers of the newspapers of Europe? Friend's Motion, I should have it in that part of the speech of the Prime Minister which dealt with Egyptian finance. If the Prime Minister chose to go off afterwards at a tangent about the bondholders, that was no fault of the right hon. Member for North Devon. With respect to the allegation that the position of General Gordon was damaged by what fell from the Leader of the Opposition, I can only say that really and truly he did not say more—certainly not much more—than the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War said. He told us that, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, it was still premature to announce that the object of General Gordon's mission had definitely failed. When a Minister, clothed with all the responsibility of his position, says a thing of that sort, anyone of understanding must be pardoned if he reads between the lines, and assumes that such a declaration really admits a statement which it does not contradict. I greatly doubt whether the right hon. Gentleman used the words attributed to him by the Prime Minister. I have no doubt he would be perfectly content to argue his case on the very words of the noble Lord himself. Whether General Gordon's mission, in the view of the Government, has definitely failed or not, as a purely pacific mission it has unquestionably failed. The Prime Minister, enlarging on General Gordon's mission, seemed to assume that it was one of perfect ease and safety; and he was quite annoyed that any question should be raised on that subject. The right hon. Gentleman has gone back to 1831 and 1832, and, I suppose by way of contrast, has asked us to compare the remarkably satisfactory condition of affairs in Egypt at the present time with the complications which then existed between Belgium and France. The state of affairs in those countries was no doubt harassing and perplexing enough; but they are not for a moment to be compared in interest or intensity of danger with the questions now engaging our attention in Egypt and the Soudan. By the action of Her Majesty's Government the affairs of Egypt are the affairs of England; and to talk about the affairs of Belgium or France 50 years ago is to perform an evolution of confusion, and, I was going to say, of deceit and imposture upon the confidence of the country, which really could not be undertaken by anyone except that wonderful master of words and phrases, the Prime Minister. I have said that if my right hon. Friend wanted any defence—and I am sure he does not—for the course which, in the discharge of his public duty, he has taken, he would have found it in the circumstances I have detailed. The Prime Minister, in the course of that angry and almost infuriated harangue, proceeded to wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman and those who act with him considered the consequences which would ensue from the course he had taken to-night. He wondered whether the example he had set would be followed in the future. To-night we have neither set nor followed any example. If we had wanted an example of harassing a Government, we should have found it in the perpetual debates raised in the time of Lord Beaconsfield on the foreign policy during that period by the right hon. Gentleman and some of his more illustrious Colleagues. We have not raised perpetual debates on the subject of the Egyptian, or on the subject of the foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government generally. We have interposed with Questions when we have thought it necessary to do so, in consequence of the persistent reticence, or the still more persistent inconsistency, of the Government. When the right hon. Gentleman went on to mention the actual number of nights consumed in these debates, I wonder it did not occur to him to perform one of those arithmetical processes which have become so familiar to us, and proceed to divide those 17 nights into the proper divisions between the Benches on either side. I wonder he did not go a little into details, and tell us exactly how many of those debates had been originated by us and how many by his Friends sitting below the Gangway. With a coolness I could not sufficiently admire, the right hon. Gentleman assumed that the whole of those 17 nights of debate were the fault of the right hon. Gentleman and those who sit near us. The Prime Minister, having gone into the history of this Session, must pardon me if I say a word or two on the subject. How was it we had a series of debates upon the Address? Because first one and then another of Her Majesty's Ministers chose to run away at the wrong moment; and the consequence was we had only a broken debate, which necessarily resulted in a second. There are two nights accounted for out of the 17. He takes no note of the debate raised by the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) and the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), or any other Member; but he coolly assumes that the whole are due to the right hon. Gentleman. I protest against the unfairness of the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman. Whenever we think it necessary to ask Questions, or to move the adjournment of the House, or to raise debates on these most important affairs, we shall continue to do so perfectly undisturbed by the sarcasms of the Home Secretary or the fury of the Prime Minister, and perfectly confident that our motives as well as our acts will be thoroughly understood and appreciated by the country, which is possessed, I am convinced, of far more common sense and shrewdness than it appears to be given credit for by Members of Her Majesty's Government.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—[BILL 119.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Trevelyan, The Lord Advocate.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.] [FIFTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [24th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House declines to proceed further with a measure, having for its object the addition of two million voters to the electoral body of the United Kingdom, until it has before it the entire scheme contemplated by the Government for the amendment of the Representation of the People."—(Lord John Manners,)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. BROADHURST said, he exceedingly regretted that the time of the House should have been wasted so long that night over matters of interest in the jungles of Africa, instead of being devoted to matters of interest nearer home. The speech made by the hon. and learned Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott) on Tuesday night did not deal with the question of the extension of the franchise, but mainly consisted of criticism, if not abuse, of the President of the Board of Trade. It had been frequently alleged in that House that there was no feeling among the mass of people in favour of the extension of the franchise. To that assertion he begged to give a flat contradiction. If the workmen who felt strongly on that question would only address their letters to hon. Members who were opposed to that change instead of to those who supported it, he ventured to say that opinion on the opposite side of the House on that subject would be materially modified. Speaking, as he thought he had a right to do, for the organized trades of the United Kingdom, he could assure the House that a Motion in favour of the extension of the franchise had been one of the chief Resolutions brought before their annual Congresses ever since the present Government had been in power, and each successive year the Resolution had been stronger. At the Congress of September last, a fear being expressed that the Government might betray the country and not deal with the question in the present Parliament, the Parliamentary Committee of the Congress were instructed to urge the Government by all means in their power to make this the principal subject for the present Session. But that was not all. On the 31st of January a deputation of trades representing the organizations of the United Kingdom waited on the Prime Minister to declare to him their anxiety for a speedy dealing with that subject. That deputation was not an ordinary one. It included about 240 or 250 delegates coming from all parts of the country, whose whole expenses and time were paid for by their union funds and voted by their respective lodges. He reckoned that its cost to the whole of the trades was not less than £700 or £800—a sum, he need hardly say, which the trade unions of this country would not spend on any matter which they had not deeply at heart. He would now like to say a few words with regard to the Bill itself. In doing so he could not congratulate the Government on the production of a measure which was satisfactory to his mind. It was far too complicated ; it had too many qualifications ; it was shaped too much to suit the prejudices and the privileges of the rich and the upper classes, rather than shaped to meet the question of the franchise fairly and honestly, as it should be. He saw no reason why any man should be entitled to two votes because he was a freeholder of landed property in the country. That was a mere concession to ancient monopolies, and the privilege should be abolished. His view in regard to this question was that there should be one vote to one man ; and the only qualification he should possess was that of being of sufficient age and of capacity to exercise it. By the jugglery of the lodger franchise and by the long residence which was necessary for qualification they effectually deprived thousands of their best citizens of the franchise. Although he did not include himself in this list, he should like permission to mention that under the lodger franchise, and owing to the difficulties of registration and otherwise, he was a Member of the House of Commons before he had an opportunity of recording a vote for a Member of Parliament. He had been elected Member for Stoke two days before he gave a vote in the East Surrey Election for the Liberal candidates who were then contesting that division of the county. There was a too great tendency to discuss this subject from the standpoint of the agricultural labourer, as if he were the only person to be enfranchised by this Bill. If it were really the case that the agricultural labourer was the only person to be enfranchised, he would labour as cordially and as enthusiastically as he did now on behalf of others, because he would consider him equally fitted with others for the exercise of his undoubted right as a citizen. But he should like the House to remember that at present there were still outside the franchise thousands of persons who had been described as the most ignorant of the community. When, however, it had been found that a mistake had been made, and that the term "most ignorant" embraced within its scope hundreds of thousands of intelligent artizans, then it was attempted to withdraw the declaration, to minimize it, and to apologize for it, because it was found that these persons so described might shortly be appealed to for their support. He had received a letter from the Secretary of the Shipwrights' Association in the Clyde district, in which some interesting facts were revealed. In the districts of Govan and Partick there were 94,000 inhabitants, the majority of whom were skilled mechanics. Of this population, 19,442 persons exercised the municipal franchise ; but only 3,426 persons had a voice in the political affairs of the country. That was through no fault of their own, but was due to the shifting character of their employment, occasioned by the removal of large firms to cheaper land. He had also received a telegram that day from Glasgow, in which it was stated that Singer's Sewing Machine Company and Thomson's Engineering and Shipbuilding Company were removing to Clydebank and Dalmuir ; 4,000 or 5,000 workmen were following the works, and in consequence would not have a vote in the county election. He had also received a letter from the Secretary of the Shipwrights on the Tyne in which it was said that Walker-on-Tyne had a population of 21,500, who had neither the municipal nor the Parliamentary representation, although they were only a quarter of a mile from the Newcastle boundary. Returning to the question of the agricultural labourers, he much regretted that there was no one of their order there to plead their cause, and give a direct denial to the charge of incapacity and ignorance so constantly brought against them. He contended that the agricultural labourers were as capable of exercising the franchise as many of the farmers themselves. [Mr. H. H. FOWLER: More so.] His hon. Friend near him (Mr. H. H. Fowler) said they were more so. He quite conceded the point ; but in all things he liked to be moderate, and within the mark. He ventured to say that when this class were enfranchised they would not be found backers of that broken-kneed old hack that was so often trotted out on rural courses—the 5s. duty on corn—that extraordinary animal that was only kept for provincial shows, but which never dared be started in the House of Commons. Those new voters would not be misled by such cries as these. But supposing it were true—which he utterly denied—that the agricultural labourers were ignorant and unfit to exercise the franchise, did the charge of ignorance come with a good grace from that side of the House mainly associated with the county representation? The parson and the squire had had charge of the intellectual progress of the agricultural labourer for centuries; and were hon. Gentlemen opposite not ashamed of their wet-nursing, and of their half-starved labourers, whom they now denounced as ignorant and unfit for the exercise of citizenship? In his opinion, the Conservative Party had a much greater fear of the labourers' knowledge and intelligence than they had of their ignorance or incapacity. It was undoubtedly the case that where the ignorance of the agricultural labourer was most dense, there Tory opportunities were greatest, and their political power and representation strongest. If it were a question of intrusting the agricultural labourer with the administration of a marriage settlement, as was suggested by the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), or if it were a question of understanding the technicalities of their hideous laws, passed by a class Parliament, he would not think of putting him in competition with the right hon. Gentleman, or his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler); but on a question of common sense, sound judgment, and honesty of purpose, he would not hesitate to place him in competition with them. The agricultural labourer had mastered a problem which the right hon. Gentleman had never mastered. He had solved the problem of maintaining a house, a wife, and family on a weekly income less than the right hon. Gentleman probably spent for his afternoon meal. These men, who had solved this question of how to maintain a family on an income of 8s. or 9s. a-week, should stand at the very head of the science of domestic economy, if of no other economy. The noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) appeared to be greatly alarmed at the references that had been made by the President of the Board of Trade to manhood suffrage and the payment of Members, and he said they would be nearer if this Bill was passed. It would be all the better if both these reforms were not only nearer, but already law. The noble Lord himself belonged to a ring that was paid for its services when in Office. Why should not hon. Members, who worked as hard, but who had not the same opportunities of distinction as Ministers, be paid, since Ministers were? Let them not suppose for a moment that the old order of things—of monopolies and privileges to a few families in the country—would always continue. The time would come, if not during his life, or that of the hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), yet during the day of the generation now being educated at the board schools, when the people would insist upon having a share, not only of Representatives in that House, but in the administrative and executive work of the nation of which they were the most important part. On this Bill the Conservative Party, while professing, some of them, not to oppose it, were anywhere but in the right direction in regard to it. He had listened to some parts of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), in which he stated his reasons for his conversion on this subject, with pain and surprise. It was lamentable to hear the right hon. Gentleman, who had been twice a Cabinet Minister, confessing that he never understood the people. The agricultural labourers could have no sordid or selfish motives in claiming the franchise. They had no places to seek, no pensions to secure, no Court honours to look for. Their leading object in life was to secure those home comforts so long denied to them, and the honour of the country which they loved no less than any other class in the Kingdom. Had the House forgotten how, when the great and powerful were weak and hesitating on the question of freedom or slavery in America, our poorer countrymen and women faced the prospect of starvation and ruin rather than sacrifice one atom of their principle and love of freedom all the world over to black and white? A good deal had been said on the question of redistribution, and as to the difficulty of finding Members in England to supply the additions to be made to the representation of Scotland. There were four Members, at the least, whom he could place at the disposal of the Government for this object. Let them take the Members for Oxford and Cambridge Universities. He was at a loss to know on what ground of reason, logic, or justice these Masters of Arts, who were mostly clergymen of the Church of England, should have the privilege of returning Members to that House more than the same number of Nonconformist clergymen. The country, he ventured to say, would not long tolerate these nests of bigotry. Having regard to the nature of their tenure, it might be expected that the University Members would behave with peculiar circumspection. But only yesterday they found one of the Representatives of these seats of learning and culture coming forth as the champion of the beer-sellers. That action was in itself an additional reason why these constituencies should be disfranchised, and that the seats thus monopolized should be given to some other part of the United Kingdom. He scarcely liked to say the same of the University of Dublin. He regretted that it should send two Gentlemen so learned and unobjectionable in every other respect but that of politics. But when they arrived at a further stage of reform, they would have to think seriously whether the many good qualities of these right hon. Gentlemen would be sufficient to entitle them to immunity from Disestablishment. [Cries of "London!"] The University of London had recently done itself great honour. No University had done so much to preserve the ancient monuments and landmarks of this country by returning their distinguished Member (Sir John Lubbock). He had no hesitation in saying that those who feared the results of the proposed extension of the franchise were needlessly alarmed. Every additional million of voters was as concrete to foundations and as buttresses to ancient towers. Every increase of influence and power of the working people had proved to be Conservative in the highest and best sense; he did not mean Conservatism as demonstrated by Oxford University; but Conservatism of the most useful and lasting description. He was not prepared to deny the people of Ireland their fair share of this beneficial legislation. He knew many Irish working men, and, in his opinion, no workmen in England were better qualified to exercise political rights than the mechanics of the great towns of Ireland. He held that it would be unwise and wicked to curtail the political privileges of Irishmen, and that the Government by their proposals had given expression to the unanimous wish of the Liberal Party.

If the Irishmen who would be enfranchised by this Bill lived in mud huts, who were to blame? Was it their fault that they occupied mud huts instead of comfortable cottages when they had been kept in a state almost bordering on slavery century after century? This was an additional reason for giving them political power, that they might give effect to their own views on political and social questions; and he would do all he could to secure to Ireland every right and privilege that Parliament was bestowing on his own countrymen.

Mr. BIDDELL: Sir, the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst), in citing the case of the 20,000 artisans living just outside of Newcastle, proves the desirability of discussing the Enfranchisement and Redistribution Bills together, for it cannot be disputed that these men should be attached to Newcastle. So blended are the two subjects that in nearly all the leading speeches they have both been discussed. That of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister is no exception. He evidently felt the necessity of alluding to the new redistribution scheme, though he did it somewhat vaguely, creating the impression that with his fear of the Irish, his known love for the Scotch, and his natural sympathy for his neighbours the Welsh, the English must look out for themselves. By his intimation of a slight increase of Members, I assume he will deal feebly with this redistributing; far from increasing, it would be better to decrease the numbers of this House by 50 or 60, for it is already too unwieldy. This great measure is simply one of household suffrage, regardless of size or quality of the house. I wish distinctly to affirm this, as I have the best evidence that many persons even of standing think there will be some limitation preventing its application descending to mere hovels. No doubt, there is not sufficient time this year to discuss the details of both parts of the subject; but the Government could explain on what general principles they intend to proceed. Do they, in such cases as Newcastle, intend to join such outside people to the borough? Do they approve of grouping towns, or do they prefer to add a slice of the county to any of our small boroughs to improve their titles for returning Members? To be sure, the Premier gave us only his private opinions; but we know that such is his imperial sway that both the Cabinet and hon. Gentlemen opposite have to act upon his opinions. The street argument I do not place so much weight in as is generally attached to it. Persons on the non-voting sides enjoy considerable advantages in having all the conveniences of the town without its taxation. At any rate, any person feeling aggrieved can easily change from one side to the other. An argument used in favour of the measure is the principle of uniformity; but do the Government act on this principle? Decidedly not, for in answer to my question they have stated that though the borough residents shall continue to have a vote for their county freeholds, the county resident shall not have a vote in the borough for his freehold there. Hence, if so, we shall have a house on one side of the street giving its owner a vote, where an exactly similar one on the other side shall confer no such privilege. This is no small matter, for in the division of the county which I in part represent nearly 600 of the voters out of 5,000 or 6,000 voters live in Parliamentary boroughs. I agree in the opinion expressed by the Premier that the more capable men voting the better; can he, then, contend that the county resident owning a freehold in the town is not a capable voter? If so, why withhold a vote from him? It has been, I think, rightly contended that farmers in the agricultural counties have had supreme political power, hence a monopoly in the representation. This I admit is bad; but what are we invited to do? Why, to merely change this monopoly from one class to another—that is, to the labouring class. It has been contended that we on this side of the House are against any extension of the suffrage. This I deny, as for years I have thought the rural labouring class should have some more direct representation. I say more direct, as every Member represents, I contend, all classes in his constituency, though I must confess we are apt to have a more lively interest in those who have a vote than in those who have not. What is objected to is—as by the present Bill—the so arranging that the labouring classes could completely swamp all others in the counties. On this point I contend that the Government should have placed some statistics before us by which we could better judge of the effects of the measure. For my guidance I have collected some; and, to convince the House I have done so impartially, I have taken three Suffolk parishes, in all of which I have resided, and consequently know about. The first is—I give only round numbers—that wherein I was born—namely, Playford; there are now six voters rated at £1,400, or £230 each; there will be 37 new voters rated at £140, or £3 10s. each. Hawstead I take next—a well-known parish, as its history is published—has now only 11 voters who are rated about £2,000, or nearly £200 each; while under the new measure there will be 42 new voters rated only at £84, or, say, £2 each. My present abode is at Lavenham, which now has 51 voters rated at £4,200, or about £80 each, and the 328 new voters to be added are rated at only about £1,350, or about £4 each. These figures prove conclusively that this representation will have no proportion to taxation. Accepting household suffrage as unalterable—or rather inevitable—how can we modify its effect? It is impossible to arrange representation in strict proportion to taxation. Some of my friends think it can be rectified in the Redistribution of Seats Bill. I think not, for if not right on the basis we cannot erect sound work upon it; but we can in some rough way take a step in that direction, when we shall in some measure modify the proposed swamping of the present electors. In cases where two Members are to be elected, let those rated under £8—namely, those who are or can be rated on a reduced scale—vote for one Member, while higher rated electors are allowed to vote for both. I contend this great Empire is but a mighty Company wherein it is not expedient that the holder of a single share should have equal weight in its direction with the holder of many shares. The hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. G. Russell) said that the parish clergyman, the squire, and the farmer have prevented the labourers from expressing their political views. I deny this. The Dissenting minister I believe has now, and certainly will have, far more political influence than the clergyman, who rarely takes an active part in politics; while the squire has had his wings so cut by the policy adopted by this House that he no longer can continue that generosity which secured him, in great part, the allegiance of his poorer neighbours. As to the farmer, the good labourer is, from the decrease of the rural population, independent of him. Jack is now as good as his master, and happily no longer has to depend upon one or two farmers for the sale of his labour. This is the greatest measure proposed in our time, and as such I ask hon. Members to drop all Party views and seriously consider whether or not it is good for the country, and even good for the working classes themselves, that our county representation should so entirely rest with them. Full well I know that the course I am pursuing is one which may imperil what I shall seek—namely, my re-election. So be it, for I would rather be cast off, and, so to speak, fall into nought, than to have it said I preferred my personal interest to that of my country. The order of the day to “worship the rising sun,” to pamper and flatter the coming power. Though yielding to none in good will to the labouring class, I decline to do it, for, in the words of one of our poets, I ask the Gods “to grant me an honest fame or grant me none.”

MR. W. REDMOND said, that, as he represented a borough in Ireland which suffered to no inconsiderable extent under the present Franchise Law, he trusted that he might be allowed to contribute a few observations to the discussion upon this Bill, which Her Majesty's Government had rather tardily introduced. There could be no two opinions as to the important effect which this measure, if carried, would have upon the composition of that House; and, therefore, legislation on such a subject should be conducted with the utmost care. The question of the franchise had been for a long time calling for settlement, more particularly in Ireland; and it was a subject for congratulation to hon. Members on both sides of the House that it was now about to be settled. Her Majesty's Government might congratulate themselves on having at length introduced a Liberal measure, while Her Majesty's Opposition had now a fair opportunity of proving that it was for the welfare of the country that a large and respectable class should be excluded from the franchise. He intended to approach this question, not from the English or the Scotch point of view, but from the Irish point of view. He might, however, incidentally observe that he was in favour of the liberties of the people in England and Scotland being extended to the utmost possible limits. He should ever remain in opposition to the Conservative Members of the House, who appeared to think that the majority of the Parliamentary voters were mere unintelligent machines to be used for the purpose of keeping far more intelligent men in opposition. He believed that the unfortunate and oppressed people of his country had much more to expect at the hands of the great mass of the people of England and Scotland than they had from the landocracy of those countries, who were disposed to legislate in favour of their brother members of the landocracy of Ireland. He had heard with surprise the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War express a fear lest the effect of the Bill would be to increase the Irish National Party in that House. That fear was only worthy of the extinct spirit of servile Whiggery which had received such a practical and decent burial in the borough which he had the honour to represent. The Opposition had relied greatly upon the mud cabin argument. It was a poor argument to adduce that because people dwelt in mud cabins they should not be entitled to have a voice in the government of their country. Another reason given for not extending the measure to Ireland was that a large percentage of the people could neither read nor write. Admitting that fact, he said it was not surprising that many of the Irish people should be illiterate when it was remembered that for generation after generation obstacles had been placed in the way of Catholic education by successive Governments in this country. But there were many illiterate Irishmen who were as well able to form a sound opinion on political subjects and to give a vote as gentlemen who had matriculated in English Universities. If the present or any other Government was coerced by Jingoism to try and lower the number of Irish Representatives, he could assure them that they would have to face the bitterest and fiercest opposition which the Representatives of Ireland in that House and the people of Ireland could give. According to the atrociously corrupt Act of Union of Lord Castlereagh, of infamous memory, Ireland had 100 Members given to her. If the Government wanted to cut down that number, they must violate that infamous Act. If the Government wished to repeal that infamous Act, they could rely on the hearty support and co-operation of himself and his Colleagues. It would have been well for the Empire if, in days gone by, Governments had proceeded to redress grievances as promptly as Her Majesty's Government were now proceeding to redress what was undoubtedly a grievance in shutting out large numbers of intelligent and capable men in Ireland from the privileges of the franchise. He would take the opportunity of appealing to the Government, now that they were in the reforming humour, fairly and impartially to view the demand of the Irish people for local self-government.

MR. JOHN MORLEY said, that the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Biddell) had made a very honest and straightforward speech; for he courageously said that whatever change the Bill might make in the franchise, he would still hope to retain his seat in that House. The speech was honest in another sense, for it let out the secret of the attitude taken up by hon. Members opposite. They only did not object to the extension of the franchise, on condition that in redistribution they could take back with one hand what they had given with the other. The hon. Member, for instance, did not attempt to deny that the man who lived on one side of a street had as good a right to vote as the man who lived on the other. But the hon. Member went on to advocate a double qualification for people of property, an idea which had long ago been abandoned even by the Party opposite. The hon. Gentleman, all through his speech, divided the nation into classes and interests; educated people as distinguished from ignorant people—farmers as against labourers—employers against workmen. The hon. Member used an ignoble image, and said that we were all members of a Joint Stock Company. But men who were bound together by the common ties of citizenship were much more than members of a Joint Stock Company. The interests which divided them were as dust in the balance compared with the associations by which they were united. He regretted to find in the speech of the hon. Member for Wilton (Mr. Sidney Herbert) the same tendency to divide the country into classes. The hon. Member used a singularly infelicitous and inaccurate illustration in connection with that theory. He said that in France it was the lower classes who drove the Empire into war. Now, nothing was better known in all Europe than that the French peasantry were devoted friends of peace. He would appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) whether there was an audience in England that would respond so earnestly to an appeal for peace as an audience of workmen. This would be as true of the labourers in the country as of the artisans in the towns. The right hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) had quoted an old saying, that the towns represented population and the counties property. But it was said by Conservative speakers that the effect of the Bill of 1867 had been to make the boroughs so Conservative that the Liberals had to attack the counties. If so, then the boroughs must represent property no less than population. So that the argument lost all its force in the mouths of hon. Gentlemen opposite. He did not understand why it was that the Party which called itself the patriotic Party were not better patriots. A patriot ought to take pride in his countrymen as well as in his country. A dozen years ago he presided at a meeting of agricultural labourers, who had come to London at their own charge to protest against their exclusion from the franchise. Everybody was impressed by their orderly and temperate attitude. A few strong remarks were made about the parson and the squire; but they were soon overborne by the good sense of the meeting. Then all who had been fortunate enough to attend trades union congresses must have come to the conclusion that their proceedings might well furnish a model to more august assemblies. But it ought not to be forgotten that agricultural labourers were not the only class who would be enfranchised by the Bill. It would add 500,000 miners, who had in that House so excellent a Representative as his hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), to the electorate. He had often attended meetings of miners, and could testify that in no assembly would revolutionary doctrines find less acceptance than among the miners of the North of England. Among no class was there a keener thirst for knowledge. There was a little district not far from his own constituency, of 17,000 inhabitants, where no fewer than 1,300 men, almost the whole of the adult male population, regularly attended the lectures in connection with the scheme of University extension, which had been inaugurated by Professor Stuart, of Cambridge. There was more honour due to these men for their thirst for knowledge in their hard lives and humble homes than to all the learned leisure of Colleges and the luxurious state of ancient Universities. Yet of the nine Representatives of Universities in that House, no fewer than seven would go into the Lobby with those who wished to refuse to such men the Parliamentary franchise. When the scheme of redistribution came before them, rather than see the numbers in that House increased, he would prefer that those nine seats should be taken away, and transferred to worthier claimants. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel) had said that the only meetings in favour of the Bill had been held by a few scientific Radicals. He did not know what a "scientific Radical" meant; but if it meant the opposite of a harum-scarum Tory, he would not, himself, be disposed to disown the name. The right hon. Baronet, just returned for Huntingdon, with its population of 6,400, might have found for Leeds, with its 300,000, a better name than that of a county town. Nothing showed how strong was the feeling of the working classes on this subject than the fact that the boroughs cared so much for the extension of the franchise in the counties. There were Conservative boroughs in which the feeling was nearly as strong as the Liberal feeling on this point, and which would not return a Conservative Member unless he pledged himself on the question of the county franchise. If there were any indifference in the country it would be due to growing scepticism as to the value of Parliament itself. The true danger to the stability of our Constitution was not in the admission of 2,000,000 more voters; but in the fact that the time of the House was so wasted that it was impossible to pass, not only disputed measures, but even non-contentious measures, as to which both sides of the House were agreed. This was striking the working classes as something that needed explanation, and of which the solution might, in time, become formidable; that it was not so now was because the respect for law was so deeply ingrained in the English and the Scotch character. Yet the Opposition refused to extend the franchise unless they were assured that there would be some manipulation or re-arrangement of seats, which, would, in fact, be taking away with one hand what was given with the other. He regretted that proportional representation should have been introduced into the debate from that side of the House, for all these schemes were but new disguises for the old Tory distrust of the people. It would be easier than it was now to answer its advocates, when they said what it was they meant by proportional representation. The House had the right to ask them which scheme it was they were going to stand upon; at present they only maintained the principle, while they threw over every application of it. They admitted that the cumulative vote involved a waste of voting power, and often gave a majority to a minority. They admitted that the three-cornered constituency involved a waste of voting power, and stimulated the activity of those electoral associations, which Gentlemen on both sides professed to hold in so much dislike. The single district system had been tried fairly in the United States; it was found to lead to gerrymandering; it stimulated the activity of caucuses; it did not secure men of exceptional ability, as had been set forth in a Report made to the Senate in 1869. As to preferential voting, the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) said he had not yet seen a scheme that would work. But if there were more to be said for schemes of proportional representation, the question did not arise under this Bill. As the right hon. Member for Bradford said in the Recess, if we were going to keep on the old lines we might safely leave minorities to take care of themselves. This Bill did go very much upon the old lines. If it were proposed to give to Birmingham, Manchester, and Leeds eight or ten Members each, a question might arise as to whether they should all be given to majorities; but there was no such proposal. The time for the schemes of proportional representation would come when it was proposed to adjust representation on a numerical basis.

[Fifth Night.]

The question of Irish representation he would not discuss, either upon the basis of numbers, or that of the Act of Union—either by reference to what had been called a musty parchment, or by working a sum in rule of three. It ought to be settled upon the same principle as that which settled all political questions—namely, the broad ground of policy and expediency. He would argue it when the time came upon those grounds. We should lose far more by irritating the population of Ireland than we should gain by taking seats from her for our own use. Ireland was entitled to exceptional representation, not so much on the score of geographical distance, as on that of moral distance, and the disadvantage under which her Members laboured from the ignorance and prejudice of Englishmen about them, arising out of the difference in race and religion. Another reason for special treatment of Ireland was that a great obstacle to improvement in Irish legislation was to be found in the other House; and, as Ireland was under a disadvantage in the hereditary branch of the Legislature, there was less reason to object to her having an excess of representation in the elective branch. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had stated that they were in favour of an appeal to the people. The supporters of the Bill wanted to enable them to appeal to the real people, and not to a privileged section with a narrow franchise, and jockeyed by an artificial arrangement of seats. If they were not to have this Bill, the Opposition would have to bring in another. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member cheered, but he would warn him that there was no case of a second Reform Bill being more moderate and more narrow than the first. The present Bill was well worth having. But if they did not get the Bill now before the House, all he could say was that they would have from the Opposition a measure better worth having still.

MR. STRUTT said, he could not look upon this great revolutionary measure as a wise one, coming, as it did, within so short a time of the last Reform Bill. The hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) had told the Opposition that they ought to have confidence in the people. For his part, he should have perfect confidence in the people if there were no agitators to go and lead them astray. They had heard a great deal about right in this matter. If hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House believed that the individual right was of paramount importance as compared with the welfare of the State, they ought to make a bonfire of nearly all their Bills. Most of the measures introduced by Ministerialists went against the right of the individual. Upon this question of right they could not refuse the franchise to the greatest criminal in the dock, or to the smallest child who could toddle up to the polling booth. If a man had a right to a vote because others had it who were in no way different from himself except in geographical position, he had equal right that his vote should be of the same value; and this argument would, therefore, lead them directly to electoral districts. But he ventured to say that even under a system of electoral districts they would find exactly the same inequality of which they complained now. What political power had a Conservative in the wilds of Scotland or Wales? What political power had a Liberal in the highly civilized districts of Westminster or Essex? It was true the Conservative and the Liberal had a vote; but what was a vote if it brought no political power? It was absolutely worthless. He submitted that to advocate proportional voting was not to distrust the people. A system of proportional voting would give political power to all the people as far as it was possible. He believed that if the Bill passed in its present shape the agricultural labourers would have it in their power to prevent a single man entering that House to represent the feelings of the farmers. He should like to know whether the Government intended to turn a deaf ear to the bitter cry of the Loyalists in Ireland. The First Commissioner of Works had told the House that if they gave a vote to the Loyalists in Ireland they must also give a vote to Irishmen in England. He did not see why they should not give a vote to Irishmen in England, because those Irishmen might not always share the opinions of Irish Members in that House. That House ought to be the reflex of every phase of public opinion, and particularly of the more intelligent part of it. He did not think that the agricultural labourers had that amount of political power which their numbers and importance entitled them to; but if the Government had introduced a Redistribution Bill, so as to enlarge the small boroughs, they would have struck a blow at the anomalies which those small boroughs presented, and would have rectified the position of the agricultural labourer. The artisans had quite enough of power already, especially when they took into consideration what a short time it was since compulsory education had been in force. He confessed he had some jealousy of that class, because he thought it dangerous that one class should have so much more power over the destinies, not only of this country, but of the 250,000,000 of the people of India who depended on the vote of that House. All the statesmen of the past and all political writers had looked with suspicion on one class having all the political power. It was easier, no doubt, for hon. Gentlemen to say that they had confidence in the people than want of confidence, when those in whom that confidence was expressed might be their future electors. For his part, he did not think that this Bill would conduce to the happiness or contentment of the people, and he should, therefore, support the Amendment.

MR. PLUNKET: I am sure that Members on both sides of the House who have heard the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Strutt) will agree with me that his presence among us is a distinct accession to the debating power of the House, and gives much promise for the future. I hope the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) will not think, if I do not follow him through his philosophic disquisition, that I refrain from doing so from want of personal respect, or from any feeling of resentment towards him for having explained his own opinion as to the way in which the nine Members who represent the Universities in this House ought to be dealt with. If I were to do so, I should evidently be speaking, as it were, with a rope round my neck. For I feel that the unfortunate heads of the Representatives of the Universities—English, Irish, and Scotch—will be the first to fall into the Republican basket of the hon. Member when he gets his way in regard to this Franchise Bill and also the Redistribution Bill of which he has given the House a forecast. I gladly turn away from the speech of the hon. Member, hoping that his Friends near him—my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair) and the hon. Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock)—will find some means of persuading their political allies generally that they would be a greater loss to the House, if taken away from it, than their companion-in-arms the hon. Member for Newcastle seems to think. For my own part, I have a strong belief in luck, and nine is a lucky number; and therefore, despite all the distrust the hon. Member feels as to the extreme illiberality of the University Members, I hope we may yet be spared to break a lance with him in some future Parliament. I pass now from the hon. Member for Newcastle to the very remarkable speech which preceded it, and which, I am sorry to think, was not heard by many hon. Members of the House—I mean that of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. W. Redmond), which was also a maiden speech. The hon. Member described his borough as “suffering, to no inconsiderable extent, from the want of some such Bill as the present.” Certainly, the borough of Wexford does not suffer from the want of a vigilant, able, and fearless Representative, and a very frank one I must say also. The hon. Member, of course, denounced the Whig Members of the House, and naturally honoured, from his point of view, the President of the Board of Trade; but, from another point of view, his speech was really interesting—namely, for the clearness and distinctness with which he brought before the House the peculiar tenets of those he is sent here to represent, affording abundant proof that, after all, the constituencies of Ireland do not suffer seriously from that “moral distance” of which the hon. Member for Newcastle has just now so loudly complained. The hon. Member has put before the House as plainly as can be desired the views entertained by himself, and, I presume, by those who sit around him, in regard to this Bill. Now, there has been a certain amount of rumour in the Press and whispering in the Lobbies for some days past that this Bill, after all, makes no formidable contribution to the power of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), as some benighted Conservative Members have supposed, but that it will rather undermine his influence; and on that ground hopes have been kindly held out to us by the Radical newspapers that it may not be impossible to secure, in opposition to the Bill, even the support of the hon. Member for the City of Cork and his Friends! But the hon. Member for Wexford has told us plainly what his view of the case is. He said he would support the Bill, not because it is a good Bill, or because he thinks it satisfactory or sufficient, for he requires a Bill which would go much further, but because it will, as far as it goes, give greater effect to what he calls the will of the Irish people in this House—he did not say the whole of the Irish people—and, he added, as I understood him—

“I accept the Bill as far as it goes; but you need not think that it will have the effect of staying the agitation of a Separatist character which exists in Ireland, for if you give us this Bill, or 20 more Bills of the same description, we will never cease from that agitation until we fully obtain our object.”

He said, further, that until the Separatist object of his Party was achieved, that agitation would have the effect of disorganizing and disgracing this Assembly. At all events, that is perfectly plain speaking. I shall not comment upon it, neither shall I make any apology to the House if, during the brief time for which I shall claim its attention at this stage of the debate, I confine myself entirely to the Bill and to the Amendment as they may affect the future of my own country. That, I think, is the aspect of the case which has weighed most heavily upon the minds of English and Scotch Members, even of Members who are favourable to the proposals of the Government. For me, as an Irishman, it totally eclipses all the others; because, if the view I take of this measure be the true one, the thing you are now asked to do in passing this Franchise Bill as it stands, without further qualifications or safeguards against its immediate effects than have been shadowed forth in the vague and contradictory utterances which as yet have been heard from the Treasury Bench, is an act fraught with grave and urgent peril to the State. It is so, in my opinion, not only because it will at once commit practically the whole Parliamentary representation of Ireland to one social class of its population, which must overwhelm in numbers all the others—and that a class, unfortunately, though I fully admit its many virtues and good qualities, who are ignorant, excitable, prejudiced, and absolutely unused to the duties and responsibilities of public affairs—because this great augmentation of voters will practically extinguish for political purposes those of my countrymen best able to form an intelligent and useful opinion. Because the result would be a total misrepresentation of the Irish people, including all its interests and all its classes. But, above all, because, in that great question which is now at issue between the Imperial Government and the Friends of the hon. Member for the City of Cork—that great question of the maintenance or the destruction of the Union between the Three Kingdoms—it will throw into the hands of the latter an increase of power wholly out of proportion to their just claims as Representatives of the Irish people. It will throw it into their hands, without the possibility of recall. The struggle we have to maintain in this great controversy is, even in the present Parliament, extremely difficult; and, in all events, in the next, it must be much more arduous. But I foresee that if this Bill passes in its present shape and without qualification, and a General Election is taken upon it, the struggle will become almost desperate, if not absolutely hopeless. I know this is a strong statement, and that I may be accused of being an alarmist for uttering it; but if the House will grant me its patience, I think I shall be able to make good my words by arguments the most simple and practical. Before, however, dealing with the Bill as it may affect the fortunes of the Separatist movement in Ireland, let me say something about its other effects in Ireland itself. The present electors of Ireland number about 224,000; the Bill would add 480,000, as nearly as I can calculate; so that the new electors would more than double the existing electors, and form over two-thirds of the future constituencies of all Ireland. And remember that these new electors would not be, as those are whom you propose to add to the English constituencies, electors of the same class, but persons totally unused to taking part in public affairs, who have had no experience whatever in the matter, and that it is nearly impossible, in the unfortunate state of their social existence, for them to form an independent political opinion, and still more hopeless for them to take any independent political action. A great deal has been said about what is called the "hovel" electors in Ireland. It is no pleasure to me to have to dwell upon that subject, and I am very glad to think that this reproach to our land is gradually passing away; still, it does exist to a considerable extent. And when it is said that in England also there are people almost as badly housed as any in Ireland, who will have votes under this Bill, I answer that that is true; but there is this difference between the two cases—those who dwell in hovels in England contribute only a small quota of the electors; but in Ireland, in the country districts, these hovels will contain about one-half of all the householders, and in the boroughs a very large proportion of the electors. And now, one word also as to the state of education in Ireland. There, too, I admit freely—and I am glad to admit it—that considerable progress has recently been made, and is still being made. But, nevertheless, the condition of the Irish people in this respect is still very bad. As far as I can calculate, the facts of the case would be these—if we assume that the present electors are able to read and write, it may be said, speaking generally, that the new electors to be added to the franchise by this Bill will be taken from a class of which 40 per cent of those above 20 years of age cannot read or write. I will not push my argument to the extent to which it was carried by Mr. John Stuart Mill, who held that no man should be enfranchised who could not read and write; I do not push it to that extent at present; but I do push it to the extent of another proposition which Mr. Mill laid down when he said—

"No one can deny that it is not a good, but a hurtful thing, that the Constitution of a country should declare ignorance to be entitled to as much political power as knowledge."

Now, I put it to the House, if this Bill were intended to apply to Ireland alone, what responsible statesman would have brought forward a measure with such results as I have described? Would you, in England or Scotland, trust the fortunes of your country to such a wild, untrained, disqualified democracy as this? I do not wish to pursue this branch of the subject further; but I should like to say this much. It is argued that there are anomalies in the present representation of the Irish people. I grant it fully, and I am quite sure that if the time were propitious for introducing reforms, remedies might be found, well-considered, cautious, and safe, which would, to a great extent, remove those anomalies. But this Bill will not only continue many of these anomalies, but it will aggravate them, and especially those anomalies which tell against the constituencies which are most enlightened and progressive. Let me give one or two instances. The town of Belfast is one of the most improving places in Ireland. It contains 35,000 inhabited houses, which exceed in number the inhabited houses in all the boroughs in Munster, including the City of Cork; yet it only returns two Members, while the boroughs of Munster return 14. Again, in Leinster, the City of Dublin has nearly 28,000 inhabited houses, which is a larger number than all the other boroughs in the Province of Leinster; but still that City has only two Members, while the rest of the boroughs have eight. I say again that anomalies in the Irish representation undoubtedly exist; but in many important cases the present Bill will not only continue, but will aggravate them. I think I have already satisfied the House that this is a Bill, as it affects Ireland, which would not have been introduced if it had been proposed for that country alone. There is no political philosopher so flighty as to maintain that, under the existing circumstances of Ireland, the wholesale extension of household suffrage to the counties and boroughs is the best way of representing all classes of the Irish people. In point of fact, the effect of this Bill would be, that the representation of the less capable citizens would be inordinately increased, while the representation of the most capable citizens would be practically extinguished. I say that such considerations as these would have been amply sufficient to have justified the Government in adhering to the precedent of all former Reform Bills, and dealing on somewhat different principles with the English and Irish constituencies. And now let me turn to the view of the case which weighs most heavily on the minds of all serious thinkers on Reform; and that is the influence which, if the Bill is carried as it stands at present, it will give in the future to the Party led by the hon. Member for the City of Cork. I am willing to accept the estimate—I wish to deal with the question in the most practical way—I am willing to accept the estimate which has been made by Members of that Party, as to the number of Representatives they will be able to return if this Franchise Bill should pass. That calculation goes up to 90 or 95, and I am sorry to say that I am not in a position to show that it is a very exaggerated estimate. If this Bill is carried, and a General Election is taken upon it without any Redistribution Bill, the result would probably be that the hon. Member for the City of Cork, or whoever may be at the moment the Leader of that movement, will have in this House from 90 to 95 followers. It has also been said that if this Bill does not pass, the hon. Member will return after the next General Election with 70 or 80 followers. I think that that is an exaggeration. I believe we should be very well able to hold our own. I think it was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) who said the other day that the Conservatives and the Whigs, by acting together, ought to be able to return 35 or 40 Members to the next Parliament against the Parnellites. Therefore, the difference which the Bill makes is not merely 10 or 15 Members, but 25 or 30. I know that the arguments I am putting forward now are arguments which will be treated by advanced Reformers as perfectly unworthy of consideration in this House. These gentlemen go altogether on other and general principles, and yet it is not very long since we had high authority for relying on these very apprehensions. I am speaking of the maxim deliberately laid down by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, and to which I beg now particularly to recall the attention of the House and the country; I allude to a speech which was made by the noble Marquess about a year and a-half ago to his constituents. In that speech the noble Marquess stated that the present Parliament was perfectly capable of dealing with the questions of local government and with the franchise for Britain; but he went on to say, speaking of the proposal to include Ireland in such measures, that in his opinion it would be madness to volunteer to give to Ireland a more extended local self-government until they received from the Representatives of the Irish people some assurance that it would not be used for the purpose of agitation and for the purpose of weakening the authority of the Crown. That was the proposition then deliberately laid down by the noble Marquess; so it remained, apparently, in the mind of the noble Marquess for more than a year, and I do not know by what process the noble Marquess has been led to change that opinion. But he went on to say that, while there was no franchise or power possessed by, or afterwards to be conferred upon, the English people, that he would withhold from Ireland as soon as he was persuaded that she was contented to remain an integral portion of the United Kingdom, he would plead for Ireland that she should have an interval of repose from such exciting legislation. This opinion, which the noble Marquess expressed at that time, I am sure, recommended itself to nine-tenths of the common-sense politicians of the country as a sound, reasonable, and just view to take of the question. But, before I proceed further on this point, I should like to add a word as to what has been said and to what has not been said by Ministers on the subject of a Redistribution Bill. I do not intend to trouble the House with any observations as to the propriety of making a reduction in the number of Members returned by Ireland. I only mention the topic as throwing some light upon the way the Irish Party are likely to be approached when the question arises of the redistribution of the constituencies of Ireland inter se. It is perfectly plain that when the Prime Minister made his overture to Irish Members below the Gangway, he did so with the hope of conciliating, or, at all events, of averting the opposition of the hon. Member for the City of Cork and his followers. Now, let me ask this question—If the Prime Minister felt himself compelled to make that rash and sudden pledge to the hon. Member for the City of Cork, while he stands in this House with 40 Irish Representatives as his followers, what would he or any other English politician feel himself called upon to do, if, instead of 40 Members, he had to deal with 90 or 95? Let me follow this up a little further, for really it is the kernel of the present controversy. Is the redistribution which hon. Members talk about to be brought about in the present House of Commons? If the Franchise Bill were carried alone, it would secure to the hon. Member for the City of Cork 90 or 95 followers. How, then, would any Minister be received who approached the hon. Member and proposed, in the last days of this doomed and dying Parliament, that he should give up 20 or 30 of those seats? When is it to be done? In the next Parliament, after a General Election shall have given 90 or 95 followers to the hon. Member? Is it to be done as part of a Redistribution Bill for the Three Kingdoms? At such a time of keen contest, of contending interests, of the hot rivalries between different English Parties and places, one single independent vote would fetch a famine price. But what will be the market value of a cohort of nearly 100 free lances perfectly disciplined to act together under the Leadership of their cool-headed and experienced Commander? Where, let me ask, will be found the Government so strong, and where the Parliament so patriotic, which would have the courage and patience to attempt to carry such a proposal against such an opposition? No; you must make up your minds to this. If this Franchise Bill be carried without such safeguards as are demanded by the Amendment—if Parliament parts with it without having secured the redress of these evils—you will have saddled this House permanently with 90 or 95 Members returned by Irish constituencies, pledged, every one of them, to vote solidly together for the purpose of breaking up the Union of the Three Kingdoms, and, as they have plainly told you, until they have achieved that end, resolved to make the conduct of Public Business in this House impossible. How long do you suppose that the frail machinery of Party Government, with all its incidents of intense rivalry, of strong temptation, of momentary exigency—a machinery which was never intended to meet such a peril—how long would it be able to resist the steady pressure of these 90 or 95 Members who are prepared to subordinate every other consideration of foreign and domestic policy until they have wrested from you the concession of the independence of Ireland? But, then, we are promised by hon. Gentlemen opposite that we may rely upon it that the English people will see right done in the matter. We were especially assured of that by a right hon. Gentleman who is certainly entitled to speak with considerable authority on the subject. I refer to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford. He told the House that his decision to support the application of the Bill to Ireland was one which he had arrived at only after great and long doubting as to whether he was justified in doing so or not. The grounds on which he seems to have got over the difficulty are very strange and suggestive. The right hon. Gentleman said that some people fear that, by constant changes in the relative power of English political Parties, the hon. Member for the City of Cork will become the arbiter of the destinies of the United Kingdom, because he could make his support "useful." Now, I think that was a very curious and interesting statement, coming from the right hon. Gentleman, who had himself dragged to light and exposed an expression, which was not at all dissimilar, in a famous letter sent on a historic occasion by the hon. Member for the City of Cork to the hon. and gallant Member for Clare (Mr. O'Shea). The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford said it might be feared that the hon. Member for the City of Cork would make his support "useful," and added that the hon. Member would get almost all he wanted by controlling the action of the different Parties; "but," said the right hon. Gentleman—

"I am not afraid of that, because Party men in this House are too patriotic, and because the householders of Great Britain would make short work of any Government which could give way to the dictates of a small minority."

It may not, however, be quite so small a minority; but suppose it were to be a small minority, I must say no one is more capable of gauging the patriotism of politicians on such a subject than the right hon. Gentleman. I do not know whether he is, as was wittily said the other day by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel), "a refugee in the corner;" I would say that he is rather an honourable exile from Office, having left the Government because he would not consent to an Act of the kind which he described, when he spoke of the destruction which would follow any Government which dared to attempt such a step. There sits the right hon. Gentleman on the Bench behind the Treasury, a danger signal—like a bell buoy on the ocean, to mark the spot where the Kilmainham Treaty sank. But the Government ship sails gaily over the wreck, and they are now engaged in further—I suppose I must not call it a Treaty, but in further “arrangements,” which the right hon. Gentleman himself described as clearly another “concession to the Irish Members.” As to the householders holding any Government accountable for such a transaction, I sincerely hope the right hon. Gentleman is justified in his confident expectation; for I am afraid that before very long the householders of England, Scotland, and Wales will have an opportunity of putting their patriotism and firmness on this subject to a very serious trial. I want now to say a word on behalf of the loyal minority in Ireland, whose voice has not yet been heard from these Benches; and when I speak of them, I wish the House distinctly to understand that this is not a landlords’ question. Some hon. Members said in the debate the other day, in a general way—“Oh, it is only the landlords of Ireland who are the loyal minority.” Nothing can be further from the truth than that. In speaking of the Loyal Party, I am thinking of more than 1,000,000 Protestants living in Ulster and outside Ulster, embracing all classes of the people, but mainly composed of farmers in the counties, and artisans in the towns—aye, and thousands and hundreds of thousands of Catholics in Ulster and out of Ulster, who are just as much devoted to the maintenance of the Union between the two countries as any hon. Member of this House. These are the men who, through all the difficulties, through all the dangers, through all the temptations, and through all the terrors of the last few years, never threw in their lot with the hon. Member for the City of Cork, but stood firm and true to the maintenance of the Union. These are the men referred to, not long ago, by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in a speech to his constituents, as that Party in Ireland which was not confined by any means to Conservatives, but included the Whig Party of Ulster as well, and which he hoped he might describe as “the greater Ireland.” In that description, I am afraid, the right hon. Gentleman took too sanguine a view; but there can be no doubt whatever that considerably more than one-third of the whole population of Ireland are loyal. Then I would ask the House—Are not these men entitled to be fairly represented in the Imperial Parliament? Are not their rights to be safeguarded? I do not care to appeal for the sake of old attachment between England and the Loyalists of Ireland; but I put it upon the ground of your own interests at the present time. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), speaking the other night, seemed to think that the Members for two or three counties were quite enough for the loyal minority in Ireland, and that they would be fairly represented by such a number in this House. Let it be remembered that this minority is not a minority composed wholly of Protestants. Neither is the principle which binds them together, and on which they are perfectly identified, a crotchet—it is one that is vital to their political existence, and which goes to the very root of their liberties as free citizens. It is a principle for which they have shown themselves prepared to risk and, if necessary, to sacrifice their lives. If ever, then, there was a case in which a minority was entitled to the support and protection of this House, it is the Loyalist minority in Ireland. Certainly, this exigency of Her Majesty’s Government is a great windfall for the hon. Member for the City of Cork. It bids fair not only to increase his power, but to practically extinguish his opponents absolutely and for ever. Let me urge my cause on yet another ground. After the next General Election, the hon. Member for the City of Cork will certainly return to this House with a very considerably increased following. He will as certainly renew his demand for a separate Irish nationality. You say you are resolved to resist that demand. But will it make no difference to you if you are then able to appeal in the presence of the public opinion of this country, of foreign countries, and of our own Colonies, to the existence in Ireland, as proved by the presence of their Representatives in this House, of a considerable proportion of people who are resolutely opposed to any scheme for the dismemberment of the Empire? Will it make no difference, especially to you who are pledged to governing Ireland according to Irish ideas? Imagine the joy with which, in such a crisis, the winning even of a single bye-election by a Loyalist would be hailed. Yet this Bill proposes to hand over, wholesale, 20 or 30 more votes to the Separatist Party than they are entitled to claim, even on the ground of mere numbers, to say nothing of education, wealth, or the payment of taxes. I cannot stay to argue upon the folly of the time selected for the introduction of this Bill. You cherish hopes that the power of the hon. Member for the City of Cork is breaking up. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, catching at any straw, dwelt upon that possibility. For myself, I am sorry to say that I can see no symptoms of the breaking up of the power and authority of the hon. Member for the City of Cork; but, even supposing that there really was such a chance, why did you not wait until the thing happened, instead of now, when the hon. Member is at the zenith of his power, stereotyping his influence and authority by sending to the assistance of the phalanx which he commands such a large additional number of supporters to secure for him without delay his ultimate triumph? Then I have heard another and a very strange argument. It is said—"What matters it whether 40, 50, 60, 70, 80, or 90 Members from Ireland are led by the hon. Member for the City of Cork. The case is already as bad as it can be?" I will not call it an argument at all; it is only a lazy, listless, and reckless excuse on the part of those who wish to shirk trouble and shrink from responsibility. I say that in the mere physical difficulty of opposing the Separatist Party in this House it must make the greatest difference, but it is to the moral value of every Irish vote that you can fairly save on this question whether you are going to maintain or to sacrifice the Union between the two countries—the question which predominates over and overwhelms in importance all others—that I attach such critical importance. Let me back my reasoning on this subject by one quotation from an unexpected ally. There have been great doubts expressed as to whether, if this Bill passes, it will really have the effect of strengthening the power of the hon. Member for the City of Cork and his Party, and it has even been urged by some that it would have an opposite effect. Hon. Members from England and Scotland, who are sincerely anxious to support this Bill, surely have been driven to strange devices in order to find arguments in justification of the course they are prepared to take. They say it is a mistake to think that the hon. Member for the City of Cork will be strengthened; that, on the contrary, his power will be broken up. Now I must admit that the hon. Member, in the only appearance he has entered on this subject, when he spoke on the first reading of the Bill—he was not here, I believe, when his Lieutenant, the hon. Member for Wexford, enlightened the House this evening—the hon. Member for the City of Cork helped the Government as much as he could. His speech, on that occasion, was a very remarkable one. He deprecated all passion or heat, and treated the effect which the measure would have upon his own position in Ireland as very trifling. He said he hardly thought he could get as many as 90 Members; and, if he did, it would make no difference at all. In point of fact, the hon. Member said everything that he possibly could in order to assuage the fears of English Members and reconcile them to the Bill. With the permission of the House, I will read an extract from a speech made by the hon. Member for the City of Cork, at another time and to a different audience—at a meeting held for the purpose of founding the present National League of Ireland. On that occasion, when the hon. Member was organizing that agitation and laying down the lines upon which it was to proceed, and holding out the hopes which were to encourage his supporters, this is what he told them, and I beg the attention of the House to it. Speaking on the 18th of October, 1882, the hon. Member said—

"We comprise about 40 out of the 103 Members Ireland is entitled to send to the House of Commons. It is true that, even under the prosent franchise, we can hope largely to increase our present numbers at the next General Election without altering at all the franchise. We trust to increase our numbers to at least 65 or 70, and we then should, at least, constitute the majority of the Irish Representatives, and not be under the imputation, as at present, that we are only a fraction or minority of that representation. But to get such a representation as would secure, for instance, the creation of National Self-Government for Ireland, we require to return 80 or 90 Members to the House of Commons, and we cannot hope for this until the franchise has been lowered, at least as far as the basis of household suffrage."

This is, then, exactly the original object and the main purpose with which the hon. Member founded the National League, which is now in full swing in Ireland; and it is in face of that object, and in face of that warning and protest, that the English Government are preparing to give this overwhelming and preponderating power to the hon. Member, so that, with the conveniences which he has described, he will be able to fulfil his prophecy, by stamping out those in Ireland who are still friendly to the Union! I beg the House to weigh this serious state of things, and this well-considered and deliberate statement of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, who must understand this subject at all events, against all these vague and general propositions about the good time coming for Ireland, when, after you have made this last concession, she is to settle down in peace and contentment. Admirable moralizing! But I should like to ask the Government how they expect to impress these excellent precepts upon the minds of men whose ideas are but too faithfully represented by such speeches, as we sometimes hear from the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) and the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy)? Through what channels do you expect to pour these gentle antidotes? They never read a word of publications that contain such respectable platitudes. They are accustomed to diet of a different kind. They believe what is said by the hon. Member for the City of Cork, and they read the newspapers which support his cause even in stronger language than hon. Members are accustomed to hear in this House—stronger even than we heard from the lips of the hon. Member for Wexford this very evening. The hon. Member for Cork has long ago assured them that the real reason why Ireland was included in the Bill was that otherwise he and his Party would not have permitted any measure to be carried at all. Realizing all these things, I stand in amazement at the folly which is hurrying forward this fatal measure; and, often as I listen to the wise saws and abstract reasons by which its supporters try to keep up their confidence in this last reckless experiment, I am reminded of that remarkable saying of Lord Dufferin, when dealing with a not very different school of critics, in his famous despatch upon the Egyptian Question. He said—

"The situation of the country is too critical, the problems immediately pressing for solution are too vital to be tampered with, even in the interests of political philosophy."

I am quite sure there are a great many hon. Members in this House—I do not know how many—who have hailed the decided improvement in the condition of Ireland, as shown in the subsidence of agrarian crime and the more general tranquillity of the country, as the harbinger of the existence of those conditions which the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War laid down in his speech at Bacup, and that they really believe that the Irish people have become reconciled to obedience to the law and to the maintenance of the Union. I am not going to repeat again what I said on that subject—against laying too much stress upon those signs of improvement—when I had the opportunity of speaking in the debate on the Address. I think, however, I am content to recall the attention of the House to the very remarkable statement made here, a few days ago, by the hon. Member for the City of Cork, when he encouraged the Irish farmers to unite in a strike against the payment of the police tax; and when I add that that teaching has been carefully improved and disseminated as far as possible in Ireland by the Press which supports that Separatist Party, I think these considerations are enough to show how far we are still from the state of affairs which was required by the noble Marquess as the condition of granting the same measures to Ireland which he is prepared to grant to England, and also to show how near we are still to the time when the law of the League was the law of the land. I implore hon. Members not to be too much influenced by the subsidence of agrarian crime. I rejoice at it as much as any man in this House can do; but I pray you not to lay your heads too calmly on the opium-pillow of security and repose, lest, while you sleep and slumber, the door of this House may be pushed gently open, and you may awaken to find that your threshold has been crossed and your House thronged in overwhelming numbers by those men, who frankly tell you they come here for no other purpose than to break up the Union of the Three Kingdoms. I will not enlarge upon the certain consequence of that movement if it succeeds. It has been laid down as an axiom by all the great thinkers and statesmen of England in former times that the repeal of the Union would mean nothing less than the breaking up of the Empire; and if such ends were sought by open force you all say you would resist it to the bitter end. But to-day the danger is of a more subtle, and therefore more formidable kind; and it is, in my opinion, nearer to you than it has been within this century. And yet I am very glad to be able to assure the House that, quite independently of the policy of the present Government, or of any Government—I should say, despite the policy of the present Government—there are forces at work in Ireland which, under more favourable circumstances, might lead that country on to a happier future. Education and material prosperity are spreading over the land their civilizing influences. The rapidly-increasing interchanges of commerce, and the interweaving of financial interests, the frequent passing to and fro of men across the inhospitable sea—oceanus dissociabilis—or, as it was once translated by an Irish schoolboy—“The Channel which repudiates the Union.” These influences are spanning and bridging the Channel, and ought to bring the peoples of the two countries more closely together; and I am perfectly certain in this House there is no feeling more strong, in spite of the bitter invectives and furious slanders to the contrary sometimes heard from Irish Members below the Gangway. There is no feeling stronger in this House than the desire for a lasting reconciliation—a desire felt not more on one side of the House than on the other. But realize,

I pray you, what are the conditions which you are preparing for the last act of this solemn drama. Separation will be demanded after the next General Election by those who demand it now; but their numbers will be seriously increased. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford said he would rather meet the hon. Member for Cork in this House than confront his associates in Ireland. I cannot see the force of the remark. What really will happen? The conspirator in Ireland, the assassin, will not be more loth to take his place behind the hedge, and the dynamiter to deposit his carefully-constructed clockwork, whenever it is thought that another tug at the chapel bell will be useful. The amount of external pressure will be carefully regulated so as to increase the power, but not to spoil the game, of the Parliamentary Representatives of the movement. But you will meet them in the House of Commons redoubled in numbers, and more than ever willing, confident, and able to protect their confederates operating in the country. Let me put the case to Ministers and Members opposite from one other point of view. What is your answer when you are confronted with the fact that after all your boasted policy of concession the Irish people seem to be more estranged from you and from England than ever? You say—“Wait a bit; the operation of our healing measures is necessarily slow; but time is on our side,” and so on. I suppose your hope is that you may win away at last the minds even of the passionate people of my country from their false guides, and that common sense, and a sense of common interests, may again draw them into a friendly fellow-citizenship? You expect that the effect of your acts of conciliation, according to the natural course of such a policy, must soon influence the more reasonable and educated of those classes in Ireland who have lately been in revolt against your rule, and that it may gradually work down through the various strata, even to the lowest, the most ignorant, the most bitterly prejudiced? That, at the best, must take time, and a long time. Yet, without giving a moment's respite for such a change to be accomplished, at one bound you outstrip the operation of those influences, and place practically the whole of the electorate power in the hands of those who are absolutely unated for it; and to the Representatives of those classes of Irishmen certain not to be converted for years to come you give such an overwhelming influence that they will inevitably control and guide the fortunes of Parliament, not only for the future action of Parliament in Ireland, but for the Empire. I have to thank the House for its attention. I have endeavoured, as far as possible, to avoid saying anything which could introduce into the debate the heats of Party conflict; and I have sought to plead—to plead patiently—the cause of the Irish Loyalist. I solemnly warn the House that in this controversy, which, believe me, is not now at an end, and of which, I fear, you have not yet heard the worst, the act which the Government are now asking you to do will absolutely efface the influence of the men who might be your friends in Ireland, and will give an overwhelming preponderance in that country and in this House to those who are resolved to destroy the Union and break up the Empire.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he felt that his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) would see that a very serious obstacle had already been raised in the way of the suggestion made in the course of his speech. He thought that the eloquent, graceful, statesmanlike, and powerful speech to which they had just listened, would very much indispose the House and the country to deprive itself of such ornaments of debate as the Representatives for the Universities of Ireland and the rest of the United Kingdom. He was not going to touch the Irish Question, which had been so exhaustively dealt with that evening, nor was he going into any side issues with reference to minority representation, or kindred subjects of which they had heard so much. He wished to say a word or two upon the Amendment actually before the House, which suggested that this measure should be postponed until the whole redistribution scheme of Her Majesty's Government was before them. That Amendment was very skillfully drawn; it secured the support of three classes of the opponents of the Bill. It secured the support of those who did not object on principle to the extension of the franchise to householders in rural and urban districts, but who contended that the grouping of those was so essential an element that they declined to support the scheme without redistribution; it secured the support of those who altogether objected to the measure, and whose opposition no possible scheme of redistribution would remove; and it also secured the support of those who, not venturing to oppose the measure openly, disguised their hostility under the cover of an Amendment which enabled them to vote against the Bill without saying what they really meant. The noble Lord's argument rested, to a great extent, upon the precedents of 1832 and 1867. With the permission of the House, he would point out the essential difference between this measure and those to which the noble Lord referred—it was that the latter were disfranchising as well as enfranchising measures. They deprived persons who already had the vote, and gave it to others possessing the same qualification living in different localities. But the present measure did not deprive a man the vote at all; it simply altered the condition in which the vote was to be cast, and although it did not remove the inequalities in the present system of election distribution, it would bring about a more equal distribution. hon. Gentlemen opposite the injustice under which the boroughs had been suffering in consequence of the unfair redistribution which had been settled upon them in 1867. The number of borough Members in the Kingdom at the present time was 360, and the number of county Members 283; the former representing only 15,000,000, and the latter 20,000,000 of the population. No such disproportion already existed, although the extension of the franchise would aggravate the difference, it would not really make the condition of the boroughs worse than at present. But no contrast of this anomaly could be made of the electoral absurdities of the present system, because it depended upon a contingency that this Parliament might be dissolved before it had dealt with the whole scheme. Now, only in three events could that contingency arise. The first was, that the Bill became law this year, and that Parliament was dissolved this year; the second was, that the present Bill became law this year, and the Dissolution occurred next year; and the third was, that the Government would postpone bringing in a Redistribution Bill until after the Dissolution of Parliament. The date on which a man's qualification was ascertained was the 31st July. That qualification was maintained for 12 months. Any election that took place this year must be based upon the existing register, which was made up to January last. The present measure, unless a clause which it did not now contain were inserted in it, could not confer electoral power until the 1st of January, 1886. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James): No, no!] The hon. and learned Gentleman said "No, no!" He would make that point clearer. He admitted that if the Bill received the Royal Assent before the 31st of July this year, it might possibly come into force on the 1st of January, 1885; but as no one would consider that it could receive the Royal Assent before the 31st of July this year, any election which took place in 1884 or 1885 must be decided by the existing constituencies. The real opposition to this Bill was the opposition of the two right hon. Gentlemen opposite—namely, the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) and the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), who believed that the Bill would effect a transfer of political power dangerous to the public welfare. His right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge said that there was a sort of compact entered into in 1832, by virtue of which the middle classes were contended that the county constituency should be left to property holders; and he contended that the same sort of arrangement took place in 1867, and that a counterpoise to the artisan franchise was to be found in the restricted occupation franchise of the counties. If that extraordinary anomaly did exist, then his reply would be to annul those who were not parties to those gains could not be bound by them; and, inasmuch as the borough householders who were left out in 1832 were not debarrd from obtaining their rights in 1867, so the county householders were not debarrd from obtaining their rights in 1884. But that was a repetition of the old argument about the franchise and classes, which had been put forth with by his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) that year. He would like to ask whether who entertained this view had taken into consideration and calculated the proportion of the wage-earning classes, and the amount of political power to which they were on that ground entitled? The wage-earning class comprised the bulk of the population; they produced the largest amount of national wealth, and gave the largest amount to the national income. Their production was valued at £500,000,000, while they paid 40 per cent of the National Revenue. On what principle was this gigantic and preponderating interest to be represented? Formerly numerous interests were represented in Parliament. There was the East India interest, the West India interest, the Colonial interest, and the Shipping interest; but the experiment had been tried, and had failed, inasmuch as the political ignorance and subserviency of the Parliaments which represented those interests had only been surpassed by the venality and the corruption of the constituencies by which they were elected. There was one interest into which all others merged, which all other classes were bound to support, in which they all shared the interest of the people as a whole, and it was upon that standpoint that he claimed the privileges of citizenship for all those who discharged its duties. The possession of political power and its use constituted the best education of the people; and he believed that the artisans of 1884 were superior in political information to the £10 householders of 1832. There were, of course, capable and incapable men in all grades of society—there was a residuum in all classes; but that was no argument against the extension of the franchise to those classes—because some people were drowned it was no reason for keeping everybody out of the water until they could swim. Gentlemen on those Benches supported it as a measure of popular government; and although he admitted that the power which it gave might not always be exercised wisely, or always exercised with justice, for blunders and mistakes were inherent in all human institutions, yet he and his hon. Friends had no fear of the result. The truth was that there were two policies with regard to the people of this country which the House could adopt—that of trust, tempered by prudence, or that of distrust, tempered by fear. He anticipated the success of the former policy, which to his mind was one of wisdom and justice, one that would strengthen the Constitution by widening the base upon which it rested, while at the same time it strengthened that system of Party government which controlled and checked the administration of the national affairs. It was the boast of Lord Beaconsfield in 1867 that he had created the Conservative working man. So long as they excluded the mass of the people from the pale of the Constitution they compelled them to assume a hostile attitude; but the moment they admitted them they gave full play to those political instincts, which were as natural to the cottage as to the mansion. The artisans and peasants did not belong to one political Party only; they had ranked themselves some with one Party and some with another; and he believed that their accession to political life would not only strengthen the working of our institutions, but would add great political force to the two great Parties of the State, whose healthy rivalry and whose common patriotism had been the story of our political freedom. He commended the Bill to those hon. Members, Liberal as well as Conservative, who foresaw that in the near future there were social and political problems to be solved, whose solution would tax the energies of our best and wisest statesmen; and he commended it also to the support of all who were desirous of erecting another bulwark around that system of law and liberty, order and progress, which was the proud and peerless inheritance of the English people.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Stuart-Wortley,)—put, and agreed to.

ARMY (ANNUAL) BILL.—[BILL 144.]
(The Marquess of Hartington, The Judge Advocate, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

MR. PARNELL said, he hoped the Bill would not be proceeded with at that hour—12.40. He had supposed, from the statement of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War, that the Motion for going into Committee would not be made at a time when it was perfectly impossible for the House to do justice to the three important Amendments which stood on the Paper in the names of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) and himself. Of course, if the Government only desired to move the Bill into Committee, and would give an assurance that the clauses would not be considered except at a time when it would be competent for Irish Members to direct attention to these important matters to which the Amendments referred, he should not persevere in the course which otherwise he intended to pursue. He wanted an assurance that the Bill would not be taken at an hour when the House had been wearied out by an exhausting discussion, and when it would be impossible to obtain for the proposed Amendments that attention to which their importance justly entitled them. He also directed attention to the fact that although the Bill had been ruled to be beyond the half-past 12 o'clock Rule, yet such was not the case with former Army (Annual) Bills, and it was owing to that fact that they had succeeded in carrying certain Amendments after full discussion. He, therefore, trusted that the Government would give them the opportunity of bringing these matters fairly before the House. He felt every confidence that if they did so—if they gave the opportunity he asked for of taking the debate at a reasonable hour, and of enabling the House to devote attention to the matter—hon. Members would be able to impress the House with the justice of their view, and obtain some alteration of the very onerous conditions which the Act now imposed on the soldiers of the Army. He begged to move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Parnell.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I should be very glad, if it were possible, to give a better and more convenient opportunity for the discussion of the important Amendments in the Bill than is afforded on the present occasion. I fear, however, from the necessities of the Public Service, that the Bill must be passed through this House before the Easter Recess; and that, therefore, no more convenient opportunity than the present will arise for taking this stage of the Bill. I would suggest to the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) that the question whether the discussion on the Bill can be taken to-morrow night will depend, to a considerable extent, on the hon. Member himself and his Friends. The principal Amendment on going into Committee of Supply to-morrow is one to be moved by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy); and if that Motion brings about a prolonged debate, I am afraid we should have no chance of taking this discussion at an earlier hour than now. If, however, it is likely that the debate on the Motion will be concluded at an early hour, we shall have no objection, if the Speaker be allowed to leave the Chair now, to the postponement of the discussion in Committee until to-morrow. If that course is taken, it must be on the understanding that we must ask the Committee to proceed with the discussion of the Bill at any hour at which it may be reached. I am afraid that on Monday the Sitting will probably be a still later one than this; and that Tuesday, when the House, it is hoped, will adjourn for the Easter Recess, will not be a convenient opportunity for discussing the Bill. If the hon. Gentleman thinks there is any probability that the Motion of the hon. Member for Longford will be disposed of to-morrow at an earlier hour than we have now reached, I should have no objection to an adjournment immediately we get into Committee.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he thought that, on the whole, there would be a better chance of the hon. Member's Amendment to the Army Bill being discussed to-morrow than to-night. The Irish Members expected a full debate on his (Mr. Justin M'Carthy's) Motion to-morrow; but, at the same time, they would endeavour to keep within reasonable limits, and he should think there would be a good chance of reaching the Bill at an earlier period than they had arrived at it now. He would, therefore, suggest that the course pointed out by the noble Lord should be agreed to.

MR. SEXTON said, he considered that, on the whole, the course proposed would be a convenient one. The noble Marquess said just now that the necessities of the Public Service required that the Bill should pass before the Easter Recess; but he (Mr. Sexton) had always, hitherto, understood that if the Army (Annual) Bill passed before the 30th April—27 days distant—it would be in time. He was, therefore, curious to know how the noble Lord could say that the Bill should pass anything like before Easter? There was no reason to apprehend that they would not be able to reach the discussion of the clauses of the Bill at an earlier hour than the present—a quarter before 1.

MR. HEALY said, he would point out to the noble Marquess that, although the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork agreed to the arrangement suggested, he could have no control whatever over the Motions of hon. Gentlemen on the Paper subsequent to that of the hon. Member for Longford. There was a Motion down in the name of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) on the subject of the fees levied upon the suitor in the Supreme Court of Judicature. Then, one of the Members for Westminster (Lord Algernon Percy) had a Motion to call attention to the Carriage Tax, and move a Resolution. There were several other Motions down, and, of course, one in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) with regard to the time of the Session at which the Estimates should be proceeded with. It appeared to him that if the Irish Members agreed to the suggestion of the noble Lord they would be obliging themselves to curtail the discussion on the Motion of the hon. Member for Longford only to make way for those Gentlemen who had Motions down subsequent to that of his hon. Friend. It should depend on the engagements given to-night whether or not Irish Members curtailed their speeches to-morrow.

MR. PARNELL said, he thought it would be best for him to withdraw his Motion for reporting Progress; but, at the same time, he must express a hope that the Government would use their influence with hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House who had Motions on the Paper subsequent to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Longford to induce them not to proceed with those Motions, in order to allow the Army Bill to come on at a reasonable time.

MR. GREGORY said, that, as far as he was concerned, his Motion to-morrow depended very much upon what was done with the Royal Courts of Justice Bill, which was down on the Paper for to-night. If reasonable time was given for the discussion of that Bill he had no intention of pressing his Motion; in fact, he would much rather take the discussion on the Bill, seeing that the measure involved the question contained in his Motion.

MR. COURTNEY said, that, with reference to the Bill in question, he should be quite ready to meet the convenience of the hon. Member as far as possible. It was impossible, he feared, to bring it on any night at an earlier hour; but, as it was a Money Bill, they would not be precluded from proceeding with it at whatever hour it was reached.

MR. TOMLINSON said, the hon. Member (Mr. Gregory) was not the only person who took an interest in this question. Strong representations with regard to it had been made to him (Mr. Tomlinson).

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee; Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

TRUSTEE CHURCHES (IRELAND) BILL.

[Lords.].—[BILL 157.]

(Mr. Gibson.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report the Bill to the House."

MR. HEALY said, that on this question he wished to express a hope that the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) would remember the courtesy which had been shown him in respect of this Bill by the Irish Members below the Gangway on the Opposition side of the House. They had refrained from putting a block against the measure, and in return for that consideration it was to be hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would remember the circumstance when he (Mr. Healy) and his Friends had little Bills down, and would refrain from putting blocking Notices against them himself, or from inciting others to do it when he did not like openly to adopt that course himself.

MR. GIBSON said, he would reciprocate the courtesy of hon. Members below the Gangway whenever they had Bills analogous to the present measure down on the Paper.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION (REPEAL, &c.)

BILL.—[BILL 55.]

(Mr. Hibbert, Secretary Sir William Harcourt.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Hibbert.)

MR. GREGORY appealed to the hon. Member to take some convenient day for this Bill, and then let it be brought on at an earlier hour. It was a Bill of considerable importance, and it might be brought on some day—and he did not care how soon—after Easter.

MR. WARTON said, he would support that appeal.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, this was a matter which interested suitors very much. He had had many representations made to him upon it, and he intended to discuss the subject when he could get an opportunity. The Bill had come before the House in a most mysterious manner. The hon. Member in charge of it moved the second reading by touching his hat, and not saying a single word upon it.

MR. COURTNEY said, this was a Money Bill.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD replied that, therefore, it could not be blocked. A serious charge was about to be put upon suitors; and, therefore, the subject was one which should be seriously discussed, and not when there was scarcely anyone present. To fix it for to-day was only fixing it formally for the day, and he hoped there would be no difficulty in fixing it for discussion soon after Easter.

MR. COURTNEY said, he did not propose to fix the Bill for to-day, and he would see what could be arranged.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow.

(Mr. Gibson, Sir Richard Wallace, Mr. Blake, Mr. Corry.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Gibson.)

MR. SEXTON said, he had been looking through Section 4 of this Bill since the discussion the other night which led the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) to make an important alteration. Instead of providing that a child might be both flogged and sent to prison, the right hon. and learned Gentleman made flogging an alternative punishment; but on looking over the Bill he (Mr. Sexton) found that Sub-section 4 of Section 4 provided that—

"This section shall not prejudice the right of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction to send a child to a reformatory or industrial school."

He wished to know whether this sub-section would over-ride the alternative provision; whether a child, having been flogged, could be sent to a reformatory or industrial school, or whether the punishment should be simply alternative; and whether, in case of flogging, there would be no other punishment inflicted? Unless he was satisfied by the right hon. and learned Gentleman that Sub-section 4 did not cancel the apparent concession given in the previous section he should move the adjournment of the debate, in order to give time for the further consideration of the section.

MR. GIBSON said, the section as to industrial schools was a section which must be retained, because jurisdiction in reference to reformatories and industrial schools was obviously most important in the interest of children as well as of the general community; and he should be very sorry to see any change in the reformatory law. The Government, he knew, could not consent to any such change.

MR. PARNELL said, the power of flogging would then be given in addition to the power of sending to a reformatory or industrial school. He thought the House would agree with him that there would be no gain in giving this additional power to the police in the case of children whom the magistrates intended to send to a reformatory or industrial school for a long period. If the child's mind was to be reformed by a course of treatment and discipline in a reformatory, that treatment should take place under the management of the directors of the reformatory, and within the walls of the reformatory. It was not necessary, and, indeed, it was highly objectionable, to inflict additional penalties to those already given to magistrates in regard to the power of sending children to a reformatory. Nothing could be more objectionable, in reference to the punishment of children, than punishment inflicted by the authority of magistrates in ordinary prisons previous to the children being sent to reformatories. As the law now stood, children were often sent to gaol for a fortnight before being sent to a reformatory; they were put in cells and frightened out of their wits. In his judgment, the course to adopt would be to send a child at once to a reformatory, so that the reformatory course could be at once entered upon, without the child being first sent to gaol or subjected to the barbarous punishment of flogging, which this Bill provided. He therefore hoped that, in order that this point might be cleared up, the right hon. and learned Gentleman would agree to the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. GIBSON said, he would, of course, agree to the adjournment of the debate till to-morrow; but he believed there must be a short imprisonment first. He would make inquiry, and very likely he would be able to-morrow to give a satisfactory answer.

MR. T. C. THOMPSON said, that in some cases these children were dealt with without anyone being present to defend them. Parents, by this Bill, were not to be summoned, and there might be nobody present to defend the children. A child of 10 years of age could not answer for himself; and, therefore, he thought care should be taken not to punish him unless someone appeared for him.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

MOTIONS.

LAND IMPROVEMENT AND ARTERIAL DRAINAGE (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to consolidate and amend the Acts for facilitating the improvement of Landed Property, and for the drainage and improvements of lands in Ireland."—(Mr. Courtney.)

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Secretary to the Treasury whether this was the same Bill as was carried last year, who had advised the Bill, and who had brought it in? The Secretary to the Treasury was, of course, quite capable of bringing in such a Bill as this, but he had not time to do so; and, therefore, someone else must have brought it in.

MR. COURTNEY said, this was substantially the same Bill as was brought in last year. He did not think it necessary to say by whose advice it was brought in.

MR. O'SHEA asked whether the hon. Gentleman was intending to propose that the whole system of arterial drainage in Ireland should be referred to a Select Committee?

MR. HEALY expressed a hope that this Bill would not be compromised by insidious arterial charges in consequence of judicial rents; because if there was anything of that kind it would probably have to be dropped.

MR. COURTNEY said, there was no sort of foundation for that suggestion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. COURTNEY and Mr. TREVELYAN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 166.]

TURNPIKE ACTS CONTINUANCE ACT, 1883.

APPOINTMENT AND NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Schedules of 'The Annual Turnpike Acts Continuance Act, 1883'—Committee to consist of Lord EDWARD CAVENDISH, Mr. WENTWORTH BEAUMONT, Mr. BEACH, Mr. CLARE READ, Mr. LAMBTON, Viscount FOLKESTONE, and Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL:—Three to be the quorum."—(Mr. George Russell.)

COLONEL NOLAN said, it was supposed that this was a purely English Committee, to deal only with English questions. He should not have raised any question on the constitution of the Committee, if that was so; but he believed that the Committee, amongst other things, would consider the question of the amount of compensation to be paid to Turnpike Trusts on the valuation of turnpikes. That was not merely an English question, because some of the money would have to come from Irish sources, and there were many people in Ireland who took great interest in local affairs, and particularly in the question of rating. A certain sum of money was now being given to England, and no privilege was to be given to Ireland in regard to Irish rates. He had put this question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer direct; and the right hon. Gentleman had answered generally that there were a great many other things paid for in Ireland. This was a case in which an Irish Member might very well be put on the Committee, to see that these Trusts were abolished in a proper manner, and to see how Ireland was treated. He should move the omission of the name of Lord Edward Cavendish.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the name of Lord Edward Cavendish be omitted from the said Committee."—(Colonel Nolan.)

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL said, he had expected this point to be raised. The fact of the matter was that he had taken the constitution of the Committee over from his Predecessor, almost exactly as it stood before, except that the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt) was unwilling to serve; and he was very glad to avail himself of the services of the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read). There was no disposition to exclude Irish Members from the Committee; but the number of the Committee had always been the same, and a wish had been expressed by the hon. Member who had always been Chairman that the number should not exceed that of former years. It was only on that account that he proposed the Committee as it now stood; and he believed the hon. and gallant Member was in error in supposing that Ireland was involved in the matter. It was a purely English subject, and the Members of the Committee were purely English.

MR. HEALY said, this was now the last year of the sitting of the Committee, and, though that was so, it was really the most important year of all, because, as he understood it, it was the year in which the question of compensating those gentlemen whose rights were to be extinguished would come up for consideration. It was not an unreasonable thing to ask, seeing that the House had recognized that it was only fair that Irish Members should serve on English Committees, that an opportunity of enabling them to serve on such Committees should be given them. Irish Members were naturally anxious to serve on these Committees, in order that they might learn all about the Sister Island. Here was a Committee in connection with which a great deal of valuable information could be obtained. Some years ago a question was raised as to the personnel of these Committees and the question of nationality, and the Prime Minister admitted that the Third Party—who, they were told, were to have their numbers increased to such an alarming extent in the future—should be put on Committees. He thought, therefore, that they should have a Member on this Committee. He trusted that the Government; seeing that there was little contentious matter to be gone into on the Committee, would accede to the request now made, and put an Irish Member on the Committee.

MR. HIBBERT said, that, having sat on a similar Committee four years back, he might explain what it was called upon to do—although he did not wish to be understood as objecting to Irish Members being put upon such Committees. The subject to be considered by this Committee was entirely an English subject, and in no way whatever could any general question be raised. The question to be considered and reported upon was whether certain classes of roads should be disturnpiked or not, and the matter was, therefore, one only affecting certain local interests in England. Whether an Irish Member who was appointed on the Committee would not feel himself rather out of place was not for him but for the Committee to say. If he were asked whether he thought an Irish Member would be of any use on the Committee, he should certainly have to reply that he did not see how he could possibly be able to render much assistance; but, at the same time, he would not like to say that the appointment of an Irish Member would in any way interfere with the deliberations of the Committee. So far as he was personally concerned, he should not have the least objection to having an Irish Member placed on it. Hitherto these Committees had never had either Irish or Scotch Members on them. This was not the last year in which they would have to sit; in fact, he expected they would have to sit for several years to come. He had merely risen to give an explanation of the work the Committee had to do, and to say that he saw no objection to Irishmen being put on the Committee, although no advantage could possibly arise from it.

MR. W. REDMOND said, it had been urged by Gentlemen on the Government Benches that it was unnecessary to have Irish Members on this Committee, on the ground that the Committee had to deal with affairs exclusively English. But had it not been often urged by Members of the Government, in justification of England interfering with Irish affairs, that Ireland and England were united in one Kingdom? Why were right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite so very reluctant to allow Irish Members to be appointed on this Committee, or to allow them to have anything at all to say in a matter which they declared to be thoroughly English? If this principle were followed out, and no English Members were appointed on Committees which referred to exclusively Irish matters, the Irish Members would be perfectly satisfied with the arrangement; but so long as English Members were appointed to take part in inquiries of an exclusively Irish character, the Irish Members were perfectly within their right in demanding to be represented on a Committee such as this. It appeared to him that the question of the appointment of this Committee had changed somewhat since last year, and that Ireland would certainly, to some extent, be interested in the result of the inquiry. He therefore thought the Irish Members were perfectly within their right, as his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) had pointed out, in demanding that an Irish Member should be put on the Committee. The demand was a very reasonable one, and he could not see why hon. Members opposite could not accede to it.

MR. WARTON said, he thought the Scotch Members who had the other day demanded so loudly to be put upon an English Committee should support the Irish Members to-day. If the House did not accede to the present demand, they would be giving the Irish Members a strong argument in favour of Home Rule. It would be a dangerous principle to lay down that Scotch and Irish Members were not to take part in English Committees; but, at the same time, he should advise any Irish Friend of his not to seek to get placed upon this particular Committee in question, for the reason that it had been sitting for some years, and he would go amongst Gentlemen who were thoroughly conversant with the subject, possessing himself no knowledge whatever about it. In order to make himself even tolerably familiar with the subject, he would have to study 70 or 80 Acts of Parliament.

MR. SEXTON said, he hoped that what had fallen from the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. W. Redmond) would fructify in the minds of the Government. To his mind, the arguments of his hon. Friends were as reasonable as it was possible to conceive any arguments could be. The work of the Committee for the present year would be to consider whether certain roads should be disturnpiked or not, and, if they were, whether the cost of the operation should come out of the rates instead of the County Fund; and, that being so, the interest of the Irish Members in the question was minimized. He should, under the circumstances, be disposed to ask his Friends not to persevere in their demand to have an Irish Member placed on the Committee. In the last year of the sitting of the Committee, however, why should not an Irish Member be appointed on it?

COLONEL NOLAN said, he would not press his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to inquire and report to the House under what conditions, with reference to the rate of interest, expenses of management, maintenance of road, payment of debt, and term of years, or other special arrange-

Ordered, That all Petitions relating to the continuance or discontinuance of Turnpike Trusts be referred to the Committee.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.—(Mr. George Russell.)

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND) (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of MR. COURTNEY, Bill to consolidate and amend certain Acts and enactments relating to the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by MR. COURTNEY and MR. TREVILYAN.

BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of THE LORD ADVOCATE, Bill for regulating the Police and Sanitary administration of towns and populous places, and for facilitating the union of Police and Municipal administration in Burghs in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by THE LORD ADVOCATE and MR. SOLICITOR GENERAL for SCOTLAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 167.]

House adjourned at half after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 4th April, 1884.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN) — KHARTOUM.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE, in asking the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend taking any step for the relief of General Gordon at Khartoum? said, he trusted the House would not think he was encroaching on their generosity if he said a few words in putting his Question. It was impossible to deny that great anxiety existed in the public mind with regard to the safety of General Gordon; and he thought that, from what had happened in the other House on the previous night, Her Majesty's Government up to the present were not under any great apprehensions with regard to that matter. Personally, he was very glad to accept that statement, and he only trusted events would prove it true; but it was impossible to look over the fact that those Europeans who were with General Gordon at Khartoum were not in unison with the opinions held by Her Majesty's Government. A statement was made in The Times the other day with respect to the report of their own Correspondent, who had also been employed for some time by the Crown as their Consular Agent, which demanded great consideration. What did Mr. Power say? Mr. Power, writing from Khartoum on March 23, said—

"We are daily expecting British troops. We cannot bring ourselves to believe that we are to be abandoned by the Government. Our existence depends upon England."

Was it likely that a gentleman in the position of Mr. Power would write such a statement as that to a journal of such influence as The Times, unless the words he used were words of truth? He (the Earl of Hardwicke) understood the Government to repudiate all those Correspondents whose contributions appeared in the papers, and to whom he thought the public were greatly indebted; for otherwise, owing to the reticence of Her Majesty's Government, they would be in entire ignorance of what was going on in the Soudan if it were not for the various intelligences sent to them from that source. When Questions were put to the Government on this subject, they held up their hands, assumed an injured attitude, and invariably treated a simple wish to elicit some statement of fact, which might be conducive to allaying the fears of the country, as though it was an expression of want of confidence. They said, in effect—"Can you not trust us? Are we so incompetent, such an ignorant body of blockheads, that we are not able to manage the affairs of this country with dignity and good sense for the country's benefit?"

EARL GRANVILLE: When did I make such a speech?

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, he did not say that the noble Earl had made that speech; but he had certainly used words to that effect in appealing, in those piteous tones and wailing voice which no one knew so well as the noble Earl how to assume, to the House, to say whether the Government were so ignorant and incapable that they could not manage their affairs for the benefit and welfare of the country. For his part, he considered that neither the House nor the public were being treated fairly, or with the respect and confidence to which they were entitled, by the Government, and that the tone adopted by them indicated the greatest weakness. People, when they were doing wrong, especially when they were doing wrong wittingly, felt great irritation at the advice given to them by their friends, but much more at the advice of those who disagreed with them; and he believed that the irritation shown by the Government arose from the feeling that they were not conducting the affairs of Egypt in a way which England would sanction. They might assume feelings of comfort with regard to the position of their servant, General Gordon, at Khartoum; but if anything happened to him there, either sooner or later, the gravest responsibility would rest upon the heads of Her Majesty's Government. But did the Government assume any responsibility? One day, they refused to assume any in the Soudan, and they said that an Army should not be sent to the Soudan; the next day, they sent 4,000 British troops there. One day, the British Minister at Cairo gave an order that the road to Berber should not be opened by force; the next day, a British Army went to the littoral of the Red Sea and slaughtered thousands of brave and inoffensive people. If the Government had managed properly, they could have opened the road from Suakin to Berber with a less amount of military expenditure than had already taken place. He would not enter upon the military part of the question; but he might point out that, in 1801, an Army was brought there, and was marched from the littoral of the Red Sea to the Nile. The march was made by 5,000 men, of whom only 12 were lost in action or by the effects of the climate, and only 15 horses. Therefore, when it was said by the noble Earl opposite that British arms and British courage were not sufficient to effect that object, and carry out a great and noble purpose, he declared himself perfectly convinced that, at any time, if Her Majesty's Government wished to do so, they would have no difficulty in finding another Army, as gallant and intrepid, who would effectually open up the road, and save all the inhabitants in the town of Khartoum. When General Gordon was sent to Khartoum the Government was in one of its many dilemmas. He was certain they were grateful to find anyone who would execute that mission, and they were thankful, when they met Parliament, to be able to state that the difficulties of the Soudan were being got over, and they had found a gallant officer who was willing and able to execute their wishes for the purpose of relieving Khartoum. In the whole history of this country no Plenipotentiary ever sent to carry out a great mission had been so ill-treated as General Gordon. Every suggestion he had made had been refused by the Government. When this country gave power to individuals, that power should be given frankly, decidedly, and openly; and when an officer did what he could to forward the views of the Government, and the Government refused to accede to his wishes, they undertook a great responsibility. At the time he went out the Government put confidence in his judgment. Not only was that declaration made by the noble Earl opposite; it was made also by Sir Evelyn Baring in his capacity of manager of English interests at Cairo. Sir Evelyn Baring wound up a despatch to General Gordon, dated January 25, 1884, in these words—

"In undertaking the difficult task which now lies before you, you may feel assured that no effort will be wanting on the part of the Cairo authorities, whether English or Egyptian, to afford you all the co-operation and support in their power."—[Egypt, No. 6 (1884), p. 2.]

It was evident that General Gordon, from that, had felt that he was likely to be supported, in case of emergency, by Her Majesty's Government. He (the Earl of Hardwicke) would ask, did the Government think that they were fulfilling that pledge? Was General Gordon in such a position as to give them disquiet; and had they received any correspondence from him to lead them to believe that the statements made by Mr. Power were not true? All these were questions which he thought the Government ought to answer. In the course they had taken, the Government implied that the British troops had not the courage and energy to perform great enterprises? On the previous night, the Prime Minister had been roused into a most brilliant passage of invective, simply because the Leader of the Opposition had made a few remarks, and asked a few questions, similar to those to which he (the Earl of Hardwicke) himself was going to call attention that evening. But that was not the way to meet such questions. Why would not the Government give a single word of information? Why did they continue to wrap themselves up in that cloak of reserve? Was it because they had some ulterior plan with regard to the Government of Egypt? Did they wish another terrible disaster to happen in the Soudan before they sent troops to Khartoum? Were they going to send them now to Gordon, or were they going to wait for 10 months, as it was rumoured they were to wait? He was perfectly certain they would have to send troops to relieve that place; but let them do it before it was too late, or that refrain which had gone through the whole policy of Her Majesty's Government would again resound through Egypt and through this country. Her Majesty's Government had taken on themselves that responsibility, and they could not get out of it. Shirk and turn about as they liked, that responsibility would come closely home to them every day they were in Office. One day they admitted their responsibility, and denied it on another—a policy, if such it could be called, of expansion. They had no forethought, and refused to foresee the possibility of an event occurring a month before it did occur; they left everything to chance, and by so doing involved themselves in far greater responsibilities. When, at the beginning of the Session, his noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) had urged on them to take steps with regard to Khartoum and General Gordon, the Government had laughed at the idea of General Gordon being in any difficulties whatever. The noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies (the Earl of Derby) had repudiated entirely any responsibility for General Gordon. On the 12th of February, he said—

“What possible ground have you for censuring us for allowing the Khartoum garrison to be destroyed, when, so far as we know, it is still safe, when we have every reason to hope it may be brought away safely, and when we are doing all in our power for that object? General Gordon, we hear, is hopeful—the garrison is powerful, the country can furnish supplies, and it will be strange if some of the Chiefs cannot be conciliated when there is no longer any cause for war.”—(3 Hansard, [284] 645.)

Was the noble Earl of the same mind now? Was he as comfortable as to the safety of General Gordon now? Did he conceive they done everything in their power? If the noble Earl said they had, he would give him credit for the strength of his convictions; but he did not think that these convictions would be shared by the intelligence of the country. The Government must give them some assurance that they meant to consolidate that power which they had taken over in Egypt. There they had committed outrages in bombarding Alexandria, which they would have been the first to denounce if committed by the Conservative Party. The Government had taken responsibilities, and they would have to continue those responsibilities, and, he trusted, act up to them for the welfare of this country.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the noble Earl opposite (Earl Hardwicke), in pursuance of the Question of which he gave Notice, has made a severe attack, not only upon the general policy of the Government in reference to Egypt, but also upon myself. He has accused me of being wanting in respect to him, of putting on an air of injured innocence, and of declining to receive the advice tendered to us by our Friends, including, of course, himself. Now, my Lords, I am not aware of ever having been wanting in respect to the noble Earl. I can assure him that it was quite unintentional if I have ever been so, and I will try to avoid being so in the future. As to the charge of putting on an air of injured innocence, the accusation is quite new to me, and I am hardly prepared to answer him at the moment. The noble Earl then declares that we are unwilling to take the advice of our friends; but I think that, with regard to taking the advice of friends, it is necessary, first of all, to consider who are our friends and who are not, and also to consider a little the competency of the friends who advise Her Majesty's Government to disregard their own immense responsibilities and to follow the particular advice of the noble Earl, such as he has given us this evening, in preference to using our own independent judgment in the matter. What I think I have a right to complain of is this—that the noble Earl has, on two occasions during the speech he has made, put into my mouth things that I never said at all, the last being the strongest—that British troops have not courage or enterprize to perform great enterprizes. It is not the first time that I have had to complain that speeches have been put into my mouth which I have not made, and I really do think that when quotations of that sort are given, some sort of accuracy should be considered necessary with regard to them. My answer to the Question of the noble Earl is this, that Her Majesty's Government, as at present advised, are not prepared to send out a great military expedition—which the noble Earl thinks so easy—into the heart of the Soudan. My Lords, the noble Earl talked of the unfairness to General Gordon. Your Lordships have in your possession the Instructions which were given to General Gordon in London. Those Instructions were given entirely with his own concurrence, and were even altered in some particulars to meet his views. He entirely agreed in the spirit of those Instructions, and when he got to Cairo further Instructions were given to him, and your Lordships will be able to judge as to what they were, as they have been laid on the Table of this House. Those Instructions expressed the deliberate opinion of Sir Evelyn Baring, Nubar Pasha, and General Gordon himself, and neither in the Instructions given in London or in Cairo was there the slightest question or indication that General Gordon was to be backed up by a British Army in the mission which he felt great confidence he would be able to accomplish. The noble Earl talks as if the greatest responsibility lay upon us for the safety of General Gordon. I admit that we undertook a great responsibility when we sent out General Gordon. We should have done so with regard to no other man; but if ever there was a man in whom we felt we were justified in placing great confidence on such a mission, it was General Gordon. The noble Earl is in great fear as to General Gordon's life. I own I was in considerable fear for General Gordon's life during the first few days of his expedition to the Soudan; but I declare that I have, at this moment, very much less fear for his personal safety than I had at that time. The noble Earl said that we sent General Gordon out with a wide discretion, but that we have interfered with him in everything that he has done. That is perfectly new to me. One of the recommendations of the noble Earl is that we should send a large force to Khartoum, and one of his complaints is, as I understand, that in one thing—which we did with great reluctance—we interfered with General Gordon's discretion. We thought, for a great many reasons which I will not trouble your Lordships with, though I should be ready to enter into them if anyone chose to take up this particular point, that we could not agree with him that it would be advisable to send Zebehr Pasha to perform the duties of Governor in the Soudan. In other respects I am not in the least aware that we neglected General Gordon's proposals. The noble Earl complains that we have not attended to everything that was said in Mr. Power's telegrams to The Times. It is, however, perfectly impossible for a Government to act on irresponsible language of that sort, influenced, as it may be, in a great many natural ways; and we have not received from General Gordon any demand that troops should be sent to Khartoum, and what communications we have received from General Gordon are reassuring as to his position in that place.

LORD NAPIER or MAGDALA rose, pursuant to Notice, to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether, under the possible contingency of the Government finding it necessary to make an effort to relieve General Gordon, the Military Departments have been requested to consider by what means such relief could possibly be effected either from Suakin or from Cairo? The noble and gallant Lord said, he would only ask the latter part of the Question, because he believed it would be satisfactory to the country, to the Army, and to the brother officers of General Gordon, to know whether the Government had considered or would be prepared with a plan for the relief of Khartoum if they should arrive at the conviction that such an expedition should be sent out. The Government had declared that at present in their belief such an expedition was not necessary; but the time might come when the opinion of the Government might change, and when General Gordon's position might not be so secure as it appeared to be at present; and, therefore, it would be a dreadful thing if General Gordon should escape—if it were possible to imagine that such a noble nature would attempt to escape—and leave behind him those who might suffer all the evils of an unfortunate war. It was possible the time would come when the Government might consider it necessary to relieve Khartoum; and if such relief was to be carried out, it would certainly be carried out from either Cairo or Suakin, and it would be done with more effect if every step had been previously prepared by the Scientific Departments under the Government, whose resources were inexhaustible. Khartoum was about 445 miles from Suakin, and about 1,200 miles from Cairo. Of the distance between Khartoum and Suakin there were 200 miles of route by the Nile, and of the remaining 245 miles, 100 miles consisted of desert which might be divided into, and traversed in, two stages of 50 miles each. Then there came 145 miles of level country between the desert and the Red Sea. There would be no difficulty at any season of the year in making a practicable route across those 145 miles; and then there would be those 100 miles of desert to be crossed. Along the 145 miles, at every stage there was some water to be got, good or indifferent; and, no doubt, it would be in the power of the force occupying those halting-places to get more water, and to sink more wells in the neighbourhood of the springs. No doubt, the climate of Suakin was very severe indeed; but it was not unhealthy, and he believed that the country could be crossed by British troops, properly equipped, at any time of the year. His noble and gallant Friend (Lord Strathnairn), and many other Generals before him, had marched and fought in the hottest of weather in India, and there was no doubt the same could be done again by our troops. The crossing of the 100 miles of desert certainly would be difficult; but water might be transported, and with the resources the Government had at their command even a light railway might be easily laid down to carry up supplies of water. Cavalry might cross 50 miles in a march—that distance had been done over and over again by the Scinde Horse and other regiments in India; and then there was the route from Cairo by the Nile, in which there would be a great advantage, as steam power could be employed to a great extent in transport, though, no doubt, there were cataracts to be encountered. He did not know which route Her Majesty's Scientific Departments might prefer. He himself much preferred that by Suakin as being the easiest. Whichever route was likely to be adopted, he was confident that the country and the Army generally would be satisfied to know that Her Majesty's Government had directed their Scientific Departments to be prepared with a scheme for the relief of Khartoum should it become necessary. The public newspapers had frequently suggested the use of Indian troops for that duty. He should feel extremely sorry, as an Englishman, if there should be an idea that Englishmen could not fight their own battles and do their own work at any season, in any climate, or in any part of the world. It might be well that some Indian regiments should have the honour of working side by side with Her Majesty's British Forces; but the work might be done by English troops. That was the object of his Question, and he therefore hoped that the Government would satisfy the country that the scheme he had referred to should be prepared if it should be necessary.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, in answer to the Question of the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Napier), I understood that he did not think it necessary, in consequence of what has passed between me and the noble Earl (the Earl of Hardwicke), to put the first part of his inquiry. With regard to the second part of the Question, as to whether "The Military Departments have been requested to consider by what means such relief could possibly be effected either from Suakin or from Cairo,"

I have only this to say, that I am quite sure that the noble and gallant Lord will easily understand that, during the last month, there is hardly any question connected with the Soudan upon which the Secretary of State for War has not constantly communicated with the military authorities at his disposal. It is not for me to speak of any confidential communication that may have passed between the Secretary of State and the military authorities. Of course, the noble and gallant Lord himself speaks with authority on a question of this sort, and he has declared that it is not an impossibility for a British Army to go from Suakin to Khartoum. I own that, to civilian ears and to one knowing nothing about military matters, the prospect held out as to a British Army does not appear to be particularly encouraging; but I entirely admit the great weight that attaches to any opinion of that kind emanating from the noble and gallant Lord. At the same time, I cannot help reminding him that very often these expeditions to such countries turn out to be very much more difficult than even experienced military men expected them to be. With respect to the campaign which the noble and gallant Lord himself executed so admirably and with such great good fortune, and which added so immensely to his military reputation—putting entirely aside the question of money and considering merely the difficulty of the expedition—the very fact that the cost of that expedition, which was to have been £2,000,000, was more than quadrupled in amount, showed how very hard it is accurately to estimate the cost of enterprises of this character in tropical countries, and, of anticipating the labour to be undergone in carrying them out.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I gather from the observations of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) the discouraging intimation that Her Majesty's Government have, as yet, formed no plan for the relief of General Gordon in his present terrible position. While not being able to add to it, they cast some doubt on the information that has been received from the only other Englishman at Khartoum besides General Gordon and Colonel Stewart—the only Englishman at that place whose mouth is open. That only other Englishman says that General Gordon is expecting the assistance of British troops. There is a strange mystery hanging over these communications from General

Gordon. We have had perpetual intimations from external sources of the things which he has done, the things which he has said, and the wishes which he is said to entertain; but Her Majesty's Government, since he left Cairo—if my memory does not deceive me—have not laid on the Table a single communication from General Gordon. An absolute mystery hangs over all his communications. They are communications which must have been frequent, and which would, no doubt, be highly satisfactory to the British mind; but not one of them do the Government venture to give us. Is it surprising that, in this strange and inexplicable silence, the British public should hang on the lips of the only other Englishman in Khartoum who is free to speak? I confess to having heard with much regret that Her Majesty's Government are putting off to the critical moment the formation of some plan for the relief of General Gordon. The vice of all the policy of Her Majesty's Government during these many months has been that resolutions of an intensely critical character have been always put off till the moment for carrying them out has passed. It seems to be a matter of great exertion—a matter of positive physical pain—for the Government to come to any resolution, and they only do it at the moment when the danger is actually imminent. The abandonment of the Soudan, if their decision had been formed when Lord Dufferin raised a discussion on the subject, was a decision of which you might have questioned the policy, but which could have been conducted with perfect safety and without dishonour to the British arms. If orders had been given to withdraw the garrisons from the Soudan before the resolution was announced that they were to be abandoned—if, in short, the resolution to abandon the Soudan had been communicated to the British authorities in Egypt early last summer, there would have been none of the difficulties, none of the threatened disasters which hangs over us now. General Gordon was sent to his present position in Khartoum because Her Majesty's Government had put off the decision to abandon the Soudan until it was too late to withdraw or to relieve the garrisons. He was sent there in the almost hopeless design of persuading the Mahdi, by some methods of unknown persuasion, to release the prey already within his grasp. Again, if an expedition had been sent to Suakin in time to relieve Tokar and Sinkat, no doubt a very great, perhaps a capital, impression would have been produced on the minds of the Arabs of the Desert. Still more, if that expedition had been sent in time to perform that journey between Suakin and Berber before the sun had become intolerably hot, there would have been no question now about the safety of General Gordon. But the same indisposition, the same mortal aversion to come to a resolution, hung around Her Majesty's Government in this case also. They knew the critical, the utterly hopeless, character of the condition of things in the Soudan early in December; and it was not until Parliament met, and they were threatened with the censure of an adverse majority, that they could make up their minds to send an expedition to Suakin. It is needless to say that a resolution taken in these circumstances was too late to do any practical good. It came in time to see our gallant friends at Sinkat massacred, to see our allies at Tokar give themselves up, and, after having seen massacred in a gallant but useless fight 6,000 of those unhappy Arabs, to retire without having accomplished a single object for which the expedition was sent out. Are these circumstances encouraging to us when we are asked to trust that, on the inspiration of the moment, when the danger comes Her Majesty's Government will find some means of relieving General Gordon? I fear that the history of the past will be repeated in the future; that, just again, when it is too late, the critical resolution will be taken; some terrible news will come that the position of General Gordon is absolutely a forelorn and helpless one; and then, under the pressure of public wrath and Parliamentary Censure, some desperate resolution of sending an expedition will be formed too late to achieve the object which it is desired to gain, too late to rescue this devoted man whom we have sent forward to his fate, in time only to cast another slur upon the statesmanship of England and the resolution of the statesmen who guide England's councils. My Lords, I deeply regret that we separate for the Easter Recess with so feeble an account of the resolution of Her Majesty's Government. When I saw that the only answer which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had to give to the Leader of the Opposition in "another place" was a reckless and stormy invective, I knew how much barrenness — [Laughter] — how much value to attach to it, and saw how proud the hollow device by which the poverty of your counsels is concealed. The truth is too patent for the Government to conceal. Hopeless divisions paralyze their decisions; British lives are sacrificed to their irresolution, and they trust to bluster to conceal their folly.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY; My Lords, I am really inclined to pardon the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) for having departed from our usual practice, and for his having referred to a speech delivered by the Prime Minister last night. That speech has evidently mortally stung the noble Marquess. The noble Marquess has, at length, for the first time, given us a statement to-night which I have heard with very great interest. In it there was some indication of the policy which he would have pursued; and I gathered this—that the expedition of General Graham should have been ordered at the time to proceed to Berber—that is to say, that a large English Force of 4,000 or 5,000 men should have been sent across the desert from Suakin to Berber. I may say, and I am glad to avow it, that I would not have been prepared, as a Member of Her Majesty's Government, to take such a responsibility as that. It is not for me to say a word as to what the noble and gallant Lord on the Cross Benches (Lord Napier) has stated with regard to the possibilities of such an expedition. No doubt, just as it is possible for engineers to execute certain work, if sufficient means be given to them, so I also have as much confidence as anyone in British troops, that any service they have to perform will be performed. At the same time, however, I think, if the difficulty of sending a force under a burning sun 100 miles across the desert is considered, it will be seen that it is our duty to consider whether the plan which has been suggested to the Government is one which the Government will assume the responsibility of undertaking. I think you ought to consider the responsibility at this time of the year, or even at an earlier season of the year, of sending a force to Berber across the desert, where there is no water; and notwithstanding that Her Majesty's Government have been long anxious to do what can be done, they would have hesitated before taking that step, and without a greater necessity than anything I have seen they would not have sent Graham's Expedition across from Suakin to Berber. All I have to say is, that, in concert with the military authorities, we have been long anxiously considering what can be done. My Lords, the noble Marquess assumed that the Government had formed no plan. What an easy assumption that is, when the noble Marquess knows that it is impossible for Her Majesty's Government to make any declaration as to the plans of military assistance in aid of General Gordon. What could be more impolitic or imprudent than that, in a question of great difficulty and great responsibility, we should, in answer to some Questions put in Parliament, disclose some of the means we are to adopt? It is absolutely impossible that the Government of this country can be conducted on such principles. I can well understand that the noble Marquess should not have any confidence in the Government; but he might have credited us with common sense, and allowed that Her Majesty's Government must conduct their policy in regard to the possibilities of the case. If the Government were to answer Questions of this character in the manner desired, the policy would be disclosed the next morning; then there would be further Questions by the Opposition, and such a course would lead to the total defeat and overthrow of the policy which had been adopted by the Government. My Lords, the noble Marquess complains that we have given no information. Is there anything which is more inconvenient or unsatisfactory than that piecemeal information should be given? The noble Marquess said that not one scrap of information has been given as to General Gordon's communications. Now, my Lords, if we are prematurely to lay on the Table of the House—what it appears is wanted—week by week the telegrams from General Gordon, it is perfectly obvious that all possible chance of the success of General Gordon's Mission must be totally at an end. These communications are necessarily confidential, and it is right and proper that in due time Parliament shall receive full information of what has been done; but no Government can give information week by week as to what has been done and what is going on. It must throw itself on the confidence of its supporters and others. You may change the Government for other men. That may be a right thing to do; but it is absolutely necessary, for the carrying on of the Government of this country, that some reticence with regard to communications which are confidential and important should be maintained. The other point of the policy of the noble Marquess is that there must be a great British Expedition sent to Khartoum. ["No, no!"] Well, the noble Marquess said, Why not state the plan for the relief of General Gordon in Khartoum? At all events, an expedition could not be sent to Khartoum without a considerable effort. The Soudan is a large country, and it is inhabited by warlike people; and whenever it is necessary for the Government to interfere by force in the interior of the Soudan, I trust that, whoever is responsible, it will not be done without due preparation and adequate force. But my noble Friend has told your Lordships that we are not at present under any apprehension in regard to the safety of General Gordon. Everybody must be aware that the position of General Gordon in one sense must be critical at Khartoum; it has always been critical, it could not be otherwise, and the gallant General himself is perfectly aware of the fact. But what we do say is, that nothing which has happened in any way indicates that he is in the least danger. Judging from the more recent intelligence we have received from him, he does not feel any immediate apprehension as to his position. It is certain that his position is not so grave as it has been represented elsewhere; and I repeat here, that the influence and power of the Mahdi does not appear to have had that effect in the Soudan which might have been expected. He has not at present shown any symptoms of following up his success by attacking Khartoum, although General Gordon has not been able to control and quell the local insurrection by which he is surrounded. The garrisons at Sennaar and Kassala still hold out, and General Gordon is in a position of great strength at Khartoum. There is, therefore, no indication of any danger at present overwhelming him. The noble Marquess has followed others in his reiterations as to the total failure of our policy, and that the operations we have taken have had no effect. Does the noble Marquess really believe that the position of the garrison at the present moment at Suakin is the same as it was before? It may or may not have been worth the effort which has been made; but, at all events, the object has been accomplished. If we are to maintain the possession of the Red Sea ports, that expedition has been fully justified by the success of our operations. I should be personally glad if the time had arrived when we could disclose to the House, in its entirety, all that has passed between the Government and General Gordon, and lay before Parliament a full statement of his position; but, consistently with our regard for the Public Service, that cannot be done, and we can say no more than we have said. We only ask for fair and reasonable support in the measures we have considered necessary.

VISCOUNT BURY said, that the allusion which was made by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) to the speech by the Premier in "another place" was received by noble Lords on the Ministerial side of the House with derisive and triumphant laughter. It was obvious that they rejoiced in the tone of the Premier's speech, and the noble Earl the Secretary of State for India (the Earl of Kimberley) had stated that the speech of the Prime Minister had mortally stung his (Viscount Bury's) noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury). It had stung not only the noble Marquess, but the people of this country also, who were watching this matter with an intense interest. It had indeed stung them with a feeling of humiliation that such a speech should have been delivered in "another place" by the Prime Minister of this country, who had told them that under no circumstances would relief be sent to General Gordon, and—

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, I rise to Order. I have always understood that it is one of the first of the Rules and Orders of both Houses of Parliament that they do not take notice of speeches delivered in the other House; at all events at the time, although, of course, historically we speak of speeches delivered in each House of Parliament. But, in the middle of discussions on public subjects which create great heat and great excitement, I do think it most inexpedient that we should break through the recognized understanding of Parliament, that we should not answer in one House speeches which have been made in another. I must confess that the noble Viscount whom I venture to interrupt, is so far excused, if not justified, by the fact that allusions were made by those who preceded him. On that ground alone I have to apologize for rising to interrupt him. But these allusions were in general terms—slight and passing allusions—and the noble Viscount proceeds to speak in detail of what has taken place in the other House. Much as many of us are excited by what is going on, we are perfectly willing to speak on what we know in this House, and demand from the Government what explanations we like to ask; but I hope we shall avoid discussing speeches in the other House.

LORD DENMAN said, it had been repeatedly ruled that a statement by any Minister of the Crown, even in the House of Commons, might be alluded to in their Lordships' House.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he must be allowed to thank the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) for his courteous reminder. After it, he would not say another word about what had passed in "another place." He (Viscount Bury) must confess he had been somewhat moved at the way in which this matter was treated by the noble Earl who had just sat down (the Earl of Kimberley); but, leaving out of account what had been said by the Prime Minister, they had heard in that House that no relief was to be sent to General Gordon under any circumstances now contemplated. The complaint they made all along had been that no preparations were made for the very probable contingency of his defeat and disaster. The policy of abandoning Khartoum—if that policy now existed—was not thought of until after the death and defeat of General Hicks. No one heard of the suggested abandonment of Khartoum until the end of November. Lord Dufferin, in his celebrated despatch of 1882, did not, as was now stated, advocate the abandonment of the Soudan. He suggested that the English Government should advise the Egyptian Government to retire from all the country south of Sennaar; but now the retirement was to be made from Assouan, which was a difference of 1,000 miles along the river and 600 in a direct line. The policy of Lord Dufferin was not abandonment in the sense now meant. No doubt, that idea was taken up by the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville), who, in a subsequent despatch, said that Khartoum ought to be abandoned. But that decision was by no means final. Cherif Pasha objected, and urged his views so strongly that the noble Earl next authorized Sir Evelyn Baring to say that England surrendered to the Porte the right of defending the Red Sea littoral. A month later that decision was again abandoned, and a British Force was sent to take possession of the Red Sea littoral. But this was after a Vote of Censure had been carried in the House of Lords and after Sinkat had fallen, and when the Government were afraid that Tokar would fall also. Tokar did fall; and they now found that the Government were not going to open the road to Berber; and, that being so, they naturally asked what was the object of the subsequent slaughter of the Arabs, if it was not for that object? He did not think that the noble Earl was justified in saying that the result of the expedition to Suakin had been a complete success, because it had no success at all beyond the indiscriminate slaughter of a large number of Natives, whom we could hardly call rebels against our authority, for they had never been under our authority at all. The question now being discussed out-of-doors was this—what did the Government intend to do with regard to General Gordon? This question the Government had not fairly met. The real point was this—that whereas the Government induced General Gordon to go out, upon the assurance that he would be supported, and that the Government would do what he wanted, the Government had not done what he wanted. They had refused to sanction the appointment of Zebehr which General Gordon recommended. It was also now known that General Gordon had applied for British troops and had not got them. General Gordon had been badly treated and betrayed by the Government. He thought that if at that moment, before they left for a considerable interval of holiday, something could be said in the House which would tell the country what they really had to expect, and what the English Government were trying to do, what object they had in view, and what had been the meaning of their policy in the past, the conversation which had arisen there would not be without result.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, the noble Earl the Secretary of State for India (the Earl of Kimberley) had hardly stated the Question of his noble and gallant Friend (Lord Napier) correctly. What his noble and gallant Friend wished to know was, whether, in the event of its being found necessary to send an expedition to Berber, it would be advisable to do so from Cario or from Suakin? He regretted exceedingly not to have heard from the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville) that the Government had given consideration to the points raised in the Question of his noble and gallant Friend. But not only had they not done that, but they seemed not to have considered the question of what should be done in case it became necessary to send troops to the relief of General Gordon. He (the Earl of Dunraven) had no idea what policy the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition would have pursued had he been in Office; but he did not understand that the construction put upon his remarks by the noble Earl was entirely in accordance with their strict meaning. He did not understand the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) to say that it was advisable to send a large force to Berber. What he understood him to say was that, in almost every incident that had taken place in Egypt, Her Majesty's Government had acted too late; that they were too late on the present occasion; and that, if General Graham had been sent to Suakin sooner, he would have been in a position to send troops from Suakin to Berber, without having to encounter the difficulty occasioned by the great heat. The noble Earl had compared the difficulties of the march to Berber with those of the march to Magdala some years ago. But the distance of the march to Magdala was about 400 miles, and over an unknown road; while the distance from Suakin to Berber was only 240 miles. Further than that, the road was perfectly well known—a caravan road; and he believed the largest stretch without water was 50 miles. The force necessary for the Abyssinian Expedition was very large, and entirely different to that which it would be required to send to Berber. At present, in the absence of any information from the Government, the only information they had to rely upon was that to be found in the newspapers. It was now nearly a month since they had read in The Times a telegram, in which General Gordon was stated to have said that he thought it necessary that the road to Berber should be opened by sending a couple of squadrons of Cavalry, and that, after that was done, he would be able to withdraw the Egyptian officials from Khartoum. He believed General Gordon was sent for that very object—namely, to evacuate the country and relieve the Egyptian officials. The substantial accuracy of that telegram had never been contradicted, and the country in general believed that General Gordon did think it necessary that the road to Berber should be opened to enable him to carry out the operations he was intrusted to carry out. There had also been a telegram to the effect that the officer in command of Berber had asked for troops. What was the object of the expedition to Suakin? It was too late to relieve Sinkat or Tokar, and it was surely inconceivable that its object was merely to protect Suakin. It was impossible not to believe that its object was to open the road to Berber. If it was not, and there had been no intention of opening the road between Suakin and Berber, he was at a loss to understand what the real object of the expedition to Suakin had been. If that was the object of the expedition, it had failed; if that was not the object of the expedition, then he did not believe that the Government were justified in their acts of hostility against the Arabs, and the slaughter of 5,000 or 6,000 Arabs had produced absolutely no good result, for it was stated in the papers that Osman Digna was at Tamaniab, and that our troops were being withdrawn from Suakin. He did not, therefore, believe that Her Majesty's Government were justified in killing those Arabs; for the only justification for war, under any circumstances, was that it would bring about some distinct and good result;

but, to say the least of it, Her Majesty's Government had been singularly unfortunate in all their operations both in Egypt and the Soudan. The only effect of the operations from Suakin was that Khartoum was now more closely invested than before, and that General Gordon had been repulsed. In fact, things in Egypt and the Soudan were going from bad to worse, and they heard that the condition of things in the Delta itself was getting worse and worse. In every respect Her Majesty's Government had failed in taking sufficient forethought and in making sufficient provision for the eventualities which a very little foresight would have enabled them to discern. It was most lamentable that they should be allowed to adjourn for the Easter Recess without having any idea that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to relieve General Gordon if necessary. General Gordon started sanguine and full of hope, and without the slightest idea that British troops would be necessary. But he was to be allowed to act with a free hand, and yet in one most important particular he had been overruled—he had not been allowed to place in power that one man he thought he ought to. He had been in the Soudan about two months, and the only result had been that a certain number of women and children—200—had been sent down from Khartoum to Berber. The only way by which General Gordon could get away from Khartoum would be by the aid of a sufficiently strong British Force; and it was also well known that the only way he could relieve the garrisons in the Southern Provinces was by being backed up with sufficient authority and power; and if he had been allowed to act as he thought fit himself, he might possibly have been successful. As he had not been allowed to do so, a grave responsibility rested upon Her Majesty's Government, if anything should happen to him. He, therefore, thought the Government ought to inform the House and the country what they intended to do to relieve General Gordon, and also give more general information as to Egypt.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that he could not allow the speech which had just fallen from his noble Friend (the Earl of Dunraven) to pass without expressing his total dissent from a great portion of it. He had always considered his noble Friend in that House as a perfect representative and the incarnation of common sense, and totally independent of and opposed to what was called sentimentalism. The noble Earl had swept aside a great many sentimentalities or sentiments, to some of which many of their Lordships clung; and he (the Duke of Argyll) had to oppose the noble Earl on more occasions than one, owing to what he might call the extreme literalness of his ideas. But, on that occasion, he had indulged in sentiments of the purest sentimental kind. He had talked about the slaughter of 6,000 Arabs as being a great crime on the part of the British Government, and as having produced no effect whatever. He (the Duke of Argyll) looked upon that as not only sentiment, but he ventured to say it was maudlin, morbid sentimentality. ["Oh, oh!"] He contended that the British Government had had legitimate cause of quarrel with these Arabs surrounding and threatening Suakin. They had threatened to take it, and had openly proclaimed their hostility, and that they would drive the British garrison into the sea. He said it deliberately, that no English Government could tolerate those threats; if they did, and had not attacked these Arabs, they would have forfeited the confidence of Parliament and the country. He denied the inference of his noble Friend that the slaughter of these Arabs had produced no effect. He felt bound to say it was not only something, it was not only a great thing, but it might be everything that these fanatical Arabs should be taught that a civilized country is the master of them in the field. He believed that the effect of the two great victories that had been gained by our troops between Suakin and the mountains had reverberated through the whole of the Eastern Soudan, and in whatever operations Her Majesty's Government might find it necessary afterwards to embark, the effect of these two actions would not be lost. The blood of those Arabs had not been spilt in vain. He now wished to turn for a moment to the question which was before their Lordships, and that was how far these interpellations in Parliament on the conduct of the Government had or had not been legitimate. He must confess that he thought the Government had no right to complain that the public had been anxious — deeply anxious — upon this question. The interpellations might have been too frequent, and he thought they had been too detailed, because no Government could explain to Parliament, beforehand, the detailed policy which they might have in their view in regard to military and naval operations. But let the Government not mistake, and he hoped his noble Friends did not mistake—it was not mere agitation on the part of Egyptian bondholders; it was no mere agitation upon the part of the Press; but it was a deep feeling of interest among all parties in the country. As a matter of fact, contrary to their own will, and owing to circumstances over which certainly they had not had control, they had been placed in a position of paramount responsibility with regard to Egypt. He believed the country would be satisfied with any fair expression on the part of the Government, and he believed that some of the expressions used in some of the statements made by Members of the Government in “another place,” to which he would not further refer, had, to a considerable extent, eased the public mind in this important particular—that the Government did recognize their responsibility in this matter. But in regard to the detailed criticism of the Government, and whether or not they were to relieve Khartoum, and whether they were to consider the possibility of sending an expedition from Suakin to Berber, or from Cairo by the Nile—he thought that on these matters, having pressed on the Government their strong opinion of the responsibility in which they were placed, it was useless and highly mischievous to go into these details and to put such questions. In regard to policy, let them remember this—that in the case of great conquerors, like Napoleon, they had a definite policy before them in their conquests. They knew perfectly well what they were at. They picked quarrels with a country which they meant to conquer, and then they conquered and annexed it. In those cases there was a policy. But that was not the position of any English Government. They had no conquests which they were determined to make beforehand. If conquests came to them, they were forced upon them by circumstances. Therefore, he could quite understand that the Government, in that sense, had no policy. It had not been their policy to conquer or annex Egypt. It was step by step, from circumstances which arose long before their accession to power, that they had been led into the difficulty and taken to Egypt, and all their Lordships should desire to know was that they had recognized the position in which those circumstances had placed them. But he must say this, that his own feeling strongly was that the Government were in a position in which they were, to a great extent, responsible for the escape of the garrison of Khartoum. They might be right in saying that it was absurd for a Power in the position of Egypt to hold Khartoum; and he must say that, after the experience we had had of what Egyptian troops were, headed only by Egyptian officers, he found it difficult to understand how they contrived to conquer Khartoum at all. He supposed it was by the assistance of the Turkish troops. But as to their permanent power, these events had shown, as regards Egypt itself, that it was a Power incompetent to rule the whole of the Soudan. Then the question arose, was England to reconquer and hold Khartoum and the Soudan? That was a matter on which he expressed no opinion. The Government had said that it was not a necessary appendage of Egypt; and having given that opinion, having dictated the Government policy of Egypt, we were bound, in honour, to see that those populations—such as the population of Khartoum—should, if possible, be taken out without being massacred. He believed that to be the feeling and the opinion of the country. Having said so much, he did think that further questions to the Government on mere matters of detail could do no good, and would lead only to embarrassment.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH said, he hoped the Government would not forget their great responsibility in respect to General Gordon, who had gone to Khartoum at the request of the Government, having given up a lucrative appointment for the purpose of going there—although no man could be more uninfluenced than that high-minded officer by pecuniary considerations. He (Lord Ellenborough) did not regret that the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll) had risen to Order, although, had he (Lord Ellenborough) been interrupted, as the noble Viscount (Viscount Bury) was, he would have pointed out that frequent reference had been made lately to individual Members of this House by two right hon. Gentlemen lately in the present Cabinet; as also reference to a Bill that might come up to this House, in respect to the course that would be pursued by that House, and more particularly in reference to one particular Member of this House, by a Member of the present Cabinet.

LORD DENMAN said, that the knowledge that this Government had often advocated retreat, as in the case of Cabul and Candahar, and lately as to Egypt, had added much to General Gordon's danger. The Mahdi had sent a Dervish's robe to General Gordon—he thought that the example of Akhbar the Great might be followed by an undoubted Power—and a discussion invited for all professing religion; and he confessed that if any could produce a better principle than “Do unto all men as you would they should do unto you,” he might be a convert to that creed. He was sure that Christians, as a defensive body, were invincible; and if there was another slaughter like that of Sin-kat, the whole of Christendom would be roused to indignation.

REUNION OF AUSTRIA, GERMANY, AND RUSSIA.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL, in rising, according to Notice, to call attention to the effect produced by the visit of the First Minister to Copenhagen; and to move for diplomatic correspondence on the alleged reunion of Austria, Germany, and Russia, said: My Lords, as a noble Earl and a noble Baron have already drawn the attention of the House to foreign policy, I may be allowed, perhaps, to bring forward a Notice in the same sphere, although I would not do so at this hour, unless your Lordships were on the verge of separation for a period, while there is no further Business coming on this evening. The Notice does not refer merely to the visit of the First Minister to Copenhagen, or the impression it produced, but also to an occurrence of considerable magnitude in Europe which seems to have a place among its consequences. It demands further information on the alleged reunion of Austria, Germany, and Russia. Unless the inspired Press of Berlin and St. Petersburg, together with a Royal Speech at one, mislead the world—there is no reason they should do so—that reunion has been formed, although it may not have reached the shape of any new convention. Before it gains maturity of that kind is the fittest season to consider it. It cannot be forgotten that the system only closed in 1879, by the remarkable decision of Prince Bismarck at Vienna. Well might the Foreign Office have exulted at that moment. But the revival of the system was inevitable, unless Germany and Austria were assiduously encouraged in their new direction by Great Britain. It always tends to reappear, because it is supported by a Treaty still on record; because habit, which, according to the late Duke of Wellington, is far more powerful than nature, governs States as well as individuals; and because the skilful, subtle, nearly irresistible diplomacy of Russia often toils to re-establish it. But Germany and Austria have been assiduously discouraged in the path they had resolved on; first, by the startling appointment of Mr. Gladstone as First Minister, when he had ceased for years to be the Leader of a Party; then, by the course which policy has taken under his dictation; and, last of all, by his appearance at Copenhagen, which, although it must engage the faithful advocacy of the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville), has not on that account been less a disturbing influence in Europe.

My Lords, the noble Earl is bound by every expedient to defend it. If he is well aware that, after the impression which has followed it, it cannot be seriously vindicated, he is bound by a well-acted levity to gloss it over. Unless I am mistaken, it is laid down in the very book of rhetoric or logic to which the noble Earl referred on one occasion, by the celebrated Hamilton, that you are always to oppose the grave by the ridiculous. The noble Earl is under a stringent obligation to uphold his Colleague, and to follow his Preceptor. Notwithstanding that, on the 1st of March, he admitted everything which I was anxious to elicit. He admitted that the First Minister had met the Emperor of Russia;

he admitted that there were no instructions of any kind whatever from the Foreign Office. If the First Minister had never met the Emperor of Russia, the subject would have dropped; if he had received instructions from the Foreign Office, his case would have been sheltered. To say that a First Minister can never act in our day as a negotiator would be extravagant, when it is only a few years since, in that character, Lord Beaconsfield obtained his strongest title to the admiration of posterity. A First Minister may act as a negotiator; but is not at liberty, when without a mission of any kind, to diffuse a false impression as to the alliances and objects of the country. This is the precise charge to which the First Minister is open, and this charge the noble Earl entirely misconceived in his laudable impatience to defend the Foreign Office. Unintentionally, if you like, thoughtlessly it may be, without the least design, one readily admits it, the First Minister gave further currency to the already prevalent opinion that Russia and Great Britain aimed at partnership in Europe. That this effect has been produced I shall be able to establish. It needs some references; but as, on principle, I hardly ever read an extract to the House, when it is essential to maintain a proposition, perhaps they may forgive it.

The New Free Press of Vienna spoke of the trip as "a demonstration of political importance." According to the Correspondent of The Times in Vienna, the journals of that capital designated the interview of Mr. Gladstone with the Czar "as a move against the policy of Prince Bismarck, and as a confederacy of England with Russia and France." I will add no more as to Vienna. The House will recollect to what extent the irregular return of Mr. Gladstone as First Minister was seen in public correspondence of 1880 to estrange the Austrian Empire. They will ask themselves, was it desirable still further to embitter it? If anyone has had occasion to be recently in Austria, he must know that there—wisely or unwisely—antagonism to Russia was never more decided than during the last autumn, and that the proceedings at Copenhagen could not but have been obnoxious both at Vienna and at Buda-Pesth. Let us see the kind of influence the step created over Russia.

Lord Stratheden and Campbell

According to The Journal de St. Petersburg—

"The Congress of Princes and statesmen assembled round King Christian, to which the First Minister attached himself, represented hundreds of millions of people, and might sooner or later revenge Denmark upon Germany."

The Journal de St. Petersburg is an official paper. It considers the assemblage as a Congress, and the First Minister as having joined it. The Nord, well known as a Russian organ in the West of Europe, contended—

"That even if the voyage of Mr. Gladstone was undertaken without any political design, the visit of the Emperor of Russia to a statesman who plays so considerable a part in the government of England cannot be a matter of indifference."

The noble Earl the Secretary of State is probably the only person to whom it ever did appear one. The Norvège Fennys said that—

"Coming as it did after the recent journeys and interviews of Monarchs, the visit of Mr. Gladstone to Denmark pointed to a possible alliance of England and Russia."

Can it be doubted that all over Russia such an alliance was considered as proclaimed with greater emphasis than hitherto it had been?

As to Constantinople, the Correspondent of The Times informed us that—

"The interview of Mr. Gladstone with the Czar had created a marked impression, and was regarded as a most significant proceeding."

However, I admit that, in Constantinople, the effect was less important, because there, already, the First Minister, on grounds well known to the House, was viewed in such a manner, that no new sentiment of hatred or repugnance could have well arisen.

In Paris, The Temps, by far the most enlightened organ of that capital in everything international, augured from the proceeding

"the growth of an alliance between England, France, and Russia."

I have now only to advert to comments at Berlin, or in the German Empire.

The Kreuz Zeitung observed that—

"The event appears to strengthen the views of those who consider the stay of the Czar at Copenhagen as a counter-demonstration to the meetings of Princes in Berlin and Vienna."

And concludes that—

"Mr. Gladstone probably considers the unfavourable for making a bargain with Russia."

giving her freer action, in order to obtain freer action for himself."

Was it desirable to scatter this impression over Germany? The Post says—

"Mr. Gladstone is the imitator of the most energetic statesman of our times; because, like him, he goes in person where he wishes to apply the lever."

It was not doubted that the lever formed a part of his equipment. The Berlin Tageblatt remarked that—

"The political importance of the Copenhagen visit of the Russophile British Premier seems to have been detected much earlier in Berlin than Vienna."

However that may be, its effect in Berlin was not a rapidly-subsiding one. Having been there in November, I assert, with confidence, that, in political society, it continued to enhance resentment which had long indeed existed. Of course, I cannot give any authority. The noble Earl the Secretary of State may contradict me if he likes it. The House will judge between us. But the safest method of arriving at a correct opinion on the effect produced is to glance at the transaction in the light which subsequent events appear to throw upon it.

The incidents which followed are well known to your Lordships. They consist in the strenuous activity of M. de Giers at Berlin and Vienna; the advance of Russia upon Merv, which has been so ably discussed a few weeks back; and the revival of what is often termed the Holy Alliance, according to the information we possess, according to the estimate which every diplomatist would form of what is probable, when Austria and Germany have reason to believe that the British Government has formed, or rather strengthened and screwed up, a previously-existing resolution to abandon them.

There is no doubt of the effect being bad; but is the First Minister responsible for the bad effect which was created? He is responsible; because, although he may not have known the Emperor of Russia to be at Copenhagen—when all the world could tell him—although he may have been forced to meet the Emperor of Russia on arriving—he was not compelled to make the speech which could not but resound—as I have shown the House it did—in many places. He is responsible; because, through the medium of the noble Earl, the Foreign Office thoroughly repudiate him. The occurrence must be also viewed in connection with the antecedents which belong to it. If, soon after the Crimean War, Lord Palmerston had met the Czar in the same manner, he might have been unblamed, and possibly applauded. Europe would not have been misled by the proceeding. It would have been viewed, not as the concert of allies, but the decorum of opponents. What was the position of the right hon. Gentleman? Out of Office, he had been the flatterer—although, no doubt, the conscientious, the unbought, and the disinterested flatterer—of Russia. He had laboured to identify pro-Russian zeal with Liberal opinion. He had done his utmost to detach the party which he used to lead from their traditionary ground and their traditionary sentiment as to Russia. He had been a powerful incentive of the war in 1877. Bursting into power by a method previously unknown, he had advanced men who did their utmost to bring the Russian armies to Constantinople. He had withdrawn Sir Henry Layard from that capital. He had gratuitously toiled for Montenegro. In every shape he had denounced the Ottoman Empire, and made himself obnoxious to the Sultan. In him, the outward show of deference to Russia was regarded not as a form, but a reality; not as an exception, but a climax. He did, what he was bound over to avoid, by special dictates of propriety and prudence. When columns, which have long been marching and manœuvring in one direction, unite at last, the effect is not the same as when armies recently opposed, during a passing truce, exchange the courtesies of warfare. What is the defence? That it was merely inadvertency, or ignorance, or heedlessness which guided him. The defence sums up the accusation in a more emphatic form than it could otherwise assume.

Your Lordships may observe a rather curious gradation among important personages at this moment. M. de Giers, impelled by thought and swayed by calculation, superior to rest and eager for activity, is moving indefatigably to advance the interests of Russia. He never reaches congresses by accident, and is not blown to harbours it is a duty to avoid. The noble Earl remains at home, which is not culpable on his part, since, not having one ally in his character of Foreign Secretary, as Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports he is bound to guard the coast from every possible invader. The First Minister embarks on voyages—as his friends assure us—without political design or geographical direction, by which every capital is alienated it was most important to conciliate, and every scheme advanced it was most essential to retard and to discourage.

I quit that subject, and wish only to reply, if it is possible, to those who ask, Why should the union of Austria, Prussia, and Russia be sedulously deprecated, when the Sovereigns who guide them are so entirely irreproachable? By looking back we gain the admonition which is needed. Long before the name of the Holy Alliance was invented the union of those Powers was directed against a reformed, reconstituted Poland, which had just deserved the homage of surrounding countries, as Mr. Burke and others thought, by hitting on the path of order and improvement which France, in 1789, was seen to be incapable of finding. For a long period this action was forgotten in the vicissitudes and struggles which had the First Napoleon for their centre. But the same union was found, in 1815, to thwart the most enlightened aspirations in the Congress of Vienna, to oppose the British Representative in all his best designs, to annex Genoa and Norway, without consideration of their wishes; to seal the fate of Poland more profoundly, and on the plea of guarding against the danger which had passed; to leave the world defenceless against the new one which succeeded. Equipped with its well-known title in September, 1815, in the name of the Trinity it struggled many years against the birth of freedom, however moderate and guarded, in Italy, in Spain, and South America. Although reduced by Mr. Canning, and counteracted by Lord Palmerston, it still accumulated in the world the revolutionary spirit which broke out in 1848, and nearly devastated Europe. After a long interval, the war of France and Germany in 1870 seems to have recalled it. In its last phase it brought about the drama, with the surprising turns of which this House was occupied too frequently; the drama which, after a long series of Commercial Treaties, Herzegovinian insurrections, Servian wars, Bulgarian disturbances—all well adapted to the simple—at length revealed its purpose when the Ottoman Assemblies were overthrown at San Stefano.

But, even if the past career of such an union were less sinister than it is, it would be easy to observe the British objects which it tends to frustrate at this moment. However, I will pass them over altogether, as some may deem them unimportant, some even pernicious; and it is difficult to fix a general consent on any line of active policy submitted. But something else ought not to be passed over. It is a reference to the immediate, urgent dangers to be traced to the reunion which presents itself. Let me refer to what was lately heard on Central Asia. Whatever eloquence or wit is brought to bear upon the question of Herat and Merv, whatever adjectives are coined to throw a doubt on their importance, whatever animated conflicts between the shadows of departed Viceroy, meeting in the Elysian fields of Parliament, may grow out of this subject, a few distinct conclusions are inevitable. Herat is the gate of India. Lord Lawrence and Sir Henry Rawlinson, belonging to rival schools, have equally affirmed it. Merv, occupied by Russia, does make Herat much more accessible than formerly. It is a military problem. It has been decided by General Valentine Baker, whose credit is so high, and by Sir Charles M'Gregor, a Quartermaster General in the Indian Service. Herat has now become the nearest stage of Russian progress unrivaled at. Is it not certain that Russia is more likely to approach it when Germany and Austria have ceased to be a counteracting influence than when they are remaining one?

Constantinople is always difficult to shelter. The First Napoleon, it is related by O'Meara in the Voice from St. Helena, deemed it almost impossible for Europe to maintain it against Russia, although he thought the effort both desirable and necessary. When Germany and Austria are won over to the Russian scale, nothing remains except the Western Powers and the Ottoman Empire. If the Western Powers are disunited or disabled, the Ottoman Empire is alone, with Greece on one flank, Russia on the other; while there are three routes to guard—that of the Pruth, that of the Black Sea, and that of Asia Minor. Can it be doubted that the new Alliance adds to the perennial solicitude of which Constantinople is the object?

But now the care of Parliament devotes itself exclusively to Egypt. We have seen to-day the agitation which it causes. I have not joined in the tide of general attack to which the Government have been exposed. It seemed to me that they were fully justified in their resistance to Arabi. I recognize the military lustre which the campaign against him added to our history. The Government may well defend themselves against those who aim at a Protectorate, and still more easily against those who urge a premature removal of the garrison. But still the situation is a fearful one. General Gordon has apparently been sent for no end except to register the triumphs of the Mahdi. His action is inappreciable; his fate is constantly precarious; his schemes are not adopted by the Government. Admitting that they have well secured the littoral of the Red Sea, the Government have no decided hold on Alexandria and Cairo. The Sultan does not join or approve the occupation. France looks on it with jealousy. It is not based upon a mandate. If the new Alliance, backed by the Ottoman Empire, or speaking in its name, of which they know how to avail themselves, dictated our withdrawal, in what manner would the Government be ready to encounter the dictation? It would be quite in accord with the principle which Russia formerly avowed—that whatever Great Britain gained upon the Nile, she was to have as much upon the Bosphorus.

But there is something yet more serious to be remembered by your Lordships. The right hon. Gentleman the First Minister and the noble Earl the Secretary of State are so placed that they can hardly grapple with the new alliance by either of the methods which in former times have been resorted to against it. Mr. Canning, in the period between 1822 and 1827, was able to divide it. The memorials his Private Secretary has collected throw a searching light upon his policy. No doubt, arguments might be employed for detaching Germany from Russia. Before now they have been methodized or given. Unless such considerations could be urged, or could suggest themselves, the event of 1879 would never have arisen. Such reasons may be found; but it is not open to the Government to use them. They are not able to warn Germany against a concert of which they have themselves been guilty in a measure so extravagant. Rebuke, recrimination without limit, might, although we cannot say it would, be heaped upon them. The name of Mr. Gladstone might, although we cannot say it would, be conjured to repel, and that of Copenhagen to overwhelm them with confusion. The other method of resisting the three Powers was the method of Lord Palmerston. His Correspondence thoroughly elucidates it. We know, from his own words, that he framed his Quadruple Alliance of France, Great Britain, Spain, and Portugal, not only to compose the wars which raged in the Iberian Peninsula, but also to balance, in some degree, the united force of Austria, Prussia, and Russia. How can the Government aspire to an equivalent of such a Quadruple Alliance when France is hopelessly estranged, or would exact the condominium in Egypt they have just removed, as the least and first condition of her friendship?

My Lords, the conclusion is—and it would be idle to detain the House without adverting to it—that foreign policy requires, both in the First Minister and the Secretary of State, a different agency from that which governs it at present. The agency which, in 1870 and the years which followed, was inadequate to avert a dangerous war, to resist an arrogant pretension, to close a standing controversy with advantage, has now become still more inadequate to neutralize the special difficulty which its weakness has created. It is not by such an agency that you can bring before the world, even reduced and shaded into diplomatic phrase, the language which it calls for.

To resume the circumstances I have urged upon your Lordships. The visit to Copenhagen, although free from all political design, although ingenuous in spirit, amiable in purpose, was construed as a more emphatic mode of proclaiming the close relation between Russia and Great Britain. It has been followed by a singular, but natural development of consequences. A further stage is reached in Central Asia. Egypt is more serious than ever. The Holy Alliance re-asserts itself. The First Minister and the Secretary of State are so placed that, with their best exertions, they cannot possibly withstand or counterbalance it. The revival of British influence at Berlin, at Vienna, at Constantinople, is the specific to be aimed at. To that revival they are both insuperable obstacles.

Does the Liberal majority require them? In a former generation the Liberal majority outlived even the services of the late Earl Grey and of Lord Althorp. It went on for years under a new, although it could not be under a superior direction. The Liberal majority is not, in any manner, the foundation on which the right hon. Gentleman and noble Earl are standing at this moment. Who made the right hon. Gentleman First Minister? The noble Earl, because his diffidence would not allow him to become one when he was the formally accepted Leader of the Party which had triumphed at the General Election. Who made the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary? The First Minister. It was the only voice in the United Kingdom which selected him. Externally, at least, the country is imperilled and degraded by two statesmen, each of whom depends exclusively upon the appointment of the other. The House of Commons, having frequently rebuked it, it would be well for such a combination to exhaust itself, before it yields to civil war, or to incendiary violence; the civil war which the First Minister foreshadowed; the incendiary violence he is not able to suppress.

I have but a word to add upon the Motion. If, indeed, the noble Earl the Secretary of State declares, in stereotyped phrase, that he has no official knowledge on the subject, it is easy to believe him. The age is led to think that many things exist, and many are preparing, which official knowledge does not grasp within its circle. The official knowledge of the noble Earl instructed him, in 1870, to count on the tranquillity of Europe. It may instruct him now to hold that Germany and Austria have not resumed their old connection with the Northern Power, in spite of the elaborate contrivances and improvised adventures by which he and the First Minister have lured them back to such a system. But this House would not perform its duty to the world, unless, before adjourning, it took the only method open to bring more light to bear upon an ominous—although far from an astonishing—appearance, which lends a graver hue to the embarrassed prospects of the country. The noble Lord concluded by making the Motion of which he had given Notice.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copy of the diplomatic correspondence on the alleged re-union of Austria, Germany, and Russia."—(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

LORD DENMAN said, he had been nearly 30 years a Member of their Lordships' House, and on three several occasions had spoken respectfully of Prussia, of Austria, and of Russia, for which he referred to his speeches. He would suggest that it would have been better if the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would postpone his answer until the noble Lord (Lord Tennyson) was present in the House. That noble Lord, having been present at the conversations which were stated to have taken place between the Prime Minister and the Emperor of Russia, would have been able to tell their Lordships what exactly occurred, in case previous assurances were doubted.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, a distinguished writer once said that that part of his head was very small which was intended to receive things that were not clear. Now, though I am not a distinguished writer, I am afraid my head has the same deficiency. I have been really quite unable to take in the drift of the noble Lord's speech, which he said he had condensed—although he had much more to say—into 50 minutes. My Lords, the noble Lord has quoted extracts from a great many European papers. I think it was Mr. Luttrell who once said that it was better that a man should commit murder in May than steal mutton in the Autumn; and, in the same way, in the dead season, I am not surprised that, it having been announced that Mr. Gladstone had gone on a diplomatic negotiation to the Emperor of Russia, the whole Press of Europe and of this country should take it up and speculate upon it. The other day, in answer to a Question put by the noble Lord, I stated in the most explicit manner that which was very well known a fortnight after the visit had taken place—that Mr. Gladstone had no political object whatever in going to Copenhagen; that he had no sort of mission for Her Majesty's Government on the subject; and that, being there, there was not any direct or indirect communication between Mr. Gladstone and the Russian Emperor. That the noble Lord should refer again to that visit, and those other fearful transactions to which he has referred, after what I then said, appears to me perfectly unintelligible. I should be very glad to give these despatches, for I have received confidential despatches on the subject; but I am sure it would be bad to create a precedent for producing confidential despatches on Continental transactions to which we are not parties. It is quite clear that if I did so it would entirely shut up the sources of information open to Ministers at different Courts. I therefore cannot accede to the Motion of the noble Lord.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: I need detain the House but for a moment. As to any personal reflection which has fallen from the noble Earl, it is easy to forgive while he is the compulsory organ of the First Minister, who is not here this evening to defend himself. The noble Earl has not contested a single proposition I have offered to your Lordships. Abandoning the First Minister where he is a subject of remark, where no charge is made he goes on pertinaciously excusing him. As to Correspondence, the noble Earl may be entitled to withhold that which the three Powers have had amongst each other. That he has none to offer of his own, the line of observation I pursued would force me to anticipate. On the other hand, the House and country will remark that the union of the three Powers is now much clearer than before, the noble Earl having said nothing to throw a doubt upon, or question its existence.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881.

NOTICE OF QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, I beg to give Notice that, on some early day after the Easter Recess, which I will then name, it is my intention to direct the attention of the House to the working and the operation of the Land Act; and to ask Her Majesty's Government, whether they have any measures in contemplation for the purpose of strengthening and enforcing the Purchase Clauses of the Land Act?

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, to Monday the 21st instant, a quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 4th April, 1884.

MINUTES.] — PRIVATE [BILL (by Order) — Committee nominated—Metropolitan Railway (Park Railway and Parliament Street Improvement).

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading — Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act (1878) Amendment (No. 2) [82], debate adjourned.

Committee—Report—Army (Annual) [144].

Report—Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Provisional Order* [142].

Third Reading—Trustee Churches (Ireland)* [167], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

EGYPT—DEFENCE OF THE NILE PROVINCES.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Secretary of State for War, What measures Her Majesty's Government intend adopting for the defence of the Nile Provinces in Upper and Lower Egypt; if it is intended to have an armed flotilla in the River, or only garrisons at Korosko, Assouan, Assiout, Cairo, &c; and, if the Government is aware that an enemy entering Upper Egypt would be able to do so without going near Korosko or Assouan?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The subject referred to in the Question of my hon. Friend has occupied the attention of the Government and of the General Officers in command in Egypt; but it would obviously be undesirable to state at the present time what measures are contemplated for the defence of the Nile Provinces. The Government are quite aware of certain roads in the direction indicated by the Question; but have no reason to believe that they are roads which would permit the passage of a very considerable number of troops.

In reply to a further Question from Mr. GOURLEY,

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it was not desirable to make known the details of what was being done. All the necessary arrangements were being made by the officers on the spot.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND) ACT—CATHOLIC AND PROTESTANT SUPERINTENDENTS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Can he state the proportion of Catholic and Protestant candidates examined, and the proportion of Catholic and Protestant Superintendents, under the Intermediate Education Act, and how many Protestant and how many Catholic clergymen have been employed as Superintendents since 1879?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Commissioners never make inquiry as to the religious profession of candidates, and do not consider themselves empowered to do so. I have been informed that the Board endeavour to equalize the numbers of Protestants and Catholics as Centre Superintendents, and that they believe themselves to have succeeded in doing so. With regard to the number of clergymen employed as Superintendents since 1879, there were 71 Roman Catholics and 127 Protestants. In giving me this information, the Assistant Commissioners inform me that there have not been so many applications from Catholic clergymen as from clergymen on the other side.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—REDUCTION OF RENTS.

MR. GIBSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the rate of reduction in rents made by the Irish Land Commission for each of the six months ending 29th February last; what does he now estimate will be the cost of the Irish Land Commission for the approaching financial year; and, will a Supplementary Estimate be laid upon the Table for the additional cost caused by the recent decision of the Irish Government to continue the employment of the temporary Sub-Commissioners for four months?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Land Commissioners inform me that they will not be in a position for about three weeks from this time to give the rate of reduction for February. In each of the six months ending January 31 the rate was respectively — about 17, 1·66, 19, 20 (nearly), 19 (nearly), and 17·7, the average being 18·6. The Irish Government is at present in communication with the Treasury on the subject of the Estimates in connection with the decision to continue the Sub-Commissions, and with the Land Commissioners on the subject of possible economies on other sub-heads of the Estimates; but, as at present advised, I can scarcely hope that a Supplementary Estimate can possibly be avoided.

ENCUMBERED ESTATES COURT (IRELAND)—MR. GEORGE BOLTON.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to an application made against Mr. George Bolton, Crown Solicitor, in the Land Judges Court, Dublin, on Saturday last, before Mr. Justice Ormsby, by counsel, on behalf of the receiver in the matter of the estate of the said George Bolton; whether it appeared that, in June last, Mr. Bolton being £200 in arrear of rent of land leased to him by the court (being part of his estate in the hands of the court for sale), the receiver applied for leave to proceed against him, but the court did not order proceedings, as Mr. Bolton undertook to give, within a week, his promissory note for £200, payable in three months; whether this promissory note, due in September last, has never since been paid; whether the court, in June, re-let the grazing land to Mr. Bolton, upon his covenant to pay the first moiety of the rent on the 1st November last, but, as he failed to pay, proceedings were ordered, and judgments issued, in January last, with the result that the Sheriff of Dublin has only been able to recover a small portion of the debt, and it has been found that Mr. Bolton is also in debt for rent to the landlord of the house in which he lives; whether it was stated in court that the land in question was let to Mr. Bolton at a great deal less than the value, that he had made considerable profit out of it, and that he is in receipt of £1,200 a-year, as the holder of two public appointments; whether Mr. Bolton neither appeared himself in court, on Saturday last, nor caused anyone to appear on his behalf; whether, in respect of a second judgment against Mr. Bolton, lodged by order of the court with the Sheriff of the city of Dublin, that official has reported that he has not been able to levy anything whatever; whether Mr. Bolton, some years ago, was condemned by Mr. Justice Fry for having drawn up a marriage settlement defrauding his own wife; and, whether he will be any longer retained in the public service?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is a fact that the application mentioned took place. Mr. Bolton states he did not appear, because no notice or application was served on him. From his statement it appears that he has fallen into embarrassment, as the result of the purchase of landed property, and that he has applied half of his salaries, the amount of which were not as considerable as the hon. Member stated. Mr. Bolton has been cautioned that he must come to an arrangement with his creditors; but the Government do not consider the case is one for removal. As to the second charge, it was considered by the late Government nearly five years ago, and it was then decided that the circumstances of the case did not warrant his dismissal.

PRISONS (ENGLAND AND WALES)— MAT MAKING.

MR. BURT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he can state why the number of mat makers has been increased in Wandsworth Prison from 53 in 1882 to 373 in 1883, and in Bedford from 14 in 1882 to 46 in 1883; whether these increases have been made at the suggestion of the contractors for the prisoners' labour; and, whether, in view of the recommendations of the Commissioners of Prisons for the year 1882, who say, page 7—

"The objects we desire to keep primarily in view are, First. To provide the prisoners with such employment as will interest and develop their intelligence; Secondly. To avoid concentrating too large a proportion of the labour of prisoners on one trade, and especially to diminish the amount of mat making throughout the Kingdom; Thirdly. To work for Government Departments as much as possible in preference to working for private employers," he can explain the cause of so great an increase?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, there were, on the whole, the same number of persons employed in prisons in the making of mats as in 1881. There had been some changes; but the total number had not been increased.

LUNACY COMMISSIONERS—INSANE BRITISH SUBJECTS ABROAD.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he can find out how many British subjects, who were insane or alleged to be insane, have been conveyed away from the United Kingdom and confined in lunatic asylums in Foreign Countries during the past ten years; and, whether any of the survivors of them are now of sound mind?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have inquired of the Lunacy Commissioners, who tell me that there are no facts which they can get that would answer the Question of the hon. Member. I do not see how it is possible to discover those facts.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

MR. JAMES HOWARD asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether the Privy Council, in view of the increased movement of cattle about to take place, and the consequent risk of disease again spreading and becoming unmanageable, the Department will consider the desirability of simultaneous action throughout the Country for stamping out foot-and-mouth disease by the issue of an Order in Council directing the slaughter of all animals at present affected with the disease, in accordance with the powers vested in the Privy Council by section 29 of the Act of 1878, and also directing, for a prescribed period, the establishment of an efficient cordon around each infected farm or place, under the powers vested in the Privy Council by section 32 of the same Act?

MR. DODSON: The Privy Council have urged upon Local Authorities the necessity for prompt and vigorous action at the present time for getting rid of foot-and-mouth disease by slaughter, or by effective isolation and regulation under police superintendence of infected places. There appears to be no such general disposition among stockowners, and still less among the public, to adopt a universal compulsory system of slaughter for foot-and-mouth disease as would warrant the issue of an Order of the stringent and sweeping nature proposed.

MR. JAMES HOWARD wished to know, whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that in the Northampton Market on Monday last some 20 or 30 animals affected with foot-and-mouth disease were discovered; and also, whether he was aware that there were only 391 cattle and 289 sheep affected with foot-and-mouth disease at the present moment, and that only an outlay of something like £3,000 was necessary in order to stamp out this malady? The hon. Gentleman likewise gave Notice that on Monday he would repeat the Question he had placed on the Paper; and that, if necessary, he would then move the adjournment of the House, with a view to calling attention to this subject.

MR. J. LOWTHER inquired when the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill was likely to be put down on the Paper with a view of being considered on an early day in Committee? He also wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman could give a formal contradiction of the report, which was very widely spread, that the Government did not seriously intend to press the measure this Session?

MR. DODSON said, that he had only heard the report in question that moment from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman. With regard to getting forward with the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman, if he had observed the proceedings of the House, must have known that it had been put down on the Paper every day, but that the Government had had no opportunity of bringing it on. They had also given Morning Sittings for the purpose of getting into Committee on the Bill; and if the Government had not succeeded it had been from no fault of theirs. The Prime Minister had thrown out a suggestion that there might be a Morning Sitting for making progress with the Bill in Committee on Tuesday after the House re-assembled. That would be a matter for arrangement hereafter; but he trusted that they might be able to get the Speaker out of the Chair before then. With respect to the Question of the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, the Privy Council had heard that morning that on a farm at Newport Pagnell, in Buckinghamshire, 25 out of 30 animals purchased at the Northampton Market on the 29th ultimo were found on the 2nd instant to be affected with foot-and-mouth disease. The total number of animals affected with foot-and-mouth disease in Great Britain was on March 29, the date of the latest complete Return, about that stated by the hon. Member. A very large proportion, however, of that number was contained in one county, and a comparatively large number in a few other counties. Those counties did not appear disposed to adopt a system of slaughter.

MR. JAMES HOWARD again asked if it had been officially reported to the Privy Council that 20 or 30 animals affected with foot-and-mouth disease had been discovered at Northampton Market?

MR. DODSON: My information is what I have stated.

MR. JAMES HOWARD said, he would repeat the Question on Monday.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENTS OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES—DENMARK.

MR. JAMES HOWARD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will obtain fuller particulars of the connection which exists between the Agricultural Department of Denmark and the Danish Royal Society of Agricultural Economy than are given in the Reports on the Agricultural Departments of Foreign Countries (No. 9) issued last week?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: If my hon. Friend will have the goodness to communicate to me the exact points on which he requires further information, it will be procured through Her Majesty's Legation at Copenhagen.

PUBLIC HEALTH (IRELAND) ACT—MEDICAL OFFICERS OF HEALTH.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, since "The Labourers' (Ireland) Act, 1883," and "The Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878," are construed as one Act, he will give a Return of the paid officials employed under those Acts, during the six months ending 31st March, 1884, showing the amount of their annual salaries, and the extra fees and emoluments, if any, received by them; whether any cases have arisen in which sanitary officers have claimed extra payment for what the Guardians pronounced to be their ordinary duty; and, whether they have a ground of action at law against the Guardians for refusing their demands?

MR. TREVELYAN: There is no objection to giving such Returns as those suggested by the hon. Member. I am informed that in some instances Boards of Guardians refuse to pay their medical officers for such services as those rendered under this Act by them; and, as one medical officer has taken proceedings against a Board, I cannot prejudge the case by the expression of any opinion as to whether or not there is ground of action.

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION ON PATENTS.

MR. B. SAMUELSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When he will lay upon the Table the terms of the accession of this country to the International Convention on Patents; and, whether he will append thereto any Correspondence on the subject with our Colonies and Foreign Powers?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The acceptance of the British accession, which accession was communicated to the French Government on the 17th ultimo, has not yet been reported by Her Majesty's Ambassador; but when it is received, the Convention, together with the British Declaration of Accession, will be presented in the usual course to Parliament. I think that the Correspondence to which my hon. Friend refers can be laid upon the Table; but it will be necessary to consult the Departments more particularly concerned. The only Foreign Correspondence is with the French Government, who have carried on the negotiations.

IRELAND—SLIGO BOARD OF GUARDIANS—THE REV. THOMAS HEANY.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Rev. Thomas Heany, now acting as a member of the Emigration Committee of the Sligo Board of Guardians, lately issued, in his capacity of Chaplain of an Orange Lodge, a circular, since published in the Press, in which circular he and his co-signatories called upon the landlords of the county Sligo to give to Protestants only vacant farms and vacant situations; and, whether, if so, the Local Government Board will permit the Rev. Thomas Heany to continue to act as member of a committee of a Board of Guardians having in charge the emigration of Catholics out of the county of Sligo?

MR. GIBSON asked whether this rev. gentleman denied that he signed his name to such a circular?

MR. SEXTON: Another clergyman denied it—not this one.

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Rev. Mr. Heany himself states that his name was attached to this circular without his knowledge or consent, and that he would not have approved of such a circular if it had been submitted to him. The rev. gentleman made this communication to me in reference to a former Question with regard to this circular, which was asked about a month ago; but, unfortunately, I did not receive his letter until after the Question had been put.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — MR. RICHARD HARVEY, GOVERNMENT STAMP DISTRIBUTOR AT DROGHEDA.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If Mr. Richard Harvey, Government Stamp Distributor at Drogheda, acted at the late and previous revisions of Voters' Lists for that borough as agent and objector on behalf of the Tory Party; and, if so, how the office of stamp distributor was attended to while he occupied himself in the Revision Court; and whether such occupation is compatible with his duty as a salaried official of the State; whether, on a former occasion, Mr. Harvey, in consequence of having written over his name a letter of a political and party character in the public Press, was suspended from the office of Stamp Distributor; but was restored to the office on making an apology, and promising not again to offend; and, what course will now be taken in his regard?

MR. COURTNEY: The distributor in question says he never acted in the capacity stated. It was true that he was suspended in 1880 for an act of indiscretion; but he was soon after restored.

VISCOUNT CRICHTON: Was not he summoned by the National Party?

MR. SEXTON: Will the Government receive the evidence as to whether he acted or not?

MR. COURTNEY: Any communication to his official superiors will, of course, be considered.

NAVY—OFFICERS OF THE ROYAL MARINES.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, What are the recommendations of the War Office Committee as to the employment of Officers of the Royal Marines on the Staff of the Army; and, do the Admiralty intend to carry them into effect?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: I have been asked to reply to his Question. The instructions to the Committee on the Royal Marines, over which I had the honour to preside, were that we should

"Inquire into and report on the conditions as regards pay and service of officers of the Royal Marines when employed on the General Staff of the Army."

We reported our opinion that the eligibility of officers of Royal Marines for such employment was clearly established by the Queen's Regulations, section 5, par. 68, if read in connection with the Army Act, 1881, section 190, sub-section 8; and our recommendations were to the effect that when officers of the Royal Marines shall be employed on the Staff of the Army they should be subject to the same conditions as regards pay and service as now are applied to the officers of the Army. The Admiralty intend to carry out these recommendations of the Committee.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—BRIDGES OVER THE SHANNON.

MR. MOLLOY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If the Board of Works in Ireland will construct a bridge over the New Cut or Auxiliary Channel at Victoria Lock, in connection with the Shannon Drainage Works in the King's County; and, further, as the three provinces and three counties meet at Victoria Lock, if he will cause a few temporary bridges to be made across the small branches of the Shannon thence to Meelick?

MR. COURTNEY: I am afraid there are no funds at the disposal of the Government for this purpose.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: It may be for the convenience of the House that I should state that I propose on Tuesday morning next to ask leave to introduce a Bill for the better government of London. As a matter of form, I may also mention that it will be necessary, as it is a Notice of Motion, formally on Monday night to make a Motion, not with the view of making a statement on Monday night, but that it may be made an Order of the Day to be dealt with on Tuesday morning.

MR. J. LOWTHER asked the noble Marquess what arrangements the Government had made for the adjournment of the House for the Easter holidays?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was glad the right hon. Gentleman had put that Question. The Government would endeavour to make any arrangement which might be most in accordance with the desires of the House upon this matter. There was, however, some difficulty about it. The Motion might be made on Monday evening, after the other Business was concluded. If, however, that course was not acceptable to the House, and if it was desired to have a discussion on the Motion for Adjournment, then it would be necessary to make the Motion on Tuesday morning, after his right hon. and learned Friend had brought in the London Government Bill; or, if there was not time on Tuesday morning, it would be necessary that the House should meet on Tuesday evening to make that Motion.

In reply to MR. GIBSON,

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that the Government did not intend to take any other Business than the London Government Bill on Tuesday.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I do not quite understand what the noble Marquess means when he says that the Motion might be made on Monday night for the adjournment. Would it be—"That the House at its rising to-morrow," and so on?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Yes; I believe that course has been taken with the concurrence of the House.

MR. J. LOWTHER believed it was the intention of the Government that on the Tuesday after the re-assembling of the House the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill should be put on the Paper. He wished to know whether it would be put down with the idea of being seriously proceeded with?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not quite understand the Question. Of course, if the Government put the Bill down it would be with the desire of making as much progress as possible.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that it had been distinctly stated that the Government would not proceed with the clauses; but that the Bill would be put down simply with the view of getting the Speaker out of the Chair. He wished to know whether adequate Notice would be given when it was intended to go through the clauses?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the arrangement referred to by the right hon. Gentleman was only made in order that sufficient time might be given to Members for the consideration of Amendments. That reason no longer applied, and the Government hoped to make progress with the Bill.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked what Supply would be taken on Monday, the 21st, when the House re-assembled?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): Civil Service Estimates, Class I.

MR. HEALY said, he believed there was no precedent for the course proposed to be taken with regard to the Motion for the adjournment for the holidays. The usual plan was to make that Motion as the first Business. It was the intention of his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) on that Motion to call the attention of the House to the question of the police tax in Cork, and the Irish Members intended to raise a debate. If the Motion were not made until after the introduction of the London Government Bill, he was afraid the House would be put to the trouble of meeting again at 9 o'clock on Tuesday evening.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR pointed out that, although the Government had put before the House two alternatives with regard to the Motion for Adjournment, they had not stated which of them they would adopt. It would be highly inconvenient that the Motion should be made late on Monday night; because in the present anxious and critical state of affairs in Egypt it was highly probable that attention might be drawn to the subject.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he thought that the discussion on the Motion of the hon. Member for the City of Cork might be taken after the other Business was disposed of on Monday night. If it were necessary to put it down on Tuesday, it was extremely likely that the House would have to meet on Tuesday evening to consider it.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (SCOTLAND) BILL—SECRETARY OF STATE.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: I should like to ask the Home Secretary, Whether he has abandoned his intention of bringing in the Local Government Board (Scotland) Bill before Easter?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I should be very glad; but I received so little encouragement from the hon. and gallant Gentleman last year. In the absence of the Lord Advocate, I can hardly say whether we can do anything before Easter; but if I am assured that I have my hon. and gallant Friend's support, I shall be very glad.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: I want to see the Bill first.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—A CHIEF COMMISSIONER OF POLICE.

MR. MOLLOY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, If he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report made to the Irish Government by Mr. Jenkinson and others upon the proposed Constabulary and Police Administration (Ireland) Bill of last Session; and, if it is proposed to reintroduce that Bill; if it was proposed to name Mr. Jenkinson the first Chief Commissioner under the Bill, and if one of the recommendations of such Report was as to the salary and allowances to the proposed Chief Commissioner, and if the amount recommended by such Report to be paid to such Commissioner was £2,000 per annum, and £400 for age allowance; what is the exact position now held by Mr. Jenkinson in Ireland; and, whether he has been, or is about to be, appointed to some new official position in England?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Report to which the hon. Member refers cannot be submitted to Parliament. I do not propose to re-introduce this Session a Bill creating a post of Chief Commissioner of Police. I must decline to say who might be considered suitable to fill a post which has not been created, or to state any of the recommendations made by the Committee referred to, which was a confidential one. The exact position held by Mr. Jenkinson in Ireland is that of Assistant Under Secretary for Police and Crime. The work which he has to do in that capacity necessitates his being a good deal in London at the present time. He has not been, nor is he about to be, appointed to any new official position in England.

MR. HEALY: Then, Sir, we have not got rid of Mr. Jenkinson. ["Order!"]

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—COMPENSATION FOR MALICIOUS BURNING—MR. WALLER, J.P., MOYSTOWN.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, on the 5th ult., the Grand Jury of King's County granted to Mr. Bolton J. Waller, J.P., of Moystown, the full amount of £315 compensation for hay destroyed by fire; whether the hay in question, for three weeks after being cut, was constantly flooded by the waters of the Shannon to within about one foot of the top of the cocks, so as to be rendered almost worthless; whether the police, after full investigation, arrested Mr. Waller's butler, a man named Kenny, on the charge of having set the hay on fire; whether, upon the hearing of the charge at Birr, on the 13th January, a man named Frank Smyth swore that he had seen Kenny set the hay on fire; whether other evidence for the prosecution was given on the same occasion, and no evidence was tendered for the defence; whether the prosecution was conducted by Mr. Adam Mitchell, Crown Solicitor, and the defence by Mr. Mitchell's son; whether the father and son are members of the same firm, and transact their business in the same office; whether the magistrates refused the informations, and dismissed the case; what explanation can be given of this judgment; and, whether the presentment will be levied?

MR. TREVELYAN: Mr. Waller was granted by the Grand Jury the compensation stated. It was also allowed by the cesspayers. It is true that Smyth swore he saw Kenny set fire to the hay; but so little credit was attached to his statement that the magistrates dismissed the case against Kenny without requiring any evidence for the defence. The Government have no reason to doubt the propriety of that decision. Mr. Mitchell conducted the prosecution; but Mr. Mitchell's son withdrew from the case when he found that it was going to be a criminal prosecution.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. THOMAS DOWLING, CAPPATHWAITE.

MR. MAYNE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to the fact, as reported in The Cork Examiner, of Monday, March 31st, that on Friday last, in Cappathwaite (county Tipperary) Petty Sessions Court, Mr. Thomas Dowling, of Inchinsquillib, Cappathwaite, a Justice of the Peace for the county of Dublin, was fined five shillings and costs for having been drunk while in charge of a horse and car on the public highway on the night of the 13th March; whether, in respect to a further charge of abusive language, brought by the police against Mr. Dowling, the presiding magistrate, Mr. Meldon, R.M., instructed them to report the matter to their superiors, and stated that the Government would not continue to afford to such a person as Mr. Dowling the force of five constables which has been at his disposal for some time; whether Mr. Dowling recently said to Sergeant Robert Moore that he would put a rope around the neck of Archbishop Croke, and hang him; whether Sergeant Moore, having reported the use of this language to Head Constable Ross Parkes, the Head Constable took no step in reference to the report, but went, on the same day, in a public-house to drink, in Mr. Dowling's company, and subsequently reported Sergeant Moore for not saluting Mr. Dowling; what notice will be taken of the conduct of the Head Constable; and, whether Mr. Dowling will be retained in the Commission of the Peace?

MR. TREVELYAN: Mr. Dowling was fined as stated. A further charge of using abusive language to his protection party was made. The Resident Magistrate desired the man to make a Report to his superior officer if he were required to continue on such duty; but he did not say that the Government would not further protect Mr. Dowling. His remark applied only to the individual constable. I believe it is the case that in the course of the prisoner's remand he undoubtedly used the language attributed to him; but the sergeant did not regard his statement as seriously intended. The Head Constable denies having gone into a public-house and taken a drink from Mr. Dowling. He went into the Post Office, which is also a public-house, while Mr. Dowling was there. The Head Constable did not report Sergeant Moore for not saluting Mr. Dowling. The sergeant did not consider it necessary to salute Mr. Dowling, as he was not a magistrate of his district; but on the matter being explained to him he did so at once. The case of Mr. Dowling is one which will be laid before the Lord Chancellor.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE BALLYFARNON MURDER.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, When the prisoners charged with the Ballyfarnon murder were arrested; how many remands were granted before their committal; can he quote any precedent for a similar number in ordinary English practice; what evidence was produced before the magistrates in the course of the investigation which might not have been tendered weeks ago; had the series of remands the effect of making the case too late for the Spring Assizes, and throwing the trial over till June or July; will the prisoners thereby be detained four months additional; what expense did these adjournments entail on the Country; and, will the expenses of prisoners' solicitor going from Ballinasloe to Galway on each occasion be defrayed by the Crown; if not, does he propose any change whereby the expense which this remand system entails on poor prisoners may be avoided? I must say that the most important part of this Question was struck out. It was, how much Mr. George Bolton got for each remand he procured?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Four of the prisoners charged with this murder were arrested on the 27th of January, 1884. There were eight remands before the committal, which took place on the 28th of March. One of the prisoners, Thomas Nolan, was only arrested on the 27th of February. The evidence was, to a considerable extent, circumstantial, and only developed as the case proceeded; and in the course of the investigation one very important witness had to be traced out and brought over from England. Another important witness was only discovered a few days before the 28th of March. In no event, therefore, could this case have been ready for trial at the Spring Assizes on the 22nd of March. The murder was committed on the 16th of October, 1879, when the body was put into a sack and thrown into the River Suck, and it was not discovered till the 19th of May, 1880. Not much expense was occasioned by the adjournments. There is no precedent for payment of the expenses of a solicitor at a preliminary investigation. I am informed that many precedents exist in England for an equal number of remands. In Gallagher's case there were 11 hearings in the police courts.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) — ATHLONE BOARD OF GUARDIANS — ELECTION OF CHAIRMAN.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, By whose authority, and at whose request, was the election of Chairman at the Athlone Board of Guardians postponed from the 29th March to the 5th of April?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, the election was fixed originally for the 5th of April, the earliest day on which it could be held.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

IRELAND—CONSTITUTION OF THE MAGISTRACY.—RESOLUTION.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY, in rising to call attention to the conduct of the Irish Magistracy; and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the present condition of the Irish Magistracy, constituted, as shown by a Return now in the possession of the House, almost exclusively from one religious denomination and one class, is offensive and injurious to the vast majority of the Irish people, and is calculated to destroy all confidence in the ordinary administration of justice in Ireland," said, if Irish Members were only concerned with the one chapter of the history of the Irish Magistracy which described its composition, and if they were convinced that English and Scotch Members would read the Return recently laid before the House on that subject, and strive to understand it, hardly any argument would be needed to convey its full import and lesson. But his hon. Friends and himself could not suppose that this long and complicated Return would receive the attention to which it was entitled. Furthermore, there were other questions concerning the administration of justice beside the composition of the Magistracy which were not touched upon in that Return, and which could only be set forth on a Motion such as he had proposed. There were two classes of magistrates—the Resident Magistrates, who were appointed under an Act of Parliament, and held office during the pleasure of the Viceroy, and there were the Unpaid Magistrates, who were appointed by the Lord Chancellor, on the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant of a county. Nomination by a Lord Lieutenant was taken as sufficient recommendation, so that the Lords Lieutenant virtually held in their own hands the appointment of the ordinary Magistracy. Now, it would hardly be believed that out of 32 Lords Lieutenant in Ireland only two were members of the Catholic Church. Ireland contained about 4,000,000 Catholic inhabitants, and about 1,000,000 of a Protestant population. These 4,000,000 Catholics had 869 Catholic magistrates and justices. The 1,000,000 Irish Protestants had 3,359 persons in the Commission of the Peace. These figures exhibited a very curious inversion of proportions, and showed that the great majority of Catholics had a miserably small minority of their faith on the Bench. Such a state of things hardly called for mere inquiry; it called rather for instant condemnation. No ingenuity or skill could reconcile a House of Commons, disposed to act with fairness and justice, to the disparity disclosed by these figures. In the Province of Ulster the population was very nearly balanced. There were about 830,000 Catholics, and about 900,000 Protestants of all denominations. Yet there were only 88 Catholic magistrates and 1,027 Protestant magistrates in Ulster. Leinster had a population of 1,100,000 Catholics, and 184,000 Protestants; and in Leinster there were 296 Catholic magistrates, and 1,047 Protestant magistrates. Munster had a Catholic population of about 1,250,000, and a Protestant population of about 81,000. The minority of 81,000 had 884 Commissions of the Peace amongst them, while the 1,250,000 had only 301 Catholic magistrates. The Catholic population of Connaught was 783,000, and it had 184 Catholic magistrates. The Protestant population of 38,000 had 401 Protestant Justices of the Peace. In the boroughs the disproportion of Catholic magistrates to Protestants was not so obviously one-sided, although it was still sufficiently striking and shameful. The Catholic population of Irish boroughs was about 612,000; the Protestant population was 299,000. The Catholic magistrates numbered 145; the Protestants 226. In the whole county of Fermanagh there was only one Catholic magistrate, and he was a Resident Magistrate, so that Fermanagh had no unpaid Catholic Justice of the Peace; but it had 74 Protestant Justices. Carlow had but five Catholic Justices, and it, he need hardly say, was a Catholic county. Wicklow had five Catholic magistrates, and 99 Protestant Justices of the Peace. The county of Donegal, although mainly Catholic, had only nine Catholic magistrates out of 138 Justices of the Peace. It must be evident from these figures that, as regarded religious denomination, there was a monstrous and farcical perversion of all the principles of justice and fair play in Ireland. He should be sorry, however, to have it thought that their whole case was a question between Catholic and Protestant. That was a matter of immense magnitude; but it would by no means content him and his hon. Friends if by some sudden manipulation of the social arrangements the Viceroy were to place upon the Magisterial Bench a number of well-selected Catholic gentlemen, who had been ostentatious in their professions of devotion to the Castle. They should feel their people just as unprotected under that sort of change as if things were left as they now stood, with the administration of justice practically in the hands of a Protestant Magistracy. What they complained of was, that magistrates were not alone taken nearly all from one religious denomination, but that they were chosen from one class of the community, and from what he might call the anti-National school. He wished the Return showed the names of the magistrates dismissed from the Commission of the Peace during the last 10 or 12 years. That would be instructive evidence; for the moment a Catholic magistrate had shown himself decidedly in sympathy with the National cause, some excuse was immediately found for his removal from the Bench of Justice. This had occurred more than once with honest, independent, sympathetic members of the Protestant Church. But he had no wish to see their places filled by the effervescing loyalty of certain Catholics, whose great ambition was to be invited to Castle balls and dinners. The complaint he made, beside that which concerned religion, was that nine-tenths of the magistrates were chosen from one class, and that the landlord class, which could not be supposed to be in affinity with any of the wants and wishes of the people of Ireland. It was possible that the Return did not do full justice to the case of the Chief Secretary, and that there might be more representatives of the farmer class on the Bench than this Return disclosed. Many in the class from which Irish Justices were chosen were nothing if not genteel; and it was not impossible that the position of the farmer might be decently wrapped up in the phrase "small landowner" or "gentleman farmer," which occurred now and then through the Return. Two or three times they had the title "gentleman land agent," and in one case they had a "gentleman soap and candle manufacturer." But, even making allowance for all the gentlemen farmers and gentlemen soap and candle manufacturers, it was clear that only a small minority of the Magistracy belonged to the farmer class. He would take examples from the county he represented. In County Longford they had 66 magistrates, of whom 62 were ordinary Justices; 52 of these were Protestants, and 14 were Catholics. If there was one county conspicuously Catholic in population, it was Longford. Of these 14 Catholics only five lived in the county, or took the slightest interest in what was called the administration of justice. One of the absentees was a Member of Parliament; and he, perhaps, was engaged in occupations of a more delicate and exalted order than the administration of justice in the County Longford. Perhaps he considered it more dignified to play the part of a modern John Inglesant at Rome than to take any interest in the welfare of Longford tenant farmers. Another of the absentees was a Land Commissioner. A third was a gentleman who signed one of the addresses to Lord Rossmore; three lived in Dublin, and one was permanently settled in Australia, apparently having no intention of returning to adorn the Longford Magisterial Bench. Thirty-six were described as "landlords;" 5 as land agents; 11 as military officers, and of these, seven were also either landholders or the heirs to great estates. Only the two Coroners for the county were farmers, and, as most hon. Members knew, Coroners were chosen by popular election; but even of these two farmers one was also a land agent. There was a pleasant and rapid process of manufacturing magistrates out of the clerks of a great land agency office in Dublin, who in their tender years were sent to the county as agents or sub-agents, and were immediately inducted into the Commission of the Peace. To give an illustration. In one division of County Longford the Petty Sessions Bench had six magistrates. The first was a great landlord—a Member of this House; then came that landlord's agent, then the agent's son, then the agent's son-in-law, and then the agent's two nephews; and by that agreeable family party was justice administered in one portion of the county he represented. Any hon. Member might consider the sort of trial which would be given to a man brought before that Bench charged with having trespassed upon the great landlord's grounds in pursuit of a rabbit, or to cut a branch from a tree. It was possible that the Chief Secretary, or some other Member of the Government, might endeavour to argue that there was no way of getting proper men to place on the Bench unless from the landlord class or the Protestant denomination. Of course, as long as they stood upon the absurd and antiquated principle of property qualification there was little to be said in reply to that argument. But the property qualification had been excluded from almost every other institution in the country, and could not stand long as regarded county magistrates. There was no reason in the actual facts of the case why there should not be obtained in every county a Bench of Magistrates well qualified to discharge their duties, while fairly representing the tenant farmers and Roman Catholics in Ireland. It must be remembered that nearly all the different Local Governing Bodies in Ireland at present had on their lists numbers of middle-class Catholics, who were able and intelligent, who understood local business, and who were well qualified to perform all the duties required by such a position. These men would be just as well qualified to sit on the Bench of Justice, and administer it fairly between man and man, as any of the landlord or land agent or military classes, no matter how high their intelligence or earnestness of purpose. That was the case to which he would direct the attention of the House. There were many questions connected with the discharge of their duty by a particular class of magistrates to which he had not referred at all. There were cases such as that brought to light in the Question of the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Mayne) to-day, which introduced the House to a Justice of the Peace who might have stepped out of the pages of Smollett for grotesque misconduct and buffoonery. As to the Resident Magistrates, also, he presumed they would hear something in the course of the debate. If they did not, it was not because their action had not excited a strong and deep feeling in the country recently. He merely confined himself to the fact that the magistrates were, in nine cases out of ten, taken from one denomination and one class, that denomination being the denomination of the minority, and that class being notoriously, and he might almost say of necessity, out of sympathy with the vast mass of the population. If that was not a case which bore out the terms of his Resolution, he should like to know by what argument it could be proved. As long as this monstrous anomaly and this gross injustice stared the Irish Catholic tenant farmer and peasant in the face, as long as they saw that the Irish Magistracy was simply a garrison employed to keep down National feeling, and was in no sense a Bench of Justice, so long would they distrust and hate the law. He appealed, then, to the House to say whether the time had not come when, in the interests of justice and good feeling, and of England as well as Ireland, this glaring and outrageous scandal should be brought to an end? He begged to move the Resolution standing in his name.

MR. O'BRIEN, in seconding the Resolution, said, after the masterly way in which his hon. Friend had exposed the scandal of the Irish Magistracy it would be merely travelling over the same ground to say anything upon the subject until they had heard the reply of the Chief Secretary. He almost anticipated that there would be no reply—at least, no reply to the damning case made against the composition of the Magisterial Bench in Ireland—and that the line of defence taken would be that anticipated by his hon. Friend—namely, that it was really not the fault of the Government, and that they had done their best to remedy it. Of course, it might be very convenient for the Government, when they had absolutely no defence to the case made against the Irish Magistracy, to say that they desired to reform it, and that they had tried to do so; but the people of Ireland had no belief whatever in such professions. On the contrary, he asserted that every step the Government had taken in the direction, apparently of Liberalizing the Irish Magistracy by the infusion of Catholics, was taken, not for the bond fide purpose of improving or reforming it, but for the purpose of corrupting the Catholics appointed. They had almost invariably, in the Catholic appointments they had made, selected men who were most open to the temptations of the Government—men who were even most obnoxious to the people. The consequence was that bad as were the Orange section of the Magistracy in Ireland, the Catholic section, with comparatively few exceptions, was worse. They were neither fish nor flesh—they were people who felt that they could only rise above their own order and gain a miserable social distinction by recanting their political opinions and cringing or intriguing with the Government. He and his hon. Friends complained that not only were independent Catholics fitted for office passed over, but that the most obnoxious of the Irish Catholics were chosen for these positions. Last Session he brought under the notice of the House the fact that in one of the most Catholic districts in Ireland—the district of Roscrea—there was not a single Catholic magistrate, and that the people were absolutely at the mercy of an Orange Bench. He mentioned that one of them had entertained the local Orange Lodge at his residence on the 12th of July; and that, in fact, the whole of the magistrates of the district ostentatiously patronized the Orange Society and everything offensive to the people. The Chief Secretary seemed to recognize the hardship of that, and he gave a promise at the time that he would see whether something could not be done to remedy it. But what was the remedy? The Lord Chancellor, or the Lieutenant of the county, or whatever official was responsible, passed over a number of Catholic gentlemen of independence and high character in the town of Roscrea, and went into the Templemore Petty Sessions district, 12 miles away, where he selected one of the most obnoxious Catholics in the whole of Tipperary, a land agent of the very worst type, and a man who throughout the whole land agitation had been a conspicuous enemy of the people. This man, who scarcely ever visited Roscrea, was raised to the Bench in the Petty Sessions district; and the Chief Secretary presumably thought that by this appointment everything was done that was necessary to inspire popular confidence in the administration of justice. Of course, the result was that another outrage had been perpetrated on popular feeling in the district. He was glad his hon. Friend had made it quite clear that it was not merely upon religious grounds they objected to the composition of the Magistracy. The objection on that ground was conclusive so far as it referred to the facts brought to light in the Blue Book obtained by his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). They, however, regarded the religious test as no test in any case where a person enjoyed the confidence of the people. Indeed, owing to the class of Catholics whom the Government encouraged in Ireland, he believed the people would even prefer a Magistracy that was entirely and frankly Protestant, rather than a Magistracy partly composed of Catholics who were promoted for being parasites and toadies of the Government. He believed that there never would be a satisfactory Magistracy in Ireland until the people elected their own magistrates, as they did their own Coroners, or at least until magistrates were nominated by representative County Boards. His hon. Friend the Member for Sligo had suggested beyond all question the next best way of getting at really representative men; but he was sorry to say that he believed that suggestion would not be taken up by the Government officials in Ireland in the spirit that would give it any success whatever. The only objection that could be raised to men nominated in the way he had suggested was that they were of pretty decided political opinions; that they were Nationalists, and, in fact, strong political partizans. He must say candidly that he thought it would be no advantage to the people of Ireland if persons of a colourless character were selected. [Laughter.] He heard hon. Members laugh. All he could say was, and there was no use in disguising it, that every man who was worth his salt in Ireland was a strong political partizan. What was the composition of the Irish Magistracy? Of 4,358 who composed the whole County Magistracy in Ireland, 2,876 were landlords, and 400 more were land agents. He asked hon. Gentlemen who laughed awhile ago, were these gentlemen partizans? Were they not bitter and interested partizans of the very worst type? He did not suppose that hon. gentlemen above the Gangway would reproach them for holding to their opinions. He maintained that a Nationalist who held his political opinions honestly was just as trustworthy and as fit to discharge the duties of the Bench as the rack-renter or a rent-warner. The plea that it was difficult to find men for the position was the merest excuse. There was no difficulty in finding honest, intelligent, and suitable men in Ireland, who were Catholics also. There were plenty of them to be had, only for the misfortune that they were stamped with National opinions. There were, for instance, the whole of the priests of Ireland, as was suggested in The Freeman of yesterday. Many of them were not strong politicians, and they at present, to a very great extent, discharged the functions of magistrates in settling disputes between the people. The effect of the appointment of a few Catholic magistrates in some districts was exceedingly strange. Take the district of Castle-town Roche, near his own constituency, where Mr. Hickey was appointed. Well, but for Mr. Hickey the public would never have heard of as gross a scandal as ever occurred. They would never have heard that a supposed agrarian outrage, which cost the people of a poor parish £300, was a pure fabrication, bolstered up by flagrant perjury. What was the result? Of course, Mr. Hickey's opinion went for nothing in the eyes of the Castle, and the opinion of a military autocrat, who patronized this perjury, was believed. There was in the same district another magistrate named Roche, who was the principal party to a circular threatening a number of tenants that they would be flung out for arrears of rent unless they would do as the landlord wished. He exposed the matter in the House, and what was the Chief Secretary's answer? He said it was quite true that these poor people were at the mercy of the landlord; that they were intimidated; but that the Prevention of Crime Act was not passed for magistrates or rent-warners. Again, there were the Resident Magistrates. Instead of being men of high character, well trained, well versed in the law, and perfectly indifferent between parties, the Resident Magistrates of Ireland were almost exclusively composed of promoted police officers, detectives, and broken-down Indian officials. Were these men perfectly indifferent between parties in Ireland? Captain M'Ternan's example at Enniskillen was a warning to them that they would be instantly "Boycotted" in society if they thought for a moment to set up their opinions against those of the landlords. It was perfectly idle to think of getting rid of the difficulty or patching up the system by dismissing a few Orange magistrates, or giving a few Castle Catholics the power of adding J.P. to their names. He believed the difficulty lay much deeper—that the whole system was wrong and rotten; and that until they reformed it root and branch, and gave the people some voice, at all events, in saying who should be their magistrates, they would never get them to look upon the Magistracy as anything better than the soldiers and police, part and parcel of the English garrison, and that they would for ever hate them as the symbols of injustice and despotism.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the present condition of the Irish Magistracy, constituted, as shown by a Return now in the possession of the House, almost exclusively from one religious denomination and one class, is offensive and injurious to the vast majority of the Irish people, and is calculated to destroy all confidence in the ordinary administration of justice in Ireland,"—(Mr. Justin M'Carthy),

—instead thereof.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL asked the permission of the House to state, without indulging in exaggeration, the reasons why he should support the Motion of the hon. Member for Longford. It would be difficult to overstate the practical importance of this question in the eyes of the Irish people, especially the Irish people of the humbler class. It was to them of much greater importance in reality than many questions of wider political significance; because the magistrates in whose hands was placed the administration of justice in Ireland were, in the eyes of the class to which he referred, the whole embodiment and representation of the law. In every question which affected the conduct and action of that class these magistrates were the judges, and practically the irresponsible judges, for from their decisions in the great majority of cases there was virtually no appeal. He remembered hearing this question discussed and debated as a crying grievance considerably more than 30 years ago. Some 30 years since he lived in Ulster, the Province in which he was born, and in the town of Belfast he practised in the other branch of the Profession to which he now had the honour to belong. He recollected that the feeling of the humbler class of Catholics in that Province then was one of utter and complete distrust, speaking generally, in the honesty and fair-mindedness of the magistrates. He did not mean to say that that feeling was well-founded with regard to many men on the Bench in Ulster. On the contrary, he believed that a great many of them desired to be fair, and were fair; but in consequence of the action of no inconsiderable number of their body, and in consequence of the fact that the great majority of them belonged to the religion of a class widely different, and indeed antagonistic, to their own, they felt the utmost distrust in the fair-mindedness and impartiality of the Bench in that Province, especially in cases into which religious and Party considerations entered. The consequences of that feeling of distrust were widespread, and very often led the humbler class of Catholics to take the law into their own hands, believing that on the Bench it would not be administered with even-handed justice. The state of things to which the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) had called attention existed substantially to-day as it had existed 30 or 40 years ago; and although some changes had been made, he felt bound to say that nothing real, nothing effective, nothing thorough had been done. One naturally asked the question, how this came to be so? Well, what he found was this—that the appointments of magistrates in Ireland, whether for boroughs or for counties, had been made upon a wrong principle. The principle, so far as he could make out, was this—that they were made upon the supposition that it was a necessary condition and qualification for an appointment to the Magisterial Bench in the counties that the candidates should be great county magnates. It was thought that they should be great men, with great interests, landlords themselves, or at least agents or sub-agents. In point of fact, it was thought necessary that they should possess the qualifications which were thought necessary for Membership of that House some years ago, but which principle had long since been abandoned. It still, however, was practically enforced in the case of the Magistracy. One of the principles which he would not advocate was that Catholics should be specially appointed merely on account of their religion. He believed that they should try and find out if they could get men of honesty and independence, without taking into account whether they were men of high social position. They should endeavour to obtain men of fair intelligence; and, above all, they should obtain men of fair and honest judgment. A man of fair intelligence should not be considered disqualified for a magisterial position only because he was in strong sympathy with what was called the popular interest. He would say that the first qualities to be looked for in the selection of a magistrate were independence and honesty of character and intelligence. The next thing to be looked for in the magisterial appointment was a man who would have the confidence of the people. That ought to be one of the primary principles of appointment. There was another practical difficulty which existed in this matter which had not yet been adverted to, and to which he would like to draw the attention of the House. The appointment of magistrates in Ireland practically depended upon Lord Lieutenants of the counties. Now, he wished to state, because he thought it right to do so, that he knew cases in which efforts had been made in Ireland by Lord Chancellors to induce Lord Lieutenants of counties to make suitable appointments. He alluded particularly to Lord O'Hagan, Mr. Law, and the present Lord Chancellor; and although he did not desire to examine too closely into the matter, still he thought it would not be fair to overlook the fact that in each of these cases they had acted without the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant, and had also, in some cases, he believed, against the suggestions of the Lord Lieutenants, made appointments to the Magistracy. What he did wish to emphasize was the fact that the Lord Lieutenants were permitted to have the nomination of the magistrates; and this rendered the action of the Lord Chancellor of the day, even if he were desirous of giving a full share of justice to the popular desire, extremely difficult. He would say, once and for all, that this power of nomination and practically the power of veto should not be in the hands of the Lord Lieutenants of the counties. It might be asked, then, who should have the appointment? Well, he thought it should at present be left with the Representative of the Executive Government, the Lord Chancellor. He thought it would be very desirable that these appointments should be made by some person who was not irresponsible to Parliament. If these appointments were made by an Executive Judicial Officer of the Government, they could make him directly responsible for his appointments in that House. He hoped, however, that the time was not far distant when through the medium of County Representative Boards the lawful representatives of the people would have some voice in the nominations of those whose fitness for the place and whose independence and honesty were known to the persons among whom they lived. Lastly, he would say that no political opinion, however strong, no sympathy with the popular movement, however advanced, should be regarded by the Lord Lieutenant or the Lord Chancellor as a bar to magisterial advancement, but rather as a reason for magisterial advancement. There were amongst themselves men who held these advanced opinions. He believed that no man should be objected to for being advanced in his opinions, provided that he forwarded them only by Constitutional means and within the law.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, that in the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for the County of Dublin (Mr. King-Harman), he happened to be the only Lieutenant of an Irish county who had the honour of a seat in the House, and, therefore, he should like to trouble the House with a few observations. He had listened with careful attention to the hon. Member for County Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), who proposed the Motion; and, having read some of his works, more particularly The History of Our Times, famed for its beautiful language and moderation, he (Sir Hervey Bruce) had expected to hear a speech of conspicuous moderation, much as he differed from him in the terms of the Resolution. The hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) took a different view, and evidently thought that the magistrates should be appointed by those who were in direct antagonism to the Government of this country, and who wished to separate the Government of Ireland from Imperial principles. He thought the hon. Member might as well tell them that prisoners to be tried at Assizes should have the power of selecting the juries to try them. So far as regarded the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), he thought his charges had been rather sweeping against the Lieutenants of counties, who had been taunted with not listening to the popular voice when names were submitted. For himself, he (Sir Hervey Bruce) had invariably carefully listened whenever names had been submitted to him on respectable and responsible authority. He had, however, carefully refused to listen to any representation of popularity got up by Memorialists; and he had the authority of the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland for stating that he (Sir Hervey Bruce) was deemed perfectly right in not paying attention to such Memorials so far as regarded any clamorous demand. In a former debate it was noticed that applications were made to Lieutenants to nominate certain persons as magistrates on the ground of Party services. He regretted that that should be so; but thought that it must be accepted as one of the incidents of political life. The allegations which had been made against the Lieutenants rested upon the very slenderest foundation. It had been his desire, so far as possible, to appoint Roman Catholic magistrates where desirable. The late Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Johnson), who had met the rewards of his deserts, and now sat upon the Judicial Bench, had stated in a speech of his that where persons who had been recommended for appointment to the Magistracy had been passed over by the Lieutenants of counties application should be made directly to the Lord Chancellor. He did not know whether the hon. Member for Wicklow had taken that course. [Mr. M'Coan: I did.] He would call attention to remarks made by Mr. Law in July, 1881, when speaking to a Vote of Censure moved by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell). Mr. Law appealed with some confidence to hon. Gentlemen opposite whether, upon the whole, the magistrates deserved the very sweeping charge that was made against them of having abused the powers they were called upon to exercise? The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk, in the same debate, concurred that a sufficient case had not been made out to justify the House in passing such a Resolution. A further Motion was made on the same day by the hon. and learned Member for Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan), expressing dissatisfaction with the constitution of the Irish Bench of Magistrates, in which he stated nine-tenths of the population were Catholics, and 19-20ths of the magistrates were Protestants. He disputed the accuracy of the numbers, though he admitted there was a disproportion. Mr. Johnson further quoted a letter from Lord O'Hagan, then Lord Chancellor, in which he stated as to how many Catholics qualified for the Commission of the Peace had applied to the Lieutenants of counties, and been rejected.

"They had been, in our time, very few indeed. I have always regretted the disproportion between the number of Episcopalian Protestants, Catholics, and Presbyterians in the Magistracy."

And he went on to say "that the disparity of wealth and position made the difficulty." Mr. Johnson, late Solicitor General, quoted further from Lord O'Hagan, in which his Lordship stated that he had not received a single complaint with which he could deal, and then stated his own experience as to the conduct of the Conservative and Protestant Lieutenant of Cork, of his willingness to recommend qualified Catholic gentlemen. The figures of the hon. Member who had brought this question forward were hardly correct, in that he had over-estimated the Catholic and under-estimated the Protestant population in Ireland. The County Fermanagh had been alluded to, and he thought his noble Friend (Viscount Crichton) would be able to answer for his noble Father, than whom there was no man more loved or respected in Ireland for the way in which he had spent his time, his money, and his intellect for the benefit of his native land. [Laughter from the Irish Benches.] Hon. Members might laugh; but he could tell them that when their names were forgotten that of Lord Erne would be remembered and beloved in his native land. He should like to mention one or two instances in defence of the action of the Protestant Lieutenants of Ireland. The county of Meath, for example, had a Protestant Lieutenant, and there were 42 Roman Catholic magistrates and 97 Protestants of all denominations; and in County Limerick there were 123 Protestant magistrates of all denominations, and 42 Roman Catholics. He (Sir Hervey Bruce) thought it would be admitted on all hands that, at any rate, County Limerick had as many Roman Catholics in it as County Meath, and yet Limerick was represented by a Roman Catholic Lieutenant (Lord Emly); and if he had been able to find the people of his own religion in a position, no matter what their station, intelligence, or disinterestedness, to fill the office of Justice of the Peace, he would have appointed them. He might state one other case—that of County Mayo—which had a Protestant Lieutenant; there were 88 Protestant and 26 Roman Catholic magistrates. In County Kerry, with a Roman Catholic Lieutenant, there were 83 Protestant and 32 Roman Catholic magistrates. He thought, therefore, all the Protestant Lieutenants had shown themselves equally willing with those belonging to the Roman Catholic Church to appoint Roman Catholics to the Commission of the Peace. Whilst he (Sir Hervey Bruce) did not wish to convey the impression that he was of opinion that property alone was to be considered the only test of the efficiency of a magistrate, at the same time the independence and education which usually accompanied the possession of property was undoubtedly one of those recommendations which made the position of the magistrate tenable, with honour to himself and advantage to those between whom he was called upon to adjudicate and administer justice. He was perfectly convinced, from an intimate knowledge as a magistrate for many years of his own county and the people of the different districts, that they infinitely preferred, what they called in their own native language, "one of the ould stock"—one who was educated, who was not mixed up in any degree with their quarrels—to decide any differences between them, than a man, however much they might like him, who acted as a spokesman at meetings where there would be demagogic principles, or matters of that sort enunciated. He (Sir Hervey Bruce) was convinced that this was not a religious question; he thought that nothing could possibly be more unsatisfactory than to place the appointment of the magistrates of Ireland upon such a footing. It was a social, not a religious question. He granted that the disparity between Roman Catholic magistrates and the Protestants gave the matter a certain colour; but, after all, it was only a colour, and not really the foundation of a matter calling for the serious attention of the House. This desire to become a magistrate in Ireland was simply extraordinary. Directly a man bought two or three houses, or became the owner of property, the next thing he sought to be made was a Justice of the Peace. He instinctively thought that it was a qualification for the Magistracy, and that the Lieutenant of his county was bound to recommend him to be made a member of the Bench. Then, as regarded the appointment of priests to the Magistracy, it was a direct instruction from the Lord Chancellor of Ireland that no officiating clergyman of any persuasion was to be recommended to him for appointment unless the case positively demanded it.

MR. O'BRIEN: How did the Rev. John Frith get upon the Enniskillen Bench, then?

SIR HERVEY BRUCE: I do not know that county.

MR. O'BRIEN: I thought all Ireland knew about the Rev. John Frith.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, he did know the case referred to; but he did not care if there were 20 Mr. Friths. Unless it was absolutely necessary for clergymen to be appointed, none were appointed; and perhaps hon. Gentlemen were not aware that the paper which was sent round for signature to those who were recommended by the Lieutenant of a county for appointment did not contain a single word about religion. He could honestly tell the House that he was not aware of the religion of many of those whom he recommended to the Lord Chancellor; and, indeed, he had frequently recommended gentlemen of the Roman Catholic persuasion for the Commission of the Peace. It was a sentimental grievance, and certainly not one of the extent it had been represented to be. He (Sir Hervey Bruce) was perfectly satisfied that it was not the grievance that it was represented to be; and to show the want of existence of any bitter feeling in the county to which he belonged, which he knew was essentially a Protestant county, he might state that they had had last year a Roman Catholic High Sheriff, for the first time, he believed, since the time of Queen Elizabeth. The Grand Jury responded to his summons almost more fully than ever before, so as to do honour to the High Sheriff, and to show that there was no dissatisfaction at his being appointed. The education of the county was principally confined to the Protestant portion of the population.

MR. HEALY: Through your stealing our endowments.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, that he did not mind interpolations from

hon. Members, because they sometimes assisted him; but such was the fact, the Roman Catholics, although in a majority as regarding population, were in the minority as regarding education.

MR. O'BRIEN: The Catholics hardly look for all the prizes which the Protestant members of the Bar get, and that is the reason of the comparatively small number of Catholic barristers.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE: Well, perhaps, that also applied to the Judgeships. The hon. Member's observations made him go a little further; because, undoubtedly, the Judgeships of Ireland were filled up more in proportion to the barristers by the Roman Catholics than by the Protestants. He could assure the House most positively that the people of the country had no such distrust of the Protestant magistrates as was represented by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell). He believed that if the people of the country were not stirred up by those who had an object other than religion in view in bringing forward this question, they would accept the position of affairs as it was now. If hon. Members would suggest how the present state of affairs was to be remedied, consistently with the holding together of this great Empire, without dissolving the Union which had been established now for so long between England and Ireland, he, for one, would be most willing to join in the proposition. He could assure hon. Members that it was no light or enviable task, though it was an honourable one, to discharge the duty of recommending certain gentlemen to the Lord Chancellor as fitted for the office of the Magistracy. In the few words he had spoken he hoped that the cause he had at heart, although inadequately presented to the House, had not suffered at his hands.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON said, he entirely challenged the statement of the hon. Member who had just sat down, that the people of Ireland were satisfied with the present system under which the Irish Magistracy were appointed. The hon. Member had referred to a number of authorities; but he (Viscount Lympington) thought that the authority to be consulted in deciding as to the truth of the statement was the authority of the people of Ireland. It was a fact, which hardly any Member of the House could deny, that this was a Motion which would be supported, not only by the section of Irish Members sitting in one portion of the House, but by the vast majority of the Irish Members sitting on both sides of the House, and by a large number of Members who, if not themselves Irish Members, were interested in Ireland. His hon. Friend told them that this was not a religious, but a social question. Well, it was because it was a social question it seemed to him that the House ought to attach great weight to the way in which this matter was looked at by the Irish people. The duties of the Irish magistrates, though in themselves of very great importance, were rendered far more difficult, and required the exercise of the utmost discretion and tact, owing to the various political and social differences that existed in Ireland. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) made a very fair suggestion, he thought, when he said that, after all, the Government were not responsible for the present system. The Government could not be responsible so long as the selection of the Irish magistrates was in other hands than their own. He was sorry that the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) had spoken so disparagingly of the Resident Magistrates. He believed that Mr. Clifflord Lloyd, for instance, had been an agent, and he thought, on the whole, a merciful agent, of the powers that were intrusted to him by Members on that side of the House and by the Conservative Party. He thought they would have to look for some remedy for the present state of affairs more immediate than the introduction of such a measure as the County Government of Ireland. He thought they ought to expect the Chief Secretary that night to tell them—first, whether he was satisfied with the present position of affairs; and, secondly, if he was not satisfied, that he would tell them the means by which the appointment of magistrates in Ireland should not rest entirely with the Lieutenants of counties, who—and he spoke with all respect of the hon. Member for Londonderry—were qualified neither by experience nor ability to perform the duties of their position. He hoped the Chief Secretary would suggest some means by which the appointment of magistrates in Ireland should be placed under the control of popular opinion and of the Members of that House. It was for this reason that he supported most heartily the Motion of the hon. Member for Longford.

Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN said, it was admitted on all sides that the condition of Ireland at the present time was not satisfactory, and, moreover, that it had been unsatisfactory for a very long period. Now they were dealing with one of the causes of that state of things. He asserted that the administration, or rather the maladministration, of justice in Ireland in all its branches was one of the causes—and a very potent cause it was—of what was called the unsatisfactory condition of Ireland. They had heard a great deal in that House of the loyalty or disloyalty of the Irish people. The word “loyal” was used, not in the sense of mere allegiance to the Sovereign of this Realm—it was used as implying a want of allegiance to the system and rule that prevailed in that country. Well, they were that night dealing with one of the reasons why there was no loyalty in Ireland amongst the masses of the people to the system of rule that prevailed in Ireland. The reason was because the Irish people had no confidence in the administration of justice in any of its Departments. The Magistracy of Ireland was drawn exclusively from the ascendancy class in that country. It was drawn almost exclusively from those whom the people regarded as the enemies of the Irish people. It was drawn almost exclusively, at all events in a preponderating degree, from the people of one form of religious belief, and there used to be a pretence that, nevertheless, those gentlemen administered justice. It was so pretended to the people of England; but the Irish people never believed any such representation, because they knew very much better. Circumstances, however, had recently occurred, which had absolutely torn the veil from the face of those gentlemen, and revealed them in their true light to the people of Ireland and England and the whole world. Why, the magistrates of Ireland had risen in insurrection against a small act of common justice and good policy and sound feeling performed lately by Her Majesty's Government. Such was the Magistracy to whose tender mercies were left the people of Ireland. The Catholics of Ireland were “Boycotted” off the Bench; they were "Boycotted" even off the petty juries; the Catholics of Ireland were not thought good enough to serve upon them; yet they were thought good enough to pay taxes—they were thought good enough to go out to the Soudan and get shot. Through his hands had come contributions from Catholic Irishmen in the Army and the Navy to help to carry on the National movement in Ireland; and he warned the Government to take care how they gave those people just cause of offence, and how they trampled on the feelings of their co-religionists in Ireland. Was it not confessed that the Magistracy of Ireland consisted almost altogether of landlords and landlords' agents; and was there any class in Ireland, or in any country, more distrusted or detested by the people among whom they lived than were the landlords and agents of Ireland? And if they had a spite against the Irish people in other days, they had ten times more of it now. The only qualification for a magistrate in Ireland was to be the owner of a certain number of acres of land, no matter how heavily mortgaged they might be. If the Government wanted a Magistracy which would command the confidence of the Irish people, let them look out for honest men—he would not say poor men, but men of independence and honour.

MR. M'COAN, who, on rising, was received with ironical cheers from the Irish Members, said, he would not be deterred by those jeers from giving his experience in the county of Wicklow, so far as it bore upon the question now before the House. He had on a former occasion called the attention of the House to this subject; and his knowledge of what had occurred during the last three years had in no way lessened his sense of the gravity of the complaint. The county of Wicklow was one of the worst cases in point, for out of a total of 104 magistrates on the Bench only five were Roman Catholics, 94 were Protestants of the Church of Ireland. There was not a single Presbyterian, Methodist, or member of the Society of Friends amongst them; and the remaining five, as regarded their religious denominations, were returned as "unknown." It was to remedy a similar condition of things that he, three years ago, introduced a similar Motion to that now before the House. He did not stop there, however, but endeavoured afterwards to make such a selection of Catholic gentlemen in the county as, by their social standing, intelligence, and character, might warrant him in recommending them to the Lord Chancellor of the day for the Commission of the Peace. He did so, with the help of many Roman Catholic clergymen and Protestant and Catholic laymen, themselves of position and character; and he was bound to say that in a county where four-fifths of the population were Catholic he was able only to select some 10 names from amongst the Catholic gentlemen and better-class tradesmen, who seemed to be generally regarded as eligible for nomination. Of these, three had declined to be put in nomination; the other seven consented, and their names he submitted to the Lord Chancellor, who, however, reminded him that the usual course was that such recommendations should reach him through the Lieutenant of the county, Lord Meath. Accordingly, he sent the names to Lord Meath; but not one of the seven was accepted by that Nobleman for nomination. Discouraged by that experience, he had allowed the matter to sleep for nearly two years; and within recent months he had again made another attempt to break through the monopoly of the magisterial position held by Protestants in the county. This time he submitted to Lord Meath three names of gentlemen of social position and high character, personally known to be such by the Lieutenant himself. With regard to the first of these, Lord Meath, while admitting the high qualifications of the gentleman, said that, having regard to the Public Service, he did not feel called upon to send forward his name to the Lord Chancellor. When, a few weeks later, he submitted the other two names, Lord Meath, with less than the usual courtesy, replied almost in these terms—"My 50 years' experience in the county requires no prompting from you; be good enough to mind your own business." He had no word to say against Lord Meath personally—he was a good landlord and a man of high personal character; but such an answer induced him to forward the two names to the Lord Chancellor direct, with a copy of Lord Meath's curt reply; and he entertained the hope that Sir Edward Sullivan's sense of justice and personal appreciation of the gentlemen recommended would have a different result. That was an ounce of fact and experience which, in a discussion of this kind, was worth many pounds of rhetoric. Since Lord Meath's appointment to the Lieutenantcy, in 1869, he had only appointed one Catholic to the Bench. But his (Mr. M'Coan's) objection was—and he spoke as a Protestant—not only that members of one creed exclusively were chosen for the Bench, but also that the choice was confined to men of one particular class. In the county of Wicklow they were all either landlords or land agents, or otherwise immediately connected with the landlord caste. In vain he looked over the list for a single magistrate who was engaged in trade, as shopkeeper, or was a professional man, excepting a few Protestant barristers, mostly resident in Dublin, and having only the slightest connection with the county. Only five Catholics out of a total of 104 magistrates! That was a fact which fully justified the angry invectives that had fallen from hon. Members opposite. The feeling expressed by those hon. Gentlemen was shared throughout Wicklow, not only by so-called Nationalists and members of the League, but by Protestant farmers, by shopkeepers, and also by thousands of others belonging to both the upper and lower classes. Indeed, all below the landlord caste complained of the existing scandalous anomaly in regard to magisterial appointments. There was a large field for selection among the upper trading and professional classes, which included men of education, position, and character, and with as high a sense of personal honour and integrity as the best men at present on the Magisterial Bench. The anomaly was a just ground of complaint, against not only the present but all preceding Governments. The mere appointment of more Catholics would not be a sufficient remedy. The field of selection should be widened and lowered; and if this were done, he had no doubt that suitable occupants for the Magisterial Bench, to whom no political or social exception could be taken, would be found without difficulty. Some of the writers in the Nationalist Press wrote strongly against the idea of members of their Party accepting Commissions of the Peace, and consenting to administer

British law at all. Such an attitude, no doubt, rendered it difficult for the Government or the House to know how to meet such a Motion as the present one; but, for himself, he should urge the Government to disregard such utterances, and to make early and generous efforts to remedy this, a real Irish grievance.

MR. PLUNKET said, he did not think the Motion before the House, or the manner in which it was being debated, was of a very practical character. The Motion was framed in very strong language, and supported by considerations the most opposite. It was introduced by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) in a speech which was distinguished, as most of the hon. Member's speeches in the House were, by great moderation, clearness, and eloquence, but wholly out of accord with the speeches which followed from Members of his own Party. Now, the hon. Member for Longford really rested his case on this—that assuming the Magistracy of Ireland were to be continued substantially on the same principle as now existing, it was a great pity that a larger number of Roman Catholics were not upon it, and that it was a great mistake to appoint them from one social rank in the country. So far he (Mr. Plunket) agreed. He should be very glad if they had a greater number of persons well qualified to fill the post of Justice of the Peace who belonged to the religion of the majority of the people of Ireland, and he should be glad to see the area of selection extended; but that was not at all the spirit in which the hon. Member for Longford was followed by his Colleagues. They took quite a different view. The hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) spoke out plainly and frankly, as he always did; and he (Mr. Plunket) was afraid the hon. Member was a truer Representative of the majority of those who returned to this House the Gentlemen below the Gangway than was the hon. Member for Longford. The hon. Member for Mallow said—"There is no use in talking about a greater number of Roman Catholic magistrates, because I, for one, would prefer an Orange Tory magistrate to the kind of Roman Catholic magistrates one is likely to get." There was no use going on arguing if that was the spirit to be exhibited by Members of Roman Catholic magistrates did not share the views of the majority of the people, so long as they were not men of strong political opinions, sympathizing with what was called the National Cause, so long, said the hon. Member for Mal- low, would the people of Ireland regard them with the same detestation as they already regarded the policemen and soldiers—namely, as the garrison of England. It was impossible to continue a debate on such grounds. To intrust the administration of the law to men chosen especially because they held opinions absolutely inconsistent with the observance of the law was perfect absurdity. But what he (Mr. Plunket) had just reason to complain of was, that men like the noble Viscount the Member for Barnstaple (Viscount Lymington), in a fine, philosophic spirit, came down with some shadowy theory of magisterial appointments, and actually added his weight to the opinion put forward by hon. Members from Ireland below the Gangway. The noble Viscount showed by his speech that he knew nothing at all about the country. He did not adduce a single fact, or give one particle of evidence; he had no remedy to suggest, and yet he gave his support to a Resolution that declared that—

“The present condition of the Irish Magistracy is calculated to destroy all confidence in the ordinary administration of justice in Ireland.”

It was a matter to be deplored to the last degree that hon. Members of the Party opposite should commit themselves to these kinds of theory, and should then seem afterwards to be surprised that they were called upon to vote Coercive Bills and other measures for putting down and counteracting the opinions which they had previously done their best to encourage. The hon. Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce) had made a complete and satisfactory defence on behalf of the magistrates of Ireland, and therefore he (Mr. Plunket) would only ask what alternatives had been put forward by speakers in this discussion? One remedy was that the magistrates of Ireland should be elected; but even in America, where Republicanism was robust and strong, and where there were safeguards for the social order and well-being of the people which did not exist in Ireland, the machinery of judicial power was in a most deplorable condition—condemned not only by other countries, but by the Americans themselves—and yet the very root of evil in that country was admitted to be that which arose from the election of the Judges. He did hope that whatever misfortunes might be in store for Ireland she would, at all events, be spared the infliction of any elected magistrates. Another remedy which was proposed was that the Magistracy should be responsible to that House. He found it difficult to understand that suggestion. Were they to elect the Magistracy of Ireland as their Committees were elected? If not, and if the suggestion was that the action of the magistrates should be subject to revision in the House, then he was still more surprised, for of all the officials of the Three Kingdoms there were none upon whom the fierce light of Parliamentary criticism beat more strongly than upon the Justices of Ireland. Complaint after complaint was made in the form of Questions; but in 19 cases out of 20 they were unfounded, and for that reason, perhaps, it was a very good thing the Questions were asked. He did not believe that responsible politicians, of whatever nation or Party, would support this Resolution. He was as desirous as anybody to see more Roman Catholics appointed; but he must join in the protest of his hon. Friend (Sir Hervey Bruce) against the wholesale charges, unsupported by facts or evidence, which had been brought against a body of public servants in Ireland, who were, almost without exception, of the highest character, and animated by the best of motives.

Mr. T. A. DICKSON said, he should vote for the Motion; but protested against the wholesale charges, unsupported by detailed facts or evidence of any kind, made at the expense of a body of public servants in Ireland, who, he believed, were almost without exception of the highest character, and acted with the greatest possible conscientiousness. The Motion had been supported in language which he held to be not one whit stronger than the facts of the case warranted. The charge brought against the noble Viscount the Member for Barnstaple (Viscount Lymington), that he knew nothing about the subject, could not be brought against that House; because so long as the him. He was an Irish Member, and did know something about it. The grievance in connection with the Magistracy pointed out by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) was not a grievance connected with Catholics in various parts of Ireland; but it was a grievance which, to his knowledge, affected both Presbyterians and Catholics in Ulster. The Presbyterians composed nearly half of the population of that Province, while the Catholic population was equal to the Presbyterian and members of the Church of Ireland combined. During the 10 years in which he had been a Member of that House he had done his best to get the grievance remedied; and his efforts had been successful to this extent—that whereas three years since there were only one or two Presbyterians among the Magistracy of Tyrone, the number had slowly crept up, and there were now 24 Presbyterians and 6 Catholics. But he need not say, taking into consideration that the population was composed largely of Presbyterians and Catholics, that number was far below what they were entitled to if there were any kind of fair representation of the religions on the Bench. Although Presbyterians numbered half of the population of the Province of Ulster, there were only 137 magistrates of that religion out of 1,065, while 840 belonged to the Church of Ireland, and Catholics, who formed more than half of the population, had only 88. Catholics and Presbyterians, who made three-fourths of the population, had only 225 magistrates on the Commission. The only reason he could give why the Presbyterians of Ulster were not better represented on the Bench was that they nearly all belonged to the middle classes—they were nearly all merchants and farmers. There were few landed proprietors or agents amongst the Presbyterians, and the same remark, he believed, applied to the Catholics. In Tyrone half the Protestant population were Presbyterian, and yet out of the 159 magistrates only 24 were Presbyterians. The Catholics formed more than half the population, and their entire representation on the Bench amounted to six, and these had all been put on within the last three years. Fermanagh had been alluded to by the hon. Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce). In Fermanagh the majority of the people were Catholic, and yet they had only one representative on the entire Magistracy. The Methodists formed the backbone of the Protestant population; but out of 74 magistrates in the county only two belonged to that Body. Only last week one of the leading Methodist clergy in Fermanagh wrote to him upon the want of Methodist magistrates; and he advised his correspondent to write to the Lord Lieutenant of the county, feeling sure that a representation from a leading member of a numerous Body in Fermanagh would be attended to. What was the result? The name was submitted of a small landed proprietor, but it was peremptorily refused. The Government sheltered themselves behind the Lord Lieutenants of the counties. It was said the nominations lay with the Lord Lieutenants; but he wanted to ask the Chief Secretary who appointed the Lord Lieutenants? There had been Liberal Viceroyes in Dublin for more than 34 years out of the last 50, and if there was any anxiety to have Liberal Lord Lieutenants in the counties those Viceroyes had ample opportunity of appointing such; but yet all over Ulster there was only one Liberal Lord Lieutenant, and he would not have been appointed if it were not that he happened to be a Lord. [An hon. MEMBER: Who is he?] He referred to Lord Waveney. When the late Lord Lieutenant of Armagh—who was a Liberal—died, he (Mr. Dickson), along with other Liberal Members from Ulster, specially attended at the Castle to urge Lord Cowper to appoint a Liberal. They recommended a gentleman who was a large landed proprietor, and who had declined the honour of a Baronetcy. But then he was not a Lord, and, of course, he was not appointed, and Lord Gosford, a young Nobleman resident in Armagh, was appointed. On his arrival he had to ask his way to his own residence. What could Lord Gosford know about those qualified to act as magistrates in Armagh? Why, no more than Lord Cowper did. And who were his advisers? The land gentry, who, of course, gave biased representation to him. The result was that since Lord Gosford was appointed by a Liberal Lord Lieutenant no one Presbyterian or Catholic had been appointed to the Magistracy in the county.

MR. BERESFORD: I rise to Order. The very last gentleman who was appointed to the Commission of the Peace, within the last month, was a Presbyterian. [Cries of "Name!"] Mr. Moorhead, who—

MR. SEXTON: Upon the point of Order, I beg to ask you, Sir, whether the hon. Member interprets the Rule of Order correctly in supposing that a statement merely held by him to be inaccurate is thereby a breach of Order?

MR. SPEAKER motioned to Mr. Dickson to proceed.

MR. T. A. DICKSON, continuing, said, the difficulties in regard to the Irish Magistracy with which the Government were face to face were largely the creation of former Whig Viceroys, who refused to appoint anyone as Lord Lieutenant unless he belonged to the aristocracy. The magistrates had been defended by hon. Members opposite; but all he could say—and he knew as much about it as any Member of that House—was, that since the late violent outbreak of Party spirit the confidence of the Catholics of Ulster had been weakened, if not destroyed, in the administration of justice. Could it be wondered at? Was it matter of surprise, after the events in connection with the magistracy which had been referred to that night? What confidence could a Catholic of Ulster have in the administration of justice when brought before the Master of an Orange Lodge? What confidence could that Catholic have in the administration of justice in a case arising out of a Party riot? The question would be asked, what was the remedy? He thought it was very plain, and it was that magistrates should not continue to be drawn solely from one class—that class being landowners or their agents; but that they should be honest, upright, intelligent men—business men, respectable farmers, if they liked—and men who had the confidence of the people in the locality in which they lived. These men should not be thought unworthy of the Commission of the Peace. He was glad that they had now in Office a Lord Chancellor who was strong enough to act on his own judgment, so that everything would not be yielded to the privileged classes. The hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce) had stated that he always carefully listened to every representation that was made to him, and to every Memorial.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, that he did not listen to Memorials, and in not doing so he acted under the advice of the Lord Chancellor.

MR. T. A. DICKSON: The hon. Baronet did not act upon Memorials then? He (Mr. Dickson) wished to point out to the hon. Baronet that Memorials were the only form in which the people could properly express their opinions upon this subject. What was the use of one man in the county of Londonderry going to the hon. Baronet and asking him to appoint a magistrate? The hon. Baronet said he listened to all representations made to him, and what was the result? Only 25 Presbyterians were magistrates for the county and nine Catholics. He did not know the exact proportion which the Catholics formed, but he knew that three-fourths of the people of the county were Presbyterians, and yet he could only find out 25 who were qualified for the Commission of the Peace, though he said he had gone out of his way to appoint them, and though there were 118 belonging to the Church of Ireland. The hon. Baronet also stated that in the paper sent to those nominated there was nothing about religion. That was so; but there was plenty about land—about how many acres of land they owned, and who was their agent, or whose agent were they. It was only fair he should say a word in connection with the Lord Lieutenant of his own county—that was Lord Charlemont—and he had to say, in justice to him, that during the last fortnight he had communications with him as to increasing the number of magistrates in Tyrone; and his Lordship wrote that he was perfectly ready to appoint a Catholic magistrate in every Petty Sessions district in Tyrone if suitable names were placed before him. Lord Charlemont cordially acceded to his wishes in appointing four Presbyterians and four Catholics last week.

MR. HARRINGTON said, the Return as to the Magistracy showed how very strangely the system of appointment worked in the North as compared with the South. It had happened that in the North of Ireland, among those appointed to the Magistracy, there were numbers of men belonging to the farming class;

while in the South there was scarcely a single farmer on the list. In order to justify their presence in the North the word "wealthy" was placed before their names in the Return. Everyone who was acquainted with the circumstances of the farming classes in Ireland knew perfectly well that in the South of the country—in Limerick, Tipperary, and Cork—there were many farmers who were much better off, and better educated, than the farmers appointed to the Magistracy in the North. The reason was that political Parties in the North held the appointment out as a bribe at the elections. When Members were returned they tried to conciliate certain sections of their supporters by putting their names forward for the Magistracy. In almost every parish of Tyrone men were pointed out to him who knew they were to be raised to the Bench. They knew they would be elevated to that position owing to their services in political struggles, or perhaps for coming in at the call of duty to break the heads of their fellow-countrymen. The Liberal Party had a special interest in setting this question at rest, because, whenever they attempted reform in Ireland, they met with the most hostile opposition from those very landlords whom they had elevated to the Magistracy. In Kerry there were 118 magistrates, all of whom, except one, held landed property in the county. In Kerry very much agrarian agitation had been carried on; and as regarded agrarian outrages, the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had placed it at the head of the list of all other counties in Ireland. Did the right hon. Gentleman suppose that the dominant class did not strive to suppress the uprising of the people for their rights, and that the number of outrages in the county was not due to the system which the Government had themselves created? It had been his own fortune, more than once, to have incurred the enmity of that class, and he found himself brought to trial in Kerry, as President of the local branch of the Land League, before a Bench of magistrates, seven in number, and the seven were landlords. He presumed they were men whose conduct had been canvassed at the various meetings of the League; and the seven magistrates sat in judgment upon him, not only for his own words, but for the words of others, because he tried to save the people from the oppression to which they had been subjected. Not only was Kerry at the head of the counties of Ireland as regarded the number of outrages, but also as regarded the number of evictions; and it was remarkable, where such absolute power was in the hands of the landlords, that the rents were higher than elsewhere, and, even as reduced by the Commissioners, they were still 50 per cent above the Government valuation. There could be no confidence in the administration of justice when it was dispensed by one class. It was a remarkable fact that in Ireland in many counties the magisterial power rested in two or three families, who had intermarried, and the sons of which were put into the Commission of the Peace the moment they came of age. They had a glaring instance of the manner in which these families managed the county business. In Kerry, Sir Maurice O'Connell, whom no person could describe as a Nationalist, and who was on the Grand Jury for 15 years, was excluded from it this year because the Hussey family, who had the selection of the Grand Jury, wanted to put in their own men in order to carry a job. There were 96 per cent of the population in Kerry Catholics, and yet there were 96 Protestant magistrates, and only 32 Catholic magistrates. How could the Chief Secretary expect that, under those circumstances, there could be any respect for the administration of the law in Kerry? The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) said that they did not challenge the impartiality of the administration of the law in Ireland by the present magistrates. That was exactly what they were doing. He referred the right hon. and learned Gentleman to the evidence lately given in Londonderry by Captain M'Ternan, and to the fact that a meeting of the Fermanagh magistrates, convened by the Lord Lieutenant of the county, was about to be held to denounce Captain M'Ternan because he had the firmness of character and strength of mind to give such evidence. He referred the right hon. and learned Gentleman also to even a more recent case than the one at Enniskillen—the case against Colonel Digby, who, when the Arrears Act was passed, thought a good opportunity was afforded to him for stealing a little money from the Treasury. Colonel Digby got his tenants to make false declarations that they owed him arrears, when they really did not owe him anything. But when he found that attention was directed to the case of Mr. John Byrne, the late Collector General of Dublin, who attempted the same game, he was wise enough to decline to receive the money. Colonel Digby was brought to trial in Westmeath, and how was the tribunal which tried him composed? Two brother-landlords, one of whom did not attend the Court for three years, came on that day in order to serve a friend, though he perjured himself. There was also the Resident Magistrate. Of course, Colonel Digby was acquitted, though the Resident Magistrate said he ought to be sent for trial. Now, he did not think the Crown would be doing its duty if it allowed that case to rest, or if they allowed to continue in the Commission of the Peace a man who endeavoured to perpetrate a fraud, and who only refused to benefit by it when he found another man was punished for a similar offence. These were only specimens of the many cases of the kind that occurred in Ireland. "But," said the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Plunket), "What remedy do you propose?" Whenever Irish Members complained of a grievance they were always met with the reply, "What remedy do you propose?" But no sooner did they propose a remedy than they were met with opposition, not only from one, but from the two sides of the House. Their reply now was that it was not their duty to propose a remedy. It was the duty of the Government, which assumed the responsibility of governing Ireland, to propose a remedy for this state of things.

MR. EWART heartily concurred in the sentiments that had been expressed by his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) in regard to the present position of the Magistracy in Ireland; and, after the speech of the hon. Member for the County of Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson), he thought it would be admitted that the question under discussion was not a strictly Party question as between Liberals and Conservatives. The hon. Member for Tyrone did not seem to know much about who constituted his own Party when he described Lord Gos-ford, who was a Whig, as a Conservative. The present state of things was very much owing to the system that had prevailed in Ireland for a very long time. The origin of the system dated from the time when Ireland was divided into three classes—landlords, farmers, and labourers—and when, in point of fact, there were very few of what might be called the middle classes. At that time there was a great want of education among the Roman Catholics, and few of them were eligible for the Commission of the Peace. He (Mr. Ewart) was glad to say that there was an improvement going on, and that a much larger proportion of the middle classes, both of the Roman Catholic and Presbyterian Party, were being added to the Magistracy. He agreed with the hon. Member for the County of Tyrone in regard to the classes from which the Magistracy might be drawn. He would, however, add a further condition—that they should be taken from the loyal classes; but that, he was afraid, would not give satisfaction to the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien), who would not appoint magistrates so much for the class as for the political Party to which they belonged. The hon. Member for Mallow would rather have them appointed for their disloyalty than for their loyalty; and no Lord Chancellor could think of appointing men who did not belong to the loyal classes. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) proposed that the magistrates should be an elected body; but, with the experience of America, this would not be found to be on the side of a pure administration of justice. A strong statement had been made in the course of the debate about Lord Meath; but he (Mr. Ewart) would require strong proof before he could believe it. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk had referred to the dissatisfaction that had been expressed with regard to the administration of justice in Belfast, and he (Mr. Ewart) must say that it was the first time that he had ever heard any charge of the kind. [MR. KENNEDY: How about Mr. Haslett?] He believed that everywhere an amendment was taking place; more should be done by those who recommended gentlemen for the Commission of the Peace to the Lord Chancellor to bring about a representation of all classes upon the Magi-tracy; and he thought that the Lord Chancellor should exercise a more strict scrutiny over the appointments which he made, so that each religion should have fair play. In reference to the appointment of magistrates in Belfast, he might say that, during the time of the late Government, he and his Colleague (Mr. Corry) had been in communication with the authorities on that very subject, and they took care that there should be a fair proportion of Roman Catholics and Presbyterians; he and his Colleague did what they could in that direction in the way of nominating suitable Roman Catholics. Two or three of those nominated by them were appointed magistrates; but one nominated had declined to serve. He would like to see fair play in this matter, and he gave this instance to show what was the feeling of Irish Members on that side of the House.

MR. FINDLATER said, they all should be extremely obliged to the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) for having obtained this Return. It disclosed a state of things which ought clearly to be altered. In the county which he represented—Monaghan—great dissatisfaction prevailed with regard to the Magistracy. According to the last Census, the population of that county was 102,748, and of these the Roman Catholics numbered 75,748. There were 66 magistrates, of whom 44 were landlords, and 12 agents, leaving only 10 for all the other classes. Only two farmers were magistrates, and one of these was returned as a “gentleman farmer.” There were but seven Roman Catholic magistrates; 58 belonged to the Church of Ireland, and one was a Presbyterian. In the name of fair play, was that proper representation of the county? He and his late Colleague used efforts on several occasions to obtain the appointment of magistrates, but failed altogether. Lord Dartrey was Lord Lieutenant of the county, and his letters of reply were anything but pleasant. There were many educated persons amongst the tradesmen who would make excellent magistrates, and would act on the Bench in a manner creditable to themselves and satisfactory to the country. He cordially supported the Resolution of the hon. Member for Longford.

COLONEL NOLAN remarked, that the enormous weight of Irish opinion had been very clearly expressed in favour of the Amendment, and he would not be afraid of the result if it depended upon the votes of the Irish Representatives who had been present; but he did not doubt that when the Division came, hon. Gentlemen who had not shown any interest in the question would come in and outvote the Irish Members. So far as he was aware, no speaker had yet drawn attention to the fact that magistrates in Ireland did something more than administer justice. Being a magistrate gave a man a position in a county which was of pecuniary advantage to his friends and class. It gave him the right to sit at the Poor Law Board, to attend Road Sessions, to vote at the election of county officers, and to assist in the administration of the county votes, which were practically disbursed by the magistrates, although they were mainly contributed by the tenants. He believed these powers of the magistrates were felt far more in Galway than in anything relating to the administration of justice. He complained of the inadequate number of Roman Catholic magistrates who had been appointed. In Galway they were not so well off in respect to Catholic magistrates as he would wish; but still, he thought, when compared with other counties in Ireland, they were in a good—a splendid position. It had been complained that Catholics had been excluded from the Bench as Catholics, but he did not attach any great importance to that; but he believed that Lord Lieutenants of counties were in the habit of selecting men with a very considerable amount of landed property, and in some cases even they selected men who did not ask to be appointed. He thought it would be well if some controlling power could be exercised over the Lord Lieutenants, so as to insure the appointment of the necessary number of Protestants and Catholics. On looking at the Returns in his county, he thought it was very extraordinary not only that Catholics had been kept off the Bench, but also that farmers had been kept off the Bench. He knew in his county men who farmed very large tracts of land, and yet out of the 200 magistrates not more than four of them were farmers, and of these four he must confess two were proprietors. He could practically say that farmers were kept off the Bench, and also that commercial men were kept off the Bench. He could not agree with the hon. Member (Sir Hervey Bruce), usually a good authority on Irish Conservative subjects, who stated that the people of Ireland liked to have one class of men to represent them in that House and another class of men to represent them on the Bench. He thought that the proposal which had been made by the hon. Member for Limerick was a reasonable one—that was, that each Poor Law Union in Ireland should have power to nominate at least one representative. That was a suggestion which he thought the Government might fairly take into consideration. Another remedy would be to really make the Lord Lieutenants of Ireland sensible people, and not have persons who would precipitate matters. He would also suggest that in such towns as Gort, Tuam, Ballinasloe, &c., commercial men should be selected, and that out of the 200 magistrates about 40 should be commercial men. Some 100 years ago, when Catholics were not educated, they were excluded from the Bench; but he believed that the Catholics would never have put up with it had they been educated. He would not ask the Government to appoint Catholics, whether they were educated or not. English Members to whom he had spoken on this subject informed him that the appointment of magistrates to a great extent depended upon the recommendation of the Members; but such a practice did not anywhere exist in Ireland. In conclusion, he expressed a hope that the Government would take the matter into consideration; and, whatever might be the result of the vote upon the Motion that night, he hoped that something would be done to remedy the present state of affairs.

MR. MACFARLANE wished to say a few words upon this subject, and he wished to confine himself entirely to the general question. They were aware that there was a good deal of opposition to the present system of the Magistracy. The whole of the people were dissatisfied with the administration of the law. He believed that the laws were unjust, and that the fountains of justice were poisoned. Now, this must have a fatal effect upon administration of the law in any country; and when it was believed that the whole system of law was rotten, as was undoubtedly the belief in Ireland, it was absolutely essential that some effort should be made to remedy it. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had shown the House what was the cause of all this. In this country (England) if a man was brought before a magistrate he did not inquire what was his religion, whether Catholic or Protestant; but in Ireland the case was different, as there the people instructed the magistrates. The question was a serious one, and he hoped it would be taken into serious consideration by the Government. If they wished the people to be law-abiding they should try and impress them with confidence in those who administered the law. He believed the Chief Secretary was willing to do what he could. [MR. BIGGAR: Oh, oh!] Hon. Members might jeer; but he might say for himself that he believed the Chief Secretary was willing to do what he could. [MR. BIGGAR: Oh, oh!] He believed the Government should try and satisfy the minds of the people.

MR. LEA supported the Motion, as he believed that it was essential that some steps should be taken to devise a remedy for the present state of things in Ireland as regarded the Magistracy. There was no doubt that a remedy was urgently required. He could only hope that it would not come too late. The hon. Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce), who was a Lord Lieutenant, said he had listened to all representations made to him with regard to the Magistracy, and dealt with them separately. His (Mr. Lea's) experience was very different, for he had received no reply to letters or memorials forwarded by him to the Lord Lieutenant of the county of Donegal, and any gentlemen whose names had been urged by him had only been appointed to the Magistracy by reason of the influence of the Lord Chancellor. Now, the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) hit the right nail on the head when he said that the Lords Lieutenant were an absolute bar to the confidence of the people of Ireland in the magistrates. The Magistracy in Ireland at present was used as an agency for political purposes, and was conferred by way of political patronage. Such a state of things could never be satisfactory to the country, nor could it induce a satisfactory regard for the law. This matter was partly a religious question and partly a social one; but no one who had not something to do with the land, either as an agent or a landowner, had but little to do with the Commission of the Peace. In the county of Donegal, where there was certainly a great preponderance of Roman Catholics, there were only nine Roman Catholic magistrates. He had found that applications to the Lord Lieutenant of Londonderry were much more favourably received than similar applications made to the Lord Lieutenant of Donegal. He himself had been able, in spite of writing a large number of letters, to obtain but very little attention. He believed that in the last three years three Catholics and two Presbyterians had been appointed magistrates in the county of Donegal; and here he might remark that Catholics and Presbyterians experienced almost equal difficulty in getting their names on the Commission of the Peace. He hoped the Chief Secretary would, in the course of his speech, say that there should be some measure of relief in this matter; as he maintained that unless something was done in respect of the Irish Magistracy serious injury would be done to the cause of law and order.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that as the hon. Member who spoke last represented the county of Donegal, he might have stated that 19-20ths of the Catholic population were either agricultural labourers or occupied holdings of less than £10 annual value; and one of the great difficulties every Lieutenant of a county had to encounter in the North of Ireland was in selecting out of the Roman Catholic population a number of magistrates in any way proportionate to the Roman Catholic population. His father was the Lord Lieutenant of the county of Donegal; and he understood the hon. Member to say that no reply had been given to the letters he wrote recommending the appointment of certain gentlemen as magistrates. Since then, however, it appeared that five gentlemen had been appointed, three of them being Catholics and two Presbyterians. This showed that the hon. Gentleman's representations had not remained without effect.

MR. LEA explained that, in addition to the Memorial sent to the Lord Lieutenant of the county, he wrote a considerable number of letters. Five magistrates were subsequently appointed; but whether this was in consequence of the influence of the Lord Lieutenant of the county or not, he could not say.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he thought it was somewhat unfair for the hon. Member to intimate that the appointments were not made by the Lord Lieutenant of the county. His brother, who long represented the county in Parliament, endeavoured to find out such Catholic gentlemen as were fit and eligible to undertake magisterial duties, and he believed that nine were appointed in consequence. Nowhere in Ulster was there a larger number of Catholics as compared with Protestants amongst the population than in the county of Donegal; and nowhere was it more difficult—in fact, it was almost impossible—to find Roman Catholics who were both willing and able to discharge the duties of magistrates. ["Oh, oh!" from the Irish Members.] Hon. Members said "Oh!" but what did they know about the county of Donegal? The moment you got out of the Protestant districts of Donegal it was almost impossible in the Roman Catholic districts to find gentlemen who were willing and capable to undertake the duties of magistrates.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask the noble Lord if he considers Catholics elected as Poor Law Guardians, and competent to discharge the duties of Guardians, are ineligible to act as magistrates?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that was a controversial question. He did not think it necessarily followed that if a man was elected a Guardian therefore he ought to be a magistrate. The hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) had denounced Roman Catholic gentlemen as toadies and flunkies, because they had accepted the position of magistrates, and were tolerably well disposed towards the Government of the day.

MR. O'BRIEN: Will the noble Lord allow me to explain? I found fault, not with Roman Catholics who accepted the office, but with the Government, who sought out the most objectionable class of Roman Catholics.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Quite so. Therefore, what the House was asked to accede was, not that the disproportion of Protestants and Roman Catholics should be remedied, but that only Roman Catholics who held the same political views as hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway should thereafter be appointed. [Mr. HEALY: Why not?] He would tell the hon. Member. The Roman Catholics who answered that description hated the existing law; and if those gentlemen were appointed they would clog the whole administration of justice in Ireland, and justice would not be obtained. The hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson) said he knew Ulster well; and, that there was not a single Lieutenant of a county who was not a Tory, except Lord Waveney. Well, there was once a considerable number of Lieutenants who had been Liberals; but whom the policy of the Government had made Conservatives. Then the hon. Member had instanced Lord Gosford, who, he said, did not know his own house. Now, the fact was that Lord Gosford was a man of over 40 years, who, for the last 20 years had lived more or less in his own house, in Armagh. The fact was that there had been a great change of opinion in the North of Ireland of late years, and now every man was either a Tory or a Nationalist. His own view was—and he always expressed it in public—that when a gentleman was eligible to perform the duties of a magistrate he ought to be appointed, no matter what his religion might be. In an agricultural country magistrates were necessarily either owners or occupiers of land; and it was natural that owners should be chosen rather than occupiers, because they had more leisure to attend to their duties. Then the noble Viscount the Member for Barnstaple (Viscount Lymington) had given the House the benefit of his philosophic mind; but, like most philosophers, the noble Viscount always liked to apply his remedies to other people. Living always in England, the noble Viscount could know little of the condition of Ireland. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) had advocated something like popular election of magistrates. He should have thought that the example of the United States would have deterred anyone from wishing to introduce a similar system into this country. If there was one defect in the Constitution of the United States, it was in the system of electing Judges. ["No, no!"] Look at the Cincinnati riots—59 persons had been shot and 200 wounded. And why? Because the administration of justice was corrupt.

Lord George Hamilton

COLONEL NOLAN: I rise to Order. I wish to know are we discussing the administration of justice in the United States?

MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord is perfectly in Order. I do not desire to interfere unnecessarily; but I desire to point out to the House the inconvenience of conducting the debate amidst the constant interruptions which are going on. It is impossible for hon. Gentlemen to continue their speeches if this kind of thing goes on.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, in New York, where the elective principle was followed to a greater extent than anywhere else, the administration of justice became a perfect farce; and the result was that many citizens of New York took the law into their own hands. Considering the antagonism that there was between the different races and opinions in Ireland, he could not conceive any proposal better calculated to throw the country back, and make the administration of justice a perfect farce, than to adopt the alternative suggestion which had been made to-night; and, therefore, he trusted the Government would resolutely oppose the Motion.

MR. TREVELYAN said, no one who had listened to what had passed in the House during the last four and a-half hours could doubt that they had a useful, and in some respects, momentous debate. No one who had heard the speech of the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Ewart) and the speech of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Findlater) could doubt that a system which was not altogether satisfactory in the past had seen its worst day, and that a better state of things was being, and would be, inaugurated. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) wished that the House had been full of English Members, in order that they might hear how very real was this Irish grievance. The hon. and gallant Member was anxious to get at the law of the case. He could inform him that the law in Ireland was precisely the same as the law in England. But in Ireland that law had been worked much more invidiously and oppressively than in England. Not only was the law the same, the custom was the same also. The recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant was simply a question of custom. It was the Lord Chancellor who appointed, and who always had appointed; but the custom was much stricter in England than in Ireland. On the last occasion when an application was made to the Secretary of the Lord Chancellor of England to ascertain how often the Lord Chancellor exercised this right in the counties of appointing Justices of the Peace outside the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant, he answered that such an incident was seldom or never known, and he did not know that the last few years had made much difference in this respect. Let there be no mistake in the matter. The power of recommendation exercised by the Lord Lieutenant was a matter of custom, and not of right. It was a power which had been conceded and which could be taken away, and the manner in which these recommendations had been exercised formed the subject of the debate of that evening; and no one who had listened to the debate could doubt that if there was not a real grievance, there] was, at any rate, what was regarded as a real grievance by the majority—he might say the great majority—of the Irish Members in at least two out of three parts of the House. In the Blue Book which had lately been published, and which was very interesting reading, it was shown that the number of Protestant and Catholic magistrates was as nearly as possible in inverse proportion to the numbers of Protestants and Catholics in the country. But the grievance was not confined to Roman Catholics. It extended also to Presbyterians; for, although they formed two-fifths of the total Protestant population, they were only represented by 1-16th of the total number of Protestant magistrates. Out of 25 Petty Sessional districts in the county of Antrim—and what would Antrim be without Presbyterians?—there were 17 without Presbyterian magistrates; in Londonderry there were 10 without; and in Down, out of 26, there were 12 without. It had been said rightly that this was not only, and perhaps not principally, a question of creed, but that it was likewise a question of class. On this point sufficient weight had not been given to certain reservations and considerations. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), in a speech which was so often praised as temperate, and hon. Members who followed him, spoke with a certain disapprobation of gentlemen magistrates. Undoubtedly money was not everything in this world; but money, to a great extent, represented leisure and education; and that sort of leisure which relieved a man from private work and enabled him to give time to the larger problems of society was a very decided element in choosing men for important positions, and, above all, for that of Judge. In Judges they must either have the sense of professional honour and reputation, or what might in a broad sense be called status. He would be the last person to draw the line too tightly. In the Northumbrian borough he represented he found that the most active magistrates belonged, to a great extent, to the class of shopkeepers. Better, more trustworthy, and more suitable men for a judicial position he never knew; and he had no doubt that what he found that class in the North of England he would find in the North of Ireland, and the South of Ireland likewise. He believed that this line of social status had been drawn much too tightly in the past, and especially in the remote parts of Ireland, in the way of excluding men who ought to have been admitted, and much too rigidly in admitting men who ought to have been excluded. All the same, he would say most emphatically that hon. Members must not lose sight of the fact that there were very few men indeed who were fit to be magistrates who could give the time to prepare themselves for magisterial duties and spare time to discharge them, who were free from the sort of temptation by which men of their position must be surrounded, unless they belonged to the educated, and, in some sense, to the leisured class. This educated and leisured class had been spreading wider and wider in past years, and it had embraced a much larger part of the community than some Lieutenants of counties in Ireland—and perhaps England, too—had been willing to admit. A Lord Lieutenant, with whom he agreed, had written him a letter in which he said—

“A combination of loyal sentiment with property and educational qualification and a reasonable social status is what I look for, and in any increase of numbers I would prefer to see Roman Catholics appointed;”

the writer being the Lord Lieutenant of a county in which there might be said to be no Presbyterians; and he gave instances of extreme difficulty in appointing eligible men because their educational qualifications were clearly insufficient. As regarded the Return, there was a matter which cut two ways. He found in one county 27 magistrates who held the Commission, in one other county six who held it in two other counties, and one who held it in three counties. He should say that if this question were approached in an exhaustive manner he should be very glad to have magistrates only appointed in the county in which they resided. A nobleman who happened to hold property in the county of Galway, for which he was also a magistrate, had caused an address to be sent from that county objecting to the manner in which Lord Rossmore had been dealt with; and he threatened that, if a meeting was held in the county, he would act as Lord Rossmore had acted. Now he scorned the threat, for it came from a nobleman who had never been near Galway for years and years, who never went to Galway, but Galway had to come to him; and if he waited until that nobleman was there to meet him he would wait a very long time. [AN IRISH MEMBER: Why did not you cashier him?] He would answer that at another time. The present system was one of old standing, and many of the abuses were due to the fact that it was so. Up to quite recently magistrates had been appointed by Lords Lieutenant; and Lords Lieutenant, being chosen as they were, could not be trusted to make appointments without being corrected by another authority, and for the most part, until quite recently, they had not been so corrected. In the boroughs magistrates were appointed by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and in the boroughs, omitting Ulster, there were 120 members of the Church of Ireland to 119 Roman Catholics. But this included boroughs where Justices of the Peace did not act as magistrates; and, omitting Dublin, in the boroughs outside Ulster there were 61 members of the Church of Ireland to 90 Roman Catholics. The disparity of Church of Ireland to Catholic and Presbyterian magistrates in the counties came from the fact that the appointments had been the unadulterated appointments of Lords Lieutenant. Now he came to the suggestion of reform made by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell). His suggestion with regard to the popular election of magistrates could not be entertained. Whatever they borrowed from America, they would never borrow that. Judges must be in a position of prominence and independence, and removable only for misconduct, and should look only to Parliament or the higher authorities for the approval of their conduct. The second suggestion was that the action of the Lord Chancellor should be made immediate. Happily, in this case, it was not necessary to wait for legislation, for the matter rested entirely with the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, with such recommendations as the Executive Government could give him. Months ago the Lord Chancellor made up his mind to exercise his legal and statutable responsibility in this matter, and to determine for himself whether the gentlemen whose names had been submitted by the Lords Lieutenant of counties, or had been passed over, were the right persons for appointment or they were not. In a series of letters the Lord Chancellor had informed him that no trouble on his part should be spared to redress, so far as he could, any inequality, or to remove any injustice. The action must necessarily be a very slow one. He thought that of all the methods for carrying on public business, none were ever so slow as communications connected with the appointment of magistrates. But, still, something very genuine had been done. Since the present Lord Chancellor had been in Office he had appointed, either without the recommendation of the Lords Lieutenant, or by conferring with them, and urging them very strongly to recommend particular individuals, no less than 61 magistrates. He could not help hoping that the Lord Chancellor was only at the beginning of his appointments, because, as he had said, the preliminary steps in these matters were very slow. [MR. GIBSON: What are the figures?] 33 were members of the Church of England—[Cries of "Oh, oh!" from the Irish Benches, and "Very slow!"]

—19 were Catholics, and six were Presbyterians. [Derisive cheers.] Hon. Members who cheered derisively might remember that they had over and over again stated that this was a matter of class, and not of creed. Whether it was a matter of class or creed, those gentlemen who had been appointed would not have been chosen if the Lord Chancellor had not taken the matter in hand. A noble Lord (Viscount Crichton), speaking in that House in an early debate, stated that, after all, Lord Rossmore would lose very little by ceasing to be a magistrate, because the office had been so much degraded. He supposed the noble Lord meant that it had been degraded by the appointment of people who would not be acceptable to the class of magistrates who sent up an address in favour of Lord Rossmore. Since that time the magistrates had been "degraded" to the extent, at any rate, of those 61 gentlemen; and he hoped the degradation, if such it was called, would be continued, because that degradation only consisted of taking good men, irrespective of politics and class, simply for the reason that they would make good magistrates, and, as the Lord Chancellor thought, magistrates who ought to be trusted by the people. The hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien), in criticizing a magistrate named Roche, said it had been stated by the Government that the Prevention of Crime Act was not meant for rent-receivers or rent-warners, or for those who intimidated people at Poor Law elections. His recollection was that he stated that it was not going to be used against intimidation or supposed intimidation of people at Poor Law elections, when he answered a Conservative Member who asked him to put the Act in force against Roman Catholic priests. He found that that sentence had been quoted as having been delivered in answer to a Question with reference to putting the Act in force against a landlord, and his sentiments had thus been greatly misrepresented, he had no doubt by mistake. The hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce), who made the best defence for the Lord Lieutenants that could be made, praised Lord Erne. Well, Lord Erne now had an opportunity of showing whether he deserved those praises. A proposal had been made to call a meeting of magistrates with regard to a libel case which was still sub judice. On that case he could find a great deal to say if it were not sub judice; and he hoped Lord Erne would not give his countenance to that most injudicious proceeding that had taken place at Enniskillen—that monstrous proceeding, in which a magistrate who had been condemned by the unanimous vote of a jury of his own class—"Oh!"—he meant morally condemned—though he knew that the case was still to be tried—actually received an address from the solicitors practising in his Court, and allowed himself to give vent to his own opinions, even after he knew that in the House of Commons not a word had been allowed to be said about this matter. Lord Erne had been asked to call a meeting of magistrates to consider that case. He did not care whether the magistrates decided for or against; but Lord Erne had no right whatever, if he wished to be a just defender of the Magistracy, to allow that meeting to be called. [IRISH MEMBERS: He has called it.] He had stated what the intentions of the Government were in this matter, and how far they proposed to carry them out. [AN IRISH MEMBER: What are they?] They were to use vigorously and impartially the power of the Lord Chancellor. It was quite another matter, however, when they were asked to agree to the Resolution before the House, which was calculated to destroy all confidence in "the ordinary administration of justice in Ireland." The number of days on which Petty Sessions were held were 14,400. On those days the enormous block of cases consisted either of small civil cases, of which there were 118,000, or of ordinary cases of smaller criminal jurisdiction, of which there were 217,000. The principal heads of the civil jurisdiction of the magistrates were:—The recovery of small debts below 40s., actions for damages or for the hire of horses and agricultural implements not above £10, and the settlement of disputes as to sales at markets and fairs, &c., involving claims not exceeding £5. That jurisdiction did not touch anyone who had a tenancy from year to year; and the enormous majority of civil cases were of a sort in regard to which the Government were quite unwilling to accept the dictum that—

"The present constitution of the Irish Magistracy was calculated to destroy all confidence in the ordinary administration of justice in Ireland."

As to the ordinary criminal jurisdiction, out of this large number of cases there were 87,000 cases of drunkenness, 30,000 of common assault, 13,000 of offences against Local Acts and borough bye-laws, 5,000 of malicious damage and trespass, and 17,000 of offences against the Highway Acts. He must say, with regard to this great class of cases, he had heard no complaint of such volume and number as would justify the Government in acceding to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. If this enormous mass of work was to be done by others than the Unpaid Magistracy the burden on the public would be very great; and he really doubted whether they would be able to find such an enormous Judicial Staff of the character which they wished to secure as would make head against such a vast amount of work. Besides, the Government were not the least prepared for so entirely revolutionizing the Judicial system of Ireland, and so separating and isolating it from the Judicial system of the rest of the country, as to withdraw from the Unpaid Magistracy their ordinary work; and he thought no one could expect, as a practical result, that any exertions which the Lord Chancellor, or successive Lord Chancellors, could make would model the Irish Bench into a state that would be exactly reduced to his ideas of what the Bench should be, with such a rapidity as to enable them to look forward to the time when these questions would be dealt with by a different class of magistrates than the present. Therefore, the Government were satisfied with regard to the ordinary administration of the law by the Bench as at present constituted; but they were not satisfied that the administration of justice with regard to Party questions could be intrusted to the Bench as at present constituted. There were, he thought, grave reasons for doubting whether the magistrates could in such cases be everywhere trusted. In a county like Fermanagh, for instance, there was not a single Roman Catholic magistrate on the Bench, except a Resident Magistrate; and the terms in which he had been spoken of by some of his brother magistrates were in themselves enough, he would not say to show that justice would not be done in Party cases, but to make it quite certain that a great body of the people would not believe that justice would be done. Under these circumstances, if only as a temporary expedient, the Government had thought it right to divide the functions of the Magisterial Bench; and by placing several counties under the 8th section of the Prevention of Crime Act—[“Oh!” from the Irish Party.]*—*well, hon. Gentlemen would find it hard to suggest any expedient for getting a fair trial of Party cases for the next few years—by placing several counties under the 8th section of the Prevention of Crime Act make it quite certain that such a scene as had occurred between the magistrates on the Enniskillen Bench would not occur again, and would make it quite certain also that justice would be done by a body of men who would hold the balance evenly between the two parties. He did not think his noble Friend (Viscount Lymington) had been quite fair in his remarks so far as the Resident Magistrates were concerned. His own experience had convinced him that they possessed very many of the best qualities of Civil servants. He believed that they were very impartial and very public-spirited men, and that they had stood, as some undoubtedly had stood, between the people and those whom they thought wished to bear hard upon the people. The Government, therefore, could not accept the Resolution, which went so far as to say that the present constitution of the Irish Magisterial Bench was calculated to destroy all confidence in the administration of justice. They were not prepared in any way to revolutionize the system of appointment. They were going to work carefully, steadily, and, he believed, boldly to use the Constitutional means they had at present through the power of appointment by the Lord Chancellor; and he had no doubt that the debate of that evening, and the very great number of speeches from Members of more than one shade of politics in that House, would give the world assurance that that policy had not been adopted a day too soon.

Mr. SEXTON said, that the advantage which the right hon. Gentleman had made up his mind to give to the Irish Members in reply to the appeal they had made was a very sad and instructive commentary on the principles which governed the English administration of Ireland. When the Prevention of Crime Act was being passed into law they were assured that it would be applied only to a limited number of districts; and now, when they had brought forward a grievance of great magnitude, and established an irrefutable case, they were told by a Liberal Minister, who put on the airs of one giving a favourable answer to their appeal, that the number of districts to which the 8th section of the Prevention of Crime Act was to be applied would be increased. He was obliged to say that the right hon. Gentleman had delivered a most unsatisfactory speech. He had not been able to deny that the Irish Magistracy was almost exclusively in the hands of one denomination and one class. He had not been able to make any case against the contention that it was offensive and injurious to the vast majority of the Irish people; but by a kind of pettifoggery special pleading he had objected to the final clause of the Resolution, and upon that vague and unsubstantial objection he refused to accept any part of the Motion; whereas the logical conclusion from the right hon. Gentleman's speech was that the Government should have accepted every part of the Resolution, except the clause to which he objected. The interest in that debate did not arise from any novelty in the facts; because, although the Return which he moved for in the Winter Session of 1882, and succeeded in obtaining a few days since, had placed the facts in a formal and conclusive manner before the attention of the House, yet the real state of the Magistracy of Ireland with regard to class and creed had been no secret to any intelligent man who took an interest in the affairs of Ireland for many a year. The interest of the debate arose from the fact that Irish Members were submitting their claims to a Government which boasted that it steered an even keel in Ireland; but he was bound to say, judging from the performance of the steersman that evening, that the right hon. Gentleman, in spite of all the cautions he had received in the course of the debate, was likely to run his ship upon the rocks. The right hon. Gentleman told them that the principles which would guide the Government lay in the bosom of the Lord Chancellor; but perhaps he made a nearer approach to frankness when he stated that the Government would proceed at a slow pace; for when the right hon. Gentleman passed from rhetoric to figures, and described the reformatory action of the Lord Chancellor in appointing 61 magistrates, when pressed by the right hon.

and learned gentleman (Mr. Gibson) as to the creed of the Gentlemen appointed it was found that the action of the Lord Chancellor, instead of decreasing, had gone to increase the monstrous disproportion which already existed. So true was it that the Government were proceeding slowly that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, like a crab, was travelling backwards. The terms of the Resolution were true beyond denial—the Irish Magistracy was almost exclusively in the hands of one religious denomination and one class. Even in a country where different creeds lived in a spirit of amity, and where the different classes had a common interest, the selection of magistrates from one class or creed would promote discontent and disorder, because the classes and creeds excluded would feel that they had been ignored and slighted. If that were true of such a country, how much more true of Ireland, where they had selected for the Magistracy almost exclusively men who professed a creed bound up until yesterday with traditions of aggression and greed, men who belonged to a social class which he might say, without exaggeration, had lived by preying upon the people. The Chief Secretary put the case in a nutshell when he said that the appointments to the Magisterial Bench had inverted the ratio of the creeds in Ireland. There were 5,000,000 of people in Ireland, of whom 4,000,000 were Roman Catholics and 1,000,000 Protestants. If that proportion had been preserved there would now be between 3,000 and 4,000 Catholic magistrates in Ireland as against 1,000 Protestant. The actual state of the case, however, was exactly the reverse. Then, out of the 4,000 existing magistrates, nearly 3,000 belonged to the class of landlords and land agents. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of wealth and leisure as necessary qualifications for the Magistracy. That came strangely from a Minister speaking in the Supreme Court of the Realm, for admission to which no property qualification whatever was required. There were hon. Gentlemen whom he could see who were engaged in important business all day, and yet were, they all knew, able to discharge their legislative functions in that House, and to furnish some of the most important ornaments of their debates in the evenings; and was it to be contended by the right hon. Gentleman that if men who were engaged all day were able to discharge the multifarious duties required in that House every night in connection with the Government of that Realm, that they would require men of leisure and wealth to go once a fortnight to the Petty Sessions? If there was necessity for wealth and leisure, he would ask how it came to pass that 400 land agents were members of the Magisterial Bench? Were they men of social position? No; they were open to corruption of the most patent kind, for they were in every case which was to be decided between landlord and tenant precluded from giving an unbiassed decision. He believed that they were just as much dependent on the landlord class as any clerk in the City of London was who received a salary from his employer. When he found 400 gentlemen of this class allowed to hold positions on the Bench, he was constrained to ask the Chief Secretary what position or leisure they had. If they had used the terms Protestant and Catholic in that debate it was not because they recognized any substantial fitness in the Catholic, or because they denounced any special unfitness in the Protestant for the position of magistrate. It was simply because it so happened that the dominant class in Ireland were Protestant, and that the masses of the people were Catholic, and that this was the most compendious way of putting a great social and political question. It was said that it was hard to find Catholics sufficiently educated in Ireland; and he (Mr. Sexton) must say that the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) spoke in terms which were most insulting to the people of Donegal. He spoke of his brother's efforts to find suitable candidates in that county; and he drew a pathetic picture of his father going out, so to speak, with a lamp in his hand in order to scour the country to find an honest man. Well, what did he (Mr. Sexton) find to follow after all those labours? That in a county where the Catholics were to the Protestants as three to one there were 128 Protestant magistrates to nine Catholics. He (Mr. Sexton) denied that Catholics were not fitted by education to act as magistrates. He agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) that the qualifications were intelligence, education, and probity; but he was not aware that God had conferred those qualities upon persons who were either above or below any given limit of valuation. He asked if the noble Lord was not able to find amongst the elected Poor Law Guardians who sat at the same Board with him any who were fitted for a seat upon the Bench? The House had been addressed that evening by a Lord Lieutenant—the hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce). He did not know that the hon. Baronet was gifted by nature, or had acquired by art, any special powers of discrimination; but after he had held the office of Lord Lieutenant for nine years in a county where the Catholics formed about half the population the Magistracy stood in this position—the non-Catholic magistrates were 109 and the Catholics nine. And the noticeable fact was that the hon. Baronet had told the House that he never paid any attention to Memorials from the people in connection with the nomination of magistrates. Surely the best way to secure the confidence of the people in the administration of the law was to take their advice with regard to the appointment of magistrates. There was a saying in Ireland to this effect—"You may judge of the sack by the sample;" and if they were to judge of the Lords Lieutenant of Ireland by the conduct of the hon. Member for Coleraine it might be the duty of the Government to consider whether the functions of the Lords Lieutenant ought not to be entirely swept away. He had never discovered in the selections of the hon. Baronet or in his speeches in that House anything which marked him out as possessing unusual acuteness or intellectual supremacy over other men. By what right, then, did he constitute himself a buffer between the people of his country and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland? In looking over a Report there was a paragraph which afforded them some instruction on the subject. It set forth that persons returned as Peers, gentlemen, &c., had been classed under the following as of "no specified occupation." Vagrants and such like were also included in this order. He must say that he should always entertain a respect for the compiler of that Report. If the Government were to make every landlord in Ireland a magistrate they would hardly render the state of things worse than it was at present. There were 4,294 landed proprietors in Ireland, and out of that number 3,000 were upon the Magisterial Bench; and unless they fell back upon the vagrants of the same class, he did not really see what was to be done unless to pass from the persons who had no specified occupation to the persons who had some. The Catholics of Ireland were not open to the reproach of ignorance which had been brought against them. It was true that only 0·3 of their children were receiving a higher education as against 1·23 of the Protestants. The Protestants, no doubt, were richer and more cultured as a class; but the number of Catholics was eight times that of the Protestants; and, therefore, twice as many more Catholic children were receiving higher education as Protestants. In the schools and Colleges there were 12,000 Catholics and 8,000 Protestants; in the high schools 10,000 Catholics and 6,000 Protestants; and in the highest schools of all 2,305 Catholics and 1,052 Protestants. Arguing from the children to the parents, it must be clear that there were plenty of well-educated Catholics in Ireland. The principal criticism made by the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) and other advocates of the Irish magistrates was that they had made no specific charges against them. What need was there of specific charges when Lord Rossmore's case was so fresh in their minds, and when no less than 1,000 magistrates from 15 counties threw back into his face the letter of the Lord Chancellor condemning Lord Rossmore's conduct, and declared that, in similar circumstances, they would act as he did? A Magistracy so politically degraded, or so shamefully devoted to the prejudices and passions and supposed interests of one class, needed to have no specific charges brought against them in order to justify their abolition. But he could instance the case of Colonel Smith, of County Meath, who prosecuted a man for unlawfully carrying a gun and shooting a hare. When it was discovered that he was in the employ of a relative and neighbour magistrate he was let off with a nominal fine; while two young farmers convicted of the same offence were sentenced to two months' imprisonment. In Omagh a drunken Orangeman drew a revolver on the sentry at the gate of the barracks. He also was brought up before a Bench consisting of five magistrates, three of whom were Orangemen, and he was released on paying a nominal fine. In Fermanagh, where the father of the noble Viscount (Viscount Crichton) had been Lord Lieutenant for 44 years—the memory of whose public spirit, it was said, would long be remembered—there were 74 magistrates, of whom 73 were Protestants, and the remaining one, who was a Resident Magistrate, Captain M'Ternan, was a Catholic, and on that account the rest of the magistrates were doing their utmost to worry and harass him. The father of the noble Viscount had violated not only decency, but even the law itself, by calling upon those very magistrates who, a few months before, had conspired with him to endanger the public peace, to discredit Captain M'Ternan, to drive him out of the country, and to corrupt a jury. If Lord Erne persisted in holding that meeting to corrupt a jury and to intimidate witnesses, would the Government prevent it—would they suppress the meeting? If they did not suppress it, he hoped that they would send two official note-takers to the meeting and claim admission for them. Would the Government, he asked, prosecute those magistrates who were endeavouring to intimidate their paid official? It was clear to him that they would never advance upon that magisterial question in the direction of reform until they got rid of Lords Lieutenant. Let the Lord Chancellor apply his own intelligence to the applications made to him. He regretted that the Chief Secretary had not answered three questions put to him. He had answered two; but in the case of the third, as to what other means he would suggest of appointing magistrates that would place their appointments more open to public opinion, he had given no answer. He would himself suggest, as a remedy for the existing state of things, in the first place the abolition of the property qualification. Practically, this qualification had been already abolished, because there were a number of land agents now on the Bench who had not enough land in Ireland to sod a lark. Then they must extend to the counties the same principles as they applied to the boroughs, and must cease to confine the office of magistrate to landlords or land agents. In Ulster there were respectable tenant farmers and millowners, and persons of such classes; in every village, in the most insignificant hamlets, they would find shopkeepers and professional men of ability, education, and independence. Let those gentlemen be appointed to the Commission of the Peace; and let the power be abolished of those mouldy relics of the past, the Lords Lieutenant. It was all very well to say—but good laws, however well designed, might have their effect minimized by bad administration. The object to be aimed at was to appoint the men, whether Protestants or Catholics, who were in accordance with the feelings of the people. That was the practical test of their fitness; and until that was done he would tell them solemnly, as one who knew that country thoroughly, that the ordinary administration of their law in Ireland would be regarded, not only with distrust, but with dislike—nay, with hatred and contempt.

"For forms of government let fools contest;"

MR. GIBSON said, the debate which had taken place that night must unquestionably be regarded as of importance; and he himself was not sorry that the charges which had been brought forward had been brought forward distinctly at the beginning of the discussion, when the matter could be fairly looked into, and the House and the country could thoroughly realize and understand what, in the face of day, was the case that was made against the Irish magistrates, and on what foundation the charges which had been made against them were supposed to rest. He asserted fearlessly, after a discussion which had now gone on for a considerable number of hours, that most unquestionably the Irish Magistracy had come out of the ordeal triumphantly and successfully. There were more than 4,000 magistrates in Ireland; and in troublous and disturbed times in the history of that country, when every action of almost every magistrate was canvassed, criticized, or condemned, it was something to find that when their conduct was brought to the test of an examination in the face of day there was nothing to be urged against them except what had been urged during the last few hours. He ventured to say that if the Magistracy of any other country, under similar conditions, were to be subjected to the same criticism as that which had been directed against the Irish magistrates that night, they would not have come out of the ordeal better—he doubted whether they would have come out of it as well. What was the constitution of a Magistracy—what must be the constitution of any Magistracy, worthy of the name? What must be the qualifications of any Bench of Magistrates that was to be regarded with respect by any person whose opinion was challenged in reference to it? Must not the Bench of Magistrates be composed of men whose independence of character, whose sufficiency of education, whose reasonable sufficiency of status, and whose sufficiency of property formed a guarantee of independence such as would stand a scrutiny and command respect? Those tests being familiar tests, they had a right to expect to find them in all magistrates, whether Irish, English, or Scotch; and the most that could be said against the Irish magistrates was that they did possess every one of those qualifications. ["No, no!" from the Home Rule Members.] The charge against them was not that they were deficient in the possession of those essential qualifications, but that they were not commended to popular acceptance by the absence of some of them. He asked every impartial English and Scotch Member of the House who had listened to the discussion to bear in mind the ordeal to which the Irish magistrates had been subjected, and from which the English and Scotch Magistracy had been exempted. If an Irish magistrate committed the smallest error of judgment, the smallest slip of language in conversation in public or in private—if a single incident of his public, private, or magisterial life could be got at, even although it occurred in private conversation only, it was at once published in the Press and dragged before the House of Commons in Question after Question. He should like to know what body of men in the important public position of the Irish Magistracy, and numbering over 4,000, could, under such circumstances, come better out of the ordeal than the class of persons to whom he was referring? What was the foundation of this charge? He would appeal to the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), who introduced the Motion in a speech as moderate as was expected from a Gentleman of his position and attainments. Was it not obvious to everyone in the House who listened to the speech that the hon. Member himself felt there were great difficulties in his way, in asking the House of Commons, acting in a judicial capacity, to arrive at the conclusion that they were coerced to affirm such a Resolution as that which he had placed upon the Paper? What was the true foundation, not of the hon. Member's charge, but of his suggestion of a charge? That there might be differences in the constitution of the Irish Magistracy, both as to religion and as to class. Now he asserted, notwithstanding the speech they had just heard from the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), that no one on that or the other side of the House had spoken with disrespect, or without sympathy, of the Roman Catholic population of Ireland from the beginning to the end of the discussion—certainly no one on those Benches, and he had heard no one on the other side, say one word that was out of sympathy with that great section of the people of Ireland. Everyone knew that one of the circumstances and incidents of the country was that the great bulk of the population, numerically, was Roman Catholic; and it would naturally be found that the great bulk of the population had not got that amount of education, and property, and of status which all must recognize as being required in a magistrate, and as necessary qualifications before they could be placed in the area from which the Lord Chancellor or anybody else would be justified in selecting the Magistracy. Of course, he did not deny, and no one would attempt to assert, that there were not many Roman Catholics in Ireland—indeed, a large and powerful section of Roman Catholics in Ireland, who were endowed with great natural intelligence—the gift of so many people in Ireland, but who were also possessed of high education and character, and all the qualities which entitled them to a seat upon the Magisterial Bench, and which would do honour to any Profession or any Bench. But in saying that he felt bound to add what he believed to be the fact in reference to the state of the Bench in different counties in Ireland, that he had had occasion during the last few years to consider the matter himself, in conversation and in association with numerous friends in Ireland; and he believed that Lords Lieutenant of counties in that country were sincerely and loyally anxious, whenever they thought they fairly could, to appoint Roman Catholic gentlemen to the Commission of the Peace in the counties in which they resided. He was himself satisfied of this—that in many cases they had strained points in their anxiety to appoint gentlemen to the Commission of the Peace, whose main and principal qualification was that they were Roman Catholics. He believed that this was the simple and plain fact, as anyone who was acquainted with the country and the difficulties of the position would bear testimony to. Hon. Members who had taken part in the discussion had found themselves in a strange dilemma. They had pointed out that the number of Roman Catholics on the Bench at present was roughly estimated at about 1,000, and that the remaining number of magistrates were Protestants. One would think that that was a charge levelled against the disproportion which the Roman Catholic magistrates bore to the Protestant ones. But the argument which had been pressed was not that at all; it was a kind of mixed and confused argument. They said it was wrong, in the present constitution of the Bench, that there were not more Roman Catholics upon it; but they went on to say that the Roman Catholics who at present had found their way to the Bench were certainly as bad, if not worse, than the Protestant magistrates. He did not see how it was possible to satisfy hon. Members who made such a complaint. He was glad that the Presbyterians had not been lost sight of in that discussion. They were a class who were entitled to be spoken of with the very highest respect, and there was no one who had had any opportunity whatever of meeting them who would not recognize that they were endowed with qualifications and gifts which entitled them to every possible consideration. He ventured to hope that there would be no Lord Lieutenant of a county or Lord Chancellor ever found in Ireland who would not be anxious to consider every claim that could be urged for the appointment of intelligent and independent Presbyterians, endowed with the requisite qualifications, for the Magistracy. He desired to point out that there were only two counties mentioned by the Chief Secretary when he made allusion to the Presbyterians. Those counties were Antrim and Down. The Lord Lieutenant of Antrim (Lord Waveney) was a friend and supporter of the Government of the right hon. Gentleman. [Mr. T. A. DICKSON: Within the last six months.] If that fact was worth making anything of it did not apply to the other county with which he was better acquainted. County Down was the other county mentioned, and who had had the management of the Magistracy of that county for several years? It was an hon. Gentleman who was well-known in the House, whose familiar figure was now only occasionally seen outside the House, clad in a seasonable garb. Unfortunately, he was not in the House that evening. ["Name!"] He alluded to the hon. Member for the County of Londonderry (Sir Thomas M'Clure). He believed that Gentleman was a Presbyterian of the Presbyterians. He had wielded the power of appointing magistrates in the county of Down, in the absence of Lord Dufferin, for many years; and if there was any deficiency in the appointment of Presbyterians in the county the blame was not to be laid on the innocent persons who sat on his side of the House, but on the respectable Presbyterian gentleman who held office in that county, who had uninterruptedly made the appointments for the last six or seven years. What was the other class of objection, in addition to the religious one, which was made as to the present method of appointing magistrates? The objection was called a social one, and consisted of a complaint that the present magistrates were taken substantially from one class only. He would ask the House if that was not an objection which might be taken to the magistrates of almost every country? Take England, Scotland, or any civilized country in the world they liked, and they would find that the magistrates were taken from a class of the community substantially the same as that from which the Irish magistrates were taken. It must always be so. In the very nature of things he did not see how it was possible to have, speaking broadly and generally, any substantial change in that respect. They must have a

Magistracy recruited from those who possessed the requisite position, independence, education, and status referred to by the Chief Secretary. The hon. Member who moved the Motion, and other hon. Members who supported him, had been under some difficulty in making positive and absolute suggestions as to how they thought the present state of things should be remedied. They seemed to think, wisely, as he thought, that it was not for them to suggest remedies; but that it was their function to state what they considered a grievance, and to point it out. He thought there was some logical force in that position; but, at all events, whether logical or not, it was a prudent course to take. Some hon. Members, however, took a different course, and did not hesitate to suggest a class from which the Magistracy might be entirely and exclusively recruited. The hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien), and the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), boldly put it that they considered the class from which the magistrates should not be partially recruited, but from which they should be entirely taken, were from those who were in entire sympathy with the popular traditions of Ireland, and in sympathy with the people of Ireland—that, in fact, they should not be "colourless politicians," as the phrase was delicately put by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy). How would this method of choice work? Let them apply it for a moment, and the House would see that they were involved in a state of embarrassment, to use the mildest possible word. If in any locality they were to take men who were strong partizans—not colourless in their politics—but men who held strong views in reference to the affairs in which they entered, in what position would they be landed? Why, in the South of Ireland they would have strong Land League magistrates, and in the North they would have strong Orange magistrates. [An hon. MEMBER: You have them already.] If they were to have strong members of a particular class—strong partizan magistrates—they could not always have them of the complexion they might like; but they must have Party men. If that were so, they would have a state of facts which would rapidly bring about disturbance. But what was the other point mentioned?

It had been suggested, although the suggestion was at once abandoned, because it was obvious that no one would listen to it, that they should select men for the Magistracy of Ireland from those who were of sound Nationalist views, and who were in full sympathy with the National League. The only other alternative was to try to get impartial Resident Magistrates. Why, they were the very class who had been most roundly abused during the whole of the discussion; and where were they to look for a Magistracy if they were not to have it appointed reasonably, and fairly, and possessing the requisite qualifications, entitling it to respect? How were the magistrates appointed at present? He thought some confusion prevailed in the House in reference to that subject even at the present moment. Certainly, the noble Lord who recently addressed the House seemed to be in a state of profound simplicity as to the appointment of magistrates. He had suggested boldly that the Government had nothing to do with the matter, and having made that statement he went quietly away. But there were three kinds of magistrates in Ireland, and as to each class the Government had a substantial power; in some respects they had an absolute and exclusive power in appointing all paid Resident Magistrates. In that case they exercised their own discretion in regard to what they considered the interests of the country. He would take that class first. The paid magistrates were appointed by the Executive Government on their own responsibility. They sought out trained men with the qualities and training which they thought most expedient. He asked the House to remember the number of Questions which were addressed to the Chief Secretary day after day; and they would find that not a single day passed without some Question being levelled against the magistrates who had been selected by the Executive Government, and paid for their training and qualifications the same as any other class of officials in Ireland. The second class of magistrates were the borough magistrates. The Lords Lieutenant of counties had nothing to say to them; but they were all appointed on the absolute ipse dixit of the Executive Government who had the absolute and exclusive power in reference to them. The only other class remaining were the county magistrates. How were they appointed? The county magistrates were appointed by the Lord Chancellor of the day. True, it was upon the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant of the county; but the Lord Chancellor was the person who made the appointment, and the Lord Chancellor was the highest legal official of the Government in Ireland. The Lord Chancellor usually acted on the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant of the county; but he reserved to himself, and sometimes exercised, the right of his own jurisdiction, and of asking the Lord Lieutenant why some particular individual was passed over, or why a preference had been shown? And if he did not feel satisfied with an excuse offered to him for passing over certain persons, he could, and had done more than once, as an act of administration, appoint for himself any person to the position of magistrate in any county in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Trevelyan) in the course of his speech had drawn a contrast. He did not complain of the right hon. Gentleman, who had a right to speak as well as he could for his own Government. That was only reasonable; but the right hon. Gentleman drew a distinction in favour of the Government between the constitution of the County Magistracy and the constitution of the Borough Magistracy which would not stand the test of examination. If a man lived in a borough it was perfectly obvious that his range of connections was far wider than if he lived in a rural district. He would probably live in the midst of a great mercantile community of the highest intelligence, education, status, and property; and, therefore, the Government in dealing with a centralized population knew, obviously, that it contained within itself large classes of persons qualified to be magistrates. They had a larger and higher area of selection, and did not, as in the case of selecting a county magistrate, experience any difficulty in searching out men fit to perform the duties of the Magistracy. He fully admitted the difficulties that in the administration of Irish affairs must often press upon the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and others engaged in the government of the country; but he was bound to say that, having regard to everything that had occurred in this case, it would have been wiser and more gracious if the right hon. Gentleman had spoken with more reserve in reference to the Enniskillen case. He (Mr. Gibson) did not intend to discuss that case, and he would not say a word in regard to it except this—that Lord Erne was a man whose public character had been before England and Ireland for many a long day, and there was not a more respected man in the whole community than Lord Erne. [Mr. HEALY: Who says so?] That was the view of everyone in the country who was acquainted with Lord Erne, and he was perfectly convinced of this—that Lord Erne would continue to act in the future as he had done in the past, so far as the Lord Lieutenancy of the county of Fermanagh was concerned, with full regard for the duties and responsibilities of his high position. He (Mr. Gibson) was so strongly assured of that, that he regretted the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary should have used one word in reference to the magistrates who were on the Bench on the occasion referred to, which was open to criticism. He would not go further into the matter; but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be told by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, who was counsel in the case, what the real facts were. He (Mr. Gibson) was bound to say that, considering the political character of the case, it would have been as well if the Law Officers of the Crown had not allowed themselves to be mixed up with it at all. The words which had been used to describe the case were open to criticism. The defence of justification—that the alleged libel was true—was not affirmed by the jury; and the only ground on which the verdict was given in favour of the owner of the newspaper was that of maintaining the rights of journalism, and it had nothing whatever to do with affirming, in the slightest degree, the truth of the allegations contained in the libel. It would, therefore, have been well if the right hon. Gentleman had ascertained the facts of the case before he used the words he had used. If he had done so, he would no doubt have modified, materially, the statement he had made. He (Mr. Gibson) would pass away from this topic of Enniskillen and the county of Fermanagh with a remark in reference to the statements which had been made as to the small number of Roman Catholic magistrates who had been made there. [Mr. HEALY: None at all.] It was true that a meeting had been held recently in Enniskillen, convened by Circular, the object of which was to suggest to Lord Erne the names of Roman Catholics who might be appropriately appointed to the Magisterial Bench. But who was it that was suggested to the notice of Lord Erne? The names of three gentlemen—men, he believed, of respectability—two of whom had publican's establishments, while the other was a pawnbroker. He did not say that these were not honourable pursuits, and that the gentlemen who followed them were not entitled to the highest respect; but it showed the difficulty there must be in making suggestions to the Lord Lieutenant of a county as to who he should appoint, when the individuals selected for his approval, however respected they might be, after searching the whole county through, were such as he had mentioned. What was the alternative, in regard to the constitution of the Magistracy? The appointment of paid magistrates. But was there anyone who was prepared to affirm that suggestion? Would any Member of the Treasury like to hear that suggestion boldly put forward—namely, to swamp the whole of the unpaid class of Irish magistrates, and substitute for them a network of paid magistrates, involving an immense financial operation? He was bound to say that, tested by present experience, and seeing that the existing paid Resident Magistrates were not able to attract to themselves more popularity than the unpaid magistrates, any Government would hesitate long before they proceeded to make a change. No one except the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien), and the hon. Member had certainly made the suggestion somewhat strongly, urged that there should be elected magistrates. It was not a proposition that any Member could be seriously or gravely entertained by the House of Commons. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), speaking with that great skill and dexterity of language of which he was a master, had suggested some vague reference to County Boards, with the notion that they might exercise some influence over the office. He was bound to admit that the suggestion was made very tentatively. The hon. and learned Member did not say what kind of County Board, or what kind of office; and, therefore, he (Mr. Gibson) ventured to think the suggestion might be passed over. The noble Viscount the Member for Barnstaple (Viscount Lynton) also made some rather hazy suggestions, winding up with the proposal that the appointment of magistrates should be subjected to the impartial criticism of the House of Commons. It was a very good sentence in the speech of the noble Viscount; but it could hardly be treated as a practical contribution to the solution of a very difficult question. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, who spoke with much emphasis on the matter, and naturally attracted a great deal of attention, said the Lord Chancellor would consider for himself. The present Lord Chancellor was one of the most emphatic men who ever held the Office, and he had no doubt inspired the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary with a good deal of his own emphasis. The right hon. Gentleman said the present Lord Chancellor would consider how to exercise his functions in reference to the constitution of the Magistracy. Every Lord Chancellor who ever held the Office was bound, in the discharge of his duty, to do that. No doubt the present Lord Chancellor, whose ability everyone would readily recognize, and whose high character they all acknowledged, followed the traditions of his Office, and, fully acquainted with the requirements of his position, applied his mind vigorously to the discharge of his important functions. Then a more extraordinary solution came, later on, from the right hon. Gentleman, when he said the Government solution was the separation of the magisterial functions into two parts—namely, the ordinary functions, and those which were regarded as Party functions. It was rather a difficult division, and he should like to know where and when the division was determined upon? It was now the 4th of April, and he should be glad to know when Her Majesty's Government decided upon this division? It was no new question. It had been considered from time to time. It was discussed in 1881, and they were all acquainted with the circumstances.

He was bound to say that it struck him, from the collocation of the words, as if it had been done in consequence of the case of Londonderry, in which the Solicitor General was counsel for one of the parties, and also of the Enniskillen case. He hoped it was not so. If the objection were taken on any such ground it would be open to grave and substantial criticism. He himself, before he could approve of such a method of division, should like to know the exact way in which it was proposed to make it. It did, however, strike him that the placing of eight counties under the Prevention of Crime Act was a crude and clumsy way of working out the division of magisterial functions, and it was open to the charge of being made in consequence of the trial at Londonderry, and what had recently taken place at Enniskillen. At any rate, it was open to the charge of not being particularly gracious. His state of knowledge did not permit him to criticize the matter in detail; he would forbear. At present the Magistracy of Ireland was amenable to very important checks. It was amenable to the check of public opinion, which had been very freely directed to it; and it was amenable also to Parliamentary criticism, which was unsparing in the way in which it pried into every one of his actions. It must be remembered that no injustice and no unfairness in the administration of their duties had been, or could be, substantiated against the Irish Magistracy. [Mr. BIGGAR: Oh!] Yes; they had made great and sweeping charges; but he fearlessly asserted that no case had been made out against the Irish Bench of injustice or unfairness in the administration of justice. He was speaking now of the great class of unpaid magistrates, who had enormous difficulties to contend against, and received very little gratitude or thanks for the way in which they discharged their duties. They got no pay—indeed they were the great unpaid—but they were amenable both to actions at law by persons aggrieved by their mistakes, and also to the jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor, who could suspend or remove them from the Commission of the Peace for error or incapacity. It was, therefore, obvious to everyone that the Irish Magistracy discharged their duty under every responsibility that should make them careful, and should win for them fair sympathy and respect from every impartial man. One word more, and he should have done. This question of the Irish Magistracy was not a very new one. He should be very sorry to make charges against any class of men who had, in disturbed times, to discharge difficult and unpopular duties. He had no wish to refer to the tributes given to the Irish Magistracy by those who agreed with him in politics, or who belonged to the Church to which he belonged. Instead of doing so he would remind hon. Members that in 1881 Lord O'Hagan, a very eminent, gifted, and sympathetic man, a member also of the Roman Catholic Church, gave an opinion as to how the Irish Members had acted, and as to how Lords Lieutenant of counties had been guided in reference to the selection of Irish magistrates. Lord O'Hagan, on that occasion, paid a high tribute to the merits of the Irish Magistracy. But it did not rest there. It rested also on the opinion of the late Lord Chancellor Law—a most able and gifted man, only too early removed, but a man also of strong Party views, and as strong a supporter of the present Government as ever sat upon the Treasury Bench. In 1881 Mr. Law had an opportunity of expressing his opinion of the Irish Magistracy, and he refused unquestionably to give the weight of his name and the power of his authority to an attack similar to the present upon the magistrates of Ireland. He would appeal also to the Lord Chancellor now in Office, clothed as he was with all the immense powers which had been mentioned of appointing paid magistrates and magistrates in boroughs, and of controlling, directing, and checking the appointment of every magistrate in Ireland. And what did he find? That although the Lord Chancellor had exercised his power, and would exercise it, as other Lord Chancellors had done before him in the appointments he had made to the Bench, in the 61 cases mentioned by the Chief Secretary he had himself, by the logic of facts and the potency of circumstances, been compelled to make appointments very little dissimilar, in the ratio of religious selection, from those appointed by his Predecessors.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he was anxious to say a word or two to explain why he supported the Motion, although he did not agree with all the arguments which had been used in its favour. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had skillfully turned a debate which was intended to be a complaint of the manner in which magistrates were appointed into a defence of the manner in which those magistrates discharged their duties. He (Colonel Colthurst) believed, himself, that taking the ordinary affairs of life, day by day, Irish magistrates did just as well as any others. But that was not the question. The question was, whether the mode of appointing them was a right one? The noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) had spoken about the difficulty, in regard to the status of the majority of the population of Donegal, in connection with the selection of magistrates. But Donegal was an extreme case, and no doubt extreme cases would always be found. He was quite ready to admit that in Donegal, and in some other counties, it might be difficult to find Catholics in any number who were fitted to discharge the duties of the Magistracy. But let them take the county of Cork. Although there were a large number of Catholic magistrates there, there were very few in some parts of the county. What was the cause? By the present canons the Lord Lieutenant considered himself bound to appoint, only except in rare cases, the owners of landed property or land agents; and it was almost impossible to obtain the appointment of a magistrate who did not fulfil one of these conditions. He was able to speak from personal knowledge of the difficulty of obtaining the appointment of Roman Catholics as magistrates in the county of Cork. He did not say that the present Lord Lieutenant had any prejudice himself. On the contrary, he had appointed several magistrates who were Roman Catholics; but in some cases he had refused, or had put the matter off. In cases where no allegation could be made against the Catholic gentlemen put forward, the reason why they had not been appointed was that they were not considered by the magistrates of the district in which it was proposed to appoint them to be of a social status sufficient to qualify them for a seat on the Bench. For that reason, and for that reason alone, there were gentlemen at that moment in the county of Cork who were magistrates who, if they were Catholics, would not be magistrates, and gentlemen who ought to be magistrates who, because they were Catholics, had not been placed upon the Bench. As far as the suggestions for reform were concerned, nothing more practical could be done than that the Lord Chancellor should institute, as had been suggested by several speakers, a searching inquiry into these cases, and then use the large powers vested in him. He would certainly be the first Lord Chancellor who had ever taken that course. He wished to speak with great respect of Lord O'Hagan and the late Lord Chancellor; but, except in very rare instances, they had never felt themselves justified in using the powers of which so much had been made. He trusted that what his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary had said that night would be carried out; and that the present Lord Chancellor, who had the will, the power, and the talent to carry out a great reform, would at any rate make a beginning, by calling for information, and finding out for himself, in each county, whether among Catholics, Protestants, or Presbyterians, those who were best fitted to serve on the Magisterial Bench, disregarding those canons which had hitherto required a magistrate either to be a landowner or a land agent.

MR. HEALY remarked that the legal training of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had been of considerable service to him, because it enabled him completely to deny the justice of everything which had been said; and it had placed him in the position of the man who, having a brief from one side, was determined to take no notice of the other. The Chief Secretary for Ireland, in his speech, had made a declaration which, practically, amounted to this—that he admitted everything, but that he would do nothing. The right hon. Gentleman had not said a single word to traverse the case which had been made out in the course of the debate by hon. Members on that side of the House. All he said was—"We can do nothing; we have no remedy to offer to you," except, indeed, to quote the right hon. Gentleman's own phrase—"We will use, vigorously and impartially, the power of the Lord Chancellor." Now, what did that mean? Did it not mean that the right hon. Gentleman condemned the partiality of the conduct of the Lords Lieutenant of counties, and that he would use, vigorously and impartially, the power of the Lord Chancellor to restrain the course of the Executive in future? Why did he not chasse the 32 Lords Lieutenant of counties altogether who refused to use, vigorously and impartially, the power which the law had given them? The right hon. Gentleman had, as usual, endeavoured to trim and to compromise. He (Mr. Healy) had no wish to impute unworthy motives; but that was certainly the position of the Government of Ireland. They told hon. Members privately that they would do all they could for them in favour of justice and impartiality; that they wished to treat Ireland as if it were Yorkshire or Kent; but hitherto they had signally failed in treating Dublin as if it were situated in Yorkshire, or Galway as if it were a town in Kent. At the same time, the Chief Secretary fully admitted that the Irish magistrates so abused their functions that it was necessary to call in the aid of the Lord Chancellor to use his powers vigorously and impartially; but he said nothing about putting pressure upon the Lords Lieutenant themselves. If the present Lords Lieutenant were deprived of the power they had so grossly abused, the next set of Lords Lieutenant would be much more careful how they used it. The right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had made a great point of the fact that 61 Catholic magistrates had been appointed by the present Lord Chancellor; and that at a meeting of Catholics held at Enniskillen only three gentlemen had been recommended to the Lord Lieutenant for appointment. He (Mr. Healy) did not know that that statement was correct, because he generally found that Tory facts were not correct when they were able to get at the bottom of them. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had made the allegation that two of the three gentlemen were connected with the publicans' interest, and he spoke of it as if it were a very great fault indeed. Was it a fault in my Lord Ardilaun—the biggest publican and creator of drunkards in the Kingdom—whom a

Tory Government made a Peer? That noble Lord, publican as he was, was good enough, not merely to be made a Justice of the Peace, but to be converted into a Peer of the Realm. Surely, a Tory Government who made a big publican, like Lord Ardilaun, not only a magistrate, but a Peer, might condescend to wink at the minor evil of elevating a publican to the Magistracy. Personally, he (Mr. Healy) contended that what was wanted in the Magistracy of Ireland was the honesty and straightforwardness of an intelligent Irish jurymen. Where did they get their jurymen now? Did they look for men of learned leisure? Certainly not, except when they had the Prevention of Crime Act in full operation. Who were the men who distributed justice throughout Ireland, week by week and day by day, without receiving 1*d.* of pay for their services? It was the jurymen of the country. There used to be a property qualification for jurymen; but except where the Prevention of Crime Act was concerned it was practically non-existent, and yet the Irish jurymen were called upon to decide cases in which hundreds of thousands of pounds depended upon the honest decision at which they arrived. But if it became necessary to fine a man 5*s.* for being drunk and disorderly, the penalty must be inflicted by a man of learned leisure. It was a ridiculous position; and when the Chief Secretary condemned the notion of electing magistrates, although he represented the Border Burghs, he displayed gross ignorance of Scotch law—probably because his experience was confined to the Borders. If he lived in the heart of Scotland, he would know quite well that the system of elected magistrates was in full blast in the Sister Kingdom. The right hon. Gentleman had denounced the American system, because it was elective; but as they had the same system in cannie Scotland, surely that was far enough to go without travelling to Democratic America. He would, however, say this of America—that the elected Judges of that country administered the law with far greater purity and impartiality than the Judges of this country. In the American Divorce Court they would not find a Sir James Hannen, who would shut up a case because it affected somebody who was connected with the upper classes. ["Order!"]

Mr. Healy

In the Republic of America it would be impossible to find a Judge like Mr. Justice Lush, who would sentence a man like Valentine Baker to only 12 months' imprisonment for a disgraceful crime, while he—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is not in Order. He must not use language that is disrespectful to Her Majesty's Judges. He may comment upon their conduct; but he is not in Order in using language that is disrespectful towards them.

MR. HEALY: I was referring to the American Judges.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member was using disrespectful language in regard to the Judges of this land, and was contrasting their conduct with that of the American Judges.

MR. HEALY said, that after the correction of the Chair he would only remark that in America it would be impossible to find a Judge who would sentence one man to 12 months' imprisonment for a disgraceful crime, and in the same Court sentence a man of lower position, for the same offence, to seven years' penal servitude. The Judges of the American Courts were elected; they were courteous to the suitors, and neither browbeated or bullied the witnesses. They were the servants of the people, and they depended upon the favour of the people for the position they occupied. He was satisfied that if they had more of the elective system, both in Ireland and in this country, they would derive much advantage from the greater purity of their judicial institutions. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary told them the magistrates of Ireland were not to be trusted to deal with and decide Party questions, and that such questions in future must be given to the Resident Magistrates, who would hold the balance equally between the parties. But who were the Resident Magistrates in Ireland, and where would they get the judicial balance? Was it in British Burmah, or Hindostan, or Madagascar, or those other far-off places from whence the offscourings of the Judicial Bench were swept into Ireland? Was it a broken-down military man, or a disused sailor, who was the fittest person to administer justice in that country, for those were the men who were created Resident Irish Magistrates? They were told that the ordinary magistrate in Ireland was not to be intrusted with the decision of Party questions in Ireland, because he did not know how to deal with them. So far as he was concerned, he would much sooner take his chance with the hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce) than with Mr. Clifford Lloyd. He would say this of his own countrymen—that they were Irishmen; and he would prefer to deal with an Irishman in his own country any day in the week, where Irish questions were concerned, than to deal with some British foreigner. They had been told that they had suggested no remedies. Well, he would venture to suggest a few. He would suggest this to begin with. Let every magistrate who held the Commission of the Peace in more than one county be obliged to decide which he would keep, and give up the others. That would cause a number of vacancies, which could be filled by better men. In the second place, he would suggest that any magistrate who did not attend in his Petty Sessions district for a certain number of days out of the 365 should be struck off the roll. That, he thought, would only be fair. What was the use of absentee magistrates? What were they good for? He would tell the House what it was that pricked on the feeling in Ireland with respect to the magistrates. It was not so much the decisions at Petty Sessions, and the fining of individuals 5s. and costs for being drunk and incapable, or the sending of men to gaol in a Party case; but it was the fact that every magistrate in the county, in addition to being a Justice of the Peace, was a Grand Juror, and in that capacity he decided what roads were to be made, what bridges were to be built, and what compensation was to be levied. He expended the money of the people without check or control; he did what he liked in the district without any representative authority, and he possessed enormous prerogatives, power and patronage. Then, again, the magistrates were ex officio Guardians. Indeed, one-half of the Board of Guardians were composed of ex officio Guardians. Therefore, it was not merely what the magistrates did at Petty Sessions, but what they did as Grand Jurors, and upon the Board of Guardians, that affected the real life of the country. They would find these absentee magistrates who did not attend a single meeting at Petty Sessions, now the 25th of March was past, going across the Channel like swallows from the warmer climate of Cannes, Nice, and Madeira, to vote as ex officio Guardians for the election of Chairman and Vice Chairman of every Board in Ireland. Indeed, he was surprised to see the hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce) in his place. Why was he not over in Ireland voting as an ex officio Guardian?

SIR HERVEY BRUCE was understood to say that the meeting of his Board had taken place the previous Saturday, and that he had been re-elected Chairman.

MR. HEALY congratulated the hon. Baronet upon having been able to make matters fit in so neatly. It was in this way that all the officers in the Union were appointed—the master, the clerk, the rate collector, and every other employé. By this means they were able to influence the voters' list, for the rate collector could strike off certain persons and put on others; and the clerk had similar power. The Tory magistrates in Ulster manipulated the electoral lists in this way; and it was that grievance—a far more striking one than anything done by the Magistracy at Petty Sessions—of which he complained. And who were these magistrates? What was their title to the confidence of the people? The fact was, that every man among them—from the hon. Baronet, who was Lord Lieutenant of the county of Londonderry, down to the Custos Rotulorum of Roscommon, the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman)—had been branded by the Land Commission as an extortioner, and had had his rent-roll reduced. As a class, they had been told, by the highest authority in the land, that they had been plundering the people for generations; and it was to these plunderers on the Magisterial Bench that they asked the common people of the land to give their confidence to. These Custodes Rotulorum and Lords Lieutenant were the men who had raised their rents so immoderately that the Land Commission found it necessary to cut them down by 20 per cent. The Irish people derided and mocked at the entire system; and if the people of Ireland had not been mere serfs they would have made a far more vigorous protest against it long ago. He believed that the people of Ireland were the greatest serfs that ever existed in any country. They had allowed the British Government to tyrannize over them in every possible way; whereas, if they had kicked and showed their teeth like men, they would get far more justice than they did from the British Government, and the Government would get rid of some of the difficulties they now experienced in governing them. In such circumstances, it would be impossible to reject the Motion of the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) by a speech like that which had been delivered by the Chief Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman admitted the existence of grievances, and told them that the Lord Chancellor would in future exercise, vigorously and impartially, the powers vested in him; but, in the meantime, in regard to the Lords Lieutenant, who, as the right hon. Gentleman admitted, had degraded the duties of their office, he would do nothing. Why not sweep them away altogether? What magic was there in rack-renters? It might be thought that there was some holy chrisom about these men which entitled them to the confidence of the people. Every man among them was branded as a thief, and yet it was to men of that kind that they intrusted these large and important powers. If the Government were in favour of treating Ireland as they would treat Yorkshire or Kent, the Irish Members would not have been met with a shuffling speech such as that which they had heard from the Chief Secretary, who, while admitting the grievances, refused to redress them, and told them the Government would vigorously and impartially use the powers of the Lord Chancellor, who, in the course of four months, had appointed 61 magistrates, 19 of whom were Catholics. He made no complaint of that fact, because he regretted to say that some of the greatest villains in Ireland had been Roman Catholics. He preferred the honest Protestants of Ireland, who stood aloof from the religion to which they belonged, to the unfortunate Catholic serfs. In the whole course of history the leaders of the Irish people had been Protestants. If the people of Ireland had to erect monuments to-morrow to their great men, there would be a long roll of Protestants to commemorate. There had been admirable Protestant magistrates. One of them was a gentleman named Charles Parnell, and what had Her Majesty's Government done with him? The Government of the even keel had struck him off the roll. When the Irish Members made Motions of this kind it was not upon religious grounds. If the Government wished to have the law respected they must bring respect for the law home to the minds of the commonest people of the country. Three hundred years ago, when Sir John Davis was Attorney General, justice was administered, and no people respected the law and stood by it more than the Irish people. Give them justice again, and the law which they now despised they would obey.

MR. W. REDMOND said, that while the case of the Irish people was being stated by more able Colleagues, he had determined not to contribute any observations to the debate; but having heard the grievances of the Irish people fairly stated, having heard the moderate and explicit address of the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) in introducing the Resolution to the House, and having listened to the most unsatisfactory and certainly discouraging statement made to the Irish Members by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, he thought he should not be doing his duty to the people who sent him to that House to represent them if he failed to avail himself of this opportunity of entering his solemn protest against the action of the Government in refusing to redress the grievances which they practically admitted the Irish people were labouring under. It had been proved most clearly that night, by moderate and calm speeches from the Irish Benches, that in Ireland, which was pre-eminently a Catholic country, the vast majority of the magistrates were of a different religion. That was a state of affairs which he thought would be admitted even by Englishmen and Scotchmen to be very much against the interests of the country, and the chances of the people living there in a contented and satisfactory spirit. It had been urged by a Member of Her Majesty's Government that more Catholic magistrates were not appointed because, forsooth, some difficulty was found in obtaining gentlemen in fitting positions to occupy the post of magistrate. In a Return which had been placed before the House in response to the demand of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), what did he find? He found that in some of the Northern counties of Ireland, where, unfortunately, the Orange spirit and feeling was predominant, Her Majesty's Government had not hesitated to appoint as magistrates gentlemen occupying the position of merchants, farmers, shopkeepers, hotel proprietors, and even there was one gentleman who had been appointed a magistrate for the county of Tyrone, who, when they looked for his description, was designated "unknown." He certainly thought it would be a very long time before Her Majesty's Government would appoint to the Commission of the Peace a gentleman in the county which he had the honour to represent (Wexford) who was as completely unknown to them as this gentlemen in the county of Tyrone appeared to be. It was a hollow and lame excuse to say that more Catholic magistrates were not appointed for the Southern counties of Ireland because there were no gentleman possessing the qualities that would enable them to fulfil the position of magistrate. If Her Majesty's Government could see their way to making a hotel proprietor a magistrate in the county of Tyrone, or a publican, why could they not also see their way to making a hotel proprietor or a publican a magistrate in the South of Ireland? Surely, a gentleman occupying the position of a merchant or farmer in the South of Ireland was quite as capable in every degree of fulfilling the duties which appertained to the position of a magistrate as gentlemen occupying similar positions in the North of Ireland. Over and over again it had been stated that this was not a religious grievance. That was not really so, because it was undoubtedly an outrageous state of affairs that, in a Catholic country like Ireland, there were only 1,000 Catholic magistrates to the 3,000 or 4,000 Protestant magistrates upon the Irish Bench. But he did not put their claims before the House on religious grounds at all, nor even on the ground of national feeling. They had no wish that the Government should appoint gentlemen to the Commission of the Peace who were Nationalists, or who belonged to any other political Party.

They did not think it was absolutely necessary for gentlemen, in order to discharge the duties of the Commission of the Peace, to be either distinctly an Orangeman or a Nationalist—a Catholic or a Protestant. The qualifications which were necessary in a gentleman to fulfil properly in Ireland the duties of the office of a Justice of the Peace were that he should reside in the locality where he was to exercise the duties of a magistrate, and that he should have some sympathy with the people over whom he was to exercise control. Now, was that the state of affairs in Ireland? English Members could not say there was anything unreasonable in the demand, when the Irish Members asked that the magistrates who were appointed should be gentlemen permanently residing in the district where they were to exercise the duties of their office. What did they find? The list of magistrates given in the Return showed that out of 89 half that number were non-resident. They were gentlemen who did not live in Wexford; who, for the most part, did not go there; and who, so far from being popular with the people, did not in any degree enjoy their confidence. It was idle for Her Majesty's Government to pretend that they could not find Catholic gentlemen in Ireland of sufficient education and other qualifications for the Magistracy. There were plenty of Catholics there fitted for that office in every way; but it was well-known that the Catholics of Ireland were national in their aspirations; and it was not because they could not be found, but because the Government did not want to place the office of magistrate in their hands, that the Catholic gentry of Ireland were not represented on the Commission. It was well that a little plain speaking should be sometimes indulged in; and he would tell Her Majesty's Government that the sooner they recognized the predominance of the Nationalist feeling in Ireland the sooner would peace between the two countries be promoted. The English Government had not to deal with a section of Irish Members sitting in this or that quarter of the House; they had to deal with a Party which extended itself beyond the little Island for which he and his hon. Friends had been struggling—a power which existed in every one of their Foreign Dependencies, and which one day or another would be concentrated against them, unless in time they acceded to such reasonable demands on behalf of the Irish people as, in language of the most moderate description, had that night been made upon them.

ARMY (ANNUAL) BILL.—[BILL 144.]
(The Marquess of Hartington, The Judge Advocate, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 3rd April.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

Amendments of Army Act, 1881.

Clause 4 (Amendment of s. 154 of 44 & 45 Vict. c. 58, as to apprehension of deserters).

MR. HOPWOOD said, he would move the Amendment standing in his name.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have looked at this Amendment, and at the clauses standing in the name of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), the hon. Member for Roscommon (Dr. Commins), and the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), and I have come to the conclusion that they must be considered as new clauses, and taken at the end of the Bill.

MR. HOPWOOD said, that inasmuch as the clause he proposed was intended to amend a section of the Army Act of 1881 prior to the provisions of the present Bill, he thought its place should be where he moved it. If it were not inserted here it would read very awkwardly as an Amendment of the Army Act, 1881.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am much obliged to the hon. and learned Gentleman for the statement he has made. I was of the same opinion myself at first; but, on consideration, it appeared to me that the Amendment would come in more properly as a new clause. The hon. and learned Gentleman has not stated in the Amendment itself when it will come in—neither the page nor the line.

MR. HEALY asked whether it was the intention of the Chairman to rule out every Amendment under similar circumstances?

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not rule them out.

MR. HEALY: Is it your intention to rule that every Amendment to the Army Bill must be moved in the form of a new clause?

THE CHAIRMAN: No; it will depend upon circumstances. I consider that these clauses to amend the Army Act of 1881 will come in more properly as new clauses at the end of the Bill, rather than, as it is now proposed, after Clause 4.

MR. WARTON said, he wished to move the omission of the first five lines of the clause. He did not know what Member of the Government was in charge of the Bill; but, whoever it was, he hoped he should have his attention, as his desire was to assist in drafting the Bill, and not to obstruct Her Majesty's Government. If the hon. or right hon. Gentleman would look at Clause 4 and the next clause, he would see that they were drawn on two perfectly different principles, although they were both amendments of sections of the Army Act of 1881. Clause 4, it would be seen, commenced with an introductory paragraph, or preamble, showing the expediency of the provision, which paragraph, for all practical purposes, was merely surplusage. There was no occasion to go into the question of expediency at all; but if they did go into it and recited documents, it was essential that they should recite correctly. In other words, a correct representation should be given of the section of the previous Act, which Clause 4 professed to recite. The recital only mentioned the police officer, and did not refer at all to any "officer, soldier, or other person," as did the section of the Act of 1881. So much for the recital; but, more than this, Clause 5 seemed to be drawn up on an entirely different system, as it did not give the introductory paragraph. The clauses were differently drawn, and they could not, therefore, be both right. He would leave it to those in charge of the Bill to say which was right and which was wrong; and, in the meantime, would move the omission of the first paragraph in Clause 4.

Amendment proposed, "That all the words from the word 'whereas' to the word 'follows,' in line 17, be omitted."
—(Mr. Warton.)

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, the words referred to were put in the clause by way of recital, in order to show the reason for the amendment of the Act of 1881. The recital came first, and then followed the words which were really operative. It was a matter of perfect indifference what the preliminary words were, because, as his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Warton) knew perfectly well, the object of the Amendment was simply to import, this year, a certain necessary Amendment into the Army Act, which Amendment would be incorporated into the Act quite independently of recital in question.

Mr. WARTON agreed with the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the preliminary words were unnecessary; but, as they purported to recite the words of the Act of 1881, should they not recite correctly? Moreover, as he had pointed out, if Clause 4 was properly drawn, Clause 5 was not. Which form would the right hon. and learned Gentleman decide upon for both clauses; for, surely, the drafting should be on general, uniform lines?

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN): The recital is only intended to show the Committee the meaning of the provision. I do not think any alteration is requisite.

Mr. WARTON: When you recite, why do you not do it correctly?

Mr. TOMLINSON: Are we discussing the Bill or the Amendment only?

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN): Only additions proposed to be incorporated in the Act which is really permanent, although renewed annually.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Gentlemen the Members for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), Roscommon

(Dr. Commins), Cork City (Mr. Parnell), and Sligo (Mr. Sexton), who may not have understood what I stated just now, that the Amendments standing in their names should be moved as new clauses. They will come on in the order in which they stand on the Paper, precedence being only given to any Amendments which may be proposed by the Government.

Mr. HOPWOOD said, he would move the Amendment standing in his name—

"That in section 32 of 'The Army Act, 1881,' the words 'penal servitude' be omitted, and the word 'imprisonment' be substituted.

He wished to say, frankly, that in this Amendment he was not dealing with the wider question in the minds of many hon. Members—namely, the general question of the administration of the punishment of penal servitude by courts marshal, but was limiting himself in this particular instance to Section 32 of the Army Act. The sense of that section was this—it repressed a particular offence, which was described in this way—

"Every person . . . having been discharged with disgrace from any part of Her Majesty's Forces, or . . . from the Navy has afterwards enlisted in the Regular Forces without declaring the circumstances of his discharge or dismissal shall, on conviction by court martial, be liable to suffer penal servitude, or such less imprisonment as is in this Act mentioned."

Now, what he wished to call the attention of the Committee to was the fact that penal servitude was a very severe punishment and should only be applied to most serious crimes. The crime, however, to which he was drawing attention was hardly to be called a crime. It was a venial offence, a deceit, and hardly came within the wider range of offences which were called "crimes." A man having been in the Army, and having been dismissed, chose, for purposes of his own, to offer himself again for enlistment as a soldier. Such an act might be a disturbance of the arrangements of the Army, and might be displeasing to commanders of regiments—it might be anything but satisfactory for a commander to have black sheep come into his regiment; but, after all, the offence was one which could be very fairly met by the old punishment that used to be meted out in respect of it—namely giving the offender three months' imprisonment as a rogue and vagabond. This new punishment of penal servitude was owing, no doubt, to the stern ideas of some people connected with the administration of the Army; but he could only say he had traced back the offence, and had found that in 1877 it was punishable with imprisonment as a rogue and vagabond on summary conviction before two magistrates, or before a district court martial—and he supposed that a district court martial under the Statute could hardly have given a longer period of imprisonment than the magistrates could have done. However that was, the offence could not be punished with anything more than imprisonment. As the Committee would remember, in 1878-9 there was an inquiry—a considerable inquiry—before a Select Committee, and the drawing up of a body of military laws known first as the Army Act of 1879 and now as the Army Act of 1881. In the model Act suggested by the Committee, the offence with which he was dealing was only made punishable with imprisonment; but, somehow or other, the provision to which he took exception was inserted in the Act which became law. He could not trace the change of opinion which took place; he did not know how it was determined upon; and he could not discover in the history of the matter that any hon. Member, in giving his sanction to the Act, and agreeing to the section in question, was informed that he was giving to courts martial the increased power which, it seemed, they now possessed. The fact was, however, that an offence which was a mere personation, a mere fraud—he did not wish to minimize it, but an offence which certainly, in the minds of those he was addressing, the Legislature was right in thinking three months' imprisonment amply atoned for—was actually now punished with five years' penal servitude. Nay, the punishment had gone beyond seven years in some instances. It had absolutely reached 10 years' penal servitude, and all for a simple lie or false act on the part of a man presenting himself for enlistment—in fact, in the midst of his false pretences, coming forward to confer on his country the advantage of his services as a soldier. Would the Committee sanction the continuance of this preposterous punishment for such an offence? He did hope the Committee would take action in the matter, and say that such things should not be—that two years' imprisonment should satisfy the most craving hunger for punishment of any officer who ever sat on a court martial for an offence like this. He would tell the Committee what disclosures were made on this subject in the Return he had moved for, and which had been laid upon the Table of the House. In the year 1882 there were 92 men subjected to five years' penal servitude, five to seven years, and one to over seven years—the Return in the latter case did not specify the exact period. In 1883, 54 were subjected to five years' penal servitude, one to seven years, and one to over seven years; and the note in the Return in regard to the last was highly suggestive, and, he was sure, would strike the Committee as such when they heard it. There was an asterisk against the case in the Return; and on referring to the corresponding sign at the bottom of the page it said of this man, who was subjected to over seven years' penal servitude—"Five years is remitted from 10 years' penal servitude," so that, in this case, someone had actually been barbarous enough to inflict on the man for this mere lie—for this mere passing of himself off as a competent soldier, which, perhaps, in one sense, he was, though the authorities might not be desirous of seeing him in the Army—10 years' penal servitude. He thought the Committee would agree with him that it was time they should take away from the military authorities, who now exercised it, the power of inflicting such a punishment. Was it possible, he would ask, the offence on the part of the man endeavouring to enlist could ever be so exaggerated that two years' imprisonment would not be sufficient to punish it? Would that not be a sufficient punishment to repress the practice? He considered that, with regard to this, as in regard to other courts martial punishments, that the Memorial recently issued by His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief must give a great many of them immense satisfaction, because of the chiding it gave the courts martial. He trusted that an additional remonstrance would be conveyed by the decision of the Committee that night, and that it would do something still further to repress an evil which was becoming a scandal; and that the Committee might part with its work with the satisfaction of knowing that it would for the future prevent such a monstrous punishment as this, and enable a remission of the punishment inflicted on 154 men, now confined in penal servitude for long periods, to be obtained in connection with an offence which might be described as a manufactured military offence, and the importance of which was greatly exaggerated. He begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

New Clause :—

(Amendment of section thirty-two of "The Army Act, 1881.")

"That in section thirty-two of 'The Army Act, 1881,' the words 'penal servitude' be omitted, and the word 'imprisonment' be substituted,"—(Mr. Hopwood.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, that, as a rule, courts martial acted very fairly, and in the course of four years he had found their decisions very just; but there was a marked decrease in crime in the Army, and he was glad the hon. and learned Member had called attention to the Circular of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief. Still, this was a most serious offence, for these men returned to the Army and corrupted the young soldiers, and so did great harm; but the offence was on the decrease, and the number of sentences of penal servitude had greatly diminished. Upon the whole, he was authorized to state that the Government would accept the Amendment.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was very glad to hear what the right hon. and learned Gentleman had said, for he thought two years a sufficient term.

MR. GRAY said, he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman was about to favour the Committee with some explanation of why the Government had made this change.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that formerly this offence was increasing, but now it had diminished.

MR. WARTON pointed out that in Section 32 of the Act the words "penal servitude" were used in two senses. He thought there should be some clear definition of who was the person to be discharged with disgrace from the Army.

MR. HOPWOOD said, that what he proposed to do was to amend the clause by inserting, after Section 32, the words "Sub-section 1."

Motion agreed to.

Clause read a second time.

Amendment proposed, after Section 32, to insert the words "Sub-section 1."—(Mr. Hopwood.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

DR. COMMINS said, the clause he now proposed spoke for itself. It read thus—

(Unauthorised Punishments.)

"Whereas doubts have arisen whether commanding officers or courts martial administering the provisions of 'The Army Act, 1881,' in dealing with offences under sections thirty-eight, thirty-nine, and forty of the said Act, committed by persons with whom they were also entitled to deal, under powers conferred by some Foreign Potentate or Power, were, under the authority of such Potentate or Power, entitled to deal with the persons committing such offences otherwise than as provided in the said Act: Be it therefore enacted, That wherever any court martial or commanding officer exercising the power or authority conferred by 'The Army Act, 1881,' also holds commission or authority from any Foreign Potentate or Power, such court or officer in dealing with offences committed against sections thirty-eight, thirty-nine, and forty of the said Act shall prosecute, punish, or otherwise deal with the same only in manner and form as provided by the said Act."

Some men had been punished in Egypt by methods which would not be approved of by hon. Members; and he believed the general feeling of the public revolted at such punishment. If British officers were empowered to inflict such punishment as they had imposed, an example would be given to foreigners that would not be to the credit of the British Army, while it would destroy the morale of the Army itself.

New Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

MR. PARNELL said, the clause which his hon. Friend now proposed to add to the Bill was an alternative clause to one which stood in his name, and he thought it was one which the Government might very well adopt. The necessity for some such provision as this in the Army Discipline Act had been rendered apparent by recent events in Egypt, where persons subject to British military law, and to all the penalties provided by the Act of 1881, had been tried under Egyptian military law. They were persons who accompanied our Forces as camp-followers, who were subject to British law, and who stood side by side with our soldiers; but on their return they were tried not under British law, but under Egyptian military law, and sentenced by a British officer to be flogged, which punishment had been abolished by English law. When this Army Act was going through the House, in 1879, the question was considered whether it would not be possible to extend the provisions of that Act to officers who might be tried under what was known as martial law. During warlike operations it was the habit of commanding officers to proclaim martial law; and the proclamation of martial law meant the suspension of all law and the establishment of such regulations as the commanding officer chose or thought necessary to maintain his position. But soldiers could not be tried under that martial law; if they were British soldiers they could only be tried under the Army Discipline Act. The House came to the conclusion that it would be impossible, under the Act of 1879, to assent to such a considerable alteration as was then proposed; and the clause of his hon. Friend did not in any sense extend so far as that, because, on the very expedition which had directed attention to this matter, a large number of Egyptian soldiers who were subject to Egyptian military law were tried and flogged under that law. Those soldiers had never come under the provisions of British military law; and he and his hon. Friend, therefore, confined their attention to the case of persons who were subject to British law, and they asked that such persons should not, under any circumstances, be punished by British officers with penalties not allowed by the Act of 1881. This, he thought, was a very reasonable request. A British officer accepting the services of a Foreign Power did so, or ought to do so, with a knowledge of the Military Code of that Power; and in every case it would be a reasonable condition to insist upon that officer not inflicting punishment, under the law of that Power, upon soldiers who were at the same time subject to British military law. He thought the lash had been finally abolished by that House; and he was very much surprised—and he believed very many other people had been greatly surprised—to find that the obsolete “cat-o’-nine-tails” had been applied to certain persons who were subject to the stringent penalties of the Army Discipline Act of 1881. In the discussions on flogging, the House was told that it would be impossible to maintain the provisions of that Act unless the lash was retained; but that statement had been falsified by the results. The discipline of the Army and Navy, and the courage of their soldiers and sailors, had not been impaired by the abolition of that barbarous punishment; and he believed it was quite possible for the officers of the Queen to maintain discipline among auxiliaries accompanying British Forces, and engaged in the same operations, without resorting to this horrible and condemned system of punishment. He, therefore, trusted the Government would see their way to making a graceful concession, and that they would not, by refusing an amendment of the law in this matter, go back on the hustings’ declarations of the Liberal Party at the last Election.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, he did not know whether the hon. Gentleman was aware of it; but, as a matter of fact, neither his Amendment nor that of the hon. Member for Roscommon (Dr. Commins) would effect the object the hon. Member had in view. Neither of the proposals would prevent a repetition of the act the hon. Members desired to put a stop to. As he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) understood it, Sir William Hewett, holding no military command in the British Army, but being a naval officer with no jurisdiction over soldiers, but being, at the same time, Governor of Suakin, ordered certain camp-followers to receive the punishment of the lash. He could not have done it, if he had been a military commander, either before or under the Act of 1881, for the abolition of flogging in the Army made no difference in the particular case in question, the punishment in question not having been awarded by a court martial as the law before 1881 required. The hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) asked under what authority Admiral Hewett had acted? Presumably, he had acted under his authority as Governor of the Egyptian fortress of Suakin. What jurisdiction the Egyptian military law gave the gallant Admiral, he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) could not say. English military law was difficult enough to understand, to say nothing about Egyptian. No doubt, by the law of Egypt, Admiral Hewett had been entitled to do what he had done. [Mr. PARNELL: He is a British officer.] No doubt Admiral Hewett was a British officer; but if his conduct had been regulated by English military law, his hands would have been altogether tied. He would have been governing a foreign fortress under a law altogether alien to that of the country in which he held command. Moreover, he was in command of a beleaguered fortress—a fortress really believed, at that time, to be in considerable danger. Hon. Members would not contend that a commander of a fortress should never be entitled to take the law into his own hands; and yet they were complaining of Admiral Hewett for having done that. Such acts might not be justified by military law, but by that necessity which justified the suspension of all law. For there might be times—nay, there must be times—when men were mutinous, when a commander, for his own safety, and for the safety of those depending on him, was entitled to disregard all law, military as well as civil. Sir James Mackintosh, a great jurist, and a man above all others opposed to the improper exercise of prerogative, in 1824 had pointed out, in connection with the case of a man who had been shot without trial, that while the law was silenced by the noise of arms, the rulers of an armed force must punish as equitably as they could those crimes which affected their safety. He went on to instance the case of mutineers, and to justify killing, in self-defence, by means other than those laid down by law. They knew what occurred during the Indian Mutiny, when acts were done which, of course, nothing but necessity could justify. Yet hon. Gentlemen now proposed to take away the power of resorting to these extraordinary measures by an amendment of the Army Act, forgetting that Admiral Hewett was not and could not be brought under its provisions. He doubted whether the Amendments proposed would meet even the case of General Gordon; but they certainly would not touch Admiral Hewett. They could not touch him in this Act, for it applied solely to military men; and the result of accepting either of the Amendments might be that they would have one law for a Military Governor of a fortress and another law for a Civil or a Naval Governor. He had shown hon. Members that they could not do what they wanted by their Amendments; but, besides, it was surely not the business of English law to interfere with the jurisdiction of the commander of a foreign fortress. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, hon. Members might differ from him; but he did not think it was right to interfere with the authority given to an officer as Governor of a foreign fortress. If they did interfere they would cause endless confusion; they would have an Englishman holding a foreign command governed by English law; and they might have cases of insubordination, and even of open mutiny, in which such an officer, simply for administering the ordinary law of the country in which he held command, might be subjected to the penalties attaching to a breach of the Army Act. He hoped British officers would seldom be reduced to the necessity of resorting to such extremities. But what he contended was, that neither by this Amendment, nor by any other, could they touch Admiral Hewett; and that if they could they ought not to interfere with him in the discharge of his functions as the Governor of a foreign fortress.

Mr. LEAMY asked whether, supposing the Egyptian law allowed an officer to subject men under his command to the greatest possible torture, Her Majesty's Government would allow their officers to avail themselves of the powers of that law? Would English officers be allowed to use the torture? In the case of a naval officer, would he be allowed to keel-haul his men, supposing keel-hauling was allowed in the Egyptian Naval Service? If such a punishment were inflicted by an English officer in Egypt, would the right hon. and learned Gentleman get up in the House and defend that officer?

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, the other hon. Gentlemen had not the courage of their convictions. The last part of that sentence was as true to-day as it was five years ago. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had not the courage of his convictions; and why was that? Because he was sitting in the safe and tranquil haven of the Treasury Bench; and, forsooth, his slumbers and repose must not be disturbed by the cries of a few wretched foreign camp-followers. He (Major General Alexander) had listened with astonishment to the special pleading of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) in regard to the camel-drivers who had been flogged by order of Admiral Hewett. The noble Marquess said he had no official knowledge of these transactions, as though the special correspondents of the newspapers had invented them; and now, to-night, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General tried to fasten the responsibility for what had occurred on the Khedive. It was all very well to quote the authority of the Khedive; but the Committee knew very well that that authority was treated with but scant courtesy whenever Mr. Clifford Lloyd wished to get rid of, or summarily eject, one of the Khedive's dummy Ministers. The real fact was that the Khedive was only allowed to have a will of his own when it suited Her Majesty's Government to shift responsibility from their shoulders to his. The Committee would not condemn too strongly the spurious humanitarianism, the mawkish sentimentality, and the transparent hypocrisy which endeavoured to draw a distinction between the flogging of British soldiers and Egyptians. Believing, as he did, that if the punishment was degrading in the one case it was equally so in the other, he should have the greatest pleasure in supporting the Amendment.

MR. PARNELL said, it was true the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for England had pointed out some weak places in the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend (Dr. Commins) and in his (Mr. Parnell's) Amendment from a technical point of view. Well, the Amendments had been drawn up for the purpose of carrying out a definite object, and he and his hon. and learned Friend had drafted them to the best of their humble skill. They had not the legal ability of the Department of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Osborne Morgan) who was defending the conduct of the Government on the present occasion; but it was perfectly obvious what they desired to effect; and if there should happen to be some imperfections in the Amendments, the way to remove them should be pointed out, and he and his hon. and learned Friend should not be met by a double set of arguments. The Government should state to the Committee what they intended to do, and how they intended to meet this issue. Did they intend to rely upon the special pleading of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for England; or did they agree with those hon. Members who contended that the officers of the Queen should not be allowed to inflict the punishment of flogging on the British Military Force in Egypt? That was the single question raised by the Amendments. If Her Majesty's Government admitted the justice of their claim as he had described it, and if they saw their way to bringing up clauses on Report to carry out this object, since they found fault with the words which he (Mr. Parnell) and his hon. and learned Friend in their ignorance had employed, all he could say was that he should be willing to refrain from pressing his Amendment on the attention of the Committee, and also to advise his hon. and learned Friend to withdraw his Amendment. But, so far as they had gone, they had had no such satisfactory assurance from the Government; and, failing any satisfactory assurance, they should be obliged to seek the opinion of the Committee by taking a Division on the words of the first Amendment.

DR. COMMINS said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General had pointed out that the Amendments would not apply to a naval officer. Of course it would not, for the Act itself did not apply to the Navy, and, therefore, could not meet the case of Admiral Hewett. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had made use of an argument which, if he would look at the clause, he would find was a bad one. The right hon. and learned Gentleman read it as if it only contained the words "courts martial;" but it also contained the words "commanding officers . . .

administering the provisions of the Army Act, 1881." Supposing that instead of Admiral Hewett—who was a naval officer, and therefore did not, as he had said, come under the Act—a military officer was in command of the British Forces at Suakin, he would be the "commanding officer administering the provisions of the Army Act, 1881," and precisely under the conditions that the Amendment was intended to meet, such an officer would not be able to act as Admiral Hewett had done, and inflict a cruel, unusual, and demoralizing punishment without any authority whatever from either this Act or any other British Commission, and would not be able to shelter himself by saying—"I have a commission from the Khedive or Foreign Power which enables me to do what I have done." Such an excuse as that might, as the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had pointed out, be used to cover occurrences which took place in Persia, or China, or other countries where systems of punishment were practised which were utterly abhorrent to the sense of humanity of the people of this country. The Amendment before the Committee would meet the case of a British Commander who had a body of auxiliary troops under him as well as a British Force. It could not be said that the punishment of flogging had been resorted to by Admiral Hewett for repressive purposes at a time of great peril. Of course, at such a time, neither this Amendment nor anything else would tie the hands of a commander; but in the case of the camel-drivers, so far as he could make out, the measure of their offending was only something like want of sufficient activity in performing their duty.

MR. HOPWOOD sympathized with hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, but did not think the Amendments proposed would have the desired effect. As to the action of Admiral Hewett, if it had been as hon. Members had described it, no doubt it had been barbarous; but he should like to have more evidence on the matter before he pronounced on it. They must remember that they were now dealing with the Army, and not with the Navy, and that it was General Graham, and not Admiral Hewett, who was in command of Her Majesty's troops at Suakin. They were now proposing regulations which would not in the least affect the particular case of Admiral Hewett. As to the gallant Admiral, he was Governor of Suakin; and if he adopted a course which no British Governor had a right to adopt, and anyone suffered in consequence, he could be sued for damages. Many cases of that kind had occurred—there was the case of General Picton, and the cases of Governors of British Colonies, whose defence was that by the laws of the places and the circumstances of the cases, the punishment, and even torture, they had inflicted had been justifiable. This defence had been set up in British Courts, and declared invalid. A protest had been made against the conduct of Admiral Hewett, and many severe remarks had been made on the subject; and though it might fairly be said that that was very slight compensation to the unhappy men who had been flogged, yet it might not be without substantial effect in preventing any repetition of the flogging, at Suakin or anywhere else.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER said, he had not intended to take any further part in the debate, and should not have done so if it had not been for the remarks which had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood). He must express his astonishment that the hon. and learned Gentleman, of all men in the House, should have taken the course he had taken. He (Major General Alexander) remembered the course the hon. and learned Gentleman thought fit to take on, he thought it was, the 17th of June, 1879. The hon. and learned Gentleman spent a whole afternoon demonstrating to the House that a sentence of 50 lashes really meant one of 450, because the "cat" having nine tails multiplied the lashes by nine. The hon. and learned Member had horrified the House with the harrowing details of this punishment; and that he, of all other persons, on this occasion, should oppose what the real friends of humanity were proposing, almost took his breath away.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The hon and gallant Gentleman the Member for Ayrshire (Major General Alexander) is indignant at what he considers the inconsistency of hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, who, having abolished flogging in the British Army, are, as he thinks, disposed to tolerate it in connection with the people of another nation. Well, I must say the hon. and gallant Gentleman's inconsistency is at least equal to ours, because I believe he was one of those who supported corporal punishment when applied to the British Army.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER: I proposed to reduce the punishment from 50 to 25 lashes.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Therefore, seeing that the hon. and gallant General would apply corporal punishment to a certain extent to the British soldier, I do not know why he should be so angry at its being applied to foreigners, who might or might not be soldiers. But I should not have risen to found an argument on the inconsistency of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, had it not been for another observation which fell from him, and which, I must say, I heard with great astonishment coming from a Member of this House, and from a Member of the hon. Gentleman's Profession. He has accused me of special pleading, or quibbling, because I said the other day I was not willing to form a judgment of the conduct of our officers until I had full official Reports before me bearing upon that conduct. The hon. and gallant Gentleman says—"Are not the reports of special correspondents sufficient?" They may be sufficient for the hon. and gallant Gentleman; but I acknowledge openly, whatever hon. Gentlemen say, that these reports are not sufficient to induce me to form an opinion on the conduct of any officer in Her Majesty's Service. The newspaper reports are often highly sensational, and I am certainly not going to form an opinion from them. The material upon which I form my judgment must be of a more authentic and reliable character.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER wished to explain the course he had taken in June, 1879. He should not have gone into the matter if it had not been for a remark of the noble Marquess who had just sat down. He (Major General Alexander) had proposed that the punishment of flogging should be reduced from 50 to 25 lashes.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: How do you know Admiral Hewett gave more than 25 lashes?

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER said, that his proposal had been accepted by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the late Secretary of State for War (Colonel Stanley), and he had taken no further part in the debates. He was perfectly content that the punishment should be done away with in the Army altogether; and now that it was abolished in the case of English soldiers, he objected to English officers having the power to inflict it on Egyptians.

MR. MOLLOY considered the doctrine laid down by the Judge Advocate General the most extraordinary he had ever heard. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that if an officer in Her Majesty's Service accepted a command under a Foreign Potentate he was exempted from all obedience to the laws of the Service to which he originally belonged.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (MR. OSBORNE MORGAN): I did not say anything of the kind.

MR. MOLLOY said, he should be sorry to misrepresent the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He had understood him distinctly to say that they could not judge of Admiral Hewett's conduct, because he was acting under the laws of the Khedive of Egypt, and was not bound by the military laws of England. It came to this, therefore, according to the doctrine laid down by the Judge Advocate General—that an officer in Egypt, though still remaining in the British Service, though under the laws of the British Army he was not entitled to administer certain punishments of an extreme character, yet, as he was in the service of the Khedive, might use the laws of the Khedive—or whatever Potentate he might be under—against the Natives under his command. Let them follow out that doctrine. Suppose a British officer accepted service for a time, with the permission of Her Majesty's Government, in the Zulu Army, and supposing that impaling was justifiable under Zulu laws. According to the doctrine of the Judge Advocate General, a British officer, although bound by the laws of his own country, yet in time of war could exercise the laws of the Zulus on camp-followers who were fighting side by side with the British soldiers. That was one of the most monstrous doctrines ever laid down by the British Government. He should be obliged if the Judge Advocate General would explain whether that was his meaning or not. That was what he understood, and what was being argued upon. When the Attorney General rose, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman was going to modify the statement of the Judge Advocate General; but after indulging in special pleading, which was like a red herring drawn across the path, he justified what the Judge Advocate General had said.

Mr. HEALY wished to ask a question of the noble Marquess. A fortnight ago the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) put a Question on the Paper as to whether these men had or had not been flogged. The noble Marquess said he did not know whether that was so or not; and he now wished to ask the noble Marquess whether he had called for a Report on the matter; and, if so, whether he had received it; and, if not, why he had not obtained the information, knowing that the hon. Member for the City of Cork intended to raise this question? The telegraph wire was at the disposal of the Government, and was freely used. Admiral Hewett had now sailed away to Massowah; but he would like to know whether the Government put themselves in communication with that officer or not upon this subject? If not, their conduct was not justifiable, for they knew that this Bill was coming on; and if they had not got this information they were open to the charge of special pleading. It was entirely their own fault; and it was a shame to meet a question of this kind in the spirit that had just been shown. The noble Marquess accused the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major General Alexander) of inconsistency; but he thought the hon. and gallant Gentleman was much more consistent than the Government. The noble Marquess was an old Leader of the Liberal Party; but the position of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major General Alexander) was a very different one. He was not opposed to flogging in the Army; but, it having been abolished, the hon. and gallant Gentleman, like a sensible and humane officer, said if it was abolished at all it was abolished for Blacks as well as for Englishmen; and in that he was much more consistent than the noble Marquess. He should like to know whether, as a matter of law, if these Blacks came over to this country and took action against Admiral Hewett, they would not have a good case against him? He contended that they would. There was a famous case in 1798, when so-called martial law was proclaimed in Ireland, and a High Sheriff had a respectable gentleman flogged. What happened? When the rebellion was put down this gentleman took action against the High Sheriff, and he obtained damages. Therefore, if an honest jury could be got together, and these Blacks took action against Admiral Hewett for assault, he believed they would win the case. Of course, he knew there was no chance of anything of the kind; but he thought it was very discreditable to the Liberal Government—the friends of humanity—that this punishment, which they had abolished in the case of White men, should be inflicted on Blacks. They must either be logical in this matter, or admit the possibility of this barbarous punishment. As the courbash had been administered to these Egyptians he would suggest that the Government should go to the country with the cry of the Courbash and the Caucus.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he thought the result of that evening's debate was too instructive to be passed by without a few more observations. It was not surprising that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) should have raised this question; for there was nothing in all his career to which he could look back with greater pleasure than the abolition of flogging in the Army. He wished to say a few words as to the position of the Government in this matter. He did not agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) that the noble Marquess was inconsistent, for the noble Marquess had opposed the abolition of flogging in the Army as long as he could possibly stand by it, and he only abolished it when he was forced to do so. In fact, with regard to flogging in the Army, the noble Marquess performed the same useful functions he seemed always to perform in respect to the Army—he acted as chief Conservative spokesman on every proposed reform. Having been forced to abolish flogging in the English Army, he now took refuge in flogging in the Egyptian Army; therefore, the hon. Member for Monaghan was not entitled to accuse the noble Marquess of inconsistency, but should rather offer the incense of his admiration to the ardent advocate of every abuse of the rights of human beings. When flogging in the Army was under consideration in that House, a discussion took place which he thought would not be publicly recorded until those long-expected Memoirs of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) were given to the world. The hon. Member was prominent with the hon. Member for the City of Cork in urging the abolition of flogging, and for a while they were let severely alone in their crusade against this punishment; but in the last Parliament the House of Commons had the advantage of gaining some keen electioneering instincts; and some hon. Members, seeing that the hon. Members for the City of Cork and Cavan had got hold of what he thought the hon. Member for Monaghan would call a "good thing," immediately joined the forces of the hon. Members, and distinguished themselves by the zeal, and energy, and enthusiasm of their attacks on the lash. But now came a little piece of private Parliamentary history which would foreshadow and anticipate the Memoirs of his hon. Friend. The hon. Member said to one of these electioneering English Radical Members whom he had called from the vasty deep, if such a course were adopted it would not result in the purpose which this English Liberal professed to advance—it would not advance the abolition of flogging. The hon. Member was of too ingenuous and almost Arcadian a disposition to understand the superior wisdom of his English ally; but he was soon undeceived, for the hon. English Member said—"We do not want to abolish flogging in the Army, but it is good for an electioneering cry." He was in the recollection of every Member of the House in saying that, with regard to that electioneering contest, the iniquities of Lord Beaconsfield were not so effective.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is travelling very wide of the Question.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was sorry the Chairman had found it necessary to curtail his observations on this point; because when he came into the House, after a brief absence, he found it engaged in an amusing contest between the noble Marquess and the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major General Alexander) with regard to their record on this question. He wished again to call attention to this point, which was perfectly novel, and which he hoped did not go outside the ruling of the Chair. The position taken up in this matter by the Judge Advocate General, and fortified by the Attorney General, was that there must be a distinction of nationalities; and the whole argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was that these men should be flogged because they were not Englishmen, but Egyptians. That was not what the Attorney General said a few years ago; his argument then was the equality of man, and sympathy with all races of men. But now the Government, who went to the country on the abolition of the lash, was standing up for the lash; they who went to the country upon the equality of nationalities were now standing by distinctions between races, and consenting to wholesale and purposeless slaughter.

MR. SEXTON doubted whether the most devoted supporter of the Government could feel any pride in the attitude taken by the Government upon this matter. They appeared to have taken refuge in silence; but as he and his hon. Friends did not think the argument had been exhausted, they could not consent to the Government taking that course. The Government had left this question in a most extraordinary position before the House; and they had placed themselves and the Liberal Party, on questions which were very likely to arouse deep feeling in England, in a dilemma from which they would not very easily escape. He had not derived any information from the argument of the Judge Advocate General, who generally got fogged on any question he attempted to deal with. All that he could gather from the right hon. and learned Gentleman was that neither the words of his hon. Friend, nor any other words, could compel an officer to keep within the limits of British law. The Attorney General did not commit himself to such an extreme view as that no words could accomplish that object; but so far as could be gathered from the speeches of the two learned Gentlemen—one of whom said no words could accomplish that object, and the other allowed the Committee to infer that some words would accomplish it—was, that an officer holding the commission of the Queen might leave this country, and, with the sanction of the Queen and of this Government, take service under a Foreign Ruler, and might apply to persons acting under his command—which he had acquired by virtue of his capacity as a British officer—the rude and barbarous laws of the Foreign Power under which he took office. Such an officer might go to Egypt, as Admiral Hewett had gone, or to Abyssinia, or to Zululand, and might inflict on persons under his command punishment of the most violent character; and after a few years of such practices he might return to England, having all the time enjoyed the sanction and countenance of this Government, and resume his position as an officer of this civilized and Christian State. He should imagine that the British public would hear of this to-morrow, and that a strong feeling would be aroused by the helplessness of the Government to control their officers abroad. The Government knew the hon. Member for the City of Cork intended to call attention to this matter, and they were within a couple of hours' communication by telegraph with Admiral Hewett. The noble Marquess, or the Judge Advocate General, might have ascertained the facts of the case as to the infliction of the flogging if they had cared to do so; they could have found out from the Admiral without difficulty whether a mutiny had been attempted, or whether the punishment had been inflicted simply because the camel-drivers had been wanting in energy, or had attempted to run away. The noble Marquess was blameable for having taken no measures to ascertain the facts of the case, since this inquiry had been set on foot, and for giving no answer to the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) as to whether or not he would now use the telegraph for the purpose of obtaining information. In order to give the Government an opportunity for reflection, and for explaining what their intentions were, he begged to move that the Chairman do report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Sexton.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I should be glad to give an answer to the question put to me; but it certainly would not be regular for me to do it on the Motion for reporting Progress.

MR. HEALY: Why did not you do it before?

MR. SEXTON said, he should be happy to withdraw the Motion, in order to afford the noble Marquess an opportunity of making an explanation.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: In answer to the question put to me, I may say, in the first place, that it was not "several weeks ago" that the question was first put to me. Only a fortnight has elapsed since then. It is true we are in communication with Suakin by telegraph; but it is not possible to go into detail upon all questions of minor importance when serious events are constantly taking place, and the wires are occupied with business of importance. What I mean to say is that the matter is not of such great importance as to warrant full telegraphic communication with regard to it. When the question was first mentioned in the newspapers, Admiral Hewett was requested, without the aid of the telegraph, to send information; and, in reply, the telegram which has been communicated to the House was received. The matter is not connected with the Department in which I am specially interested, but is connected with the Admiralty. I do not think my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty (the Earl of Northbrook) has yet received a full Report. As to the observations made by several Members opposite, to the effect that any barbarous punishments sanctioned by the laws of barbarous countries can be inflicted by officers of Her Majesty's Army and Navy, I think that the obvious and simple reply is that it is possible, so far as any legal consequence is concerned, for such barbarous acts to be committed; but, of course, we know that the country is the judge of the conduct of its officers; and that if such acts as those suggested were committed notice would be taken of it by the public. The officers would be brought to account in regard to such acts, just as they are at the present moment brought to account in regard to failure of duty in other matters.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY wished to know how far the Government desired to go with hon. Members, and how far they wished to keep away from them? It was now admitted that the barbarous systems permitted in some foreign countries could be practised, under certain conditions, by Her Majesty's officers—when holding a foreign fortress, or in command of foreign troops. Well, hon. Members on those (the Irish) Benches desired to make that impossible. Did Her Majesty's Government wish to make it possible or impossible? If the Government wished to go with hon. Members for Ireland they could put an Amendment to effect the desired object into proper shape; and if they did not do so, those hon. Members would know perfectly well that the Government were against them.

MR. PARNELL said, that, as he did not see a Representative of the Admiralty present, doubtless the noble Marquess had been in communication with that Department on this question. As the Amendment referred to the conduct of a naval officer, he (Mr. Parnell) wished to ask whether the Admiralty had called for any Report on the matter from Admiral Hewett? It seemed to him that if such a Report had been called for by telegraph, sufficient time had now elapsed to have enabled it to be sent several times over by mail. They had received detailed accounts by mail of things which had occurred in the Fleet since the flogging incident. He saw that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had just taken his place. He was asking whether the Admiralty had called for a Report with regard to the flogging of the camel-drivers who accompanied General Graham's expedition, a Question on the matter having been put in the House a fortnight ago?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) had referred to the fact that a question had been immediately put to Admiral Hewett by telegraph, and that the reply thereto had been laid on the Table of the House. No further inquiry had been made since then. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, no second inquiry was made, because the first appeared sufficient, and because, as had often been declared in the House, it was not desirable to repeat inquiries unnecessarily, or to occupy the time of officers in Admiral Hewett's position by sending and requiring needless telegrams. There could be no doubt that when they received Admiral Hewett's detailed despatches they would have full accounts of all the steps he had taken in connection with the matter under discussion.

MR. PARNELL said, it appeared to him that the answer of the hon. Member was most unsatisfactory. In reply to a Question he had put to the Government a fortnight ago the noble Marquess had read to the House a telegram which had been received from Sir William Hewett. The noble Marquess had stated at that time that he was not aware whether the punishment dispensed by Admiral Hewett had been flogging or any other punishment. The noble Marquess stated that Admiral Hewett had reported that he had caused the camel-drivers to be "punished"—that Admiral Hewett had not used the word "flogged;" and that, therefore, corporal punishment might not have been inflicted. Under the very grave circumstances of the case, the probability being that a very unusual punishment had been inflicted by a British officer, and Notice having been given that an Amendment would be moved in Committee on the Army Bill, the least the Government could have done would have been to have sent a definite telegram to Admiral Hewett asking for explicit information on the subject. As matters at present stood, Admiral Hewett was probably under the impression that his telegraphic despatch to the Government was perfectly satisfactory, and that no further inquiry would be made. In order to give time to the Government to give further consideration to this matter, and to enable them to communicate with Admiral Hewett again, he would move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Parnell.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 26; Noes 76: Majority 50.—(Div. List, No. 56.)

The Marquess of Hartington

Question again proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. HEALY said, he thought after what had occurred it was very evident that the Government could put an end to this controversy, which threatened to be so prolonged, if they liked. The former contention of the Government, when they were charged with shifting and shuffling, was that they could not state what the punishment inflicted by Admiral Hewett was, or why it was inflicted. Now, however, hon. Members had extracted from them the fact that, though they knew this Bill was coming on, and that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) intended to bring forward his Amendment, they treated the hon. Member with contempt, and declined to send a 2s. 6d. telegram to Admiral Hewett to ask for the required information. It, therefore, came to this—that, although the Leader of a Party which could muster in that House 40 men, and which, on an occasion like next Monday, would be in request by the Government, had asked for information which the Government could readily obtain, they did not think it worth their while to attempt to get it—and this, notwithstanding that the subject was the one which tore the Liberal Party asunder in 1879. This parsimonious Government did not think it worth its while to go to the expense of sending a telegram in response to the demand made by the Leader of an important Party in the House. Probably they would say it was not the expense they looked at. Was it the trouble? It could not be that, seeing that, after the recent battles, telegrams were sent to and from the Soudan almost hourly concerning the wounds of British soldiers. The sufferings of English soldiers were worth telegrams; but not so the sufferings of Egyptian camel-drivers. British soldiers were wounded in the front—the Blacks were wounded on their backs, and whilst nothing was too much to say about the one set of wounds, nothing was to be said about the other. Royal personages could telegraph "hoping the wounded were well," and so on; but no one asked after the Egyptian and Arab wounded, save the Irish Members. Irish Members "hoped the Egyptian wounded were well," and asked Questions about them in the House; but their inquiries were treated with contempt. The Government treated the Leader of the Opposition with respect; but they treated the Irish Members with disrespect, because they numbered only 40; but they would treat them with respect when they numbered 90. The Judge Advocate General had said that no Amendment that could be drafted would meet the question; and the noble Marquess had advanced the extraordinary doctrine that there was a perfect safeguard in the fact that an officer would not inflict this barbarous punishment, because the Government would know what to do with him. But if the noble Marquess had his back scored and courbashed it would be a very poor consolation to him to know that the man who had done it would be punished afterwards. He would rather prevent the application of a barbarous punishment of this kind. Wherever British troops had gone they had carried fire and sword and torture with them; and he could not rely upon the honourable British officer. What he could rely upon would be a distinct provision in this Bill against what was clearly illegal. The Government, in this matter, had taken up the Jingo policy of Lord Beaconsfield; and every time they sent an expedition abroad they so stirred up rapine that every British officer might act as he pleased under the laws of the country to which he went. Therefore, the humanity of this country depended not upon morality, but upon geography—not upon whether a man should be flogged or not, but upon the latitude in which he was to be flogged. He protested against this. Every time this bastard Jingo Government, which had not the courage of Lord Beaconsfield to go boldly into a spirited foreign policy—every time they went in for the annexation of some such place as Egypt, they did dirty work. The Irish Members felt very strongly upon this subject. The hon. Member for the City of Cork was a Gentleman who had been pretty successful in opening the minds of the Government. He had been able to open the mind of the Conservative Government when his Party was only seven strong; but now he had a Party of 27, who were young and strong. He begged to move that the Chairman do now leave the Chair, Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question again proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

Mr. H. B. SAMUELSON, as one of the Members who had voted in the Divisions against corporal punishment during the late Administration, and had taken part in the debates at that time, and as one who had repeatedly spoken in favour of the abolition of that punishment as far back as 1868, wished to say a few words to clear himself from the accusation of inconsistency. He believed that hon. Members, in bringing forward this question, were actuated by a spirit with which he sympathized; and what he wanted to point out was that the object of the Amendment appeared to be that when foreigners were serving with British troops, and under the command of a British officer, no matter whether he derived his authority from the Potentate of that foreign country or not, he should not be entitled to apply to those foreigners any penalties other than those which the laws of his own country permitted him to apply to British subjects. That was an object with which he entirely sympathized; but this Amendment failed to attain that object; and it was very like a practical bull to ask Members to vote for an Amendment which confessedly failed to attain the object to which it was directed. He would vote for the abolition of corporal punishment in every form, and under all circumstances, in both the Army and the Navy; but he thought the wishes of the supporters of the present proposal would be better met if the Government, before the Report, would promise to look into this matter, and to endeavour to devise some means of dealing with it. He could not vote for the Amendment; and if the Government would promise to look into the matter and try to introduce words making it impossible for a British officer to apply a different form of punishment to foreigners from that which he was empowered to apply to British soldiers, he should advise hon.

Gentlemen opposite for the present to withdraw their Amendment.

Mr. PARNELL said, he quite recognized the good feeling and the good faith in which the hon. Member had just spoken, and he believed that the hon. Member was entirely with him and his hon. Friends in desiring to take away this power, which had been abused; but he thought the hon. Member was not accurate in saying that the Amendment would not effect that object. He contended that his Amendment would effect that, and most effectually, and that it went further, and prevented British officers or Civil Governors abroad from inflicting punishment. He had suggested to the Government that they should bring up a clause on Report which would guard against the difficulty they had pointed out. The hon. Member would be safe in voting for the Amendment, because it did meet what he objected to; and as he could not help feeling that the general feeling of the Committee was in favour of what he desired to effect, if that could be done without injurious results to the Service abroad, he would suggest that the Government should consider this matter between now and Report, in order to see whether they could frame a clause which would carry out what he desired, and which, at the same time, would not be open to the objections which the Attorney General had urged against his Amendment.

CAPTAIN MAXWELL-HERON rose to make a suggestion to the Government. At this moment the Egyptian Army was commanded by an English General and by English officers; and he thought it would be in the power of the Government to say that, in an Army officered by Englishmen, no corporal punishment should be administered. He hoped the noble Marquess would consider this suggestion, for he thought that what was inexpedient in one army was inexpedient in another.

Mr. LEAMY said, he was sorry that the Government had not adopted the suggestion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). What was asked was that these people should be saved from what every Englishman recognized as a brutal punishment; and the case appeared to him to be not contested by the Treasury Bench. Admiral Hewett had been spoken of as if he were merely a servant in the hands of the Khedive, and as if he were not fighting the battles of England partly with Egyptian camp-followers and partly with British troops. Though acting under the authority of the Khedive, he would not be allowed to inflict unauthorized punishments on English troops, notwithstanding the Egyptian law. It was unmanly for an English officer to punish Egyptians by a species of punishment he could not inflict on English soldiers. They could not attempt, at that time of day, to draw a distinction between men who were of different colours. The poor Egyptians had been long accustomed to bad laws, and did not feel degrading punishments as much as Englishmen; but if Her Majesty's Government had gone to Egypt on a civilizing mission he could assure them they were not advancing the cause of civilization by allowing these degrading punishments. The Egyptians, it was true, had not tasted the blessings of the British Constitution—of Church Establishment, and so on—but they were human beings, of flesh and blood, made by the same God as Admiral Hewett; and it was a disgraceful thing that they should have been subjected to degrading punishments by British officers. It was a comforting thing to know that there were Gentlemen in the House who, although they were supporters of the Government, would stand up in the House and support appeals on behalf of humanity, such as had been made that night.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have referred again to the statement of Admiral Hewett, which I read to the House the other day, and I think it is extremely doubtful whether the persons the Admiral felt himself obliged to punish were subject to military law at all, and whether their case would be at all affected by anything we could enact in this Bill. The Admiral reported that he had punished the men because they refused to work and to obey orders, and added that he did not think the misconduct amounted to a mutiny, and, therefore, had not reported what had happened to the Lords of the Admiralty. A further telegram affords an explanation why no full Report has been sent home on the subject, for he says he is writing to Cairo for the reduction of an officer to lower rank for showing a bad example to the men. The affair, therefore, is not completed, and it is possible that his full Report cannot be sent in until he receives the answer he is expecting from Cairo. As to what the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) has said, it is worth considering whether persons who at any future time come under military law should be, whilst they are so subject, at the same time amenable to any other law. But, as has been shown by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, the Amendments of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, and of the hon. and learned Member for Roscommon (Dr. Commins), will not effect the object for which they are intended. That, I think, is admitted. The question appears to be one of very considerable difficulty; and I could not, on the part of my right hon. and learned Friend the Judge Advocate General, undertake that he will propose clauses which will be satisfactory to ourselves, or which will at all improve the condition of the law. All I can say is that if the hon. Member for the City of Cork is not satisfied with the criticisms which have been passed on the existing law to-night, and will place a more carefully drawn amending clause on the Paper, we will give it fair consideration, with the object of, if possible, effecting the hon. Member's object. I could not undertake that we ourselves shall be prepared to propose any new clause on the matter.

MR. PARNELL said, he would adopt the course suggested by the noble Marquess. He supposed some time would be given to hon. Members to enable them to consider the subject and draw up an amending clause.

MR. HEALY pointed out that unless the Report stage were delayed it would not be possible to get the Amendment on the Paper. It was out of the question to expect that it could be drawn up and handed in that night in time to appear in the next Votes. Then, on Monday, there was to be the final debate on the second reading of the Representation of the People Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: We will not take the Report stage before Tuesday.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he noticed that the noble Marquess expressed some doubt in the matter, because he had stated it was not certain that the persons punished by Admiral Hewett were subject to military law. But he (Mr. Sullivan) thought the infliction of flogging ought to be equally objectionable whether the person punished in that way was subject to military law or not.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SEXTON said, this was a very untimely hour—3.10 A.M.—at which to proceed to move an Amendment; but he would endeavour to do it in a very few words. The Amendment he was about to propose had on a previous occasion been voted for by three Members of the present Cabinet and five Members of the Government. It raised no Constitutional question, its object being merely to carry into effect the pledge given by Viscount Cardwell, 10 years ago, that the soldier should be liable for the maintenance of his wife and children to the same extent as if he were a civilian. The law said that the soldier should be liable save when his regiment was ordered on foreign service. The number of calls last year was 840; and he wished to know what number were ordered on foreign service at the time the claims were made? If the Government could allege that the acceptance of his Amendment would impair the efficiency of the Army he would not press it; but he thought that if the Government would get statistics on the question, it would be found that the Regulation would affect an infinitesimally small number of men, and yet effect a great deal of good. The second point was that at present a woman making a claim on a soldier who was not at the time in the town in which she made such claim had to deposit a sum of money to take him to the Court, and back again to his barracks. That was very hard on the woman, especially as in the case of a civilian she was not called upon to pay anything, or leave anything, in the form of a deposit. Supposing a woman was in Kent and had a claim to make on a soldier in Belfast, it was not fair that she should be called upon to pay his expenses to Kent and back. The Judge Advocate General had said, last year, that in such a case as this it was not the man's fault that he was taken to Belfast, and that was perfectly true; but neither was it the woman's fault. The Judge Advocate General seemed to regard the helplessness of the man as a justification for injustice being done to the woman. Supposing the Government paid the expenses of the men, there were only 840 cases last year; and if the expenses in each case amounted to even £2, that would only mean an expenditure of £1,680, a very small consideration when they took into account the fact that it would remove from many poor women a financial obligation which amounted to a total denial of justice.

New Clause—

(Liability of soldier to maintain wife and children.)

"Whereas it is desirable that the liability of a soldier or marine to maintain his wife and children should be real and better defined, and it is expedient to provide for the same, be it therefore enacted as follows: That Section 145 of 'The Army Act, 1881,' shall be construed as though all the words after the words 'commanding officer of such soldier,' in sub-section three were omitted,"—(Mr. Sexton.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, he thought he had met the hon. Member half way last year by consenting to a proposal taking away from the military authorities all discretionary power as to stopping a portion of the soldier's pay. The Proviso objected to required a woman who made a claim on a soldier to deposit a certain amount of caution money, to answer the cost of bringing the soldier to the place where the summons was heard; but it was necessary to draw a distinction between a wife applying for maintenance and an affiliation case. The cases of this Proviso coming into operation in the case of married women were extremely rare. They did not enlist men if they knew they were married; and, according to present Regulations, if a soldier made a false statement he was punished, and, on the parish charging him with desertion of his wife, he was discharged from the Army. In most cases—in 99 out of 100—the soldier admitted his liability, and the deduction was made from his pay as a matter of course; therefore, in the case of married soldiers, it seldom happened that resort was had to the power to which the hon. Member took exception.

Mr. T. D. Sullivan

In fact, he did not know more than one case in which the provision had been put into operation. In the case of an unmarried woman applying for a maintenance order, the soldier and the civilian stood on a very different footing. But, even in the case of civilians, the inducement given by the law to women to bring trumped-up cases against men was very great. The law was apt to be abused, being very often only used for the purpose of extorting money. The case of the soldier, moreover, was very different to that of the civilian. If the soldier were at a distance—

Mr. SEXTON: He is always at a distance.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, he was not necessarily always at a distance. He might be at Aldershot, and the woman might be in the same place; therefore, the proposed clause, if accepted, would not come into operation in that case. But take the case of a soldier stationed in Kent and ordered to Galway. He did not change his residence of his own free will, as a civilian did. There was another objection to the Amendment of the hon. Member. Supposing the money was paid by the public, what would be the result? Why, they would at once open the door to endless collusion between the woman and the soldier.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 35; Noes 58: Majority 23.—(Div. List, No. 58.)

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Tuesday next, at Two of the clock.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAY (PARK RAILWAY AND PARLIAMENT STREET IMPROVEMENT) BILL.

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on nomination of Committee [1st April],

"That Sir James M'Garel-Hogg be a Member of the Select Committee on the Metropolitan Railway (Park Railway and Parliament Street Improvement) Bill."—(Mr. Shaw Leffer.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. BERNHARD SAMUELSON, Mr. SHEIL, Sir HENRY PERK, and Sir WILLIAM M'ARTHUR were nominated other Members of the Committee.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT (1878) AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.

(Mr. James Howard, Mr. Borlase.)

[BILL 82.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. James Howard.)

Mr. COURTNEY said, he hoped the hon. Member would not press the second reading of this Bill at that time of night.

Mr. JAMES HOWARD said, the hon. Member had given no reason why the Bill should not now be read a second time. This was a very reasonable Bill, and was supported on both sides of the House; and he should invite the opinion of the House on the Motion for the second reading.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Herbert Gladstone.)

The House divided:—Ayes 28; Noes 10: Majority 18.—(Div. List, No. 59.)

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at a quarter before Four o'clock till Monday next.

QUESTIONS.

SCOTLAND—GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH—REPRESENTATIVE ELDERS—LEGISLATION.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE asked the Lord Advocate, Whether, having regard to questions which have arisen in Scotland as to a legal obligation lying on Town Councils to return Representative Elders to the General Assembly of the Established Church, and to the right which has been assumed by minorities of Town Councils to elect such Representative Elders when the Town Council has by a majority refused to do so, he will take steps to prevent such questions arising in future by bringing in a Bill expressly relieving Town Councils of any obligation of the kind referred to that may now rest on them, and declaring it illegal for a minority to act in the name of a Town Council which has failed to elect or resolved against the election of Representative Elders?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): Sir, I have observed from the newspapers that differences in regard to this matter have occasionally arisen in Town Councils; but, until this Question was placed on the Paper, I had not received any representation on the subject, nor is it one to which, so far as I am aware, much importance is attached. A somewhat analogous point was raised in the Courts of Law in 1843; but not, to my knowledge, since that time. It appears to me that there are more urgent and pressing matters demanding the attention of Parliament.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE said, he wished to point out that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had not answered the latter part of the Question—namely, whether, in the absence of a statutory obligation, it was legal for the minority to act for the majority?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I have not been able to discover any original statutory obligation on this matter, although I have looked; but there has been in various statutes a recognition of the representatives sent by Town Councils as constituent members of the Assembly, although, so far as I have been able to discover, there is no statutory origin for Town Councils sending representatives to the Assembly; but there has been a uniform practice in the matter since the time of the Reformation. Of course, the point that my hon. Friend puts now is one of law, and I rather think that if there is, either from statute or from inveterate usage, a duty grown up on the part of Town Councils to send representative Members, and the majority of the Council refuse to discharge that duty, it could be performed by a minority, and have legal force.

MR. DALRYMPLE, with reference to the point, said, he would ask, Whether reluctance on the part of Town Councils to elect a representative is not of rare occurrence; and, whether, even where there may be indifference on the part of the majority, there is not generally a complete acquiescence in the action of a minority when taking steps on the part of the Town Council to elect a Representative Elder according to custom?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): This Question has already been answered in what I have said, and I do not think I can add anything further on the matter.

TRAMWAYS AND PUBLIC COMPANIES (IRELAND) ACT, 1883—CLAUSE 10.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in view of the partial failure of "The Tramways Act, 1883," in the poorer districts of Ireland, the Government intend to introduce an amending Bill this Session; and, if so, whether they will propose amendments whereby the liabilities of the rate-payers, under Clause 10, may be further defined and limited, and whereby the Treasury may be enabled to pay their portion of the guarantee direct to the Tramway Company?

MR. BIGGAR: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question, I would like to ask him, Whether, or not, he would consider it his duty to encourage tramways being laid down in places where they would not pay if finished; and, also, if he would sanction schemes where the estimates were much in excess of what the real value would be?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I hope the hon. Member for Cavan sees that the Question is one which he should have put upon the Paper to-day. In answer to my hon. Friend (Mr. Buxton), I can only say that, until these schemes come before the Government, as required by the Act, it is impossible for them to review the working of the measure, or to propose Amendments, should such be required. I should be very glad to give my hon. Friend information upon a subject in which he takes such a personal interest; but regret that I cannot do so.

ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND—
PROFESSOR ARMSTRONG'S CLASS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many students of Professor Armstrong's class, who passed his Sessional Examination in Queen's College, Cork, presented themselves for the honour Examination at the Royal University, in the paper set by him, containing similar questions in both cases, and how many passed?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I may say that I am informed that of four of the students referred to, who presented themselves for the honour examination, one passed. While giving this information, as supplied to me, I wish to say that there are no official records from which it could be gathered, and that I think that Questions of this character, as to the success or failure of individual students, which cannot be answered without personal inquiries among themselves or their acquaintances, are greatly to be deprecated. I think I have already vindicated to the satisfaction of the House the character of Professor Armstrong against the charge here again suggested.

MR. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman knows very well the point I have referred to.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE RIOTS AT LONDONDERRY—TRIAL OF DOHERTY
—THE JUDGE'S NOTES.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will inquire if Mr. Justice Murphy would have any objection to allow his notes at the trial of Doherty, in the Derry case, to be laid upon the Table; and, if so, will the Government print them as a Return, as supplementary to the report of Messrs. White and Bewley?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I have to say that any question which could be supplied was in the report of the criminal trial before me. I understand that there is no precedent for asking a Judge to supply for publication his notes or any report of a criminal trial heard before him, and that it would not be right to ask Mr. Justice Murphy to do so in this case.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—ENNISKILLEN PETTY SESSIONS—CAPTAIN M'TERNAN—MEETING OF THE MAGISTRATES.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been drawn to certain proceedings in the Enniskillen Petty Sessions Court on Monday last, reported in The Freeman's Journal of the following day; whether Mr. Charles Irvine, a solicitor practising in the Court, addressing the magistrates present, among whom was the Rev. J. B. Frith, the plaintiff in the recent libel action against Mr. William Trimble, referred to the evidence on that trial of Captain M'Ternan, R.M., a resident magistrate acting in that Court, and present at the moment, as "a foul aspersion" upon the character of others of the magistrates present, and proceeded to read an address, signed by himself and five other solicitors, also practising in that Court, which described the evidence of Captain M'Ternan on the trial in question as "an extraordinary and unfounded charge of partiality and corruption against his brother magistrates," as "a wanton slander," and as "a gross attack," and condemned Captain M'Ternan for having made a groundless statement; whether Captain M'Ternan and Colonel Bouley, the other resident magistrate present, left the Court when Mr. Irvine described the evidence of the former as "a foul aspersion on the character of other magistrates;" whether, of the six solicitors who signed the address, one is the private solicitor of the Rev. J. B. Frith himself, two others appeared for the accused Orangemen on the 28th of January last, when the Rev. Mr. Frith and his colleagues made the decisions which provoked the strictures of The Fermanagh Reporter, and two others have only been admitted to the profession within the last few months, while the sixth lives in another county; whether he is aware that several of the solicitors and most of the magistrates concerned in this affair are members of the Joint Stock Company which owns The Fermanagh Times, the local paper opposed in politics to that edited by Mr. William Trimble, the defendant in the libel action brought by the Rev. Mr. Frith; and, what steps will be taken to mark the sense of the Government in regard to what has occurred, and to protect Captain M'Ternan in the discharge of his duty?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I have watched this case with great interest from its commencement. Although this Question touches upon more than one matter as to which the Government cannot be expected to have any official information, I may say that I believe the facts to be, for the most part, as stated. The last paragraph only calls for a more definite reply from me. As to that, Captain M'Ternan informs me that he is quite confident that the law is sufficient to enable him to protect himself in the discharge of his duty. With regard to the circumstances connected with the reception of the address, the proceeding appears to have been indiscreet; and at a future time, when the case is disposed of, should any further disposition of the kind be manifested, the Government will be prepared to state what steps they will take with regard to it.

MR. SEXTON said, he would also ask the right hon. Gentleman, If his attention has been drawn to the fact that the Earl of Erne, Lieutenant of the county of Fermanagh, has summoned a meeting of the magistrates of that county, to be held in the Courthouse, Enniskillen, on Thursday next, for the purpose of considering the evidence of Captain M'Ternan, resident magistrate, at the Londonderry Assizes, in the case of Frith v. Trimble; whether the case of Frith v. Trimble is still sub judice, the judge who tried the case having resented execution of the verdict obtained by the defendant until the first day of next sittings, to enable the plaintiff to carry out his declared intention to move for a new trial; whether, considering the feeling provoked in county Fermanagh by the circumstances of the case of Frith v. Trimble, the Irish Government regard the meeting convened by Lord Erne as coming within the category contemplated by section ten of the Crimes Prevention Act; and, whether, if the meeting be permitted, the Irish Government will send official note-takers to be present and to record the proceedings, and will take into consideration the propriety of prosecuting all such persons as may identify themselves with those proceedings, under section seven of the Crimes Prevention Act, for endeavouring to intimidate a witness in consequence of evidence given in a Court of Justice, and in a case, moreover, at present pending?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am glad, Sir, to be able to inform the hon. Member that the meeting is not going to be held.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS, KILKEEL UNION, CO. DOWN—REJECTION OF VOTES.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is the fact that the Local Government Board decided that Poor Law votes were correctly rejected in the Kilkeel Union (County Down), because voters signed as marksmen, who, it is alleged, were able to write; if so, upon what is this view of the law founded?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Local Government Board advised the Returning Officer that the votes of the persons who placed a mark upon the papers and who were able to write should be rejected. The General Order regulating the election of Poor Law Guardians is explicit on this point.

MR. HEALY: What is the Statute?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is a General Order made by the Local Government Board under their statutory powers upon the point, and is well known.

MR. HEALY: I beg to give Notice that I shall call attention to the fact that people are deprived of their right to vote, under powers which have not been granted by the Statute.

BOARD OF INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND).

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

Whether it is true that in the Intermediate Education Department £2,000 a-year, or six per cent. of the entire income of the Board, is paid to two secretaries; whether the amount paid in 1882 as result fees to all the schoolmasters and schoolmistresses in Ireland amounted to less than three times the amount of these two salaries; whether the office of these secretaries is terminable at the pleasure of the Lord Lieutenant; whether he will inquire if the functions now devolving on these two secretaries could not be more efficiently and economically provided for by assigning the secretarial portion of their duties to one official qualified by experience of office work, and by requiring the staff of examiners already employed, or some of them, to perform any educational work now devolving upon the secretaries; is one of the secretaries in the habit of attending the meetings of the Senate of the Royal University and Royal Dublin Society and its committees during official hours, and how does he find time for the purpose; had another of them, at the time of his appointment, served about thirty years in one of the Queen's Colleges, and did his then age, length of service, and state of health mark him out rather for superannuation than for a fresh appointment; and, whether steps will be taken to prevent any portion of the income of the Commission being applied in superannuating Queen's College officials?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, when the Board was created the Lord Lieutenant of the time, acting under the authority expressly given to him by the Statute, appointed two gentlemen as Assistant Commissioners, to act as Secretaries, to hold office during pleasure, at the salary of £1,000 a-year each. It is not the case that the amount paid in result fees in 1882 was less than three times the amount of these two salaries. It was a little over that figure. I am not aware of any sufficient grounds upon which I should ask the Lord Lieutenant to make the inquiries suggested by the hon. Member. It is true that one of the Assistant Commissioners is a member of the Senate of the Royal University, and attends its meetings, which are not frequent, and that he also attends meetings of the Science Committee of the Royal Dublin Society, which are held after his office hours. There does not appear to be anything incompatible with his official position in his doing so, provided there is no neglect of his official duties, which I have no reason to suppose there is. This gentleman has for 22 years held a Professorship in one of the Queen's Colleges. It is not the case that when appointed to the office of Assistant Commissioner, his age, length of service, and health marked him out for superannuation. The Act does not appear to make any provision for apportioning any part of the funds of the Commission for pensioning these officers.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—PETTY SESSIONS CLERKS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether there are any fixed hours during which it is the duty of Petty Sessions Clerks to attend at their offices; whether serious inconvenience to the public results from the irregular attendance of Petty Sessions Clerks in many districts; and, whether he will enforce reasonable attendance where such public inconvenience is shown?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I am informed that, in the most important districts, the magistrates arrange the time for the attendance of Petty Sessions Clerks, and record the fact if any officer does not give his services for a reasonable time. Complaints are very rarely made of any inconvenience arising to the public from the non-attendance of the clerks. Where such complaints are made, and if, when investigated, found to be well founded, their attendance would be insisted upon. If the hon. Member knows of any case, I shall be happy to have the matter inquired into.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—MARRIED CONSTABLES.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is in accordance with the Constabulary regulations that a constable married, and allowed to live out of barracks, should be placed under stoppages for a room in barracks, which, in his absence, is occupied by another constable, who also has to pay for the same room?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, the case as stated would not be consistent with Constabulary regulations.

IRELAND—REGISTRY OF DEEDS
OFFICE, DUBLIN.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is a fact that all the twenty Third Class Clerks (except one) in the Registry of Deeds Office, Dublin, will be at their maximum salary within the next three months, without any chance of promotion?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the fact appears to be as stated so far as regards the salaries; but, so far as I can learn, there is by no means an absence of chance of promotion.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—SITTINGS OF THE JUDGES.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether the Order of the Lord Lieutenant in Council, No. 60, dated 18th December 1877, fixes the sittings of the Judges as follows: Michaelmas, 2nd November to 21st December; Hilary, 11th January to 1st April; Easter, 15th April to 18th May; and Trinity, 1st June to 8th August; whether suitors are entitled to have actions placed on the paper for hearing on serving ten days' notice, and to have motions moved on two days' clear notice; whether a notice was inserted in the Legal Diary for the Hilary sittings, directing that no causes or actions, of which notice of trial should have been served later than 1st March, should be placed on the paper for hearing during that sitting, and that the 5th March should be the last day for serving notices of motion for that sitting; whether there is any legal authority for issuing such a notice; whether it is a fact that the Master of the Rolls failed to sit in his Court on the following days in March, 10th, 18th, 19th, 20th, 22nd, 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th, 29th, 31st, and on April 1st; whether the Vice Chancellor failed to sit on March 7th, 8th, 14th, 18th, 19th, 20th, 21st, 22nd, 25th, 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th, 31st, and April 1st; and, whether the attention of the Lord Chancellor will be called to the notice referred to, and the failure in question, and to the injury and delay of justice to suitors in the Chancery Division resulting therefrom?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER), in reply, said, the days fixed for the sittings of Judges by the Judicature Rules were as stated in the Question. A suitor was, prima facie, entitled to have his case heard on giving 10 days' notice of trial, and to have a motion disposed of on giving two days' notice. The notice referred to in the Question was issued to prevent the trial of cases being kept back by professional men to the very end of the sitting, and to prevent the accumulation of arrears; and from his own experience he knew it was framed solely in the interest of suitors. But, notwithstanding it, both the Judges referred to have been always ready, in any proper case, to hear any action, and dispose of any motion ready, as soon as arrears are got rid of. The Master of the Rolls, on some of the days referred to, was engaged in hearing cases for the Common Law Divisions during Circuit; and, on the other days on which he did not sit, he had disposed of all cases on his paper, and I may add there is not now in his Court a single case in arrears, and no delay has been caused to any suitor in it. The same observations as to the despatch of business and non-existence of arrears apply to the Court of the Vice Chancellor.

POOR LAW (SCOTLAND)—MAINTENANCE OF PAUPER LUNATICS—DUMFRIES PAROCHIAL BOARDS.

CAPTAIN MAXWELL-HERON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been drawn to certain Resolutions passed at a meeting of representatives of Parochial Boards held in the town of Dumfries, relative to the expenditure of a sum of over £8,000 per annum, for which sum the ratepayers of the counties of Dumfries, Kirkcudbright, and Wigton are assessed for the maintenance of Pauper Lunatics, and stating that the expenditure of that sum is administered by a Board not elected by or in any way representative of such ratepayers, to whom any detailed account of expenditure or access to accounts for supervision was positively refused; and, if so, if he considers that such a state of matters is satisfactory or just to the ratepayers?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): Sir, the matter to which this Question relates is a somewhat complex one; and although I have been making inquiry in regard to it, since Notice was given, I have not yet received such full information as to enable me to answer the Question in detail. I may, however, say that where the money of rate-payers is concerned, it appears to me that it is desirable that the accounts of its appropriation should be as full as possible.

TURKEY IN ASIA—AMERICAN SCHOOLS IN ARMENIA.

MR. BRYCE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is a fact that the Turkish authorities have lately been threatening to close, and have in some cases actually closed, the schools of the American Missionaries in Armenia and Asia Minor, which have been so eminently serviceable to the Christian inhabitants of those countries; and, whether, if such be the fact, Her Majesty's Government have remonstrated, or will remonstrate, with the Turkish Government against such conduct, and endeavour to secure that the schools shall not be interfered with?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, the Foreign Office have no very precise information as to the American Schools; but they are aware from the Reports of Her Majesty's Consuls that an attack was made on the American Missionaries near Bitlis, and that they were prevented from opening a school at Irjesh, and that the Armenian schools in the Vilayet of Van were closed. I may add that Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires received the thanks of the United States Government for the assistance which he rendered to the American Minister at Constantinople in connection with the former matters; and Lord Dufferin has taken every favourable opportunity of impressing upon the Porte the necessity of ameliorating the state of affairs in Kurdistan and Eastern Anatolia.

MR. BRYCE: Would the Foreign Office have any objection to make an inquiry on the subject, with a view of ascertaining if the report in the newspapers as to the closing of the American missionary schools is well founded or not?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I shall have no objection to make inquiries.

CRIMINAL LAW—BRUTAL ASSAULTS—LEGISLATION.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a case tried at the Thames Police Court, in which a man named Joseph Dennis was found guilty of an assault upon a woman named Norah Driscoll, which is described as follows in the newspapers of the 2nd April:—

"For the last three months he had been following her about, and had frequently ill-used her, but she had never prosecuted him. About half-past seven o'clock on the evening of the 17th she was walking along Brunswick Street, when he struck her in the right eye and knocked her down. While on the ground he lifted her head up by the hair and dashed it on the pavement, and kicked her on the left side. She became unconscious, and was discovered in that condition by a policeman. At Poplar Hospital it was found that two of her ribs were bent in. Mr. Saunders fined the prisoner ten shillings and ten shillings compensation;"

and, if he proposes to amend the Law relating to brutal assaults?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I am not aware that there is any defect in the law. The Judges and magistrates have power to inflict severe sentences in cases of brutal assault; but, of course, they are not compelled to do so, unless they feel themselves called upon to take that course. Of course, when a sentence is passed, I have no power to over-rule their discretion by saying that a magistrate or Judge should inflict higher sentences than he thinks right. I have, however, communicated with Mr. Saunders with reference to this case, and he says that the newspaper report is sensational and inaccurate, and does not at all give a true account of what occurred; and that, under all the facts of the case, he thought the sentence which he passed was sufficient. I cannot, therefore, take any steps in the matter.

MR. MACFARLANE gave Notice that, when the Bill for Cruelty to Animals came to be considered in Committee, he should move that women be included in the Bill.

MR. RITCHIE asked whether numerous complaints had not been made of the lightness of the sentences passed by Mr. Saunders?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: That is certainly not a Question which ought to be put to me without Notice.

MR. MACFARLANE said, that, as the case appeared in the newspaper report, it amounted to a public scandal; and he, therefore, asked that the magistrate's own version might be made public, so that it might be seen in what respect the reports were inaccurate.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: That is the case with a great many newspaper reports, I regret to say. I cannot undertake what the hon. Member asks for. I have been in communication with the magistrate, and I do not think this is a case which ought to occupy the time of the House any further.

EXCISE—LABOURERS' BREWING LICENCES.

MR. BIDDELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in the event of his not greatly reducing the cost of a labourer's brewing licence, he would allow him to take out a half-yearly licence?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): Sir, in reply to the hon. Gentleman, I have to say that the Budget will be so soon brought forward, that I am unwilling to answer any Questions about the Revenue until my proposals are before the House. I shall be happy to answer his Question after the Budget, if he thinks fit then to renew it.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING—PROVISIONAL ORDERS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the Swan and Edison Electric Lighting Companies, which it is now proposed to amalgamate by a new Provisional Order and Act, have paid the sums which they were bound to pay within six months under the Acts of last year; whether the other Companies which obtained Orders for areas in the Metropolis have paid up; or, if not, whether the Orders are forfeited; and, what is done about the insolvent Brush Company, which sought to be allowed to offer its Orders for sale without having done anything whatever?

• MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, the Provisional Order to which the hon. Member refers does not propose to amalgamate the Edison and Swan Electric Lighting Companies. The amalgamation has already taken place, and the Order proposes to transfer to the amalgamated Company the Orders granted last year to the two Companies. These Orders provide that if the promoters fail to deposit certain sums of money to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade within six months (which period may be extended by the Board of Trade), the Orders may be revoked. After communicating with the local authorities, the Board of Trade have approved an extension of time to the 15th of October next in the case of the Orders of the two Companies, except as regards the South Kensington Order, where the local authority objected. As regards the Orders of the Metropolitan Brush Company, the Board of Trade have refused to grant any extension of time. The only other Orders affecting the Metropolis are the Hampstead Order of the Hampstead Electric Light Company, and the St. Giles's Order of the Pilsen Joel Company. In the former case, an extension of time has been approved with the concurrence of the local authority. The Board of Trade have taken no steps to revoke any of the Orders.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (SCOTLAND) BILL—A MINISTER FOR SCOTLAND.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will introduce the Bill for a Scotch Minister before Easter, in order that it may be considered during the holidays by Scotch Members and their constituents?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I am afraid that the Bill cannot be introduced before Easter; but I hope it will be brought in as soon as possible after the Recess.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION—MR. JOHN E. VERNON.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. John E. Vernon, one of the Irish Land Commissioners, was, up till the time of his appointment, agent for several properties in county Cavan; whether he did, on his appointment, transfer the nominal agency to his son, continuing to be himself the real manager of the properties; whether the Sub-Commission, presided over by Mr. Bomford, has been again sent to Cavan, although it was some time ago removed on the representation by Mr. Bomford and others that he had close personal relations with several landlords in the county; whether, at the recent Court held in Cavan, only four days' notice was given of the intention to hold such Court, twenty-one days being usual notice; whether it was, by the action of Mr. Vernon, that the Bomford, Hodder, and Weir Sub-Commission was sent to County Cavan; and, whether he will endeavour to have causes of complaint removed?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Land Commissioners have favoured me with observations on this Question to the following effect:—Mr. Vernon, up to the time of his appointment, was agent for several properties in the county of Cavan. On his appointment as Commissioner, he resigned every one of those agencies into the hands of his principals. To some of them Mr. Vernon's son was appointed by the owners of the respective properties. Mr. Vernon has not since his appointment as a Land Commissioner, directly or indirectly, taken any part in the management of the estates referred to. The county of Cavan has been added to the district of Down and Antrim, and committed to a Sub-Commission of five gentlemen, of whom Mr. Bomford is one. The Commissioners have been informed by Mr. Bomford that he has not had any business relations with any landlord in Cavan from whose estate cases are listed for hearing before the Cavan Sub-Commission. There are two cases on the list in which the landlord is a relative of Mr. Bomford, and in those cases Mr. Bomford will take no part whatever. It is true that a very short notice was unavoidably given of the sitting at the first town on the present Circuit; but the Sub-Commissioners had instructions not to press on any case where a bond fide objection was raised on the ground of shortness of notice. It is absolutely untrue that this Sub-Commission was sent to Cavan by the personal action, or at the special suggestion, of Mr. Vernon.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—THE CORONERSHIP OF WESTMEATH.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the cause of the delay in filling up the vacant coronership for the county of Westmeath, two coroners having always been appointed until the last seven or eight years, when one died, since which time the second appointment has not been filled up?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, prior to 1874 there had been two coroners for the county of Westmeath. In that year one of them died, and the vacancy was not filled up. In 1878 the matter was brought under the attention of the late Government, and inquiries were made into the matter, which led to the presentation of a Memorial signed by five Justices pursuant to the Statute 9 & 10 Vict. c. 37, praying to have the county constituted one division for one coroner. In pursuance of that Memorial a special Sessions was held and a resolution was unanimously passed on October 31, 1878, that the two divisions of the county should form one district, and the existing coroner was elected to discharge, and has since discharged, the duties of the entire county. All this was done under the advice of the Law Officer of the late Government.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—ELIGIBILITY OF POOR LAW MEDICAL OFFICERS—DR. FLANNERY, TUBBERCERRY, CO. SLIGO.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the intimation given as to the eligibility of Dr. Flannery, of Tubbercerry, county Sligo, being a dispensary medical officer, to act in the Commission of the Peace, Whether it is accurately set forth in the Irish Medical Directory for the present year, that Dr. Richard Barrett, medical officer of the Inchegeala Dispensary, Macroom Union, is a justice of the peace for the county of Cork; that Dr. John W. Busteed, medical officer of the Castle Gregory Dispensary, Dingle Union, is a justice of the peace for the county of Kerry; that Dr. John I. Donovan, workhouse and dispensary medical officer, Skibbereen, is a justice of the peace for the county of Cork; that Dr. Robert S. Hayes, medical officer of Rathmore and Kill Dispensary, Naas Union, is a justice of the peace for the county of Kildare; that Dr. David Jacob, medical officer of the Maryborough Dispensary, is a justice of the peace for Queen's County; and that numerous other dispensary and workhouse medical officers in Ireland hold the Commission of the Peace; whether provision is made in the Poor Laws, or in the Articles of the Local Government Board, to prevent the performance of the functions of an ex-officio guardian by any Poor Law medical officer appointed to be a justice; and, whether, the Lord Chancellor will reconsider the recommendation of Dr. Flannery's name?

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I beg to ask, whether Dr. George Plunkett, of Farrell, resident in the district, was asked to act as Justice of the Peace?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, it is a fact that several dispensary doctors hold the Commission of the Peace; because, although it was considered advisable to make no law upon such point, it was thought inadvisable that, in future, medical men should be appointed, except where it was absolutely unavoidable. A difficulty was found in removing medical gentlemen who were appointed to the Commission of the Peace before the rule was made in 1872. I am informed, however, that arrangements were made to avoid such appointments in future; and any violation of the rule which has taken place since then must have been through oversight. The Lord Chancellor has, during his term of office, invariably opposed the appointment of medical men. I may say, in reply to the hon. and gallant Member for Dublin County (Colonel King-Harman) that several strong cases have been cited previous to the prohibition which has been referred to. From the full information now before me, I find that the rule was not made without consultation, and was upon general consideration of their unsuitability.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to give Notice that I shall call attention to the extreme lameness and want of satisfaction in the reply made by the right hon. Gentleman, and also to the incongruity of the rule made by the Lord Chancellor.

MR. HEALY: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, if he is aware that Dr. Naish is not only a medical officer, and I think a pensioner, but also an ex officio Guardian?

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BOARD OF GUARDIANS, TUBBERCURRY, CO. SLIGO—ELECTION OF CHAIRMAN, DEPUTY, AND VICE-DEPUTY CHAIRMAN.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

Mr. Sexton

Whether the election, on Monday last, of the Chairman, Vice-Chairman, and Deputy Vice-Chairman of the Tubbercurry (county Sligo) Board of Guardians for the ensuing year was a valid election; whether, before the election began, Mr. N. H. Devine, an elected guardian, drew the attention of the clerk to the fact that none of the elected guardians had received the Notice (Form A) of the date of election of Chairman, prescribed by Article 3 of the General Order of the Local Government Board of the 18th December, 1882; whether the clerk admitted he had not sent out the Notice (Form A), but nevertheless proceeded immediately to hold, and did hold, the election of Chairman, in contravention of the General Order; and, whether the Local Government Board will direct the clerk to duly perform the function assigned to him in Article 3, by forthwith furnishing to each guardian of the Union that Notice (Form A), and thereafter, in due course, proceeding to a valid election of a Chairman, Vice-Chairman, and Deputy Vice-Chairman for the coming year?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, it is not a fact that the election took place in the evening, or that attention was called to the fact that notice had not yet been sent out. The clerk of the Union admitted that there had been some elements of oversight with regard to the election, which he regrets. As regards the latter part of the Question, I am informed that it is not valid owing to the right forms not having been used, and it is therefore intended to proceed to a fresh election.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE 18TH (LIVERPOOL) RIFLE VOLUNTEERS—CHURCH PARADES.

DR. COMMINS asked the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether the usual Church parade of the Irish Volunteers (the 18th Liverpool Rifle Volunteers) at Liverpool on the 16th of March ult. was prohibited by an order direct from himself or from the War Office; whether the privilege of having a Church parade has been allowed them, and practised uninterruptedly, for twenty-three years without offence and without complaint, and is the usual and regular privilege of all Volunteer Corps willing to avail themselves of it; and, whether any order was issued by the War Office prohibiting any other Corps of Volunteers from holding a Church parade on the 16th of March last; and, if not, why was such an order issued to the Irish Volunteers of Liverpool?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, it has in former years been the practice of the 18th Liverpool Rifle Volunteers (an Irish corps) to have a church parade on the Sunday preceding St. Patrick's Day, and to march to a Roman Catholic Church with their band playing. The parade has, however, resulted on previous occasions in serious disturbance of the peace, in which person and property have suffered. The local authorities having represented the danger of these riots being repeated, I considered it best that a parade which tended to impair the reputation of the Volunteer Force should be prohibited altogether. I may add that I have been informed that the officer who commanded the regiment last year had expressed his intention to have no more of such parades. The church parades which other regiments may hold have not been stopped, because no representation has been made of inconvenience resulting from them.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE NEW CODE.

MR. FINCH-HATTON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether examination in public elementary schools will be conducted under the New Code immediately after it becomes law; or, if not, from what date?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, all public elementary schools examined on and after the 1st of May will be treated under the regulations of the New Code.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—INSTRUCTIONS OF 9TH AUGUST, 1882—EXAMINATION OF INFANTS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether the provisions are still in force contained in "Instructions to Her Majesty's Inspectors" (Circular 212), paragraph 6, issued 9th August 1882, which include amongst other things the following words with reference to infant schools:—

"Where not less than three-fourths (of the infants) pass the individual examination well . . . the mark good should be awarded;"

and, if they are no longer in force at what date they were superseded?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, the instructions of the 9th of August, 1882, are still in force, although it is intended shortly to issue fresh instructions, which will embody all that is needed for the guidance of Inspectors under the New Code. The words quoted are accurately quoted; but the meaning apparently attached to them by the hon. Member is erroneous. The instructions do not say that all the infants are to be individually examined. Individual examination of the whole is distinctly confined to those above six (and I now observe that even this is to be modified); but it is required that—

"A sufficient number of the others are examined to satisfy Her Majesty's Inspector that the elements of reading, &c., are properly taught."

It is obvious, therefore, that the three-fourths does not refer to all the infants, but only to those who are examined, which should form only a fraction of the whole number.

THE STRAITS SETTLEMENTS—THE RAJAH OF TENOM—CREW OF THE "NISERO."

MR. C. M. PALMER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give any further information as to the state and prospect of release of the crew of the Nisero?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, I regret to say that the mission of the agent, whom I informed the House on a previous occasion had been sent by the Governor of the Straits Settlements to endeavour to obtain the release of the crew of the Nisero, has failed owing to the Rajah of Tenom having raised his claims, to which the Netherlands authorities declined to accede. A telegram to this effect has been received from the captain of Her Majesty's ship Pegasus, who accompanied the agent, Mr. Maxwell. Immediately on receipt of this information on the 18th ultimo, Her Majesty's Government entered into further communication with the Netherlands Government with a view to further measures being taken.

In reply to a further Question by Mr. C. M. PALMER,

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that communications were taking place with a view to some plan which might bring about the deliverance of the crew. But it would not conduce to the attainment of the object in view to enter into details.

ACTS—DISINFECTION OF MARKET PLACES, &c.

MR. HICKS asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether the Privy Council, in view of the increased movement of cattle about to take place, will consider the propriety of taking steps to secure the thorough cleansing and disinfecting of all market places and auction yards after each market day or day of sale?

MR. DODSON: Sir, local authorities have power to order and make regulations for the disinfection of markets, fairs, sale yards, lairs, &c. The travelling Inspectors of the Privy Council are constantly visiting the markets, lairs, and sale yards about the country; and where disinfection is not properly carried out, the attention of the local authorities is drawn to the fact. In some instances the markets have been closed, in consequence of the owners having failed to carry out the injunctions of the local authorities.

EGYPT—THE KHEDIVE—PLEDGES OF THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether there exists, in the archives of the Foreign Office, any document or diplomatic instrument establishing any covenant pledging Her Majesty's Government earnestly to support the Government of the Khedive; and, if so, whether he will lay it upon the Table of the House?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he would also ask the right hon. Gentleman, If he can name any covenant or official document pledging this Country earnestly to support the Government of the Khedive other than the Joint Note presented in January 1882, by the representatives of France and England, to the Government of Egypt, and which is described by the late Monsieur Gambetta, its originator, as an official assurance (to the Khedive) of the support of their two Governments against all the difficulties which result from the present situation in the Country (page 34, Egypt No. 5, 1882), and which was accepted by Her Majesty's present advisers, with this reservation alone—

"That they must not be considered as committing themselves thereby to any particular mode of action, if action should be found necessary (page 35, Egypt No. 5, 1882)."

MR. GLADSTONE: Undoubtedly, Sir, there is evidence in the Foreign Office which, I think, would sustain the allegation which the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill) has adduced. The Government have no objection whatever to the production of it; but there are other two parties to be considered. The one is the Members of the late Government; and it would also be necessary, by usage, to ascertain that there are no parts of the document or documents to the production of which the French Government would object. Subject to those reservations, there is no objection whatever. If I am informed that the late Government do not object, that will dispose of one part of the case, and we can immediately proceed to ascertain how matters stand as to the French Government. I think the noble Lord is perfectly justified in asking the Question.

MR. BOURKE: On the part of the late Government, I have to state that there is no objection whatever to the production of the documents alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. GLADSTONE: I would suggest that it would be convenient if the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bourke) would communicate with my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) as to the particular Papers; and, in that case, perhaps he would like to put down a Motion on the Paper, and afterwards we would proceed to ascertain the opinion of the French Government. The noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) will, perhaps, have gathered from what I have said that his Question is substantially answered.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that there are documents which can be produced to substantiate his allegation—

"That it cannot be too clearly understood that the covenants under which this country has been acting in Egypt were not made by the present Government."

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes.

MR. BOURKE: I hope, therefore, it is clearly understood that these documents will be produced, if there is no objection on the part of the French Government.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—NUBAR PASHA.

SIR STAFFORD NORTH COTE asked, Whether the Government had any information as to the truth of the statement that Nubar Pasha had resigned?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Government have no information at all in corroboration of this statement.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—IMPORTATION OF CATTLE FROM IRELAND.

MR. KENNY asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, If his attention has been called to the Report of the Richmond Committee on the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill, published in 1878, according to which (see paragraphs 1202, 1203, and 1204) such cases as the "Silloth case" and the "Manchester case" could not re-occur; whether, notwithstanding such assurance from the then Lord President of the Council, Irish cattle have been excluded from English and Scotch ports, and from English and Scotch markets, by local authorities; and, if the Government propose to take any steps to prevent local authorities acting in such a manner?

MR. DODSON: Sir, the assurance referred to as given by the Duke of Richmond was that the Silloth and Manchester cases—namely, the detention of healthy animals in transit, in consequence of the appearance of disease in one or more of the number, should not recur. No such case has occurred, and the Regulations of the Privy Council render its recurrence illegal. No assurance was given that a local authority should not exercise the power of excluding from its district animals (other than animals in transit) from the district of any other local authority or local authorities in the United Kingdom. No exceptional powers are given against Ireland.

the increased movement this month by the to take place, and the Board in the of disease again spread, which inquiries into unmanageable, and within prisons are Returns on the 29th of the year's Report is at there were only 740 deaths, consideration of the the United Kingdom, and that con- from the slaughtering careful. MR. STON: Will the Report of the Privy Council be laid on the Table?

MR. SEVELYAN: I cannot answer an officer out seeing what has been done farm or in cases.

MR. GISTRACY (IRELAND)—ENNIS-

MR. DUN PETTY SESSIONS—CAPTAIN put the case.

FRIDAY MONT CRICHTON asked the Chief not change to the Lord Lieutenant of Ire- refer him, in the late trial of Frith v. am glad, at the Londonderry Assizes, turns for M'Ternan, R.M., of Ennis- which, directly charged the Rev. LO:

MR. M'TERNAN appeared to be of a asked sweeping tendency, and everybody who Home before him he seemed inclined to send to which for a month. It was possible that the day, for magistrates differed with him, and fairly reasonableness differed with him. He (Captain will be nan) had thought fit to present himself Wednes- them, and, not content with saying 'I

He did not intend to say any- right more about this, except that he was that it more surprised, never more grieved, than Order he heard one magistrate say such a thing was as another;

generally Captain M'Ternan also charged But he other magistrates, who were on effort Bench with Mr. Frith and himself buted no occasion, with partiality, igno- , or corruption; whether, after the verdict was given, the judge acceded to an application on behalf of the plaintiff to stay execution, with a view to a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence; and, if, pending the final decision of the case, he will make such arrangements that these four gentlemen shall not be obliged to sit on the Bench with a Government official who has directly charged them with ignorance, partiality, and corruption?

MR. SEXTON: Upon this Question, I beg to ask, Whether it is not the fact that Captain M'Ternan was subpoenaed to attend the trial by Rev. Mr. Frith himself, and that it was in reply to questions from him that he spoke; whether the presiding Judge was not the same Judge who, in a remarkable trial in Dublin in 1880, expressed himself in such a manner upon a case pending that he had to retire from the Bench?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I am not sure whether Captain M'Ternan was subpoenaed on behalf of the Rev. Mr. Frith. He was examined as a witness, and gave evidence as to partiality of the Enniskillen Bench of Magistrates; but the charge referred to in the preliminary part of this Question occurred in reply to questions which he was compelled to answer on cross-examination by plaintiff's counsel, and for protection against which he earnestly and frequently, and, I may say, pathetically, appealed to the Court. The Lord Chief Justice is represented by the newspaper reports to have stated what the Question embraces; but it is not for me to say whether that language was rightly or wrongly used. As to the other three magistrates, it would appear, from the newspaper reports, that Captain M'Ternan, having the words put into his mouth by the Rev. Mr. Frith's counsel, stated that, in his opinion, they acted from ignorance rather than corruption. Strong as are the opinions expressed by Captain M'Ternan, if he honestly entertained them on sufficient grounds, he, as a witness, was bound to state them. I have already stated that this case being sub judice, I will reserve my action about it, and the Government will make no such arrangement as is referred to in the Question. Should any embarrassment arise in the administration of the law, the Government will be prepared to take effectual steps to remove it.

MR. SEXTON said, that the right hon. Gentleman had not answered his Question as to whether the presiding Judge had not, on a previous occasion, to retire from the Bench because of unjudicial language?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Are the newspaper reports correct in stating that Lord Chief Justice May wept in the course of his charge to the jury?

MR. TREVELYAN: I hardly know whether I am bound to answer these Questions, seeing that they are presumably asked for a notorious purpose.

SEA AND COAST FISHERIES (IRELAND) —ENCROACHMENT OF FRENCH FISHERMEN.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that the large French boats fishing off the coast of Clare are in the habit of encroaching within the prohibited limit of three miles, and that when "driving" for mackerel their nets, which are of great length and weight, bear down and injure the small light nets with which the native fishermen fish from their canoes; and, if so, whether he will consider whether a cruiser might not advantageously be sent to the neighbourhood to enforce observance of the law?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN, in reply, said, the Government had no information, and therefore it was not thought necessary to send a cruiser to enforce observance of the law. There would be no objection to a gunboat occasionally cruising off that part of the coast.

MR. KENNY asked if there was not a man-of-war stationed in the Shannon, and whether it could not be sent?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he could only repeat that the Government had no information of the alleged proceedings.

ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—COLONEL DIGBY, J.P.

MR. HARRINGTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What action the Government propose to take with regard to the charge against Colonel Digby, J.P. for having, by false representations, sought fraudulently to obtain from the Irish Land Commission certain sums of money for arrears of rent which were not due; whether, of the two landlord magistrates who refused informations in the case, one had not attended that Petty Sessions Court for some years previously; whether it was competent for the Resident Magistrate alone to take informations without the concurrence of the other magistrates; and, if so, why this course was not pursued; and, what course the Government intend to take with regard to Colonel Digby?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the question of further proceedings will be considered by the Law Officer, as I have already stated. The Official Return made by the clerk of Petty Sessions shows that it is not the case that one of the local magistrates had not previously attended for some years, but one had attended much more frequently than the other. The application for informations was made to the magistrates in Petty Sessions, which is the usual practice; and, this being so, I am advised that it was not competent for the Resident Magistrate to comply with the application when the majority of the Bench dissented.

MR. HARRINGTON: Might I ask whether it is not the fact that there were three other cases similar to that in which the application was made, and that no ruling has yet been made upon these cases; and, whether, on that ground, it is not competent for the authorities to get information taken before the Resident Magistrate?

MR. TREVELYAN: Yes, I do believe it is quite possible for them to do so; and it is with the view of their exercising, or not exercising, the powers that the matter has been referred to the Law Officer.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS, LOUGHREA UNION—COLLECTION OF VOTING PAPERS.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If, in the East Athenry Electoral Division of the Loughrea Union, voting papers were left for Mr. Evans by the collecting officer, Constable Maloney, on the 18th March; if these papers were not collected by the constable until the night of the 21st March, and if such a delay is legal; if the nomination of the candidate opposed to the gentleman for whom Mr. Evans voted, requested that the late papers on his side might be similarly collected; if the head constable refused to collect the late papers on that side saying that his power in such matters was discretionary; and, if the election was decided by the late paper so collected; and, if so, will the Local Government Board permit the election to stand?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, he was informed that the voting papers referred to were left to be served on the 18th, and that when the collector called he was told they had been sent by post to Mr. Evans, who lived in another county, and that they could not be received back before next day. The rule was that voting papers should not be in the hands of the voter for more than one day; and in going for the papers a second time, the collector was of opinion that as the voter lived at a distance, the paper would not have been more than one clear day in his possession. There were no similar cases on the other side, but there was a case in which the collector was asked to visit the house of the voter the second time; but this he refused to do. The number of votes recorded for each candidate was equal, and the Local Government Board would order a new election.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BOARDS OF GUARDIANS—ELECTION OF CHAIRMAN.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will quote the statute which prescribes that three days must elapse between the election of guardians and the choice of chairman; and, if the rule simply depends on an order of the Local Government Board; and, if so, when was such order made and on what grounds?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, section 3 of the Irish Poor Relief Act empowers the Local Government Board to make Orders, amongst other things, for the guidance and control of Poor Law Guardians; and, in the exercise of this power, the Local Government Board made a General Order on the 18th of December, 1882, for regulating the meetings and proceedings of Boards of Guardians, which Order is the rule referred to by the hon. Member. The rule made was in order that sufficient time should be afforded for making known to each guardian the day on which the election of chairman should take place.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—
SCHOOL.

Mr. SAMUEL MORLEY asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, If he has investigated the statement that two boys named Haffenden, scholars in the national school at Speldhurst, near Tunbridge Wells, were flogged, in the presence of the entire school, by the master, for having on the previous Sunday, the 2nd March, attended a service in a dissenting chapel in the village; and, if he will report the result to the House?

Mr. MUNDELLA: Sir, a formal inquiry into the facts of this case was held on Saturday last by an experienced officer of the Department, when all the parties appeared before him and gave evidence. It was admitted that, in the presence of the clergyman and of his sister-in-law, two boys were beaten before the whole school for having attended a Dissenting chapel. It was also admitted that, after the beating, the clergyman called upon any other boys who had attended the chapel to hold up their hands, and subsequently did the same in the girls' school. He further inquired of each child in turn whether he had attended chapel with the parents' approval, and admonished them, as he says, "to stick to one thing or the other." The two boys who were punished were the sons of the schoolmaster, and were employed in the school as monitors. It is pleaded that the schoolmaster was justified in punishing his own sons for disobeying his orders not to attend chapel. I have no doubt that the whole of this proceeding was improper and inconsistent with the conditions under which a public elementary school ought to be conducted. The clergyman and his sister-in-law admit their error; and, in justice to the other managers, I must add that what occurred was without their authority or approval. I think the inquiry will have had a beneficial effect and prevent a repetition of such deplorable intolerance. The Department will require from the managers an undertaking that no such interference with the management of the school will again be permitted; and they will be informed that, should it recur, it will not be again overlooked.

GIBRALTAR SANITARY COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Government has received a Memorial from the late Sanitary Commissioners at Gibraltar, complaining of the statement made by him on the 8th February, and asking for a public inquiry; whether such inquiry is to be granted; whether that Sir John Adye has only been able to find one gentleman to act upon the Sanitary Commission although there ought to be eight; whether payment of rates is being refused on the ground that the assessing body is no longer legally constituted; and, whether Government mean to continue attempting to levy rates through the official minority, or if they mean in the old or in some new way to give the people some voice in the levying and spending of taxation?

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: Sir, the complaint arose from a misapprehension of what I said, which was understood to convey personal blame to the Commissioners, whereas the system and procedure of the Commission were alone pointed at. This has been explained in a despatch from the Secretary of State, which will, no doubt, be quite satisfactory. It is true that only one gentleman out of the eight unofficial members takes any part at present in the deliberations of the Commission. We have not heard of any refusal to pay the rates. The old way is still open for the voice of the people in the matter of taxation; and Her Majesty's Government—in the words of Lord Derby's despatch to which I have already referred—

"Are sensible of the good service rendered to the community of Gibraltar by the unofficial members of the Sanitary Commission, and have no other desire than that their valuable co-operation should continue to be given as heretofore."

Mr. ANDERSON: Has the hon. Gentleman seen a Petition which was presented a few days ago by the hon. Member for Colchester?

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: No, Sir; I have not.

POST OFFICE (CONTRACTS)—THE WEST INDIA MAIL SERVICE.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If it is true that Her Majesty's Government are now entertaining a tender of the Royal Mail Company for £95,500 per annum for the conveyance of the West India Mails; whether that sum is £15,000 in excess of the subsidy now paid; whether other tenders had been received under which the service would be performed with equal celerity at a saving of nearly £30,000 per annum; and, whether all the Correspondence connected with the tenders will be presented to the House before the contract becomes binding?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Sir, the statements and figures in the noble Lord's Question are substantially correct; but as, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, all the tenders will be reconsidered by the Departments interested, the Correspondence cannot at present be laid on the Table.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— KHARTOUM.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked, Whether it was true that the Governor of Berber had telegraphed that all the roads beyond that place were blocked, and that it was impossible to forward telegrams from Khartoum because the tribes between Berber and Khartoum were in open rebellion?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I really cannot answer all the details of this Question without Notice.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he did not wish the noble Lord to answer all the details. He simply asked, whether it was true that the Governor of Berber had sent this important information which implied that Khartoum was entirely cut off?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he must ask for Notice of the Question.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he would repeat the Question to-morrow.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE EASTER RECESS.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would ask leave to make a statement with respect to the Easter Recess. The House was aware that the Government had appropriated the Sitting to-morrow morning for the purpose of introducing the London Government Bill. It would be impossible, under those circumstances, to undertake at that time to move the Adjournment of the House for the Recess. There were two other courses which might be taken, one of which was to put down the Motion of Adjournment for the Evening Sitting. The other was a course which he did not suppose the House would be ready to entertain—namely, to meet on Wednesday for the purpose of dealing with the Motion. What had been done, therefore, was that the Government put down the Notice for Adjournment at the Evening Sitting on Tuesday. He observed that there were three Motions on the Paper for that evening. One of these had reference to the disestablishment of the Church of England in Wales. He hoped that, with regard to that Motion, the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) would, under the circumstances, courteously give way. The hon. and learned Gentleman in whose name the second Motion stood (Mr. Serjeant Simon) was, unfortunately, owing to the state of his health, precluded from making that Motion. With regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Coope), he (Mr. Gladstone) would admit that the question with respect to the evening opening of our national collections was one of importance, and well deserving discussion in that House. Still, he would confidently venture to make an appeal to the hon. Member to be so good as to give way, in order to enable the Motion for the Adjournment of the House to take precedence of the other Motions.

MR. COOPE said, he had endeavoured several times to obtain an opportunity of bringing his Resolution before the House. After the appeal of the Prime Minister, however, and considering the convenience of the House, as well as trusting to find another occasion to bring forward the Motion after the Recess, he was quite willing to yield.

MR. DILLWYN said, that if he thought he could bring forward his Motion with any chance of success he would do so; but as he could not, he would trust to the chance of the ballot to secure another evening.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought the House would be obliged to the hon. Members for their courtesy, and especially to the hon. Member for Middlesex, who had the first place on the Paper. He would ask the Prime Minister to state how long the holidays would continue?

MR. GLADSTONE: Until Monday week.

MR. PARNELL, as a point of Order, asked the Speaker, Whether the New Rules would preclude, on the Motion for Adjournment, the discussions which formerly took place, or whether they would be limited to the immediate Question?

MR. SPEAKER: There will be no change made in that respect by the New Rules.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—[BILL 119.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Trevelyan, The Lord Advocate.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

[SIXTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [24th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House declines to proceed further with a measure, having for its object the addition of two million voters to the electoral body of the United Kingdom, until it has before it the entire scheme contemplated by the Government for the amendment of the Representation of the People,"—(Lord John Manners,)—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY: Sir, happily or unhappily for me, it is my lot to stand between the desires of the House and the sumptuous fare to which it is looking forward in the speech of the Prime Minister. Bearing that in mind, I will proceed to the speedy execution of the duty which I have to discharge on behalf of the constituency which I have the honour to represent. I admit that the agricultural labourer is entitled to fuller representation; but I deny that he can be said to have had hitherto none. Since 1867 he had, though not fully represented, been represented, so to speak, by sample, and this not only is the case of what are called the district boroughs, such as Aylesbury and Wenlock. Hon. Members may be amused to hear, but they cannot deny, that the agricultural labourers are the class from whom are drawn the great bulk of those who return to this House the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), and the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett). How, then, have the agricultural labourers availed themselves of the means thus in the hands of some of them for making known to this House the intolerable grievances which it suits hon. Gentlemen opposite to say that they suffer? What measures have they taken to press upon the House their ardent desire that the bulk, instead of these mere samples of their class, should be represented in Parliament? To answer that question we must go back and inquire what were the agricultural champions, in the persons of the Liberals who sat for East Retford, Aylesbury, and Much Wenlock in the Parliament of 1868, doing when that Parliament was committing all those thefts and injuries which the implacable partizanship of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has imagined? If it be true that these Liberal Representatives were consenting to the doing of the evil deeds which the right hon. Gentleman says were being done here, how was it that all three of them successfully sought re-election, both in 1874 and 1880, by the votes of the wronged and plundered peasant? With these facts before us, it really seems useless to inquire whether the President of the Board of Trade's ignorance of the Common Law relating to the inclosure of waste lands is real or feigned. But if such has been the attitude of the agricultural labourer towards his Representatives in the past, let us come to newer times and newer men, and let us inquire what was my hon. Friend and contemporary, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. George Russell), doing when he was known only as the junior Member for Aylesbury—what has he done in this Parliament to give voice to the grievances of the agricultural labourers who are his constituents? Is he wanting in the faculty of persuasive speech? Did he never, as an independent Member, give exercise to those faculties on the floor of the House? Of course he did, to the delight of the House; but to what extent to the relief or benefit of the agricultural labourers who were his constituents? Why, one of his earliest and most brilliant utterances was a speech directly aimed at maintaining, if not of amplifying, the domination over the agricultural labourer of his natural enemy the parson. Another brilliant speech of the hon. Member was devoted to an entreaty to the Government to stand by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General in his Catoic severity towards corrupt practices; but, unfortunately, that speech, if it went to prove anything, went to prove that the working men in boroughs, who have generally been supposed to be more fit for the franchise than the agricultural labourer, were themselves scarcely to be trusted with political privileges at all. And what more has the hon. Member done for the labourers in the amusing, but not too heavily ballasted, speech with which he favoured us in the present debate? What was the worst and most flagrant instance of squirearchical or parsonic oppression that he could produce? Merely that one of his constituents, a labourer, had thought—the hon. Member does not attempt to say rightly or justifiably thought—that if he were not to behave himself as a guest should at a meeting to which he was admittedly taken as a guest, he might possibly lose the benefit of a lift home from the parson by whose gratuitous kindness he had been carried to the meeting. Well, if this is the worst that is ever done to the labourers of Aylesbury, we need not wonder that the hon. Member had such ample leisure, while still in a state of independence, for literary pursuits and the study of the curiosities of theology. To-day, however, he finds it necessary to be eloquent about the wrongs which, for some mysterious reason, he had never told us of before. He is full of black indignation at the malignity of parsons; and now that he has joined a Government that owes its existence to the political side of Nonconformity, I suppose his theological views have come to consist of an admiration of the sweet reasonableness of the ecclesiastics of all other persuasions than that of the country parson and non-resident Masters of Arts, whom now he would apparently like to unfrock and to disfranchise altogether. I only mention these things, Sir, as some of the proofs by which it might be shown that though the agricultural labourer has hitherto suffered from the theoretical grievance of being under-represented in this House, he has apparently not suffered any great practical injustice in consequence. I am not, however, concerned to prove that myself, because I do not dispute the justice of some such Bill as that now before the House. Even if the rural labourers had not been promised the franchise, it is pretty clear that, whatever Party may be in power, we shall see some considerable increase in the number of working men entitled to vote, if only on the mere ground of the anomalies created by the present borough boundaries; and, in that case, I am by no means disposed to consent that the artisan and the miner should monopolize that increased representation. I hold that not to admit the agricultural labourer to balance the vote of the artisan and the miner would be not only inequitable but unsafe; so that I am at least as much in favour of the central principle of this Bill as hon. Gentlemen opposite. I say “at least as much,” because I mean that the evidence that they desire it themselves is to be found mainly in their own profession and protestation of desire, and scarcely anywhere else. We are told by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board that this Parliament was elected for the purpose, before any other, of making this extension of the franchise. Then, why did it not set its hand to this work before any other? Who gave them leave to put it off for four Sessions? The Reformers of 1831 did not take “French leave” to put off Reform. Nor did the Reformers of 1866, though they had been elected only a year before, and that with scarcely any visible mandate for Reform. If the wrongs of the agricultural labourers are so great, why have their self-constituted advocates so long put off redress? If the unrepresented state of the labourers is a scandal, why have four years of bye-elections been allowed to recur, and not only to recur, but to have the disastrous effect of replacing Liberals, and so-called friends of Reform, by Conservatives—friends of the parson and the squire—Conservatives who delight to rob and to bully the down-trodden tiller of the soil? And why has this Parliament been all the while suffered to arrogate to itself the task of legislating on matters deeply affecting the welfare of the agricultural labourer, when, all the time, this Parliament has been admittedly incompetent for the task, because itself unrepresentative of the peasantry? Gentlemen opposite have seen all this going on with the most unaccountable equanimity; and now they have the face to wish us to believe that they have been all the while yearning for Reform. I say, that the hour is suspiciously late in which the Government are seeking to redeem their pledge, and there is much significance in not only the lateness of the hour, but also in the tactics with which they set about it. They have clearly got to abandon the other shifting alternatives by which they have been used to interpret the mandate of 1880. Sometimes it has suited them to represent that mandate as being, before all things, for a reversal of our foreign policy, and for a policy of peace. That mandate, if, indeed, it was ever given, has been fulfilled in a strange way, and the attention of the public has now to be diverted from the inconvenient subject of peace. The same thing may be said of the supposed mandate for retrenchment. Instead of retrenchment, we have the thing which is called Liberal finance. Naturally, the Liberal Party, in the extremity of their discredited condition, feel constrained, rather late than never, to try, at all events, to give the Reform which they promised so long ago, but have since neglected and refused to give. Does all this look as if the redemption of that pledge would, apart from Party objects, be very much to their liking? In any case, all this entitles us on this side to be very suspicious indeed, not only of the motives of the Government in bringing in this Bill, but also of their intention as regards its effects, and the effects of the redistribution which must follow. As the Amendment of my noble Friend (Lord John Manners) condemns the non-disclosure of those intentions, I shall vote for it. The Party character of the Bill, as judged by the necessary effect it must have, has been well exposed by previous speakers, notably by my noble Friend the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton). It is brought in under circumstances which make redistribution in the present Parliament almost impossible. It comes before us tainted with Party motives, and visibly aimed at Party objects. By keeping back the redistribution scheme, those Party objects are further promoted, and most especially so by the scanty nature of the Prime Minister's declaration on the subject. It mattered little to the right hon. Gentleman that that was not a binding declaration, provided that what it revealed was just so much of his scheme as should attract support from the constituencies controlled by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and that what it concealed was just so much as, if revealed, would alienate the support of the Southern English constituencies. The supposed intention to maintain the present representation of Ireland can be nothing but a bid for Irish support. It is itself a departure from the loudly expressed principles upon which this Bill is said to be based. It conflicts as flatly with the principle of justice to Ireland as it does with the doctrine that every vote should have an equal value. Justice means a man's due—not more than his due, nor less than his due. Justice to Ireland ought not to give either more or less than that to Ireland. If Ireland is to be treated on an equality with England, let her have applied to her the same principle that is applied to England and Scotland—that the number of Representatives is to be assigned with reference to population and taxation. To treat her otherwise is to meet her on principles not of equality, but of expediency. Who can wonder that, in defence of this proposal, the Government are driven to such an argument as that geographical distance is likely to impede in the future, any more than it has in the past, the Parliamentary importunities of hon. Gentlemen from Ireland who ask perhaps two-thirds of the Questions, and deliver perhaps two-thirds of the speeches in a House of which they number less than a sixth part? Under all these circumstances, I feel bound to vote for an Amendment which condemns the unconscientious position from which these proposals are made, and the policy of concealment by which it is sought to push them forward.

Mr. BARRAN said that, in his opinion, the agricultural labourers had no great reason to be proud of their advocate, the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Stuart-Wortley), that night, when he called upon them to be satisfied with such representation as that afforded by some of the small boroughs of the country. He (Mr. Barran) represented one of the greatest constituencies in the Kingdom; a constituency which had always taken an interest in this question, and had warmly extended its sympathy to the 600,000 or 700,000 agricultural labourers who were still unenfranchised. He thought it hardly likely that the agricultural labourers would be satisfied with the cold comfort offered to them by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield, that they should be satisfied with being represented by the hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) and the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill). The right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes) questioned the qualification, as regarded capacity, of the men whom the Bill would enfranchise to exercise reasonably the duties and rights which would be conferred upon them as a trust; but, in answer to that, he (Mr. Barran) would point out that agricultural labourers, and working men generally, had shown themselves qualified to act in their own interest in connection with large commercial enterprises — enterprises which had done credit to the working men of this country. He referred to Co-operative Societies and Friendly Societies; and maintained that the working classes, wherever the franchise, either municipal or Parliamentary, had been enjoyed by them, had always exhibited great capacity for the exercise of their rights. That being so, they must surely be qualified to exercise the full rights of citizenship. In all those cases they had developed a competency to make good use of it. They took great interest in questions affecting the welfare of the people—sanitary and economic questions, for example—and the result of their possessing municipal rights and privileges was that in many large towns the management of local and benevolent institutions had vastly improved. They had been told that population in the towns ought to be represented, and, perhaps, property in the counties; but wherever population was found there would be property. He held that the franchise, although a very responsible privilege, was not a trust. What right had any man to judge of any other whether he should have the franchise? Agricultural labourers and artisans were responsible to the laws of the country, and they had, therefore, a right to a voice in the making of those laws. Hon. Gentlemen opposite expressed a fear of being overridden by numbers; but when they passed the Bill of 1867, did the Conservatives ask the merchants and manufacturers in large towns whether they were willing to be overridden by the larger numbers then enfranchised? He supported the Bill, not on the ground of its representation of any particular section of the people, or of any particular industry; not only because it extended the franchise to the agricultural labourers, but because he looked upon it as a measure of justice, and an instalment of legislation designed for the purpose of giving the people a voice in the selection of those who were to represent them in the House of Commons. The agricultural labourers were not the only class who were not enfranchised. More than 1,000,000 people who lived in large urban districts, 150 in number, had no representation. Were they to continue to want the franchise simply because, in the opinion of some politicians, there might be a danger that, if it were conferred upon them, one particular Party in the State would be overborne by numbers? If hon. Gentlemen opposite would tell the country openly that they disliked the Bill, and did not want it, because it would place power in the hands of the working classes, they would do honour to themselves, and he could understand it; but to avoid making that declaration, by means of the device which was embodied in the Amendment of the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Manners), was a way out of the difficulty which was neither honourable to those who were supporting it, nor creditable to the Conservative Party—that great body which professed in all cases to represent the working men. He would, therefore, appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite to make a clean breast of it, and say at once that they did not wish to have an extension of the franchise. If they would tell the country they did not wish to have it, the country would know exactly what they wanted; but if they tried to shelter themselves under the Amendment, and sought to postpone the accomplishment of this object by such means, they would suffer in their character and in the position of their Party. He would say just one word in reference to Ireland. Statistics had been very carefully drawn up, estimates had been made, and opinions expressed as to what would be the effect if the Prime Minister's suggestion to retain the same amount of representation for Ireland as it had at present were carried out, and therefore he would not venture to go into the details of that question. That country had been, and might be, a great difficulty in connection with the passing of the Bill; but if Ireland was to be used as a means of rejecting this Bill, hon. Gentlemen opposite would before long have reason to regret that they had used it as a Party shuttlecock, for purposes for which it ought not to be used. Ireland had been made a means of Party warfare in the past, and she might be made such a means in the future. She was smarting now from the conduct of the past administration of her affairs; and if they had, at the present time, reason to regret that the condition of that country was not what it should be, they ought not to shut their eyes to the fact that very largely the dissatisfaction and discontent which existed there was the offspring of the injustice which had been done to her for centuries past. If to-day they had an opportunity of doing justice to Ireland, let them do it; but if, on the other hand, they thought they could do even more than justice, he would appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite, and ask them whether it would not be wise to remove every ground of objection and discontent as regarded the equality of the two nations whilst passing this great measure? He had no sympathy with disturbance and riot in Ireland; but he had sympathy with those who were asking that justice should be done. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had appealed to the House on behalf of the loyal portion of Ireland; but he would appeal to the House to increase the numbers of that loyal Party in Ireland. He would say to hon. Gentlemen—"If you intend to have loyalty, you must do justice; and if you do justice and have loyalty, you can insist on enforcing the law." He thanked the House for having listened to him. He had expressed his feelings in regard to Ireland as strongly as he knew how; and he was sure that if they gave to that country the justice she was entitled to, we should strengthen our hands in the administration of the country, and do honour to Ireland and to ourselves.

Mr. GRANTHAM said that, in his opinion, if anything were wanting as a justification for the Amendment of his noble Friend the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) they had only to look at the speeches delivered by hon. Members opposite. The question nominally before the House was the representation of the people; but in all the speeches delivered by the leading Members on the other side of the House nothing was discussed but the question of redistribution. Whether or not the scheme sketched by the Prime Minister was, in the first place, just, and, in the second place, right, they had had it conclusively proved by Liberal speeches that the redistribution scheme, as sketched by him, would not be passed by this House of Commons. That being so, it was as clear as could be that, if this Bill became law, there must be a Dissolution without a Redistribution Bill, and they would consequently bring about that which Her Majesty's Government themselves had stated ought not to be tolerated—namely, dealing with the reduction of the franchise by one House of Commons and dealing with redistribution by another. It had been admitted by the Government, in their speeches in the country and in the House, that it was desirable, if not necessary, that the question as a whole should be settled by the same House of Commons, and they had excused themselves for breaking it up into three distinct measures—the reduction of the franchise, registration, and redistribution. But the debates in the House during the last fortnight had shown that it was perfectly impossible that two, at all events, of those three questions could be settled by the present House of Commons, as almost all the leading Members opposite who had spoken had condemned the redistribution scheme of the Prime Minister. What justification then, he would ask, had the Government for forcing this part of their measure on the country, when they knew very well that they could not by any possibility pass a redistribution scheme, which they said was to be the basis of the reduction of the franchise? How was it, then, that they found Liberal Members still saying that they intended to vote for this Bill? It was because it was known and understood that, if it passed through the House of Commons, it would be thrown out in the Lords. The fact was that those Liberal Members who, by their speeches, had shown that this Bill ought not to become law, and who were afraid to give expression to their own feelings and opinions in the House of Commons, were relying on the House of Lords to cover their departure from right principles in dealing with this important question. He had often heard the expression emanating from Conservative lips—"Thank God that they had a House of Lords;" but the sentiment was really being uttered by Liberal Members, for they were trusting that the House of Lords would throw out the Bill, as they themselves had not the courage to do it. He was one of those who took a different view of it to many other hon. Members upon his side of the House. In 1832 and in 1867 the freeholders in boroughs were not abolished. They had, in effect, two votes—one as occupier, and the other as freeholder; and he contended that in the counties they should have the same privilege, and thus preserve the balance of power. As to the great question of the reduction of the franchise, the two principles involved had been best exemplified by the speeches of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) and the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler), one of whom said he considered the working man had a right to his vote, and the other that they had to consider the balance of power. He (Mr. Grantham) thought that they were both right, and that the occupier and householder in the counties, if he had not the vote, had a right to claim one. It was said that this Bill gave equality for the first time in the representation. So far from giving equality, it placed the county voter, at any rate, in a position of greater inequality than before as compared with the borough voters. Although the county freeholder had a freehold in the borough, he had no right to vote there at all, having one vote only; whilst the freeholder in the borough had not only his vote in the borough, but also a vote in the county. This Bill took away the right and privilege which the county freeholder had before, of being in an electoral district in which property was the basis of the representation, and gave him nothing instead, consequently giving the borough freeholder a considerable advantage over him. He did not object to the representation of numbers; but he did object to numbers being made supreme. Labourers in counties had, perhaps, a right to say that, as labourers in towns possessed voting powers which they in counties did not enjoy, the system of representation ought to be so altered as to put them upon an equality; but the object of all alterations in the franchise ought to be to secure good government and stability in the representation; and it was necessary to look and ascertain, with reference to the electors in the country, whether there could not be found that equivalent which would give this stability, at the same time that they extended the franchise to the labourer. It was desirable that, whereas this Bill would place the county freeholder in a false position, there should be given to the owner of every freehold, however humble, the right to vote both as a freeholder and as an occupier. That would tend to give that stability to representation and good government which ought to be desired by everyone who took any part in legislating upon such an important question as this. If, however, the Bill before the House was not likely to secure that object it ought not to pass into law. By this Bill the freeholder in a county stood in an anomalous position as compared with the freeholder in a borough; and as the Bill would continue that anomalous and unequal distinction between them, he contended that it ought not to be sanctioned by Parliament.

MR. GLADSTONE: Mr. Speaker—Sir, under the circumstances of the moment, I ask to be allowed, by the indulgence of the House, to address them on this subject at an earlier period of the evening than would, under ordinary circumstances, be the proper course for the person holding the Office that I have the honour to hold; and, while I am confident that indulgence will be granted to me, I hope I may also say that I trust I shall have no occasion to trespass on the time of the House at anything like the length to which I was obliged to go on the occasion when I laid this Bill before the House on asking for leave to introduce it. But I wish, Sir, to take notice of several complaints, which appear to me to constitute the substance of the opposition to this Bill, so far as speeches in this House are concerned. It has been complained that there has been a want of positive arguments for the Bill; it has been complained, and is complained, that the Government do not unite a plan of redistribution with the Bill; then complaint is made of the outline of a scheme of redistribution which, on my own behalf, I ventured to submit to the House; and finally—and this is, perhaps, the most serious complaint—it has been complained that this Bill has been framed, not with the patriotic object of enlarging the number of the enfranchised population, but for the purpose of securing perpetuity, or, at any rate, prolongation of Office to the present Government and the Liberal Party. Now, Sir, with respect to the production of no arguments for the Bill. When I observe the care and caution with which a great number of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite avoid any declarations against the principles of the Bill, it would be an abuse of the time of the House to dwell in lengthened detail on the arguments for its introduction; but I may say that they have not been so entirely neglected, even by myself, as appears to be supposed. Does anyone contest the principle upon which I founded myself in my introductory statement—that it is good for the State that the largest possible number of capable citizens should be invested with the Parliamentary franchise? If that is denied, let us hear the denial in plain terms; but if it is not denied, then I say the whole argument is at an end. Because with respect to the very classes whom it is now proposed to enfranchise in the counties, the law has already declared, and experience has confirmed the declarations of the law, that the very same classes are already possessed of the franchise—the artisans in the towns and the peasantry in the smaller boroughs, not inconsiderable in number—and, consequently, their capability is no longer to be disputed. I must say I do not think it is easy to dispute the enormous value of the Parliamentary vote as an educating power. By conferring the vote—I put out of view those cases where it is conferred on narrow and sectional principles as a privilege to individuals, or the view which is apt to give it the character, or too much the character, of a supposed property disposable at the will of the possessor—where the franchise is liberally extended, the Parliamentary vote is a great educating power, and the man who was a good citizen before he had it will be a better citizen after he has received it. Well, then, it is hardly denied, I think, that the representation of classes will be far more equal when a Bill of this kind is passed than it is at present. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) contended to-night that the Bill was not necessary, because, as he said, the peasant was already represented in some of the smaller boroughs of the country.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY: That was not my contention. I was only describing the state of things that has existed up to now. I did not contend that he was sufficiently represented.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am glad to hear that the hon. and learned Member says he does not contend that the peasant is sufficiently represented, for that is an argument which, if it had been good at all, would have been good in a great degree against the original Reform Act; because, through the extraordinary diversities of the franchise that prevailed under that old Parliamentary system, it was undeniable that in some boroughs or counties all classes of the community were, though insufficiently, yet were more or less, represented. Then, Sir, if the representation of classes can be made more perfect, what does that mean but the improvement of the constitution of this House? Has the constitution of this House been improved or not by the Reform Bills which have already been enacted? [Cries of "No, no!"] Perhaps, then, you hon. Members who say "No" will bring in a Bill to repeal these Acts accordingly. But do not let it be supposed that I am going to institute a personal comparison to discuss merely the composition of this House and compare man for man, those who sit here now and the men who sat here 60 or 70 years ago. What I am going to affirm, and with great confidence, is this—that when we speak of the improvement of the House of Commons, we do not mean the bringing here of a finer set of private Gentlemen—we do not mean the bringing here even of a set of more highly-educated men. What we do mean is, that we bring here an Assembly better qualified to comprehend the wants of the country, more disposed to deal with those wants in the whole of their extended circumference. Now, in that point of view I do not think that any Gentleman will say “No,” when I affirm that the House of Commons has been improved and has shown a capacity for dealing with the legislative exigencies of the nation such as unquestionably, under its former composition, it could not and would not have shown. It appears to me that, under these circumstances, there is no difficulty and no occasion for dilating upon arguments for the Bill. There is, indeed, one statement made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel), and I think by some other Gentlemen—namely, a complaint that there is no sufficiently vehement or audible knocking at the door of Parliament for the granting of the franchise. What does my right hon. Friend want? Does he remember what happened in 1866? Certainly, at that time I do not think that anyone will say there was a greater desire among the unenfranchised for enfranchisement than there is at this moment among the unenfranchised. At that time it was the staple argument of the opponents of the Bill that there was no demand for it. And there was another and greater difference at that time. I am thankful to say that this Bill has been submitted to a Parliament which is in earnest upon its work as regards this question; but the Parliament of 1866, I may say without offence, was not in earnest. Yet, Sir, although that Parliament was not in earnest, although the reproach of indifference then was constantly addressed to the people, it required only the disappearance of a few railings in Hyde Park to dispose of the whole of these objections; and after having gained what was the real object in view—the displacement of the Liberal Government of the day—the Tory Government, before it was in Office six months, came down itself with a Reform Bill giving a far larger measure—I do not say it was so at the beginning—but it ended in giving a far larger measure than that which had been submitted by the Liberal Government. Does my right hon. Friend wish that that game should be played over again? I think, hardly; and, if not, I submit it is better not to dwell too much on the absence of vehement demands for Reform. I believe, myself, it is true, as has been well said, that there is a general desire among those who are to be enfranchised by this Bill for the possession of the franchise; and, further, that those who have the franchise already are in strong sympathy with those who have it not. The artisans of the towns are earnestly desirous and determined that measures of this kind, so far as depend on them, will be passed; and I do not think my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield will contradict me now when I say that he himself has had a lesson from Sheffield on the subject, and that in that town, so much divided into Parties and so much given to openness of discussion, at a vast meeting, truly representative of the whole population of the town—the general sentiments of the population—has given its enthusiastic support to the measure now before the House. So much for the complaint of want of argument for the Bill, which, I hope, will be reduced simply to a want of needless and wearisome details where propositions are broad and general, and perfectly undeniable. Then comes the severance of redistribution from the extension of the franchise. I see very plainly why it is that severance is made a matter of complaint on the opposite side. Because if only we had, in our plan, introduced redistribution, with a vast amount of detail, which it must necessarily have involved, unquestionably Gentlemen opposite would have laboured under no such difficulty as now afflicts them in finding grounds for criticism and opposition. But they say—“What have you to say?” Well, I have this to say—in the first place, had we introduced a Bill, a Franchise and a Redistribution Bill, every other important measure would have become impossible during this Session. It would have been idle for us to pretend that we held the whole question of local government to be one of prime urgency when we had supplied Parliament with an organic measure so large in its scope as necessarily to demand the whole time of the Session available for legislation of the first class. But it ought to be borne in mind, as I have always said, that there never has been a time when these two subjects were combined in a single Reform Bill. There never has been any attempt to combine in a single Bill the whole question of Parliamentary Reform. [Mr. STUART-WORTLEY: The Bill of 1832.] [An hon. MEMBER: 1866.] Never, never; because that was a Bill for England only. Scotland and Ireland, which in 1832, comprised two-fifths of the population, formed no part of that Bill; and therefore it was incomplete with respect to an enormous portion of the people. But was there any reason why we should make our Bill more comprehensive and complete on this occasion than was ever the case before? Certainly there was, because we had in view the possibility of a most formidable controversy if we had introduced an English Bill and a Scotch Bill, and left an Irish Bill drifting behind to take its chance. Being determined to do justice to Ireland in this matter, we took that which was the only way to secure justice—namely, incorporating and identifying the provisions relating to Ireland with the provisions relating to Great Britain, so as to show to the people of the three countries that we, the Government of the Queen, hold ourselves equally bound to them all. What says the hon. and learned Member who has just sat down (Mr. Grantham)? He makes it his main argument against this Bill. He says it is absolutely essential that the two questions should be dealt with by the same Parliament; and that it is now impossible they can be so dealt with. In regard to its being “absolutely essential,” I do not admit it; but I go so far as this to meet the hon. and learned Gentleman—I may say it is important, it is desirable, and it is entirely within the intentions of the present Administration, that the question should be dealt with by the same Parliament. Then, he says, it is now impossible that it should be so dealt with. That is a broad proposition. Why is it impossible? “Because,” he says, “you have proposed a plan of redistribution, and your plan has been universally condemned.” I have not heard that the plan of redistribution has been generally discussed, and I entirely deny that it is universally condemned. I have heard no serious discussion of a critical character with regard to that plan of redistribution, except upon the certain point of the number of Members to be allotted to Ireland. Well, Sir, the number of Members to be allotted to Ireland is an important point in a Redistribution Bill; but it is not the plan of redistribution as I ventured to sketch it out—it is not worthy to receive that name, because it is but a faintly-traced outline of a plan—that plan contained a number of propositions of principle—propositions which, I thought, would show persons of friendly disposition—though I did not expect to take any benefit or advantage whatever from those who are unfriendly—that our desire, in dealing with the subject of redistribution, would be, so far as I was able to make myself a prophet as to the final decision of Parliament, to gain the essential objects which redistribution had in view with as small disturbance of existing relations as possible. I, therefore, meet the hon. and learned Member with what I call a plump denial of his proposition which he has brought out for the purpose of sustaining the argument that he wanted to make. But I will go further—I will say this, as was well said by my right hon. Friend behind me the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster)—that the effect of combining redistribution in the same measure with the franchise is to cause an Imperial question to be settled upon local, sectional, partial, and selfish considerations. The effect of producing a plan of redistribution which must necessarily, in its details, ostensibly be disagreeable to some, is to place all these local and small interests in direct antagonism to what is broadly and nationally beneficial; and, therefore, we hold that this combination is a combination which is not desirable for the purpose which legislation of this kind ought to have in view. We have also pointed out that a knowledge of the manner in which the new franchisees will distribute themselves is almost essential to determining prudently the details of the plan of redistribution. We cannot tell—it is impossible to tell—in what particular spots particular franchisees will be found to work so as to yield a larger or smaller amount of voters to the constituencies; and it is only when a Franchise Bill has been passed that you can be in a position to deal justly and finally with the subject of redistribution. Well, Sir, in our opinion, it is quite wrong and irrational to say that any hardship or anomaly is aggravated by this Bill. There are grievances—there are admitted grievances. It is a grievance pleaded on behalf of counties that they are not sufficiently represented; and that is perfectly true. They are not sufficiently represented; but they never can be more adequately represented until you have a larger enfranchisement of their population; and when you have a larger enfranchisement of their population, the counties will take very good care that the question of redistribution shall not be paltered with or postponed. The establishment of a wide franchise, to emancipate these men and bring them within the sphere of political power and privilege, is, as is well known opposite, an absolute security for making the question of redistribution certain, for making it urgent, for making it, in the absence of any extraordinary circumstance, not only certain and urgent, but immediate. So much for this question of severance of redistribution from the Franchise Bill, with regard to which I have stated that it is not difficult at all to read between the lines the real motives which have led to its being put forward as the main ground of objection to the present Bill. With regard to my own outline of redistribution, I have said all along that I did not suppose, for a moment, it would conciliate a single opponent—opponents are not at all to be conciliated in that way. What they are looking for are grounds for objection, and not reasons for assent. That is my experience in Party debate and discussion. But I am glad to be able to say this—that, so far as I know, nearly the whole of the propositions that I laid down have been received in a favourable manner, and have not been made the objects of adverse criticism. All the adverse criticism, as I have said, has been concentrated upon a single opinion which I expressed—that, so far as I was able to judge, it would not be wise to reduce the number of Members from Ireland, which stands at 103. I do not at all wonder that that observation of mine should have been made the subject of comment. The objection was taken, I think, upon two grounds. First of all, it was said—Why mention this subject at all? Why introduce the question of the proportion of Members which Ireland ought to have in the scheme of Parliamentary Reform under your Franchise Bill? The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) was extremely—I do not say angry—he does not lose his temper in these matters—but he was evidently excited, because, as he said, I delivered this proposition about Ireland, looking to the Irish Members below the Gangway. The right hon. and learned Gentleman seems to me to be like a proud beauty who will not allow you to look at any beauty but herself. I have opportunities of observing the physiognomy of the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the physiognomies in his neighbourhood—opportunities so agreeable to me—and I feel and believe I am as straightforward a man in the glances I direct across this House as anybody who speaks in it. I do not think I am at all liable to censure for looking constantly, or even too frequently, into the Irish quarter. The fact is, that if I were to look back upon the votes given in the present House of Commons during the last four years and compare the amount of benefit that we, on this side of the House, have derived from the Irish vote on important occasions, with the amount of benefit which the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his Friends have derived, I think, in the first place, it would be but a barren and unprofitable business for me to be continually looking among the Irish Gentlemen who sit below the Gangway opposite; and, in the second place, I cannot at all wonder at the jealousy shown by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and his fear lest we should be found endeavouring to poach on the preserves of so valuable a manor. But, Sir, the reason why I mentioned Ireland was this—that I knew perfectly well it was impossible for us to take a single step in this matter without the putting of—nay, pressing of—some questions with regard to the relative representation of the different parts of the United Kingdom. In 1831 that was found the first and most convenient point for the opposition to that Reform Bill to raise; and, upon this occasion, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Wigtown (Sir John Hay) had given me notice, by an obstructive Amendment, that he would not allow even the Motion for the introduction of the Bill to be put until I had made some declaration with respect to the increase of the Scotch representation. How was it possible to suppose that a demand of that kind could be made with respect to Scotland and nothing said about Ireland? So much, Sir, for the sin of having mentioned the question of the Irish proportion of representation. But now, why should I have presumed to recommend, or to intimate a leaning to the opinion—which is certainly the true leaning, in my opinion—that it would be well that the present number of Irish Representatives should be retained for Ireland? I beg to refer, in the first place, to what was most justly stated on a former evening in the present debate by my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington)—namely, that that opinion of mine was associated with opinions which I also expressed on two other points. One of them was that, in my judgment, the question of relative distance from Westminster was one that in adjusting the proportion of Representatives should not be wholly overlooked. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford said, in the fairest and frankest manner, that he wished, by a distinct declaration, to exempt himself from being bound, constructively or otherwise, by anything I have said on that point. Nothing could be fairer than that; and if my right hon. Friend had not spoken, he would not have been bound, for nobody would have supposed that he or anyone else was bound by the tolerance which was allowed to me. But on this question of distance my right hon. Friend was certainly frank to the last degree, because he did not scruple or hesitate for a moment to grapple with the whole breadth of the proposition, and he stated that, in his opinion, the population of London ought to be represented up to its fair numerical strength. That is a very important question, but one on which it is impossible for me to forecast the judgment of the House. It is not my opinion, however. I cannot pretend to say that that subject, which has been swollen into so enormous and extraordinary magnitude, is one of those which appear to me to constitute the articulus of a good or bad Reform Bill. That is the impression I entertain, and it is in connection with that impression—which I should apply in some degree to Scotland also—that I gave my opinion with respect to the number of Representatives for Ireland. Further, it indicated a leaning in my own mind to the belief that, considering the vast increase of work to be done in this House, and hoping, as I do, that much more effective arrangements will, before many years are over, be made for the distribution of that work, some small increase in the number of its Members might be fairly considered. That may, or may not, be adopted; I will not enter into any argument now. The right hon. Gentleman the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. W. H. Smith) made an objection which, I think, ought to be considered. He said we have too many Members already, as shown by the great number of speakers, and that we ought to keep them down. I am rather disposed to think it is the great number of speeches made by particular Members, rather than the number of Members who enter into our discussions, which constitutes the great part of our difficulties. I will say two other things with regard to the representation of Ireland. I will not look to the quarter of the Irish Members, and I trust that they will not be construed to mean more than they usually do mean. There are, as I think, elements of the case which fair-minded men and far-seeing men may well take into consideration. They are these—I fully admit that at the present moment Ireland has but one-seventh of the population; that upon that basis of one-seventh of the population, instead of 103 Members, Ireland is entitled only to 93 Members. That is not a very great breadth of margin. What I hope is this. In the first place, in my own mind, I am not willing to assume that this continual decline of Irish population is a permanent and a normal factor. It may be that there are cases where a great reduction of population is a necessary road to a people's well-being. It may be that Ireland is one of these cases; but it is a most painful thing, and that depletion in itself is a subject for regretful recollection, while the consequences produced by the dissemination of a population over the globe who carry away with them the idea that they have been driven from their homes are consequences painful enough for us all to bear in mind. I do not, however, abandon the hope that Ireland may recover some of the ground that she has lost. I would not—considering that it is but once in 50 years that a question like this has been entertained—I would certainly not assume the permanency of this continual descent in the numbers of the people of Ireland; further, Sir, I would say this—that those who have been niggardly and unjust in former times must be very cautious when they come to plead on their own behalf for the strictest application of laws of which they might, indeed, have claimed the strictest application had they never deviated from them themselves. I do not seek to bind the House in the slightest degree on this question. I do not think it is possible to state the question more temperately or fairly than it has been stated by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). It is not a very large question, whichever way you take it. Look back to the year 1832, and see how we dealt with Ireland on that occasion. I think I am right in saying Ireland had, at that time, three-tenths of the population of the United Kingdom, and to them we gave considerably less than one-sixth of the representation. I do not think that, looking back to that proceeding, we should say now that it was a very handsome treatment; and I cannot entirely dismiss that fact from my recollection in coming to consider the Irish question, when we deal with the redistribution of seats in prosecution of the plan contemplated by the present Government. I commit no one; I do not wish to commit anyone, or to stand committed myself; but I say it is not a desirable position for a great country to occupy, to claim the most rigid application of numerical laws when they tell in her favour, and, on the other hand, to apply a very lax view of them indeed when they tell against her. I do not argue the point, because I am rather proceeding on the assumption that it will be allowed that 103 Members was not a liberal allotment to Ireland in 1832. If Ireland had been treated according to her numbers—the number of them I am almost afraid to present to the imagination—her Members would have been nearer 200 than 100. However, having stated what appears to meet the case with reference to this subject, I must claim for myself that the view of the proposition I threw out should be taken, as my noble Friend near me most justly said, in conjunction with other propositions which I was inclined to submit to the favourable consideration of the House, and that there should be no haste, at all events, to run, like the hon. and learned Member who has just sat down (Mr. Grantham), to the extreme conclusion that criticisms equitably taken to the particular point in the outline I endeavoured to draw either amount to, or in the slightest degree partake of, a general condemnation of the ideas with respect to redistribution which I have ventured to throw out. I now come to the last of the complaints that are made, and it is this—that this is a Bill which has been conceived or introduced and has been framed for Party purposes. [“Hear, hear!”] Let me, in the first place, respectfully and cordially thank hon. Gentlemen who have made that charge and who have uttered that cheer for the high-flown and extravagant compliment which they are paying to the Liberal Party. When the Liberal Party proposes to raise the constituency from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000, and to bring in 2,000,000 more of British citizens to enjoy the privilege of which they have not yet been sharers, a complaint is made that it is a Party measure. It is impossible, Sir, to pay a greater compliment to us than to say that we know that when we let in 2,000,000 of citizens to the franchise we are letting in a large majority of those who are favourable to our views. But I must say that it appears to me—passing by that agreeable subject of the complimentary character of the reproach—it appears to me that hon. Gentlemen ought a little to consider, even in their political charges, I will not say justice, I will not say even plausibility, but some kind of colour of what is probable or possible, in order to sustain the accusations they make. Now I affirm, and I challenge contradiction, that upon every point connected with the construction and consideration of the present Bill the facts confute the charge which some have been rash enough to make. Why, Sir, which is the largest and most numerous of the classes to be introduced to the possession of the franchise by the action of the present Bill? I apprehend there is no doubt that it is the rural population, properly so called.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE: No.

[Sixth Night.]

MR. GLADSTONE: No! What are the most numerous class then? I believe they are. Does the hon. and learned Gentleman mean to tell me that he thinks the artizans—I am now speaking of the artizans, of the labouring population, not the tradespeople—does the hon. and learned Gentleman really think that the number of artizans, in the sense I have now given to the word, of operatives to be enfranchised by this measure is larger than the number of the peasantry?

MR. EDWARD CLARKE: Yes.

MR. GLADSTONE: In England, Scotland, and Ireland?

MR. EDWARD CLARKE: In England.

MR. GLADSTONE: In England and Scotland—I will say nothing about Ireland?

MR. EDWARD CLARKE: Yes.

MR. GLADSTONE: Then I differ from the hon. and learned Gentleman altogether. I will take another challenge, and affirm that the divisions of those counties where large masses of those commonly understood as the labouring classes—miners and manufacturing operatives—abound in large numbers, are a very small minority of the counties. Consequently, we are going to strengthen the constituencies in the large majority of counties, and, unquestionably, by a large introduction of the rural population. Is that a measure which colourably sustains, or at all sustains, the charge of oblique and indirect views towards the undue aggrandizement of the Liberal Party? Well, Sir, what class is there in the country that is more open to the influence of other and stronger classes than the rural population? What are the classes in the country that constitute the strength of the Tory Party? Farmers, landlords, and clergymen—and it is the farmers, the landlords, and the clergymen who have the most direct, and the largest, and the most constant influence upon the rural population, the peasantry of this country; and yet, when we are going to give over a very large majority of the counties in England, and a yet larger number of them in Scotland, to a system under which this rural population will be immensely represented, we are told that we are doing this for Party purposes, and in the interest of the Liberal Party. I advise all those who make that charge to confine themselves to vague generalities, to avoid carefully any reference to details. But that is not all. We have considered a service franchise, and in what spirit have we done so? Is the service franchise also a device for strengthening the Liberal Party? Those who have said the enfranchisement of the peasantry is a device for strengthening the Liberal Party are, in my opinion, equal to saying anything, and will, perhaps, be prepared to say that the service franchise is likewise a device for strengthening the Liberal Party. No, Sir; if we had had in our minds any idea of strengthening that Party as the aim of this Bill, we might, perhaps, have concocted something in the shape of argument against the service franchise. Those who will be qualified under it are those who are most open, and directly open, to the influence of their superiors in wealth, and we might have plausibly insisted that, as regarded the greater part of them, it was not safe to intrust them with the franchise. We have not done so, and why have we not done so? Because we have faith in the people; and because we believe it to be the first element, the first article, in the creed of Liberalism, to have that faith; and because we believe that to be the strength of Liberalism, that it has that faith; and that, and nothing else, affords the reason why the Liberal Party has been predominant in this country through the last half-century. If counsel might be accepted from a foe, I would offer to hon. Gentlemen opposite my humble advice, and tell them that they, too, will be a stronger Party when they have learned to put faith in the people. I would only ask the opinion of every candid man among them whether the introduction of this service franchise into the Bill is not a fairly conclusive refutation of the statement that we have been manipulating the state of the franchise, and making our arrangements with regard to its adjustment with a view of diverting it into those quarters which are subject to the predominance of the Liberal Party? I have shown that regards the rural population—I have shown that as regards the service franchise, how entirely that is untrue. But Sir, I may also say that if there were any disposition to give us credit, under any circumstances at all, for any cover that we do, some credit might have been given for our having declined to confine property voting to the cases of residents. We have considered that matter. Before this Bill was introduced, those who were inclined to strangle it, if they could, in its birth, found it convenient or necessary to assume at once that we would never dream of allowing non-resident owners of property to vote; and I read a speech that was attributed to the right hon. Gentleman the late Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir R. Assheton Cross), in which he said—

“Why, in their Bill that is coming forth, a man may own half a county, and he will not be allowed to vote unless he resides in it.”

I must say, in passing, that I think a man who owns half a county and does not reside there is a very doubtful member of society, and not at all a good citizen; but it is not my object to employ that argument. Be that as it may, my object is to prove that by declining to impose that condition of residence on property voting, we have again, and have conclusively, shown our determination to disturb nothing which we can avoid disturbing, and also our determination, on the one hand, to present a great enfranchisement, and, on the other hand, to tender it to those who either hesitate or oppose us, in such a shape and figure that they shall have no excuse for rejecting it, and that those whose real motive is hostility to the enlargement of popular liberties shall be left without an effectual pretext. I may say, further, that my right hon. Friend the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), although he certainly was not violently favourable to the unhappy outline of redistribution which I gave, yet in his speech he boldly, fairly, and earnestly called this Franchise Bill, speaking generally, a Conservative measure. That also shows how desirous we were at every step in the consideration of this measure to narrow the grounds of difference between conflicting parties in this country, and, if possible, for once to place on the Statute Book this great boon, this great enfranchisement, this enormous enlargement—would so call it, if you please; I am not afraid of the use to which you may turn the term—to place upon the Statute Book this enormous enlargement of our fellow-citizens, without its being made the subject of odious Party contest. Well, Sir, although this question is most important, it has been commonly observed that the debate has been languid. It might almost be said, in the words of Pope, I think, that the debate has—

“Like a wounded snake, dragged its slow length along.”

And why has it been so languid? Not, certainly, because of the want of talent or of ability in those who have taken part in it. I take the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Manners), who moved the Amendment. I have always admired his debating powers and the great ingenuity of his arguments; and if anything could give interest—lively and pervading interest—to the discussion, he would have done it. Very able men on both sides of the House have also entered into the debate, and yet it has been observed that it has been languid. And why has it been languid? Because no direct issue has been raised. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield told us to-night that he was greatly in favour of the principle of the Bill—indeed, I think he said that he was much more in favour of the principle of the Bill than most of us who sit on this side of the House.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY: I said I was at least as much in favour of its principle.

MR. GLADSTONE: My hon. and learned Friend says he is at least as much in favour of the principle of the Bill as most of those sitting on this side—“For, after all,” he said, “you deal only in professions.” That is a heavy reproach. I am very glad that my hon. and learned Friend feels that it is inconsistent, and even lowering, to deal only in professions. I am very glad that he has given us that reproach, because it will put us on our mettle, and make us endeavour to show whether we do deal only in professions or not; but my hon. and learned Friend, who has such a horror of those who deal only in professions, and who is himself so strongly in favour of the principle of the Bill, will have an admirable opportunity to-night of showing to those 16,000 men who met in Sheffield what is the value of his professions. Stung by the reproach of my hon. and learned Friend, we shall walk out into the Lobby with more zeal and energy than we should have done if he had not launched at us that reproach. We shall not be wanting when the time comes, and I do hope that he will be found in our company. Yes, Sir; there has been a want of direct issue. That has depressed and clouded the debate. And why has no direct issue been raised? Because, Sir, Gentlemen opposite know, as well as we know, that this is a res judicata—a settled question, not to-day and not to-morrow, perhaps by this Government, perhaps by the next Government before it is six months old—but the question is no less a settled question. Then, Sir, if it be true that this Bill is favourable from its construction to the Liberal Party, this I say with confidence—it will not be we who have made it favourable, it will be you. If, again, you, the Tory Party, unwarned by your experience of former controversies, are going to place yourselves in a false position in the face of the country by appearing as the withholders of the boon which others seek to grant, why, in that case, and for the moment, perhaps, your prophecy may be fulfilled, and, perhaps, for an Election or two we may receive a benefit from this Bill. But the remedy is in your own hands. You know that the thing must be done, and, therefore, you do not contest it directly, but you contest it indirectly. Is that really for your advantage? Do you believe that your Party will be stronger five years, 10 years, 20 years hence in consequence of this futile opposition? No; you know it will not. You know that after a Government that is in earnest in its work has proposed a measure of this kind to a Parliament which is not less in earnest, there is not a doubt as to the issue to which the question will rapidly be carried. If you want to disarm this Bill of danger to yourselves, if you want to falsify the charge which you have made against this Bill, and which you would be glad to falsify—that it is manipulated so as to be beneficial to the Liberal Party—your plan is obvious. Enter freely into competition with us—compete with us in the free, cheerful, and willing presentation of this boon. That is the way, if there be danger in this Bill, to take the sting out of it. But your present opposition will have not the less the effect of discrediting you with those who are to be enfranchised, because it is an indirect, instead of a direct, opposition. But be the disposition of that side of the House what it may—whatever you may be disposed to say or to do, whatever doubts may entangle your path—on this side of the House, at least, there is no doubt, no hesitation, no lingering, no question. We have divested our Bill of every questionable or assailable proposition, because, Sir, we felt that if a Constitutional struggle were to arise we would wash our hands of the responsibility by placing ourselves from the outset in the right. That is the reason why our Bill has been reduced to the form of naked simplicity—that is the reason why we have asked and conjured those who have important propositions of their own to urge in amendment or extension of the franchise to refrain from urging them on this occasion. We wish that a simple issue shall be raised before the country. We feel that our object has been gained, and that the country comprehends it. I believe, Sir, that the Division of to-night will show that the House of Commons is not behind the sense and intention of the country, and will be such as to afford a certain prognostication that we shall at once proceed to incorporate this great enfranchisement in the law, and place it in the Statute Book of the Realm.

MR. DALRYMPLE said, that when the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down declared that there was no doubt or hesitation on the Ministerial side of the House on that question, he could not help wondering whether all doubt and hesitation had been removed from the mind of the right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen). It had been alleged that there was an unreality about that debate; but it might be asked whether that unreality was not owing to the mode in which the Government had treated the question? The right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes) had told them how Ministers had been answering one another on the platform throughout the autumn; but anyone who heard the different speeches delivered in that House from the Treasury Bench upon that Bill could hardly believe they were made in support of the same measure. There had been as great a contrast between the speeches delivered by Members sitting on the Treasury Bench as could well have been between speeches made from opposite sides of the House. He was anxious, however, to say a few words in regard to the Bill itself, because the position he occupied in reference to it was not that of some hon. Gentlemen who sat on his own side of the House. Ten years ago he voted with the present Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. Trevelyan) in favour of the extension of the suffrage to counties. At that time, however, different views regarding this question were taken from those which the House was bound to believe were now held by right hon. Gentlemen who sat on the Treasury Bench. The Chief Secretary at that time had to contend against influences which then, as now, were exercised in high places. He thought that when the gratitude of the unenfranchised was demanded on behalf of those who promoted this measure, it ought to be borne in mind that it was the Chief Secretary who was the pioneer in the labour into which other men had entered, and from which they were prepared to take the utmost possible credit. As regarded his own position in reference to the Bill, he had, as previously stated, voted with the Chief Secretary 10 years ago in favour of the extension of the franchise to counties. His right hon. Friend at that time was defeated by majorities of about 114, 100, and so on. He did not believe there was any use in pressing the question upon the Parliament elected in 1874; but he made a declaration, not under pressure, that he would support the extension of the suffrage to the counties when it should be afterwards proposed by the Government of the day. [Ironical cheers.] He had made that declaration from time to time when asked about the franchise question. He had not repented making it, and he was quite prepared to give effect to that declaration when the proper time came. He repeated it last winter, without knowing what the nature of the present measure would be; but he guarded himself against being absolutely bound to support the measure in the particular form in which it might be introduced if it should be separated from the question of redistribution. He held that, in order to arrive at a fair settlement of the question, it was absolutely essential the House should have the scheme of redistribution before it—he did not say in the particular measure before the House, but in such a form as the House and the country might judge of it, as to how far it might affect the scheme of Reform. He was not only not unfavourable to the principle of the Bill; but he might say distinctly that he could not have voted for a direct negative to this Bill. It was, however, because the Amendment raised a matter upon which he especially desired satisfaction that he supported it, and not because, as had been stated, it was a mere side wind. He remembered that, in the opening speech of the Prime Minister, it was said that this question was a vital part of the mission of the present Parliament. He was not going to argue that question; but he might say that it was a strange thing, if it was a vital part of the mission of this Parliament, that during a certain campaign in the North there was scarcely a reference made to that which was about to be the chief mission of the Parliament then about to be elected. His copy of the Mid Lothian speeches was in such a tattered condition, owing to the constant reference made to it, that it was not capable of being brought to the House. He had had, however, an opportunity recently of refreshing his recollection of what those speeches contained in reference to the question of Reform. The Mid Lothian speeches, which were for a long time the vade mecum of Radicals, were now the merest repertory of shattered idolatries. He had had an opportunity of studying the references to this question in those speeches, and he found they were contained in two paragraphs only. Strange to say, the references were to what was now known as the centrifugal theory, and to the inadequacy of Scottish representation. He might notice another circumstance which was curious. While those speeches did not contain references to this subject, which, as the House was now told, was a vital part of the mission of this Parliament, there was a complaint in a certain election address that Lord Beaconsfield had not mentioned in his Manifesto to the country the question of a more equal distribution of the political franchise, showing, therefore, the importance of this matter on which the Amendment turned. There was something almost pathetic in the revival, or, he might say, in the survival, of the question of the centrifugal theory; because, although the Parliamentary wave was strewn with the wreck of abandoned professions and abortive schemes,

there were two standards still held aloft—one was the standard of the centrifugal theory, and the other was the standard of the paramount claims of jam. With reference to the centrifugal theory, he might ask, who were the Members constantly in the House? They were those who represented distant constituencies. Whether the suffrage was the chief part of the mission of this Parliament or not, no doubt it had been heralded for some time past, and many theories which were promulgated in the country had not found expression in the measure. He spoke for himself when he said there was much in the measure which he heartily approved. There was no disfranchisement in it; there was no question of the one man one vote principle; there was no condition of residence as a qualification for a vote; and, what was more important, there was what was called the service franchise. Speaking only as a Scottish Representative, he said that service franchise was of infinite importance. It was admirably adapted to meet the case of those persons who were neither owners nor tenants, but who, in many cases, were quite as capable of exercising the franchise as many owners and tenants. He remembered that his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, when addressing a meeting in the Border Country last autumn, said what an awful thing it was to think that if Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, had been alive, he would not have had a vote. He would not have had a vote under the present Bill if it were not for the proposed service franchise. He also approved of the extension of this measure to Ireland. The condition of Ireland was, in his humble judgment, an argument for postponing the Bill altogether; but it was not an argument for omitting Ireland if the question was to be dealt with at all. It was, however, because he was prepared to accept the principle of the measure; because he sympathized greatly with many who were not as yet enfranchised; and, above all, that he was prepared to see it extended to Ireland, that he desired to see the whole scheme of the Government. He maintained that precedents were in favour of this view. There were two views of this matter which might be considered. One was that the extension of the suffrage and the redistribution scheme should be kept separate; and the other was that they should be, if not actually dealt with together, at least announced together as forming part of one great scheme. It was because the Conservative Party asked that the latter course should be adopted, and not the former, that it was said they were secretly hostile to Reform, and that the Liberal Party were the only true friends of Reform. He thought, however, Liberal Members ought to have some sympathy with the proposal he contended for. A Member of the present Cabinet took part in a proposal that the whole question should be dealt with together. In 1866 this proposal was started, and the present Secretary of State for the Colonies advocated that the Government of the day should deal with the measure as a whole. A Franchise Bill unaccompanied by redistribution would increase the anomalies of the present representation twenty-fold. In 1875 the Secretary of State for War expressed a strong opinion that the franchise portion of a Reform scheme ought not to be pressed forward apart from redistribution. He thought the necessity for the presentation of the whole case had become ten times greater since the speech of the Prime Minister in introducing the Bill, and since his speech to-night. The question of redistribution that was being raised was, the Prime Minister said, a trap; but, nevertheless, he walked into it. Why was this? Not because he desired to give the Opposition any information; but so as to "rescue" his measure from certain awkward risks which it ran, and then to "retire" from the subject. There was reason to believe that the Irish Members would not support the Bill unless they were assured that the representation of Ireland would not be diminished; and the Prime Minister's references were manifestly intended to satisfy them on that point. Hon. Members blamed the Opposition for desiring to see the whole scheme of the Government; but this was only natural after the Prime Minister had declared his intention of doing what would be, not justice to Ireland, but injustice in reference to Ireland. Hon. Members opposite said that they trusted the Government. Well, he did not; and he rather suspected that some Members of the Government would be glad if the redistribution scheme was postponed altogether. There ought to be no difficulty in the way of inserting a clause providing that the registers should not be made until the Redistribution Bill passed; but this the Government refused to consent to. The strangest thing that had come under his observation was the attitude of the Scotch Members on the other side of the House in reference to this stage of the measure. He quite understood and sympathized with their support of the measure; but it would have been well if Scotch Members had shown more distinctly what they felt on the subject of the nebulous scheme of redistribution as shadowed forth by the Head of the Government. Scotch Liberal Members were for ever telling Scotland that it was inadequately represented. Whatever difference existed on this subject, they all took refuge in that canny, that obvious allegation, that Scotland was inadequately represented. He believed entirely that that was the case; but he thought Scotland suffered from another thing besides inadequate representation, and that was from not having its Representatives more equally divided between the two Parties in the State. If they could sometimes see from Scotch Representatives opposite a little of the troubling of the waters of independence, and a greater vigour of self-assertion, it would be better for Scotland, better for the credit of the Scotch Representatives, and better for Her Majesty's Government, who, knowing they could depend on the support of their Scotch followers, disregarded the claims of Scotland in this as in other matters. If Scotland was inadequately represented, where was the increased representation to come from? It was not from Ireland, because the Government would take care that the representation of that country remained undiminished. There would be great opposition to its being taken from the boroughs of the South of England. And as to increasing the number of Members of this House, he did not suppose that anyone seriously contemplated supporting such a fantastic proposal. The Prime Minister, it seemed, would far rather run the risk of neglecting loyal Scotland than run the risk of opposition to his Bill from disloyal Ireland. It was not from hostility to this measure; it was not from any desire to continue the disfranchisement of those who did not at present possess the franchise; but it was because he believed that only by redistribution the anomalies of the electoral system, which would be greater in future than now, could be rectified; because by diminishing suitably and fairly the representation of Ireland the evils of extending the franchise to that country could be remedied; and, above all, because it was only by redistribution that an adequate addition could be made to the representation of Scotland, that he claimed to see the whole scheme of the Government, and must vote for the Amendment of the noble Lord.

MR. WILLIAMSON said, the speech of the hon. Member who had just sat down was scarcely worthy of his ability or judgment; and he would, doubtless, be called upon by his constituency to give some good reason for his speech and vote. He left the hon. Member in their hands. Although a Scotch Representative, he intended to give his vote for the Bill, and to deal with redistribution when it came up. As well might hon. Members opposite refuse to pay their greengrocers, because they were afraid they might not make a good use of the money, as to refuse to assimilate the borough and county franchise, because they did not know how the political power was to be cast when redistribution took place. The hon. Member magnified the difficulties of the situation. Why could they not get the just quota of Members for Scotland out of the small boroughs in England? Why should they give to the Metropolis over-representation of political power? To deal with the Metropolis according to the principles of proportional representation, London would be greatly over-represented. If they looked at the number of London barristers, bankers, &c., who represented small English boroughs, they might find some way to apportion to Scotland the requisite number of seats without possibly touching the representation of Ireland as it now stood. Many of them listened with astonishment to the sweeping assertion of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel) that this Bill proposed to add to the electoral body 2,000,000 of the most ignorant classes in the country. The right hon. Baronet had generously deducted from the number the London artisans who lived beyond the Parliamentary boundaries. So far well. He wished to know whether he was prepared to deduct the well-educated rural population of Scotland, the intelligent mining population of Scotland, the artizan and labouring population of Scotland on the banks of the Clyde, and scattered over the country in its unenfranchised towns and growing centres of population? If he were to make the amende which he was sure his sense of justice would prompt, then he submitted that Scotland would be entirely exempted from his computations, and practically his objections would fall to the ground as untenable and erroneous. The right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) ridiculed the rural population of this country, held them up to obloquy as devoid of political foresight, and spoke of them as only concerned about the material objects of life. He was sure he did them much injustice. No class had a better opportunity of learning that a man's life "consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth;" and he felt assured there was among them a proportionately larger share of unselfishness, and as much regard for the happiness of others and for the welfare of the State, than was to be found among men who were subject to the corrupting influences of luxury. Then, as to their political perceptions or foresight, was it not a fact that in all the great questions which had agitated this country for half a century the working classes had, as a rule, had a clearer perception of the right than the wealthier classes? He believed this had unquestionably to be answered in the affirmative. Why, then, scoff at and scorn the men who were the very backbone of the country? Such scorning was only fitted to drive them to take up with false political theories. It was also said on the Front Opposition Bench that there was no necessity for this measure. It was always a necessity to pay heed to the claims of justice. The assertion made was unworthy serious refutation. Then, again, it had been said that the exercise of the franchise was not "a right, but a trust." This was a mere sophism, meant to blind the eyes of the unwary. How could the trust be exercised unless the right be acknowledged and granted? All that the Bill proposed was to grant to large sections of the population dwelling outside Parliamentary boroughs that which hon. Gentlemen opposite granted to these boroughs in 1867, when they took what they called the leap in the dark. He was glad this measure was not cumbered with any redistribution scheme, as to which he kept himself entirely free to act when the proper time came. A striking argument might be found in support of this course in that curious Redistribution of Seats Bill which on Saturday was brought under the notice of Members—a Bill promoted by Members opposite—having amongst the names on its back that of the right hon. and gallant Admiral opposite (Sir John Hay). The Bill was designated "A Redistribution of Seats Bill." It was a scheme for so redistributing political power as to secure a Tory preponderance. It eliminated from the counties nearly all the towns and villages of any consideration, grouped them with boroughs of similar political complexion, and so left the rustics in the hands of the squire and the factor. Thus the only towns in Peebles and Selkirk were to be picked out and added to a Liberal group 50 miles away, so that Sir Graham Montgomery might come back to the House. Pre-eminently Liberal towns were sought for out of the county of Fife to be added to the boroughs he represented, so that a Tory might have some chance of displacing the hon. Member for the county, and so on all over Scotland. It seemed to him that Lord Salisbury had secretly offered a premium for the best essay on redistribution jugglery, so as to gain political advantage, and that the right hon. and gallant Member for the Wigtown Burghs had won the prize. That just showed the wisdom of not cumbering this Bill with any scheme of redistribution. The country wished to have no redistribution scheme before it till the Legislature had done justice by the Franchise Bill to those who were now suffering manifest injustice. There ought to be no opposition on the part of just men to such a proposal as that before the House, and he gave it cordial and unqualified support. He made no secret of his belief that the Democracy of this country needed strengthening and invigorating. They wanted a more resolute Democracy to demand from this House a more adequate and business-like concern for the many social questions that demanded attention. He wished to see this Assembly purged of its Bridports and Knaresboroughs and Eyes, which were such an obstacle to the diligent and successful discharge of its duties and obligations.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE, as the Representative of an agricultural constituency (South Wilts), claimed the right to offer a few words on this question. He denied that there was no precedent, as laid down by the Prime Minister, for introducing a Franchise Bill and a Redistribution Bill at the same time. The speeches delivered in support of the Bill were, as far as he could see, entirely based upon the assumption that a vote was an individual right, and that the extension of the franchise was a necessity, without regard to its influence on the good of the Empire, and on the Constitution at large. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had sketched a plan of redistribution; but it was not by any means certain that he would be in the House next year in order to propose his scheme. Could they not foresee the possibility of the right hon. Gentleman enjoying his otium cum dignitate on the cushioned Benches of "another place?" And then there were other circumstances which might possibly prevent a Redistribution Bill from passing next Session. There was a Coercion Bill to be renewed for Ireland, and that they all knew was a matter which would take up a great deal of the time of the House. In any case, he (Viscount Folkestone) was of opinion that the Bill was not wanted by the people generally. The Prime Minister had said that the addition of capable citizens to the constituency was a good thing. But if regard were had to capability, he feared that the Bill would be a measure of disfranchisement rather than of enfranchisement; although, no doubt, many were at present without the vote who were capable of making a good use of it. A valuable test was lost when voters were allowed to affix a cross to the name of the candidate instead of signing their own name. If they were to carry out to its logical conclusion the principles of the Ballot, Members of that House would vote by Ballot, in which case the fate of that Bill would probably be very different from what it would be in present circumstances. But if the present voters were so capable, as it was claimed they were by the Liberal Party, what was the necessity for the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act? The passing of that Act convicted the Party opposite of insincerity. The President of the Board of Trade had gone out of his way to attack the landlords of this country, and said that they had robbed the poor of their land, and that there was not a lane in the country which could not tell of landlord encroachment. When he heard that speech he could not but think that the right hon. Gentleman had in his mind a certain lane in Flintshire where the right hon. Gentleman his Chief had planted a number of trees to improve the view from his mansion. But that could not be so, because the magistrates had ordered that the trees should be cut down. It was not true that the landlords oppressed their tenantry. An American friend of his, who came to this country full of that idea, determined to investigate the matter himself, and had told him that he was surprised at the care with which the landlords consulted the interests of the tenants, and that they did so far more effectually than any legislation could do. Certainly, there were not among agricultural labourers the constant strikes which occurred in the manufacturing districts. He had personally no objection to household suffrage in the counties; but he objected to giving the proverbial blank cheque to Her Majesty's Government. In 1878, when the present Chief Secretary for Ireland brought in his Resolution in favour of the county franchise, the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War insisted on the necessity of dealing with the question as a whole. The Postmaster General also, during the Recess, had said that the notion that the extension of the franchise and redistribution of seats should not both be taken up at the same time was preposterous. He was not, therefore, disposed to leave the question in the hands of right hon. Gentlemen who could so easily be induced to alter their opinions on questions of such vital importance. The Conservative Party were right in bringing forward that Amendment, which he should heartily support.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, that he could understand the measure being opposed by those who preferred an absolute Monarchy or an Oligarchy to a

[Sixth Night.]

Constitutional or popular Government. From the murder of Charles I. down to the passing of the Ballot Act, the Government of this country had really been an Oligarchy. Theoretically speaking, the British Constitution deserved all the praises which had been bestowed upon it; but in practice it was an Oligarchy, which worked extremely well for the interests of those who were the exclusive depositories of power. The few who were voters voted according to order, while the vast majority—the non-electors—had the privilege of cheering and getting drunk. A Reform Bill was essentially a Party measure. It was the very principle which divided Parties in that House. They—the Liberals—existed as a Party for the defence and extension of popular rights in order to confer political power upon their countrymen, and in order to admit them to a share in the management of public affairs. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were bound to resist the extension of popular rights, to keep political power from the people, and it was a common desire to do this which alone kept them together. He was quite aware that they were able to assign reasons in defence of their conduct; but it was sufficient to say that those reasons were regarded by the masses as untenable, sophistical, and delusive. He contended that Liberal Members sat on the Ministerial side of the House in virtue of the belief which prevailed among the masses that they sympathized with their general and all-absorbing idea—the attainment of political power. It was the universal prevalence of that desire which united the people in their support. If that desire were gratified, the people might break up into various sections; but at present they were united in the pursuit of a common object. It might be said truly of the Liberal Party that on all occasions they relied on popular support. This Bill, no doubt, placed hon. Gentlemen opposite in a position of unusual difficulty, because it was so simple that the modern tactics of the Tory Party were useless. The Leader of the Opposition had a habit of getting up and saying that they were prepared to accept the principle of a popular measure; but that they reserved to themselves the right of amending it in Committee. That was to say, they reserved to themselves the right of destroying the Bill in Committee. The extension of the franchise was so simple a matter that there was no room for the exercise of their destructive ingenuity. The nature of the Bill was such that the answer of hon. Gentlemen opposite should be “Yes” or “No.” They had, however, declined to answer, and had brought forward an Amendment which furnished what appeared to be their reason for taking the course which they were pursuing. He noticed that his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, in his introductory speech, laid great stress upon the simplicity of the Bill, and he had observed that its possession of this merit had been generally recognized by the Press. It was also most satisfactory that the right hon. Gentleman held out not the slightest encouragement to the vagaries of the “fancy franchise” gentlemen. There was a great wail over what was to be the condition of the minority in the future, and an appeal would be made to them to adopt the principle of proportional representation. He had never been able to get anyone to explain proportional representation in a manner to reconcile his advocacy of it with his duty as a Liberal. It was on behalf of the minority that they were asked to adopt that innovation. Who were the minority? He would take his own district. There the minority consisted of those who were opposed to the Church Act, to the Land Act, and to the extension of the franchise—that was, to this Bill. There were not a few who were in favour of the re-enactment of the penal laws. Was it possible that they were to be asked to supply such minorities with Members? He said Members, because minorities of that kind existed in every constituency in England as well as in the county of Kerry. Was legislation to be strangled by giving additional representation in that House to exploded views, and to anathematized opinions? The proposition was so monstrous that it deserved to be scouted by everyone who had at heart the political enfranchisement of the people and the general welfare of the country. The Government had been exposed to some adverse comments because of their determination not to reduce the number of Irish Representatives. He could not, without dismay, contemplate the possibility of the Government receding from their resolution in that matter. If the Government gave way, it would strengthen the very prevalent idea that there was a fatality attending all the attempts of that House to legislate for Ireland; and that, no matter how good a measure might be in itself, there was always certain to be coupled with it something bad and distasteful to popular feeling. The consequence was that people remembered mainly what was bad in a measure. It was difficult not to recall what occurred at the time of Emancipation. The great merit of Emancipation—its political value—consisted not in the re-admission of the Catholics to seats in Parliament, but in its enabling Ireland to choose Representatives from amongst men whose political sympathies were in accord with those of the majority of their countrymen. The Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel saw that the effect of this would be to enable O'Connell to get together a Party of 70 or 80 Repealers; and, consequently, the disfranchisement of the 40s. freeholders was coupled with Emancipation and a constituency created completely under the control of a small class. Now, when the Government was going to vastly increase the Irish constituency, hon. Gentlemen opposite were anxious to clip the Irish representation. The contemplated reduction, at the very most, could not exceed 10 or 11; and, putting it at even a higher figure, it would have scarcely any appreciable effect on the proceedings of that House. The question of repeal did not depend in any way on the presence there of 25 or 30 Members more or less; the effect of the reduction would be simply to give Ireland an additional grievance. It would not do to push too far the argument that Ireland was a part of the United Kingdom. After all, Ireland was Ireland, as England was England, and required consideration in no way more than for her national pride. The Liberal Party had made up their minds that England and Ireland should be treated alike on this question; and he felt confident that the wise and patriotic course laid down by the Prime Minister would be followed, and that there would be no spoiling of a just, a great, and a necessary measure by a curtailment of Ireland's Parliamentary strength.

VISCOUNT NEWPORT said, he did not believe that there was any strong feeling in the country in favour of the reduction of the franchise. Sitting for a great constituency (North Shropshire), which contained a large agricultural element, he could say with truth that he had never received the smallest intimation from any one of his constituents that he ought to vote for a reduction of the suffrage. He denied that the President of the Board of Trade, or the junior Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley), or the Conference at Leeds, had succeeded in stirring up any real feeling or general enthusiasm in favour of this measure. The fact was that the class which the Bill was particularly intended to enfranchise did not care one bit about it. It would be admitted, even by hon. Members opposite, that during these last years of agricultural depression, when landowners and farmers had been struggling with overwhelming difficulties, the agricultural labourer had been free from distress. Prices had been low, but wages had not fallen; and his belief was that the agricultural labourer was satisfied with things as they were. But if people went to an agricultural labourer and asked him whether he wished to have a vote it was not in human nature that he should say no. He asked himself, therefore, these two questions. Would the extension of the suffrage be for the good of the community; and, if so, was this the proper moment to introduce a measure for that purpose? To these questions he answered, unhesitatingly, no. Why should the county and the borough franchise be assimilated? From time immemorial the contrary had been the case; and the practice of the Constitution was that there should be a different suffrage for Knights of the Shire and for Members for boroughs. He could not see the advantage of bringing both down to one level. Nor was it desirable that the whole political power of the country should be thrown into the hands of one class. His idea was that all classes should have their due share of political power. By this Bill they would practically disfranchise culture and property, and owners and occupiers of land would have no power except through the labourers. He thought that any change which might be made ought to take the direction of redistribution, and not of lowering the franchise; and in that way what was called "the one side of the street" argument would be met. Did anyone suppose that this Bill would effect any final settlement of this question? He was a Member of the House when the last Reform Bill was passed; and one of the considerations which induced him to support it was that he heard from all sides, even from hon. Gentlemen opposite, that the Bill would place the franchise on a permanent basis. He was an older and wiser man now; and if he had learnt nothing else he had, at least, learnt this—that there was no such thing as finality in Reform. Since he had been in Parliament there had been nothing but peddling with and patching the representation of the people. They had had the Reform Act, the Ballot Act, the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, and the President of the Board of Trade had frankly told them that he considered the Bill before the House only an instalment of still greater change. Surely it would be wiser to pause in order to see how these changes worked before proceeding further. On other grounds, too, he could not imagine a more inopportune moment for introducing such a measure. The state of Ireland alone ought to be sufficient to show that. It would be the height of folly to make any change of this kind in England without extending it to Ireland; because he thought the present unfortunate position of that country was greatly due to its having been governed by different laws from our own. But he would say, without hesitation, that it would be an act of madness to throw the entire electoral power in that country into the hands of one class, when it was impossible to keep Ireland quiet without the most stringent Coercion Act. As an Englishman, strongly approving the Union, he protested against the course which the Government proposed to take. He thought also that the present was a most ill-chosen moment for the introduction of the Bill. A question like the franchise ought to be approached from all parts of the House in a spirit of independence. At the time of the last Reform Bill the Party opposite showed their independence pretty freely; but they could not, or would not, do so now. At that time there was no Caucus, and the Liberal Party was as free as the Conservative to exercise an independent judgment. If the Prime Minister's concluding sentences when he introduced the measure meant anything, they meant that the Party opposite were to acquiesce in this undesired and undesirable Bill whether they approved it or not. The country, he felt satisfied, would not tolerate much longer that the independence of the constituencies should be sacrificed at the bidding of the organization managed by Mr. Schnadhorst. The result of the Brighton Election confirmed him in that belief. The country ought to have an opportunity of pronouncing upon the Bill before it was passed, and for that reason he should support the Amendment of the noble Lord (Lord John Manners).

MR. BURT regarded the Bill as a moderate and just measure of Reform, introduced in the interests of a large number of capable citizens in the country. He believed it had been received with complete satisfaction throughout the country, and there was in all parts a very strong desire that the House should, without unnecessary delay, pass the Bill into law. They had heard very little direct opposition to the Bill. Why? Did hon. Members believe that the present franchise was satisfactory, and could be maintained? Did they believe that if the present measure was rejected and the country was thoroughly aroused, anything more moderate than the present Bill would be accepted by the country? Did they not know that all the fancy franchises, all the faggot votes would be swept away, and the country be brought so much nearer universal suffrage if this Bill were not accepted? He had been glad to notice that in the course of the debate there had been very little said that could be regarded as offensive to the unenfranchised portion of his countrymen. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Huntingdon (Sir Robert Peel) made some strong remarks; but he appeared very speedily to come to a penitent frame of mind, and, therefore, it was not necessary to say more on the subject. He had noticed, however, that several Members on the opposite side of the House endeavoured to institute a contrast between the citizens in the boroughs and the agricultural labourers. They asserted that while the present voters in the boroughs had all the advantages of the political education and combination which they derived from Trades Unions and Friendly Societies, the agricultural labourers had not those advantages. He was glad that hon. Members recognized the educational advantages of Trades Unions; but the argument was not a valid one, because the agricultural labourers and others outside the present borough boundaries had in recent years all those advantages that the voters in the towns possessed. At one time or another, more than 150,000 agricultural labourers had been connected with Trades Unions; and at the present time one Trades Union alone paid £2,000 a-year in support of its sick members, and to that extent relieved the rates. In Durham and Northumberland there were about 87,000 miners, and of these about 50,000 were connected with Trades Unions, and the great bulk of those men were in the counties, and had no votes at the present time. A great deal had been said to the effect that there was no desire on the part of the working men who lived in the counties to have votes. His own experience, however, altogether contradicted that supposition. One of the most extraordinary meetings which he had ever seen in support of the proposal to extend the franchise was a meeting presided over by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), at which between 2,000 and 3,000 agricultural delegates and labourers assembled to declare their desire for the extension of the franchise. The meeting cost no less than £3,000, the whole of which sum was contributed, not by any political organization or Caucus, but by the agricultural labourers themselves in their own villages. The miners wished earnestly for the franchise. There were 550,000 of them in the country, and at present very few possessed the right to vote. He had attended meetings in all parts of the country, the numbers of those attending varying from 5,000 to 50,000 and 60,000, and at all of them Resolutions were passed unanimously in favour of the extension of the franchise. Last week there were no fewer than 50 meetings held in the county of Northumberland alone, at which Resolutions were passed in favour of the present Bill. In Durham and Northumberland there were Associations of long standing, formed for the purpose of promoting such measures as the present. He himself had received in the last few days more Resolutions bearing on this subject from his constituents and others in the North of England than he had received on any other subject since he had had the honour of a seat in the House. In fact, one could not attend a political meeting in the North of England where a reference to the extension of the franchise would not be received with as much enthusiasm as a reference to the reform of the House of Lords itself. How much excitement did hon. Members opposite want to see in order to be convinced of the demand for electoral reform? He wished they would explain to what extent they wished the people to agitate. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), who was always outspoken, had told them exactly what would satisfy him—that if the agricultural labourers were to meet in vast numbers, to neglect their work, to march upon London and pull down the Park railings and necessitate the calling out of the police and the military, the noble Lord would be satisfied that they wanted the vote and knew how to use it. Was that the new qualification which the Tory Party wished to insist upon? The noble Lord could have but a very poor idea of the labourers' adjustment of means to ends if he thought that they would be satisfied to march to London simply to pull down the Park railings. It was possible that suggestions such as this one of the noble Lord might provoke a spirit that could not be controlled. He believed that the working people were too wise and too conscious of their power to resort to any such methods in furtherance of their desire; but it was, nevertheless, dangerous to tell them that such methods as those described by the noble Lord would constitute the only argument which would convince the House that they were in earnest. Was it at all desirable that there should be excitement on this subject? If such excitement existed, would not that be advanced as an argument why the franchise should not be extended? Mr. Disraeli, in 1874, said—

“When a class is in a state of excitement—whatever may be the cause, however just it may be—when there exist a variety of circumstances, hopeful I trust for their eventual benefit, but not conducive to calm reflection and cool judgment—I do not think there is a prima facie case for suddenly advancing them to and investing them with the franchise."—(3 Hansard, [219] 253.)

That very argument had been adduced in the present debate. The noble Lord who had just spoken had advanced as an argument against the Bill that Ireland was in too excited a condition. It therefore came to this—England was too quiet; Ireland was too excited; they must wait until England was revolutionary and Ireland contented. A great deal had been said about redistribution, which all admitted to be necessary in consequence of the great anomalies and irregularities which existed. Hon. Members opposite were prepared, however, to maintain these anomalies. ["No, no!"] Well, at all events, they wanted redistribution at the same time as the extension of the franchise. When hon. Members became favourable to Reform, they were so impetuous and so extreme that it was hardly possible to satisfy their voracious appetite. He knew that a great number of Members were anxious to address the House, and he did not wish to detain it. All he had to say was that he hoped that the House would pass the Bill by a decisive and triumphant majority. As to the action of the House of Lords, Lord Salisbury had spoken of an appeal to the people. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen opposite cheered that sentiment. Those were strange words from such lips. What Lord Salisbury meant was, not an appeal to the people, but an appeal to the present electors; that was, to ask the present voters whether those who had not votes wanted them and ought to have them. Even of an appeal of that kind he (Mr. Burt) was not at all afraid. He could trust the people; and though it was proverbially hazardous to prophesy, this much he ventured to predict—the Bill might be delayed; it could not be defeated; and whatever might follow the rejection of the Bill by the House of Lords, such rejection would not add either to the reputation or to the power of that great historic Assembly.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down seemed to be very doubtful, after he had stated that a large number of miners and others in the North of England were anxious that the franchise should be extended to their neighbours who had not got it, of the propriety of appealing to the present constituencies, as he was not quite sure what their verdict might be. They were anxious to appeal to the present constituencies, who, it was said, were so desirous that the franchise should be extended, to hear what they would say when an election took place. He did not mean to say there were not many agricultural labourers fit to have the franchise; but when it was deemed so light a matter that 1,300,000 should be enfranchised in England, 200,000 in Scotland, and 400,000 in Ireland—as stated by the Prime Minister, but he believed it would be found to be nearer 500,000—they had a right to ask themselves whether this great change was for the benefit and interest of the country. The Prime Minister, speaking with regard to the constitution of the House, asked whether it had not been improved by the Reform Bills of 1832 and 1867, and whether it was not better qualified to deal with the legislative exigencies of the nation? That was a question he should like to put to the House. It had not been discussed during the course of the debate. He would like to ask right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the Bench opposite why they had called the House together in the autumn of 1882 to pass all those Rules, and stop that Obstruction which they said existed? Surely, they then thought the House had deteriorated, or they would never have come forward with those Resolutions. Then, again, why were there such a number of Questions put in the House now? The constituencies were not satisfied unless their Members took some active part in the Business of the House; and if they were not able to speak they thought that asking Questions would bring them prominently before their constituencies. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) had asked what would be the effect on the Members of the House if the franchise was extended; and if the working classes combined upon something which was not for the interest of the country? Such a question, coming from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon, was worthy of consideration. There had been a large accession of Members of a particular view from Ireland; and had not that had an effect on the debate—had it not had an effect on the occupants of the Treasury Bench? Was it not said by the Prime Minister and by the present Lord Chancellor in 1870 that nothing would induce them to deviate one hair's breadth from the Irish Act of 1870, and that fair rent, fixity of tenure, and free sale could never be given? Did not the noble and learned Lord say that if rents were reduced and free sale given it would be a breach of the Act of Parliament which constituted the title of so many to the land they held? But the exigencies of Party were such that, in order to obtain the Irish vote, the Government passed the Land Act of 1881, in spite of all they had said in 1870. We had to look to the danger to which men in power were exposed when they had the opportunity of gaining votes on one side or the other by deviating from what they had formerly said. It was not done prior to the Act of 1867; but it was now done in a way which almost amounted to a crime. The Act of 1867 conferred a household and rating franchise; that was done away with by the Poor Rate Assessment Act of 1869; but two wrongs did not make a right. He would venture boldly to say no man ought to have the franchise who did not personally pay his rates. This was a question that ought to be, and he hoped would be, seriously dealt with in Committee, if the Bill ever reached that stage, for it was one upon which the construction of the County Government Bill would rest hereafter. A man might be the owner of 4,000 acres, and have on the estate 20 tenants and 100 cottages for 100 labourers who would be enfranchised, even although the landlord had compounded for and paid all the rates. The vote would be given to these men, although they paid nothing to the rates; and certainly that was not the way in which the vote ought to be given. If the vote was worth having, it was worth making a sacrifice for. If a man thought it was worth having, he ought to pay his rates. With regard to the service franchise, he objected to it, because it took away all condition of a man paying his rate, for it said a man might pay nothing to the rates, and yet he should have a vote. They were told they were to have a County Government Bill immediately following the Franchise Bill. At the present time they had a graduated scale of rating according to property; but now, if they gave a man a Parliamentary vote, he paying no rates whatever, when they came to the County Government Bill, was this same man to have a vote in the distribution of money to which he had not contributed a farthing? That was a point likely to cause much discussion. Then, with regard to Ireland, if he had no other reason to object to the Bill he should object to its extension to Ireland at that moment. He wanted to ask the House, were they prepared to hand over the Government of Ireland, in a particular sense, to those men who professed openly that their only view was separation from this country? That was what they were proposing to do; and at some future day it would not be by such mild means as this extension of the franchise. Could they have confidence in the Government that if the Redistribution Bill was not produced now they would hereafter do what was right and just in the interests of the country? A good deal had been said about setting class against class. If there was an incitement to conflict between class and class it was given by the President of the Board of Trade, when he charged the landowners with robbery, and said the poor had been robbed of endowments. But the other night, when an attempt was made to restore one of these endowments to the poor, the right hon. Gentleman was absent, and the effort was resisted on behalf of the Education Department, whose policy made the right hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) one of the chief robbers. It was a Liberal Government that passed the Act under which this robbery was carried on. The Prime Minister suggested taking away Members from the loyal South of England to give to Ireland a representation to which she was not entitled. Now, he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), who had something to say on this Bill, would he vote for the Bill if Ireland was to be dealt with in that way? Then, also, they had to say what was to be done about proportional representation; and he advised those who wanted it not to lose their grasp of this Bill now. They wanted the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill. The measure without redistribution was incomplete; and it was because he thought that it was essential that redistribution should go with any extension of the franchise that he should give his most hearty and cordial vote for the Amendment of the noble Lord (Lord John Manners).

MR. GOSCHEN: If on the first reading of this Bill I had said, what some hon. Members seem to have thought I said, that I should support this Bill, I should have scrupled to trouble the House a second time on this question. What I did say was that the action I might think it my duty to take in regard to this Bill would be determined by the language which might be uttered by Ministers in the course of these debates with regard to some questions which appeared to me to be vital and inseparable from the business which we have in hand. That being so, I should wish, before the Division takes place, to be allowed to explain to the House what impression the utterances of Ministers and other Members of the House have made upon me. No man likes his own vote to be misunderstood; and I trust the House will pardon me if I recall what I stated to them on a former occasion. I then strenuously contended that the enfranchisement of 2,000,000 additional voters below the £12 line ought to be accompanied by some precautions which would insure a hearing to minorities, and the protection of other classes of the community. I said—

“I do wish, in the course of these debates, to know what is in the mind of the Cabinet—what is the tendency of the Cabinet with regard to such vital questions as to how minorities are in future to be heard, and how they propose to prevent the total disfranchisement of the loyal classes in Ireland?”

I proceeded—

“If the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House had been the last word, if there were no other hope to be given to us that Her Majesty's Government would face the problems which I have endeavoured imperfectly to put before the House, I confess that I should feel it my duty to oppose this Bill at every stage. If, on the other hand, I can see in the declarations to be made in the course of these debates by my right hon. Friend himself and his Colleagues that they intend to grapple with these difficulties, and that if there is a Dissolution—a contingency which we cannot put out of sight—before they can carry their Redistribution Bill, they will place before the country a moderate programme in accordance with that which has been sketched out by the Prime Minister, then I can conceive that one might support this Bill.”—(3 Hansard, [285] 429.)

With regard to the moderate programme of redistribution, I have every confidence it will be placed before us; but I ask any hon. Member of this House whether, in the course of their speeches, Ministers have to any extent faced the problem which seems to me to be so vital and inseparable from the business we have now in hand—namely, whether the Government have any intention of keeping in view the great principle of the protection of minorities? If they hold that principle, at all events they have not disclosed it; but I am inclined to think they do not assent to it, and in that course they will be supported by many hon. Members who sit around me. They do not assent to the principle; and, consequently, what is the position? If there are no declarations from the Government, in the presence of the silence of the Government, what are the chances that any such securities will be obtained? Shall we obtain them in the present Parliament? Contrary to the view of the Prime Minister, I believe—I am sorry I must believe it—that the chances of the Redistribution Bill passing next year are not so favourable as my right hon. Friend supposes; and if the House permits me, I will advance one or two considerations in favour of this view. If the chances are against a Redistribution Bill being passed in the course of next year, what will be the chance for the principle of the protection of minorities, if it should be heard in a Parliament elected on the new franchise? [Cheers.] An Election on the new franchise, as I can conclusively prove, will immensely add to the strength of the urban democracy—[Cheers]—which, even without this reinforcement, as we can tell by the cheers we have just heard, will be opposed to any precautions which would weaken the force of solid majorities. If the Cabinet had declared in favour of the principle of protecting minorities, then there would be some chance that a programme would be put forward at the next Election embodying that principle, and that Members would be returned to oppose or support it. But in the absence of any declarations on that subject, it is, I am afraid, hopeless to expect that a Parliament elected upon the new franchise would be in favour of the principles to which I attach so much importance. Those, therefore, who deem these securities indispensable if the franchise is to be extended, cannot desire to leave the decision to the new

Sir Walter B. Barttelot

Parliament; and I, for my part, see my way clearly—it is, I regret to say, my duty to vote against this Bill. Now, I would entreat my hon. Friends on this side of the House to believe me when I say that I do see a close and intimate connection between these two portions of the great measure of Reform. I quite understand the view they take—that enfranchisement may proceed without redistribution; but I wish them, on their side, to understand the ground on which many of us attach so much importance to certain elements in the redistribution scheme. If we see that the chances of their being duly considered diminish, if not dealt with in the present Parliament, though you disagree with us, at all events you cannot say our belief is irrelevant to the Bill in hand. I have heard some of my hon. Friends say in the course of this debate—"Let us deal with the question as it arises;" but some of us think that when the question arises it will be too late; and that after we have enfranchised the 2,000,000 of voters without any securities, we should never get the securities which we now wish to take. Now I think my hon. Friends should see that there is some force in this plea for tying the two Bills together; or if not for tying the two Bills together—for I have not contended for that—that we should know that when we proceed to redistribution we shall have the assistance of Her Majesty's Government in regard to the points I have indicated. My noble Friend the Secretary of State for War, in his clear and able speech, has said that if he thought redistribution was to be conducted in such a way as to lead to equal electoral districts he should not support the Bill. That, at all events, shows that in the opinion of the noble Marquess redistribution does hang together with this Bill, and the noble Marquess was exceedingly candid on that point. He said that there was reason in this demand, and that we were entitled to know the general plan of the Government with regard to redistribution. But I can quite understand that hon. Members who are prepared to admit to the franchise 2,000,000 of voters without looking to the right or to the left, without considering any of the consequences of such a measure, and who consider that the best and most ideal test of Representative Government is the number of those who go to the poll—I can quite understand that they would not hold my view, but would be content to leave the decision of this question to a Parliament in which they would be largely reinforced by those who hold the same views as themselves. But surely the position is a different one in the case of Members who do not hold this view. I hope, at all events, that hon. Members see that, to my mind, there is an intimate connection between the two subjects, and that it is not a mere crotchet that induces me to take the course I do. But hon. Members will, perhaps, think that I am wrong, not only in saying that we have no securities in this measure, but also in saying that securities are necessary at all. They will say that I have made admissions with regard to the qualifications of the working classes to enjoy the franchise, and that, therefore, they cannot understand why I should take the line which I feel myself compelled to take. I have been reprimanded by several hon. Members, and the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) said that it was lamentable that I should have had to make the admission which I have made. But I think that in the present great complexity of political forces it is possible that one may occasionally hold opinions that require to be modified by events; and I do not think that it is humiliating to admit that one has made a mistake. It would be far more humiliating to act as if one were not converted when one is converted. I will put it to the generosity of the hon. Member for Stoke. Supposing that on entering this House he had had the idea that the various sections in the House had not got that same desire to promote the interests of the working classes which he himself has, and that when he was here he had found that, contrary to his expectations, there was a great tendency and a great desire to assist in this work. Would the hon. Member not go before his Trade Union and say to them—"We have been mistaken as to the ideas of the other classes of the community, and I come here to admit it?" I trust we shall all be candid both in acknowledging criticisms and when we change our views. I am bound to say that no single Member has grappled with my other point—namely, the power of resistance of this House. The Prime Minister in his speech to-night pointed to what had happened since 1867. The Prime Minister said that Parliament had greatly improved, and that there was now more comprehension of the wants of the people than there had ever been before. Hon. Members say—"Why not then go further, and enfranchise 2,000,000 more?" That is true in one sense; but I would venture to ask the Prime Minister whether there have not been gigantic changes in the last 10 or 15 years? If Parliament has improved in some senses, are there not totally different views prevailing on political questions, some of which might be dangerous to the State? In this House do we not take a totally different view on many questions from that which we took 10 years ago? Do we not see that Democracy at every turn is clutching the arm of the Executive power? Do we not see that it is influencing our actions in our Indian Empire, and testing our hold on subject races? We see it in the relation of Members to their constituents. [Cheers.] Those cheers come from hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway; they are Democrats, and they know that the measure the House is going to pass is calculated to strengthen the hands of the Democrats. We are perfectly agreed as to its effect; but there is this great difference between us—that what is their hope is my fear. I will illustrate what I mean by reference to hon. Members below the Gangway, if I may do so without impertinence. I admire the great public spirit with which they throw themselves into the consideration of public questions, and I believe there is no body of men more animated by public spirit; but I should not like to see these hon. Members in a vast majority in this House. That precisely illustrates my feeling with regard to this question of enfranchisement. I would gladly see the enfranchisement of large additional numbers; but I do not want to see the preponderating power given to a particular class. It is said that this is distrust of the people. That is not so, because the people do not consist of one class of the community; there are various classes and various interests; and I do not see that there is any class which is not more or less open to criticism with regard to its attitude on matters affecting its own special interests. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) in his speech said—"Why bring up this question of classes?" But in this debate the selfishness of the present depositories of political power has been commented on upon several occasions; and what we are asked to believe is this—that all the classes now entitled to the franchise are more or less animated by selfish interests; but that there is one class below the £12 line which will be totally different from all the other classes. I say that that is a little too much. Either let us believe that all classes are liable to the foibles and infirmities of political human nature, or let us believe that they are all superior to them. Do not let us draw the line just at the £12 household franchise in the counties, and believe that all those below that line will be virtuous, while those above it are systematically content, as my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade would say, to connive at robbery. Now, Sir, we are told—and I wish to believe it—that the classes whom we are about to enfranchise will be under the good influence of other classes; and we have been repeatedly told, and, among others, by the Prime Minister in his speech to-night, that these classes—the agricultural labourers, for instance—would be under the influence of those Conservative forces—the squire, the parson, and so on. But if we are told that we should look to the influence of other classes upon the new voters for political stability, let us, at all events, be assured that language is held to them which will increase their respect for the classes above them. And it would be—and, in fact, is—very inconsistent that, at a moment when we are told to rely upon such influences, a Member of the Government should tell us—and not only us, but, through us, the classes that are to be enfranchised—that this House has not only been indifferent to their interests and to the redress of their grievances, but that it actually connives at robbery. My right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) said that the President of the Board of Trade was made the lightning conductor in these debates. Now, I can assure my right hon. Friend (Mr. Chamberlain) that it is from no personal antagonism that I allude to him now or on other occasions; but he seems sometimes to invite separate criticism by separate utterances; and we sometimes think that he wishes us to forget that he is a Member of the present Cabinet, because he wishes us to remember that he is, at the same time, the vigorous, determined, and unflinching Leader of the advanced section of the Liberal Party, both in and out of this House. And, therefore, we are compelled in our political utterances—I hope without any personal offence—to allude more to his speeches than to the speeches of any other Members of the Cabinet. I venture to put this to the House. If my right hon. Friend holds such language now, when he is himself a Member of Her Majesty's Government, when the Government is presided over by my right hon. Friend the present Prime Minister, and when the Liberal Party are in a majority, what would be likely to be the language that would be held if it should be a Conservative Government and a different majority which were guiding the affairs of this country? I point to this because I wish to indicate that there is a vital distinction between two sets of speeches which have been made in this House with regard to the admission of these 2,000,000 voters to the franchise. There are many Members who have supported this Bill simply from a desire to enfranchise a large additional number, who have spoken of it simply from the point of view of justice, and in the belief that they would strengthen the Constitution by passing it; and it is in that spirit that we have been addressed to-night by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. But there are other Members who tell us plainly that they desire to promote this enfranchisement, not simply from the point of view of the voters themselves, but in order to strengthen the position which they themselves occupy, and to promote those political objects which they, most conscientiously, have at heart. We have been told that we have but to await the advent to power of those 2,000,000, in addition to those already within the pale of the Constitution, to quicken the pace at which we are now going. These persons wish to heap further coals upon the fire, in order that democratic progress may proceed still faster. Such was the tone of the speeches of the junior Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) and the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst). And it is not only in this House, but out of it, that we have indications, that it is not only a question of admitting these voters for the sake of their own position, but that it is to be done in order to strengthen the democratic movement in this country. And from their point of view those hon. Members are perfectly consistent. I certainly shall not, at this hour of the night, put history into the witness-box in regard to this question, because we all know that in these days any allusion to what has passed in other countries is considered most irrelevant to our circumstances. I will not put into the witness-box any of those who have thought deeply on these subjects, because we all know that such witnesses are now brow-beaten. The men who are put into the witness-box are hon. Members who sit in this House—men of the Leeds Conference—men of the autumn campaign, Representatives of the very class which is to be enfranchised; and from their own mouths we hear for what purpose they wish 2,000,000 additional electors to be brought within the pale of the Constitution, and why they would wish for no checks and no restraints. And, meanwhile, other hon. Members rush, with that language in their ears, to throw themselves into the arms of the masses; while hon. Members representing advanced opinions laugh a quiet, but a very triumphant laugh in their sleeve. I think I have shown why I consider that the course of this debate proves that we require securities. But I am told that what I propose is to take away with one hand that which we give with the other. That is not so. It would be true, if we were first to enfranchise, and then, some time afterwards, we were to ask the new voters to give back a portion of their power. But it is not true, if in one and the same measure we take these securities at the time the enfranchisement passes, and as the condition of enfranchisement. The challenge has been thrown out to me and others who think with me—"You have not shown what are the securities that you want, nor said a word about the particular form of representation of minorities that you expect." Well, Sir, my answer to that is, that it is very ingenuous for hon. Members to ask us to tell them what these securities are, while they support the Government in refusing to disclose what their scheme of redistribution is. The securities I wish for would depend, to a great extent, on the Redistribution Bill of the

[Sixth Night.]

[Sixth Night.]

Government. We are to remove anomalies; anomalies are varieties; and varieties often are the protection of minorities; and in proportion as the scheme of the Government does away with anomalies and places electoral power in the hands of large aggregates of population, in that proportion it will be necessary to take the securities to which I have alluded. I certainly should not contemplate any general system of cumulative voting, nor that it should be applied to the whole country. In satisfying the demands of new centres of voting and counties which will have reinforcements of voters, the more you can meet them on the old lines the better; but where you pass the old lines the protection of minorities becomes indispensable. Then I would not propose any separate system for Ireland; but the same system of minority voting, whatever it is, that is applied to England should be applied to Ireland. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade ridicules the three-cornered constituencies. I myself was never enamoured of them; but sooner than have no protection to minorities I should prefer that such a security should be retained, and I should not deem it impossible to extend that system in a certain degree to Ireland. How far, then, has the Government endeavoured to meet this point? With regard to the general, simple scheme of redistribution of seats, the Government proposal seems to be moderate; but not a single sentence has fallen from them showing that they have the slightest desire to provide protection for minorities in any way; and that reminds me of a phrase which I regretted to hear from the Secretary of State for War with respect to the representation of minorities in Ireland. He suggested that they would be adequately represented by the majority in England and Scotland. Now, I cannot admit for a moment that the loyal minority in Ireland would be represented in any such way; because, what we must desire is to see present in this House, not only the Party of Separation, but, in proportion to their population, the Loyal Party in Ireland. We have been taunted, in the course of these debates, as if we had proposed to apply the population test to Ireland in opposition to the plan of the Government, or to that of the Prime Minister, who suggested that Ireland should retain her present number of Members. The population test has not been put forward as the only possible standard to determine what Ireland should have, but as the standard most favourable to Ireland—as a kind of maximum; and if you take population as a basis, Ireland will not be entitled to the full number of Members she has at present. I have heard no one suggest that it should be a population test that should be applied to Ireland; but it is a test the most favourable that can be applied; and what I object to in the Government proposal is this—that Ireland should have a guarantee that she should be treated differently to the other portions of the United Kingdom—a guarantee that, come what may, Ireland should not lose any of her Representatives. I should be prepared to say—"Let Ireland be treated like the other two countries." If you find that there are boroughs in Ireland below a certain point which are not entitled to a Member, let them be disfranchised; if there are counties and large centres of population in Ireland which are entitled to additional Members, let them receive them, precisely as in England and Scotland; but let no guarantee be given that a separate principle will be applied to Ireland. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister alluded to what was done at the time of the Union, and also in 1832; and I think, if I may be permitted to say so, he was rather hard upon the great Reformers of those days, because he puts it as if so unjust was their action to Ireland, that now we must be more than strictly just in meeting the demands of Ireland, because then she did not receive her fair share of Representatives from England. But that is because my right hon. Friend has set up the test of population. Mr. Pitt never professed to act upon population; and, therefore, he committed no crime. In 1832 the test of population was not set up; but population and taxation were taken together. For my part, I should be perfectly prepared to meet my right hon. Friend, and to say—"Let Ireland be treated precisely as she has been treated before, taking all circumstances into consideration." Such seems to me the answer to my right hon. Friend on that point. I have shown to the House that, in my view, there is little satisfaction to be obtained in the way of declarations with regard to the vital questions that I have mentioned from the Government. And I have to ask myself what chances are there of getting what we want from the next Session of Parliament, or, if not, from the Parliament after? My right hon. Friend believes that we shall, in the next Session of Parliament, be able to deal with this question of redistribution. Well, I say frankly I hope that my right hon. Friend may be right; but he will have to deal with tremendous difficulties. He will have to deal with hon. Members from Ireland, who will have to submit, if I may use the phrase, to a certain transfer of power from various parts of Ireland to Ulster on account of her growing population; and I think we may anticipate a great degree of opposition which will be made to almost every proposal. Then, we have to deal with right hon. Gentlemen and hon. Gentlemen opposite—with the Conservative Party; and the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War said that, without their co-operation, he believed it would be exceedingly difficult to procure a satisfactory redistribution scheme. I am inclined to agree with him; and I am inclined to think that unless the two Parties lay their heads together with regard to the Redistribution Bill that it will be exceedingly difficult to pass a satisfactory Redistribution Bill in the course of the next Session. Hon. Members opposite will be wrong if they oppose a Redistribution Bill next Session; but, looking to the whole circumstances of the case, and looking to the fact that we shall have to pass, and may be invited to pass, a Prevention of Crime Bill in the course of next Session, I think he is a sanguine man who believes that we have got a good chance of passing this Bill. What, then, I proceed to ask, are the chances with regard to the protection of minorities in a Parliament elected upon the new franchise? Now, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister put before us this evening the supposition that in the new counties the large majority, as I understood him, would be agricultural labourers.

MR. GLADSTONE: The majority to be enfranchised by the new Bill.

MR. GOSCHEN: That is precisely what I mean—that the largest class to be enfranchised under the new Bill would be the agricultural labourers. That is true; but it is only true to a certain extent. I have looked very carefully into that matter. Let me remind the House that in the days when my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary used to bring forward his Motions we were always told that the numbers were about equal—500,000 urban population and about 500,000 rural population, which would be enfranchised, putting them roughly at half and half. Now, that may be so; but then they are very variously distributed. I have looked very carefully into this matter, and I venture to submit my examination to the earnest attention of the House. I find that in 30 county constituencies out of 95 the addition to be made to the constituency from what I may call the industrial and urban element will be so great as to entirely outvote the agricultural constituents. I can refer hon. Members to industrial statistics upon these points, and many hon. Members know these facts from their own experience. The urban element will be strongly increased; and it must be so, because the boroughs will be left unchanged by this Bill, and although there are service and other franchises, they are exceedingly slight and insignificant compared with the numbers which will be otherwise introduced. Hon. Members will see that this process will go on; that a large number of urban voters residing in unrepresented towns or the suburbs of boroughs will be placed in the counties in numbers entirely out of proportion to the labourers, the landlords, and others. When I say that, I refer not only to the dwellers in towns, but to all who have affinities, political and otherwise, with what I may call the urban democracy. It is the industrial and the urban, the gregarious classes, which will be enfranchised in large numbers; and it is the wish of hon. Members that they should be enfranchised in those large numbers. They will be enfranchised in such numbers that in 30 county constituencies returning 60 Members there will be an entire transfer of political power from an agricultural and farm class to the urban class. I have looked carefully into the matter; and it is not a question between the Conservative and the Liberal side. I hope the House will see that I have not dwelt upon any Party consideration; but it is a question between the rural and the urban element. I say, with reference to the next Parliament, to which we refer redistribution and the protection of minorities, we shall find that it will be reinforced by 60 Members returned for county constituencies, which will have become practically urban or industrial. But I will only assume 40 votes. We know there will be a gain to the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) of, at least, 10 or 15 votes; and the result will be that in this new Parliament there will be at least 50 Members, representing 100 on a Division, who will strengthen the urban Democracy, and who will have in their hands power for the purpose of the Redistribution Bill, and for the resisting of those securities for which some of us have pressed so much. I have submitted my argument to the House, and I thank it for the attention it has given to me. Many hon. Friends of mine who sit around me say—"What is the good of your individual vote or your speech against the Bill?" I believe there is no greater temptation, no more seductive influence to which we in these days ought more to close our ears than to the siren voice which says:—"Swim with the stream; let the boat glide; statecraft is no more than the clever use of the pole to keep it from the bank." That is not my view; and I believe that resistance, even if it fails on a particular point, nevertheless is not without its influence. I believe that a campaign is influenced in its results even by a hopeless resistance made on a particular point. It is said that the wish is father to the thought. I can assure the House that in my case no proverb is more untrue. I have endeavoured to persuade myself that I could vote for this Bill; but I have not been able to persuade myself. My Party seem to breathe an atmosphere of Utopia, and to feel a confidence I cannot share. But I wish this House to feel assured that if I cannot join hon. Members who will crowd through the Lobbies to carry the second reading of this Bill, that if I must sit silent while the cheers are heard which will greet the victory when the numbers are announced from the Chair, I shall none the less breathe a most fervent and earnest hope that my own misgivings, which compel my dissent, may be put to the rout by the future course of events; and that the Democracy to which the large majority of the House is content to confide the future destinies of this country may stand out in splendid contrast to the Democracy of other countries, and that by its superior fairness and greater moderation it may prove that history does not always repeat itself, and that examples do not always teach a lesson. It is with feelings such as these that I am obliged most reluctantly to announce my intention of voting against this Bill.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, it seemed to him that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down might more appropriately have been uttered on the first reading of the measure by the Leader of the Opposition, or some of his Colleagues. Knowing the right hon. Gentleman's skill as a debater, he confessed to some disappointment that he should not have attempted to answer the speech which was delivered that evening in favour of the measure by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. He had warned them against moral cowardice and swimming with the stream; but he did not think that on this occasion the right hon. Gentleman showed so much courage in not swimming with the stream. To use another metaphor, it seemed to him that the right hon. Gentleman had taken the desperate resolve of jumping overboard, hoping that he could buffet the waves of Democracy by himself alone. He (Mr. O'Connor Power) looked upon every proposal of this kind as an effort made by a wise and far-seeing statesman to guide the ship of State over the turbid waters, and to allow it to pass along on its course into a harbour of refuge. He would sympathize with the right hon. Gentleman thoroughly in not going with the stream when it was going in the wrong direction; but he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman occupied the peculiar and unique position of being directly and emphatically opposed to the principle of the Bill. If there was danger to the State by this increase of political power being placed in the hands of the people, that argument would more properly have come from the Leader of the Opposition. But if the Conservative Party were afraid to raise that issue, because they knew that it could not be successfully defended on logical or Constitutional grounds, the right hon. Gentleman must admit that he was engaged in an entirely hopeless resistance. He noticed that the right hon. Gentleman harped upon a few strings, one of which was the Irish Separatist Party. He supposed that no one would accuse him

(Mr. O'Connor Power) of undue sympathy with the tactics of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and his Colleagues in that House. He would, however, emphatically deny that what had been described as the Constitutional Home Rule Party in Ireland, which numbered amongst its ranks some of the most loyal subjects of Her Majesty in that country, was one which advocated a policy of separation. He lamented that these tactics were resorted to by, it seemed to him, every English politician who wished to make it appear that the aspirations of Ireland were inconsistent with the integrity of the Empire. It was that which had baffled English statesmen for centuries in their attempts to govern the country; and he thought it ought to be the proud ambition of the Leaders of public opinion on both sides of the Channel to endeavour to solve the difficulty satisfactorily and finally. The Separatist bogey had been thrust before them by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the senior Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) no less than half-a-dozen times in the course of his speech a few nights ago. He thought no good purpose was served by such attempts to put forward this erroneous conception of Irish demands. He believed that no Member of the Party which followed the Leadership of the hon. Member for the City of Cork would make any proposal of a serious character tending towards the separation of Ireland and Great Britain; and it would be time enough for hon. Gentlemen who were interested in the maintenance of the Union and in the integrity of the Empire to raise their protests when any proposal of that kind was really brought forward. The principle of the Bill was simply that household suffrage should be extended to all parts of the United Kingdom; while the Amendment asked the House to declare that the Bill ought not to be proceeded with until the redistribution scheme of the Government was laid before Parliament. The fact, however, was that no risk whatever was run in passing this measure as it stood, because Parliament would have the power of moulding the Government redistribution scheme as it thought fit. He was sorry that the Conservative Party, who had threatened the House with a Dissolution, should so soon have forgotten the principle which had been laid down by their late illustrious Leader (the Earl of Beaconsfield), in introducing his Reform Bill of 1867, that it was not for the advantage of the country that the question of Reform should involve the fate of a Ministry. He apprehended that if they had his guidance there that day he would reproach his Colleagues and political Friends for their opposition to that Bill. They were being constantly asked what was to become of the loyal minority in Ireland? For his part, he did not think that the "loyal minority" were in such danger as those hon. Gentlemen seemed to believe. They could rely upon the protection of the great loyal majority in England and Scotland; and he was satisfied that they would sustain the loyal minority in Ireland in the exercise of every one of the rights to which they were entitled. The time was, however, gone when they would sustain the "loyal minority" in Ireland in the exercise of undue and exceptional privileges. They had sought to govern Ireland through the agency of the loyal minority in Ireland for centuries, and in order to gratify them they had divided the nation into two classes. The privileged few were placed at the top and the people were placed at the bottom, in order that they might be trampled on by the privileged few; to the loyal minority had been handed over the government of the country. They had erected their schools, endowed their Colleges, and subsidized their churches. In their interest they had disinherited the nation, degraded them, and deprived them of their civil and religious liberty. On the ruins of their laws they had erected a system of class domination and territorial government in its most hateful form, and had added insult to injury by making them support an ecclesiastical ascendancy; and now, because in this age of enlightenment they were endeavouring to put an end to this nefarious policy, they were told that they were about to extinguish Constitutional liberty in Ireland. It was alleged that the Irish householders whom this Bill proposed to enfranchise ought not to be enfranchised, because of the objects which their Leaders had at heart; and the two most odious objects pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) were the destruction of landlordism and the disintegration of the Empire.

[Sixth Night.]

He did not see how landlordism could be saved by withholding the Parliamentary vote from the people who, while still beyond the pale of the Constitution, had by methods, some of which all hon. Members deplored, contrived to attain the objects they had in view. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster declared that if the Bill passed in its integrity the Irish Members would hold the balance of power and control the destinies of the Empire. Who could be so absurd as to imagine that if the hon. Member for the City of Cork came back to the House with every single Irish Member pledged to support him—with the whole 100 Members—the 560 English and Scotch Members would be so powerless and feeble that they would not be able to maintain the integrity of the Empire against the action of the hon. Member? The right hon. and learned Gentleman the junior Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had given his views upon this question, and had asked, in the speech he had delivered the other night—"Why do you not wait until Ireland has quieted down?" The answer was plain. It was unreasonable to expect a state of quiet and tranquillity in Ireland so long as there remained any inequality between the peoples of the two countries. It was vain to expect it. They would have the same cycle of events, appeals for the restoration of liberty followed by agitation, agitation followed by attempts at rebellion, and attempts at rebellion followed by coercion. This would be repeated again and again, unless they took their stand once for all on the principle of Constitutional equality between the peoples of the two countries. They had been invited, at a very early stage of this discussion, to consider what action was taken by Irish and English statesmen respectively at the time of the Union in respect of the number of Members which Ireland should have in the United Parliament. He had taken the trouble to look up what passed between Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Grattan. He thought it was in the very last debate which took place in the Irish Parliament on this subject. Ireland had 300 Members in the Irish Parliament, and it was enacted in the Act of Union that her representation in the United Parliament should be limited to 100. Lord Castlereagh, in referring to the subject in the last debate on the question, used these extraordinary words—

"It is a matter of no moment what are the number of Irish Representatives, provided that they be sufficient to state the wants, and watch over the interests, of their country."

["Hear, hear!"] He was not surprised to hear the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) cheer that observation; but, surely, the hon. Member would not bind Ireland by the declaration of Lord Castlereagh. To tell him what Mr. Pitt's view of that contract was, and to tell him the opinion of Lord Castlereagh, was to interest him very much, and to present to him something for his consideration, which ought not to be treated with indifference or neglect; but, certainly, if they were to try to make Ireland content, they must satisfy themselves what the Leaders of Irish opinion in the Irish House of Commons thought about it. Mr. Grattan, in reply to Lord Castlereagh, said—

"In defence of his plan of Union, he tells us that the number of Irish Representatives in the British Parliament is of little consequence. This doctrine is new—namely, that between two nations the comparative influence is of no moment. He supposes 100 Irish Members will be sufficient, because he supposes any number will be sufficient."

Further on, in the same speech, Mr. Grattan contended that—

"If Yorkshire were governed by a Lord Lieutenant, and a different code of laws, it would not be simply a part of England in the Constitutional sense, but a nation allied with England, or, if you like, a Province of Great Britain."

With regard to Scotland, Mr. Grattan said—

"The Constitutional sympathy of England defends her, and renders the number of her Representatives less essential."

He (Mr. O'Connor Power) did not ask hon. Gentlemen from Scotland to accept the concluding part of that quotation as a conclusive argument against their demand for increased representation; but it had been well said by the junior Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) that though the physical distance of Ireland from Great Britain entitled her to some increased representation, in that respect her moral distance entitled her to more. It might be said that the activity of certain Irish Members in the House ought to compensate for any moral distance between Great Britain and Ireland; but he thought it ought not to compensate, for he was one of those who deplored the fact that legislation should be passed under the physical pressure of walking into the Division Lobby and obstructing the Business of the State, and who trusted that in the future they would not be tempted to rely upon any tactics of that description. Let them come a stage lower down in the history of this Reform Question as between Great Britain and Ireland—to the year 1831. The late Lord Derby, then Mr. Stanley, referring to a speech in which it had been urged that the Reform Bill of that day would give too great a preponderance to Ireland, and that the proportion laid down at the time of the Union should be preserved, said—

“For my part, I am not inclined to attach any great importance to the strict maintenance of the relative proportion between the three countries. As long as I find large, wealthy, and populous places unrepresented in any of these three countries, I care little whether they are to be found in England, Scotland, or Ireland. I thank God that there is now an United Empire, and I am for meting out the same measure of strict impartiality to all.”

The two hon. Members who, he said—

“Struggled so pertinaciously for the maintenance of the proportion of Members between the three counties; and who grudged Ireland any increase to her Representatives beyond the number given to her at the period of the Union.”

He cautioned—

“To consider well the arguments they are putting into the hands of those who are contending for a measure which I conceive would be most mischievous—those who put forward the doctrine that Ireland is not adequately represented in the House, and was, therefore, to have a domestic Legislature of her own.”

He (Mr. O'Connor Power) asked the attention of the House particularly to the concluding part of this quotation from the late Lord Derby. He said—

“If you fear to give any more Members to Ireland, why did you pass the Relief Bill; why did you grant Catholic Emancipation?”

And he (Mr. O'Connor Power) said that if they feared the presence of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, and his new accession to strength in the new Parliament; if they believed that it would be fatal to the existence of the State and the integrity of the Empire, why did they give the Irish constituencies the trouble of returning any Members at all? They could not halt half way in a policy of restriction and exclusion. They must govern Ireland on Constitutional principles, or they must govern her by force. It had been the conception of the Conservative Party that Ireland was not a nation to be governed, but was simply a military outpost, to be held by the strong arm, and to be kept down by the iron hand. If that was the opinion of hon. Members, then, he maintained, they had not the courage of their convictions—they were stopping half way, and were taking up a ground that was absolutely untenable. The Prime Minister had referred to the injustice, in regard to the number of Members, under which Ireland had laboured for so long a time, without any great disposition being manifested by the Representatives of England and Scotland to redress the wrong. He (Mr. O'Connor Power) did not intend to dwell on that question; but, for the purpose of showing how far the Prime Minister was justified in his reference to that part of the Reform Question, he should like to make one very brief quotation from O'Connell on the subject. O'Connell had said in 1831—

“One great objection to the Union is the gross partiality of the arrangement by which Ireland has only 100 Members to watch over her interests; whilst England, with only twice her population, has five times that number.”

Well, after all that had been said on the subject, he trusted hon. Gentlemen would have no difficulty in supporting the Bill; and that no further attempt would be made to affix the stigma of inferiority to the people of Ireland by excluding them from the scope of the measure. There were a great many right hon. and hon. Members in the House—the right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), he believed, being of the number—who considered that certain persons in Ireland made a parade of their grievances in order that they might make political capital out of them. The right hon. Gentleman was one of those who believed that many of the grievances spoken of were of a purely imaginary character. Well, if they were imaginary, they were not likely to last long. It was a very illogical position for the same hon. Members to take up to say—“Because Ireland has no real grievances of which she can justly complain, we will manufacture a grievance ready to her hand; and, in the present excited state of the relations between the two countries, we will supply every leader of popular opinion in Ireland with a just ground of complaint against the people of England and Scotland." Almost every hon. Member who had addressed the House on this subject had discussed it in connection with some contemplated redistribution of seats; and upon that point he only wished to express a hope that, when the Government came to deal with the question of redistribution, they would consider worthy of their attention what was called the self-acting Reform Law in operation in the United States of America. At the close of the last century, and for some years at the beginning of this century, the number of the population each Member of Congress represented at Washington was 30,000. In 1811 the proportion was raised to one Member to 35,000; in 1822 it was one to every 40,000; in 1832 one to every 47,700; in 1842 one to every 70,680; in 1852 one to every 93,000; and almost every 10 years a similar change had been made, until now each Member of the House of Representatives represented about 145,000 people. The effect of this was obvious. They had a continually growing population; but so great was the desire of American statesmen to keep down the number of Representatives that, though the country had a population considerably larger than that of the United Kingdom, he supposed the number of Representatives at Washington was not more than half those who, at the present time, occupied seats in this House of Commons. He trusted, therefore, that when this redistribution scheme was taken in hand, Her Majesty's Government would consider that arrangement worthy of serious consideration. Well, he thoroughly endorsed every opinion expressed by the various speakers on the Ministerial side of the House in reference to the essential principle of the British Constitution. He believed its essential principle was its representative character. That was its main strength; and he believed the reason why the British Constitution had remained unshaken, whilst other systems of government had been overthrown again and again in various countries of Europe, was because it was an elastic Constitution, which tried to embody the legitimate aspirations of the people and of the community of which it formed so great a part. Regarding the Constitution of the Empire in that light, and believing that this measure was a wise and prudent one, founded upon justice and expediency, he should certainly, for one, give it his hearty and sincere support.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Earlier in the evening we had the advantage of a speech from the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. He gave us, in terse language, his view of the discussion which has taken place; and he also invited us to consider certain points with regard to the measure which we are now considering. I wish, before I take notice of some of the observations of the right hon. Gentleman, to call attention to the exact nature of the issue which we are presently to pronounce upon. We are now discussing an Amendment moved by my noble Friend the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) upon the second reading of the Bill. As hon. Members are perfectly well aware, there are two ways of dealing with a Bill which you desire to discuss and oppose. One is by moving that the Bill be read on some future day, three or six months hence; the other is by an Amendment of a distinct and argumentative character—not necessarily disposing of or rejecting the Bill, but laying down the points upon which the House is dissatisfied with it, or dissatisfied with the proposal by which it is accompanied, and requiring something else to be done. There can be no doubt, with regard to the principle of my noble Friend's Amendment, although there may be some doubt with regard to the principle of the Bill. When we come to discuss the Bill we shall see that there is reason enough for the observation of the Prime Minister, and that the debate has been, to a certain extent, languid, because of the doubt as to the issue involved in it. I think, when you come to consider the Bill, the circumstances in which it is brought forward, and the arguments by which it is supported, the House may fairly say that there is a certain amount of doubt as to what is the principle of the measure. But with regard to the principle of the Amendment I contend that there is no doubt whatever. The principle involved in that is neither more nor less than this—that an alteration of the balance of the Constitution by the introduction of so large a number of new voters as this Bill proposes to introduce is a matter of a very serious character, and is one which requires to be viewed and considered from all points; and it is impossible to pronounce upon a measure of this sort without knowing whether it is part of a larger scheme, and, if it is part of a larger scheme, what that larger scheme may be. We are told that the measure which we have now to consider is one that the Government offer with great confidence, because it embodies a principle which they think the House cannot possibly reject, and because it is supported by arguments which they have brought forward; but when we begin to discuss these arguments and that ground, and when we begin to inquire as to some points in the position of the Government, we are met with vague and shadowy explanations, which, after all, we are told, or we are as good as told, by the Prime Minister are only meant to be shadowy and sketchy arrangements, and which, when we attempt to grapple with them, we find are constantly changing in their form. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head; but I shall be able to prove what I have stated. At all events, I would observe that the right hon. Gentleman told us that this Bill was presented to an earnest Parliament by an earnest Ministry, and he said that that being the case it was absolutely certain that the measure must be adopted. I will not say anything about the earnestness of this Parliament—I give hon. Gentlemen on both sides credit for desiring to deal with this matter as earnestly as they can; but when I am told that the Government is in earnest, I must say that they have not produced upon me an impression of their real earnestness, because they are so vague and uncertain, and, as it seems to me, so little agreed upon the main principle of the proposals they are making, and upon the grounds on which they defend them. It is all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to say, as he did this afternoon, that he calls upon us to trust the people; it is a question of whether you can trust the Government. It appears to me that we have no encouragement, and no ground given to us, to warrant us in putting in the Government that trust which they require, for it is no inconsiderable matter they are asking of us. It is not a simple and insignificant transaction they are asking us to take part in; it is not a small social question, or a mere matter of detail; but this is a question of revising and altering the whole basis of your Constitution, and the whole balance of your Constitutional system. Surely, if we are in earnest we must insist—we are bound in duty to insist—upon a full explanation and consideration of all the points which are involved in so great a change. What was it the right hon. Gentleman told us in his speech at the beginning of the evening? He began by saying that there had been certain charges brought against the Government and against himself in respect of the measure that he had brought forward and the speech in which he had explained and defended it. He said the first of these objections was a want of positive argument. I do not say that there has been an absolute absence of positive argument, but there has been a great deficiency of positive argument in support of the measure, considering its great importance. We must bear this in mind. It has been said, on various occasions, in the course of this debate and elsewhere, on the one hand, that this is not a measure which has been called for by the people, and then, on the other hand, we are rebuked for using such an argument as that, because we are told that it is as much as to say we desire to see the people goaded on to riot and disorder, for the purpose of obtaining that which they ought to obtain without such pressure. Well, I entirely agree that we ought not to wait for riot and disorder if we are convinced that a measure of this kind is desired; and that we ought to consider in what way the legitimate wishes and desires of the people can be gratified and met without injuring the Constitution. But, I may say, when you have a quiet time, as by the hypothesis and by the confession of all you have; when there is no pressure from below, and when the change comes recommended from above; when it is proposed by a Government who has been three or four years in Office, and who, we may assume, have been carefully considering the question, who tell us it was the first task imposed upon them by their return to power, and who have had three or four years to consider the matter, being conscious of its importance, I say it was their duty to have so considered it that they should be able to present to us some strong ground for taking the step, and present to us a complete plan. What I say is, that at every turn in the argument the Amendment of my noble Friend rises up, and is a rebuke to the Government for the manner in which they are dealing with the subject. In the first place, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister says—"When you speak of want of positive argument we deny the charge; we say we have given you positive argument which redeems something of the pledges of the Government, and realizes something of the expectation of the people." But the point put forward in the first speech, and which has been repeated to-night, was this—that it is a matter of advantage to the State that the largest possible number of capable citizens should be admitted to the right of election. We want to know the meaning of that rather vague phrase. What does the right hon. Gentleman mean by "capable citizens?" and what does he mean by "the largest number that can possibly be admitted?" If "capable citizens" means all who are able to give a vote, it is obvious that there is a much larger number than you propose to include in your Bill who would answer to that description. If you mean to tell us that anybody who is not incapable, by reason of some physical or mental infirmity, or some extraordinary circumstance of position, and who is untainted with crime and anything of that sort—anyone who, in that way, is a "capable citizen," ought to have the franchise extended to him, then you ought to extend the principle very much beyond the limited number you propose to include. If you make a capable elector the test, you will find that you are bound to go very much further, and in very different directions in some respects, to what you have done in order to complete your definition. I take, for instance, the case of the female franchise. There cannot be a doubt, if you ask who are capable electors, that you would find it very difficult to declare that the females who are in a certain position as taxpayers and ratepayers, and who are electors for municipal purposes, are not capable citizens, and should not be included in the franchise. I believe, from Returns I have seen, that about one-seventh of the electors of the municipalities of the Kingdom are females; and, on the principle on which you are proceeding, you will find it difficult to say that they are not entitled to vote. You find it, I think, inconvenient to give us a definition of "capable citizens." It is an easy term to repeat, and when the Prime Minister is called upon to give us a definition, or thinks he is called upon to give us something of a definition, instead of doing so, he says—"At all events, the persons whom we propose to bring into the electoral body are capable citizens, for they belong to the same class whom you have already enfranchised in other parts of the Kingdom—those resident in the counties are just the same class as those you enfranchised in the boroughs, and enfranchised with such excellent effect." The right hon. Gentleman says—"Or, if they are not the class you have enfranchised, then they are agricultural labourers, whom you must necessarily trust as being men whose circumstances make them trustworthy—indeed, who are shown to be trustworthy by the fact that they exercise the franchise very properly in certain boroughs." Then the right hon. Gentleman, having laid down these two propositions, which, no doubt, are correct so far as they go, says—"That is a proof that the measure we are proposing is a safe measure, and that it only includes capable citizens." Well, but the right hon. Gentleman forgets that in this measure he is introducing into the electorate not only these classes of agricultural labourers, artisans, and others in the English and Scotch counties, but that, according to the principle he is acting on, he is introducing into the electorate a very large number of electors of whom you cannot say the same thing that you have said of the English and Scotch electors. The right hon. Gentleman contends that the proof that the addition to the electorate is safe in England and Scotland is that we have already tested these classes of men and found them capable and good persons to trust with the franchise. He assumes, on the strength of that, that he is right in carrying the same doctrine into the whole of the United Kingdom, and so include Ireland. We are twitted, if we venture to allude to this subject, and are told that we are proposing or suggesting that this measure should be passed for England, or England and Scotland alone, and that Ireland should be excluded. We say nothing of the kind; but we want to call attention to that point, which is of such vital importance to the character of the Bill, as a proof that it is necessary that you must make your whole scheme with reference to that electoral fact, that electoral element, you are going to introduce. And here comes my noble Friend before the House with his Amendment, and says—"Before we can give you the verdict you claim we want to know your whole scheme; we want to know how you are going to deal with the questions that were raised in the able speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) just now—the question of the protection of the loyal minority in Ireland, and the question of the share or proportion which Ireland is to have in the Representative Body of the United Kingdom." These are questions which it is not necessary for us to pronounce an opinion on, because we want to know what you are going to propose. I say you have no right to turn on us and ask—"What is it you propose?" until you have at least done us the honour of communicating to us what it is you propose. With regard to the first part of the right hon. Gentleman's statement, I have offered what I consider to be an answer to the House. Now, with regard to other observations of the right hon. Gentleman, I wish also to point out the force of the Amendment of my noble Friend. The right hon. Gentleman said that the representation of classes will be far more perfect and equal under this Bill than it is at the present time—and this is one of the strongest recommendations he can offer. I want to know how he makes that out? That is a most difficult assertion to make, and it is certainly one which is not self-evident. If you have got a certain distribution of power and a certain description of the electorate, and if you suddenly throw into that body an amount of voting strength equal to two-thirds of the existing power, you certainly do not, on the face of it, make matters more equal, and I require a proof that you will do so. If we saw your measure of redistribution, we might, perhaps, find that you had so devised it as to accomplish that object.

But you are entirely silent on the subject; you do not tell us anything about it; and you leave us to accept that proposition entirely on your authority. Now, that redistribution has a great deal to do with the character and the justice of your measure is a fact which requires no argument, no proof. But, if I am to appeal to any authority on the subject, I will appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), who, I remember, many years ago, in a very powerful speech he made in Birmingham, said that redistribution was by far the more important question of the two, and that, take what franchise you pleased, if you left redistribution to him he would undertake to produce certain results. That was the opinion of a Gentleman extremely well qualified to pronounce an opinion on the subject. And I am not sure that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister—I will not say this Session—has not said something very much to the same effect. What did he tell us the other day? He told us that in the discussions which have occurred on the different Reform Bills in the past, it has always been on the redistribution question that the great fights have taken place; and that the Divisions on that point have been in the proportion of 20 or 30 to two or three on the franchise question.

MR. GLADSTONE: That was the proportion of the length of time spent in debate.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Well, of the length of time spent in debate. It was evident, therefore, that redistribution was the more important part of the whole, and was felt to be the more important part; and now you are undertaking an easier and simpler part, and are purposely putting off the more difficult and important part to a more convenient season. By what argument do you justify such a proceeding? The right hon. Gentleman used to-night a most extraordinary argument as a defence of what he is doing. He said—"If we had undertaken to deal with the whole question, including redistribution, this Session, we should have had time for nothing else." Why, what could be more important? What could be more proper than that you should give up everything else, if required? Are we to be put off from dealing with this great question in what is, I think, admittedly, the best manner? ["No, no!"] [Mr. GLADSTONE: The worst manner.] The best manner is to bring the whole of the matter before the House of Commons at the same time. You have got your plan ready. It is not necessary, if you find it impossible to do it, that you should put it all into one and the same Bill, or that you should carry your two Bills, though I believe you would find that as easy as the course you propose. But that you should keep us entirely in the dark with regard to this important section of business, seems to me to be utterly indefensible. When your defence comes—that you have got to deal with Local Government, and to bring in a Bill for the Municipal Government of London, and matters of that sort, I must say it appears to me to be an insult to common sense. It is unworthy of the magnitude of the question that such an argument as that should be used. The right hon. Gentleman tell us that redistribution is a question of local character, to be settled on local grounds. That is one of the most extraordinary statements I have ever seen or heard. Settled on local grounds! What does the right hon. Gentleman mean? He tells us that redistribution is a matter of a local character, as though it had to be settled like some dispute between Gloucester and Birmingham, or between one part of England and one part of Scotland—whether there shall be one or two more Members in the one place than in the other. That is not the question. What you want to get in your redistribution and re-arrangement of the franchise is a better electorate and a better Parliament as the result. If that is not a national question, I do not know what it is. It is not only a national question, but an Imperial question; because, after all, you must bear in mind what this great House of Commons is, the composition of which you are now so especially considering. Consider what are the interests within the purview of this House—that they are not limited to the domestic affairs of this country; that they are not limited merely to the affairs of the United Kingdom; but that they touch all your relations with your Colonies, with India, and with all parts of the world. Therefore, consider of what enormous importance it is that you should do your best to constitute a really good House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman told us to-day that the Reform Bills which we have hitherto passed had largely improved the character and constitution of this House. That is a point which I am not disposed to take up as an argument. I think the proposition is one which is not altogether self-evident; but, at the same time, there is a considerable amount of truth in it. But we must feel that while we have been introducing a much larger amount of the popular element, and greatly increasing its power, we are, at the same time, suffering certain inconveniences from the enlargement of the constituencies, and have not yet learned thoroughly how to manage the footing on which the Member ought to stand with reference to his electors; and we must feel that there are difficulties and dangers attending our present system that we must take care we do not increase by a hasty and premature increase of the electorate. Take one point. You have had to legislate quite recently upon the subject of corrupt practices. You have introduced a Bill that is of the greatest importance, but which is also of a novel character, and which, in the first instance, it will not be at all easy to apply to your existing electoral system. Will you make it easier to apply it by suddenly throwing a large number of new voters into your constituencies? I doubt if you will; and so on with regard to other matters. You will find that by the sudden throwing upon your electorate of 2,000,000 of voters you will be raising questions that you will find it difficult to deal with. What will be the effect of introducing so large a body if you have not properly arranged the manner in which they are to fall into your system? There is always this to fear—that the masses you import will prove unmanageable, unless a system of training and manipulation is adopted; and the difficulty you will have to face will not be altogether with the masses themselves, who will be untrustworthy and wanting in experience, but it will be in the danger of their falling into the hands of persons who will misdirect them. I believe that the chief thing you have to guard against when instituting an electoral reform is anything likely to lead to a diminution of individual freedom and responsibility. The right hon. Gentleman has told us a very curious thing—namely, that it is really impossible for the Government to say how they are to distribute seats before they have got the Franchise Bill and the Registration Bill. That is very confusing. When shall we have those Bills? The Registration Bill, apparently, will not be introduced this year.

MR. GLADSTONE: I know no reason why it should not be.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: We are by degrees extracting a few statements from the Government. We may, then, hope for a Registration Bill this year. That is very important. I do not know, however, how the registration can be conveniently managed if you have not fixed the character of the constituencies to which it is to apply. I do not profess to be an expert in the conduct of a whole system of registration; but, to my inexperienced mind, it would appear necessary that you should have your redistribution first, and then get your registration to work in the constituencies you are going to form. The right hon. Gentleman himself admits that it is desirable that all these measures should be passed by one and the same Parliament, although he says it is not essential. But will you be able to do that, considering the present stage and age of your Parliament? Remember that in order to get your registration to work before the Parliament which may have to be elected in 1886 comes into existence, you have to get your redistribution and registration plans through by somewhere about the month of June next year; but will you be able to do that? What will be your position? You will find that you will have as much time to spend over the Redistribution Bill as over the Franchise Bill; and you will find it very difficult indeed to get them forward so early next year as to enable you to have your registration ready before the Parliament which may have to be elected in 1886. Now, I think the House has a right to look at all these matters from this point of view. Here is a Government which has been in Office for four years, having received, as their first charge, the charge of dealing with this great question of a Reform Bill—with this great question of the Franchise, and with this great question of redistribution—and who have also undertaken to deal with Municipal Reform, but have allowed these four Sessions to pass by without beginning one of them. And now, at this time of day, they tell us it is impossible to carry all this through, because they have to deal with Local Government and the Government of the City of London, and various other matters. I say that this is not treating the House fairly. Well, the right hon. Gentleman told us another thing. He observed that fault had been found with him on account of the indications—faint and shadowy indications, but still sufficiently significant—which he has already given us of the plan of redistribution as it exists in his breast. Well, we were very much astonished at some of the points in that scheme, and especially—let me go back again for a moment—at those which dealt with the question of the Irish representation. The Irish representation, we were told, was not to be diminished. The number of the Irish Members was to remain as it is at present; and we were told that whereas Scotland, undoubtedly, ought to have an addition made to the number of her Members, that addition was to be made in such a way as not to diminish the number of the Irish Representatives, and the number was to be made up by taking certain seats from the South of England and handing them over to Scotland and to constituencies in the North of England. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. I do not know whether he questions my statement; but I am speaking not of what he said to-night, but of what he said some days ago. Possibly there may have been some change in the plans of the Cabinet since then; but I think I am in the recollection of the House, and I think that even the right hon. Gentleman will not deny it, when I say that in the scheme which he shadowed forth the other day he told us that he attached importance to retaining the number of the Irish seats; and he told us, further, that, undoubtedly, Scotland ought to have a greater number of seats, and that from the Southern parts of England it would be necessary to find the number required to make up the number for the North of England and for Scotland. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] Well, the right hon. Gentleman still shakes his head. It shows what a terribly bad plight we are in. Of course, this is not what he intended; but I will venture to say it is what everybody thought he intended. Well, then, we come back to what was said by my noble Friend who sits beside me (Lord John Manners). If my noble Friend's advice could be followed, and if we could have the whole plan in any shape before us, we could not have all these doubts and disputes in regard to what the right hon. Gentleman's intentions are. But I admit—and it is, in fact, part of my case—that since we had that statement made we have had several other statements, some of which are of a very curious character. We were rather surprised that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War should have been content with an arrangement of that character which involved no diminution in the Irish representation, because we remembered various speeches and observations of the noble Marquess which seemed to point to something very different. But when the noble Marquess came to speak on the subject the other day he pointed out that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was made only in conjunction with the laying down of two other principles, one of which is that you are to have regard to the distance of the constituencies. That is what, I believe, is commonly called the centrifugal theory. The other principle is that you must contemplate a moderate addition to the total number of Members sitting in the House at present. Now, we want to know—and the right hon. Gentleman this evening has repeated the words of the noble Marquess and has made some significant remarks upon them—we want to know what is the meaning of those words, “in conjunction with the other principles?” I can understand that the argument in regard to this is one that might be entertained; but when the right hon. Gentleman talks of the Irish Members, and says he proposes that the number of the Irish Members shall not be diminished, but that he proposes it in conjunction with the centrifugal theory—that you are to have regard to the distance of the constituencies—I want to know what he means? Does he contemplate a scheme founded upon keeping the Irish Members as they are, or does he not? Really, at the present time, we are in absolute darkness upon this point. And what is the meaning of this centrifugal theory? It seems to me to be one of those curious, mysterious things that make one feel quite uncomfortable. It is like a sort of ghost, that you cannot explain. We do not know what he means by it. Why are we to have this principle, that distance is to entitle a constituency to a larger proportion of representation? To what extent is it to apply? Are we to apply it all through, and to say that as Ireland, as a whole, is to have a larger proportion of Members than England, therefore Connaught, being more distant than Ulster, is to have a larger proportion than that Province? Are we to say that the more distant parts of Scotland are to have a greater proportionate number of Members than the more Southern and active portions of that country? What is the ground on which we are to say that? Are we to take the ground that those who are least in the way of receiving intelligence—that those who are at the greatest distance from the Metropolis—are best qualified to guide the policy of the State? It would be quite interesting to know whether that is the ground which we are to go upon. But now, to-night, the right hon. Gentleman has started a new theory, and it seems to me to be one which is also of a very curious and alarming character. He has made the suggestion that the Irish representation should not be diminished upon this plea—that formerly we did much injustice to Ireland by giving her too little; and that now, by way of redressing the evil, we ought to do injustice to this country, and give Ireland too much. Really the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman are extremely ingenious, and they are always interesting to listen to. But is this the way in which we ought to deal with a large and important question of this character? Are we really justified in taking up one thing after another in this manner, lightly, and I may even say carelessly, as who should say that any argument is good enough to support a foregone conclusion? I venture to say that the spirit in which the House ought to be called upon, and the spirit in which the House is prepared to deal with, a question of this kind, must be something very different from that in which we are now told to approach it. If this debate has been languid, as the right hon. Gentleman says it has, it is owing to the very great uncertainty in which the whole of the proceedings of the Government have been involved. It is very difficult to believe that they are really in earnest in endeavouring to carry even this Franchise Bill; because it is perfectly clear that the Bill is one which can only be part of a scheme, and it is so uncertain when the remainder of the scheme is to be laid before us, and what its character is to be, that it really looks as if they could not seriously expect the House to do more than discuss the subject and pass certain stages of the Bill, and stop there. They can hardly expect this to be taken as a redemption of their pledge. Now, Sir, the matter is really in their own hands. If they will only meet the natural desire and wish of the House, and will lay aside all other Business, and proceed to reveal to us the remainder of their scheme—if the House and the people are put in possession of the views of the Government, those views will be considered and judged in no narrow and in no purely Party spirit. There would be a perfect readiness to consider and discuss such a scheme as might be presented. I call on the House to consider what its duty in this matter really is. I call on the House to consider that it will not be doing that duty if it receives, adopts, and passes this large increase of the franchise without more light than has yet been shown to the House as to the effect of the measure. No doubt, we shall have other opportunities of discussing many of the questions of detail that arise. I am not desirous now to enter into matters which may arise out of the details of the Bill. There are many points upon which I think the Government have made proposals of an interesting character which will require very careful consideration. I think, for instance, that this “service franchise,” as it is called, is one that will require very careful consideration indeed, and there are other matters also which require it; but this is not the moment nor the opportunity for discussing the details of the measure. The Bill is one of a very important character—indeed, its importance has not, I think, been exaggerated by any of the speakers who have recommended it to us; and yet we are asked to consider it in a way which seems to imply that it is of very little more importance than a Turnpike Bill. I see the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) in his place. He, at all events, knows perfectly well what he wants; and there are expressions which every now and then fall from his lips which are worthy of the attention of the House. I have not got the exact words here; but I recollect that in a speech he made—I think at Bristol—he distinguished between the two measures of the Government, and said that the question of the franchise was a question of principle, but the question of redistribution was a question of tactics. Now, that is a very important distinction.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg the right hon. Baronet's pardon. I did not say that. What I did say was that the question of uniting the two subjects in one Bill was not a question of principle, but a question of tactics.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Well, Sir, there is not a great deal of difference between that version and mine—between the meaning which I thought I found in the words, and the meaning which is now given to them. Is it correct to say for the Government, as it certainly is to say for the right hon. Gentleman, that it is a question of tactics how far they will allow their redistribution scheme to be known before we are committed? Glimpses we have sometimes of the Redistribution Bill, such as have been afforded by the right hon. Gentleman, and also by the noble Marquess; and we can judge from their observations that whenever it comes it must be one of a very large and important character, and one very far in excess of any we have seen, at all events, since the Reform Bill of 1832. We have had these glimpses. From time to time the corner of the veil has been lifted, and we have been allowed to see a little of what is beyond. But it is a question of tactics, as the right hon. Gentleman is very well able to tell, as to how much of this redistribution scheme you had better let be seen before you carry your Franchise Bill. The two measures cannot possibly be separated. I do not mean to say that they cannot be separated in a certain sense, because you have done it. It is said that the speech of my noble Friend (Lord Derby), made in this House some years ago, was an unanswered and unanswerable speech. It certainly was unanswered at the time; but it has been shown that it was not unanswerable, because my noble Friend has contrived to answer it himself, by the process which we used to call in our old days of logic, solvitur ambulando. He has cut the knot of the difficulty by doing that which he said was impossible. I do not think he has destroyed the argument of his speech; but he certainly has shown that there are things which appear to be impossible which may be accomplished. But it is in the nature of things impossible that you can complete anything like a reform of your representation without dealing with both these subjects together. If you separate them one from the other, you must do it in such a way that you have no fair clue, and worse than no fair clue, because you have shadowy and deceptive indications—I do not mean intentionally deceptive—but shadowy and deceptive indications of what the details of the measure may be, and, therefore, you are acting in the dark. I trust the House will consider these views, and that it will pause before it consents to the second reading of this Bill. I trust that it will consider the Amendment of my noble Friend; and insist that before the Bill proceeds any further we shall be furnished with that which we ask for, and which we have a right to ask for.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): I can only hope for the indulgence of the House by promising that I will trespass upon its attention for a very short time. I make this promise, not only because of the lateness of the hour, but because it would be out of place for me to attempt to make any general reply on the part of the Government. That general reply has been made five hours ago by the Prime Minister; and hon. Members will feel, as I do, that it would be absurd for me to attempt to supplement that speech. But as I take some interest in the form in which the Bill has been framed, perhaps the House will forgive me if I refer to one or two subjects of which mention has been made during this discussion. In the first place, I think that the cause of the enfranchisement of the masses of the people has made great progress during the debate. The discussion may have been languid, and so it has been from one point of view; but admissions have been made of a large and grave character which ought to give great encouragement to those who support the Bill. When this Bill was placed upon the Table there was, on the part of those who were responsible for its introduction, a desire to ascertain whether it contained that measure of reform which would satisfy both its supporters and its opponents. Putting on one side for the moment the main principle of the Bill, there has not been a single criticism upon the minor details of the proposed Reform; and the Government have the satisfaction of knowing that those prophecies which have been made the ground of attacks upon the Government have been all falsified. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir R. Assheton Cross) stated at Aberdeen that the Government were about to introduce a Bill which would destroy all the rights of property; that no man was to have more than one vote.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I said it had been stated by Members of the Government that that was what would probably be brought forward.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): The right hon. Gentleman warned those whom he addressed to give no support to a Government which was likely to bring forward such a Bill. Then, again, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther), during the election in the City of York, appealed to the freemen of that city not to support a Government that was about to introduce a Bill which would allow no freeman to vote, and would deprive them of their ancient privileges. Not one of those prophecies have been fulfilled; and, notwithstanding all these prophetic attacks upon the Government, not one of the predictions have proved true. The Government now have the satisfaction of knowing that the settlement of this question is to be found in the Bill which they have presented to the House. No Conservative Government will ever venture to introduce a Bill that is more Conservative; and no Liberal Government will be wise to introduce one that is more Liberal than this. If this Bill in its details is acceptable, there are really only two questions remaining on the subject. The first is, whether the main principle of the Bill is acceptable to the majority; and upon that point the Government are encouraged to believe that the answer will be favourable to the Bill. Those who are responsible for opposing and criticising the Bill have not answered in the negative, and have not said they object to the principle of the Bill. Their own supporters, representing large constituencies, have said, one by one, that they approve of the principle of enfranchisement; and I therefore hold that I have a right to claim that as they have allowed the Bill to proceed thus far no one can now go back. It is now only a question of time when this great question is to be solved; and on whomsoever the responsibility for that solution should rest, the sooner that question is determined the better. Upon the main question some light has been thrown by the course which the Opposition have taken, not by introducing the Amendment, but by the statements of those who are mainly responsible for the criticisms upon the Bill. I heard the speech of the noble Lord who proposed the Amendment with regret in one sense, because it seemed to bear the tone rather of a past time of warfare. I cannot refrain from saying that the noble Lord, although he used arguments that were not without force, never allowed a word of an acrimonious character to escape him, and never said a word to which a political opponent could object. The noble Lord dealt with the question of the peasant class; and there is, perhaps, no one more entitled to deal with that subject than the noble Lord, for years ago he belonged to a Party which took great interest in the prosperity of the peasant class. But what has that interest done for the peasantry? Has it made their position any better, or given them any greater power, or opportunity of speaking for themselves? Now, the noble Lord asked why this class should be enfranchised at all; and argued that they have representation already in certain agricultural boroughs by means of the Members for those boroughs. But is not that statement, so far as it goes, the cardinal principle in the matter? And when the noble Lord endeavoured to persuade the House that for this reason the peasant class should not be permitted to enjoy the franchise, did he not see that he was paying them the greatest compliment he could, for he was telling the House that these agricultural voters were of like capacity and character with urban voters, and not only equal in their electoral character to town householders, but were in fact, so superior that they had sufficient intelligence and judgment to elect Members for all the agricultural labourers throughout the country? While the noble Lord was thus bearing his testimony to the efficiency and capacity of these agricultural labourers who already have votes, he was, at the same time, saying that they were such ignorant men that to give them votes would be to destroy the Constitution, and annihilate the agricultural interest. In face of the view that there is not sufficient capacity on the part of these men, is there any encouragement to be learned from the Bench opposite as to the course which Gentlemen opposite will take? The right hon. Baronet (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) has told the House what he would do if his Party had to frame a measure; and, knowing the district which the right hon. Gentleman represents, the idea came into my mind that if his scheme were carried out labourers in East Gloucestershire would have to visit some distant town such as Cheltenham to vote, and the registration officer would have to wander over the Cotswold Hills in order to select the agricultural labourer whose alleged incapacity would have to be punished by making him vote far away from his fellows and his home. On the part of the Opposition, the right hon. Gentleman seriously asked for delay, in order that they might deal with such a scheme; and this is from an ex-Cabinet Minister, putting forward what he thought should be the basis of a measure of Reform to be introduced by the Party who claims to take charge of the question. Then there is another right hon. Gentleman who is an authority on Provincial matters—namely, the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther), who has a peculiar capacity for attending elections, and who always greets the issue for a new Writ with pleasure, because of an intention to take part in the coming fray. I hope the House will forgive me if I say the right hon. Gentleman reminds me somewhat of a certain dog that used to be in the habit of going to fires. Whether it was asleep or awake, at home or abroad, that dog was always present at a fire; but, although it barked a great deal, I do not know that it ever did any good; but in justice to the right hon. Gentleman I must say I do not know that he ever did any harm. The right hon. Gentleman was present at an election in the City of York, and he

there appealed to the intelligence of the electors, and told them he had the greatest confidence in their electoral capacity. That was very gratifying to them. But when he went down to an agricultural constituency in Somerset, he there said the farmers were alone the persons fit to vote, and that no householder ought to have a vote unless he was a £12 householder; and also that according to the size of the farms they held the more votes they ought to have; or rather, that according to the amount of taxation they paid so they should have a corresponding number of votes. The right hon. Gentleman likewise advocated the principle of Sturges Bourne's Act as applicable to the franchise—the principle which determines the election of Vestries; and he said that was the principle upon which he would give Reform. That is the kind of Reform which the country may expect when the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends come to deal with the question. But I perceive that there are signs of mutiny against the Front Opposition Bench; and the greatest advance the Government could have made was to find that there was mutiny on the part of the Lord Mayor. The noble Lord who moved the Amendment has advanced nothing by way of contradiction to this Bill; and in what shape does he plead for delay? He does not plead for an indefinite delay; but he says he wishes first to see the Registration Bill. Why does he want to see that? He does not only wish to look at it. He wishes to discuss it together with this Bill, and to be able to point to every line of it as a reason for opposing the present Bill. He wishes to be, in effect, in Committee on a Registration Bill whilst we are discussing the Motion to read a second time this Franchise Bill. It is also urged that the present time is inopportune for this Bill, and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Rutland (Mr. J. W. Lowther) has said, in a very able speech, that such a measure ought never to be introduced at the tail of a Parliament. Does he wish the Government to introduce such a measure in the first years of the existence of a Parliament? Does he not know that a Franchise Bill can never be introduced except at the tail of a Parliament; because the moment it is introduced the tail of a Parliament comes into existence? Then it is said, that before we introduce such a Bill as this we ought to look and see what is going on around us, and only introduce it when the surrounding circumstances are favourable. Then, when are we to introduce the Bill? We are to introduce it whenever there shall be peace at home and abroad, either in relation to this country or to the whole world. The hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), in a speech to-night which I wish more Members had heard, pointed out another argument which has been used. It is said, he remarked, that you must introduce your Bill when the agricultural labourers and the working classes of England are in a state of disturbance, and when similar classes in Ireland are in a state of perfect content. But if you are to wait for that time to arrive, when will the Bill be introduced? It is idle to say that justice should be denied, if it be justice, until all this is accomplished. I have but few words to say in regard to the speech of the right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen). Sir, my right hon. Friend will, I am sure, wish that my personal regard for him shall not interfere with what I may think it right to say in regard to his speech. If he will allow me to say so, that speech scarcely seemed to me to be a speech that should have been delivered by a Member of the Liberal Party. Perhaps it will not be agreeable to him if I say that there will be very great difficulty for him to make that speech accord with the views of the Liberal Party; but all I will say is that the Members of the Liberal Party will find it very difficult to make their views come into accord with that speech. [Opposition cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman listens to the echo of those cheers, and finds that the Conservatives are in accord with him—a fact which supports what I said just now. I have read speeches something like that of my right hon. Friend delivered in the year 1866 by Mr. Robert Lowe, a supporter of the then Government, and who spoke just in the same tone. And I heard a speech very much like it delivered in the year 1876 by the right hon. Gentleman himself, who then spoke from the ranks of the Liberal Party. Taking that speech which my right hon. Friend has made to-night—taking it as a whole, I will say that it is not one which can support the cause of the Liberal Party. What did it amount to? Total timidity towards those who have not a certain degree of wealth, and nothing else. "Aye," said the right hon. Gentleman, "I have no confidence or trust in the class below the £12 householder!"

MR. GOSCHEN: I am sure my hon. and learned Friend would not wish to misrepresent me. I said nothing of the kind. I said I was not prepared to give them an absolute preponderance among the electors; but I also spoke of their high qualifications.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): The right hon. Gentleman is not prepared to give them a preponderance, as he calls it, because he wants confidence in them. Why is that? My right hon. Friend's whole argument was founded on the fact that he could not have sufficient confidence in them to give them a vote? How are they to get a preponderance unless they get a vote? The preponderance is the result of the vote. My right hon. Friend's statement was that he had not confidence in them sufficient to give them the vote—[Several MEMBERS: Preponderance.]—to give them the vote which gives them a preponderance.

MR. GOSCHEN: I am sure my hon. and learned Friend does not wish to misrepresent me. I did not say that they should not have the vote; but I claimed that it should be accompanied by checks and safeguards. [An hon. MEMBER: Flash cheques!]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I agree that my right hon. Friend did not say that he wished they should be deprived of the vote; but he wanted it to be accompanied by checks and safeguards, so that he has not the same degree of confidence in the class below the £12 householder that he has in the classes above, or he would not want to enforce checks and safeguards in the case of the one class and not in the case of the others. Sir, that very phrase "£12 householder" sounded to me as a phrase from a bye-gone time; that language is obsolete. It became obsolete in 1867. You cannot elect to use the phraseology of the £12 householder in the county and not to use it in the town. You swept it away from the Statute Book in 1867. My right hon. Friend wishes to restore it in 1884. Does not the right hon. Gentleman see that this Democracy, of which he is so timid, is far more strongly developed among the urban than among the rural populations? He has cheerfully trusted it in the towns in 1867 and 1869; and now that he sees the effect and knows what it is he refuses, with great timidity of political character, to trust it. Sir, hon. Gentlemen opposite cheered my right hon. Friend. They were quite right to show their satisfaction with his speech—to show more joy over the right hon. Member for Ripon than over the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie). But they cheered him as if he were a new convert. He is nothing of the kind. It is true he has had different opinions at different times. I know no one who has done more for the cause of enfranchisement than my right hon. Friend. In 1869 there was an Act passed which bears his name, by which was enfranchised, if I may use the term, the most democratic section of our town populations. He freely gave the vote then to the Democracy who did not pay the rates. Let the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) bear that in mind when pleading for a rate-paying qualification—let him bear in mind that it was the hand of the right hon. Member for Ripon which removed that qualification from all the householders whose dwellings were so small that the rates were not worth the trouble of collection. His was the hand which trusted the Democracy of the towns—it was he who gave the vote to that very Democracy of which he is now so frightened. Between 1869 and 1876 the fruits of experience brought him to the conclusion that it was impossible, or at least unwise, to extend the franchise and the influence of the Democracy; and, speaking from that Front Bench opposite, he formed one of a Party of two who voted against the proposal made in 1876. Happily, his Party is less in 1884 than it was in 1876. It did number two Members then; it will only number one to-night. Not a single Member upon these Benches will he take with him into the Lobby. He has been cheered by the Tory Party in every proposition he has laid down; and that is the reason why there is a difficulty in making our views and our principles accord with his. But what are the checks and safeguards which he asks for? He says—"I would ask you, before I vote for the Bill, to tell me what are the safeguards which you are about to give in order to insure the representation of minorities?" Will not my right hon. Friend consider that in thus acting as an opponent to the Bill on its second reading he is taking a course which will do harm to those who are seeking to secure the representation of minorities—to those who, as matters stand, want to see no undue preponderance given to any particular class? What are we to do? We are to introduce, I suppose by way of a Bill, some measure which will show what safeguards are to be given to minorities, and which will be satisfactory to the right hon. Gentleman. The price is too high, and the return too small. We shall endanger the Franchise Bill and gain one vote on this coming Division. What would be the fate of such a Bill if we placed it on the Table and we had my right hon. Friend discussing it, and the noble Lord opposite discussing it, and the whole House discussing it, while the Bill which is now before us, and which presents the main principle, would have to be put on one side until we had satisfied all the most learned views and scruples of my right hon. Friend, and of all those who would support him. My right hon. Friend admits that he does not claim to be a friend to this Bill—at best he accepts it reluctantly. He has told us that he is not one of those who wishes to swim with the stream. Well, Sir, that may be true enough; perhaps it is not always wise to attempt to do it. But has he not learnt that there are some streams which you cannot breast—some onward streams which bear men with them? This question which we are now discussing is like one of those powerful currents. We have gone too far with it to enable us to recede; and the extent to which it has been developed rests not with individual Members, but with the whole House. This question stops the way; and whoever may have charge of this measure must know that the sooner it is put out of the way the better it will be for all concerned. No Conservative Government could live for a year in this House without undertaking this question and dealing with it.

The Attorney General

"Put it out of the way," says the noble Lord. Does he think it can be put out of the way by the Amendment he has moved? The right hon. Gentleman has rightly described it. He says it bids us pause. You might just as well say that a comma in the middle of a sentence means the end of a book as to tell me that the adoption of the Amendment before us would settle this question. It is idle to bid us pause; for you know that the work must be resumed, and must be continued to the end. The introduction of these 2,000,000 of men to the franchise must come. How, then, are we to receive them? Are we to receive them with words of distrust, and with a grudging instead of with an open hand? When we are giving them political power, are we to tell them that they are enemies and not allies? After we have given them education and political knowledge, are we either to refuse to give them the franchise, or admit them to the Constitution as men who are to be distrusted? But now that the support of this measure has gone so far, it has become impossible to resist it, and the only wise course for every man of patriotic views to take is to be generous with an open hand, to welcome to equal rights with ourselves those people who must before long be allowed to record their votes; and not to teach them that we have assumed over them a superiority and an authority which can only produce injustice, and which may result in disaster to the country.

Question put.

TELLERS.

Crichton, Viscount
Winn, R.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday 24th April.

MR. NEWDEGATE gave Notice that, on the Order for going into Committee upon the Bill, he would move—"That the House do go into Committee on this day six months."

REAL ASSETS ADMINISTRATION BILL

(Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Warton.)

[BILL 98.] COMMITTEE.

[Progress 24th March.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2 (Real estate assets in hands of personal representatives).

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR moved, in page 1, line 11, to leave out the words "customaryhold," in order to insert the words "of any other tenure."

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. GREGORY said, the Bill had come before them so very abruptly that he did not think they were in a fair position to consider it at this time. It was a measure which sought to make a most revolutionary change in the law, and it would affect all landed property throughout the country. Under the existing law, the primary fund from which the debts of a deceased person were to be paid was his personal estate; but his real estate might be brought in in case the personal estate was not sufficient. This Bill proposed to place the real estate and the personal estate exactly on the same footing; and the devisee or heir-at-law could not deal with the real estate until all the debts had been paid. This matter required more consideration than could now be given to it, and he should, therefore, move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Gregory.)

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he thought the Committee had already manifested general approval of the provisions of this Bill; and he could hardly understand what reason the hon. Member could have for opposing so moderate a measure. The grounds he now put forward were grounds which should have been brought forward on the second reading.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he thought the hon. Member was not dealing quite fairly in saying that the objections now taken should have been advanced on the second reading. It was understood that the provisions of the Bill would be carefully considered by the Law Advisers, and that the Committee should then have the benefit of their exertions; but it did not seem that they had had time to explain their views. It appeared to him that the hon. Member (Mr. Gregory) was reasonable in objecting to proceed now.

Question put, and negatived.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 11, to leave out from "be assets" to end of Clause, and insert "notwithstanding any testamentary disposition, devolve upon and become vested in his legal personal representative or representatives from time to time and subject to the payment of his debts."—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. WHITLEY asked for the opinion of the Law Advisers, because this was a Bill of an extraordinary character. When a person left freehold property to anyone, it did not pass to the devisee as real estate, but to the executor as a personal asset; and it would be a matter of serious consequence that no man who had property should be able to part with it except under the conditions here provided. Such a change ought not to be introduced by a private Member, for such a change respecting the devolution of property was one of great importance. A Bill of this kind ought not to pass except on the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the real question was, whether this Bill would improve the law? If it would, then they ought to welcome it even from a private Member. He believed there could be no question that heavy expenses were caused at the present time by assets being administered under suits only for the purpose of securing that real property should become chargeable for debts. Obviously, if that could be avoided it would be very desirable, because it was not to the advantage of owners of property that it should be wasted in Law Courts for the purpose of administration, which only became necessary through the circumstances of the moment. He had endeavoured to assist the hon. Gentleman opposite with his Bill, by putting before him such Amendments as might meet some of the difficulties that had been raised. This first Amendment, as to the property vesting in a legal personal representative, was drawn in terms which had received the approval and authority of the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch (Mr. Horace Davey), who was no mean authority on the subject; and also of an eminent conveyancer, Mr. William Barber. The scheme was also recommended by a Select Committee of that House; therefore, there was considerable authority in favour of the Bill. All leasehold estates, however long the term, vested in a legal personal representative, and he had not heard that that had caused any real difficulty; and he did not see why there should be any difficulty when freeholds were vested in the same manner. It had been urged that they might be charged with debts; but that charge was, in the first instance, on the property; and although it was vested in a devisee he could not sell it until it was seen that the charge would be met. They could not get rid of that by throwing it into Chancery; they would still be faced with a difficulty; and he did not see that that would be increased by the propositions of the Bill. On the other hand, he believed that they would be relieved of very considerable law costs; and a Committee of that House some years ago held that a provision of that kind would tend very greatly to simplify titles, and would not tend to the contrary result, as hon. Gentlemen supposed. The late Lord Chancellor had stated that although he saw difficulties in the way, he also saw advantages in that scheme. Therefore, he thought that he had shown that the matter had not passed without consideration; at the same time, he thought the hon. Member in charge of the Bill would be well advised to carefully consider and to welcome any suggestions from hon. Members opposite.

MR. GREGORY said, he believed the Bill would cause increased litigation rather than otherwise, because it would lead to continual disputes between the heir-at-law and the personal representative. The real estate would vest, in the first instance, in the personal representative who could not release it until all the debts were ascertained, and who must sell or mortgage it for the payment of them. The Solicitor General had referred to leaseholds; but their case was very different, as they were of the nature of personalty already. He did not see how the Bill could be amended; and as it stood he feared it would lead to a great deal of litigation.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

New Clause :—

(Power of disposition by legal personal representative.)

"The legal personal representatives or representative from time to time of a deceased person shall have power to dispose of and otherwise deal with all real property vested in them or him by virtue of this Act, with all the like incidents, but subject to all the like rights, equities, and obligations as if the same were personal property vested in them or him."—

—brought up, and read the first time.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause :—

(Determination of interest of personal representative.)

"A memorandum, signed by the legal personal representative or representatives for the time being, stating that all the debts of the deceased person have been paid, or that any particular real property is not required for the purpose of paying his debts, shall have the effect of determining the estate and interest of the legal personal representative or representatives of the deceased person under this Act in the real property of the deceased person, or in the portion or portions thereof to which the memorandum relates, and thenceforth the same shall vest in the devisee entitled thereto under any testamentary disposition, or in the deceased person's heir-at-law, as the case may be.

This Act shall not extend to Scotland,"—

—brought up, and read the first time.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to express the deep concern of this House at the great loss which Her Majesty has sustained by the death of His Royal Highness Prince Leopold George Duncan Albert, Duke of Albany, Fourth Son of Her Majesty the Queen, and to condole with Her Majesty on this melancholy occasion:

To assure Her Majesty that this House will ever feel the warmest interest in whatever concerns Her Majesty's domestic Relations; and to declare the ardent wishes of this House for the happiness of Her Majesty and of Her Family

To be presented by Privy Counsellors

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That this House do condole with Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Albany, on the great loss which she has sustained by the Death of His Royal Highness the Duke of Albany

Ordered, That a Message of Condolence be sent to Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Albany, and that the Marquess of Stafford and the Earl of March do attend Her Royal Highness with the said Message
